(d) would be incompatible with any international obligation or the interests of defence or national security.'.

New clause 4—Refusal to lay draft statutory instrument—

'In the event of approval of a draft statutory instrument by the Assembly, as specified in section 94 (5) (a), followed by a refusal to lay that draft statutory instrument before each House of Parliament, as specified in section 94 (7) (b), the Counsel General or the Assembly may refer to the Supreme Court for decision the question whether the Secretary of State's decision to refuse to lay the draft statutory instrument was made reasonably in the circumstances and intra vires.'.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Nick Ainger): Sir Alan, as I was saying only at 10 o'clock last night—

Chris Ruane (Vale of Clwyd) (Lab): It seems like only yesterday.

Nick Ainger: Indeed it does. We were discussing the group of amendments beginning with No. 180, and I was talking about the proposal in the amendment that would require a two-thirds majority before any Order in Council process could begin. I was saying that the Order in Council process is one that is completely different from the Order in Council that would introduce a referendum on primary powers for the Assembly. It is a completely and utterly different order. An Order in Council, for example, that would have brought in the legislation that would have enabled the Assembly to consider the legislation on the public administration ombudsman or transport in Wales would be very different.

4.45 pm

I wish to remind the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) of the situation when parties present their manifestos at election time. If the Welsh Assembly Government that is formed in 2007 is elected on the basis of a manifesto commitment and if that commitment needs new legislation to be delivered, it would be a clear basis for a proposed Order in Council to enable the Assembly to legislate on that matter. With the electoral arrangements that we have for the National Assembly for Wales, it is unlikely that the ruling group or party would have a two-thirds majority. The hon. Gentleman's proposal would mean that a party or group of parties, having fought an election on a proposal, would not be able to legislate for that proposal.

Even when no specific manifesto commitment is involved, such a request will not come out of the blue. To take the transport example that I mentioned earlier, I placed in the Library the Order in Council example with its explanatory memorandum. Before the draft Bill came before the House, we had a full report by the relevant Assembly subject Committee, which led to the conclusion that the Assembly needed further powers to enable it to play a more effective strategic role in transport in Wales. Opposition Members should recognise the fact that the Assembly, as a democratic institution, has an open process for debating and developing policy, as does the Welsh Assembly Government. The requirement for a two-thirds majority before an Order in Council could be introduced is wholly disproportionate.

Amendments Nos. 187 and 212 address an important issue that has been mentioned by right hon. and hon. Members, especially my right hon. Friend the Member for Torfaen (Mr. Murphy). On Second Reading and on several other occasions, he raised the issue of pre-legislative scrutiny and how it will be carried out. I recognise the importance of pre-legislative scrutiny in the proposal for Orders in Council. Several interventions have been made on that point and I am grateful for the many suggestions that have been made as to how that process could be conducted, including the proposals in amendment No. 187.

I should say immediately that I do not think that it is right that the Government should prescribe in the Bill how such scrutiny must be conducted, but that is what amendment No. 187 suggests. That would not allow parliamentarians the proper discretion to determine the most appropriate arrangements. However, in my letter to the hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan) of 17 January, which was circulated and placed in the Library, and which covered the illustrative examples of Orders in Council, I outlined the normal procedure that I envisaged for scrutiny of such proposals. It may be helpful if I run through them again for the benefit of the Committee.

When the Assembly has a proposal, it will discuss it with the UK Government. If broad agreement were reached, the Assembly would produce a proposed draft Order in Council—this is the difference between what is set out in amendment No. 187 and what I propose in my letter. The proposed draft Order in Council would be accompanied by an explanatory memorandum, as is shown in the examples attached to the letter. It is worth pointing out that the proposed draft Order in Council could be amended, which would mean that more weight would be given to pre-legislative scrutiny than would be the case if the process of scrutiny did not allow amendments to be made, which I understand is what is set out in amendment No. 187.

Mr. Dominic Grieve (Beaconsfield) (Con): Who would be doing the amending, and in what setting?

Nick Ainger: Let me continue to go through the process.

The Secretary of State would forward the proposed Order in Council to the appropriate parliamentary body—for example, the Welsh Affairs Committee—in the same way as is the case when draft Bills receive pre-legislative scrutiny. It would be open for any other Select Committee to scrutinise the proposal. When draft Bills receive pre-legislative scrutiny, the Wales Office announces that the public may give their views and, if they wish, contact their Member of Parliament, who may wish to contribute to the process. Pre-legislative scrutiny would thus not be restricted to Members of the House because members of the public could contribute their views.

The practice of joint scrutiny between the Welsh Affairs Committee and Assembly Committees has worked well in the past. Depending on the type of Order in Council, the Welsh Affairs Committee could choose to continue with that arrangement, or decide to examine the proposal separately. That would be a matter for the Committee, but such a process would assist in gathering the widest possible input into the consideration of the proposal.

I did not mention this in my letter, but as part of the pre-legislative scrutiny of draft Bills, reports of the Welsh Affairs Committee have regularly been debated in the Welsh Grand Committee. I have noted the thoughts of my right hon. Friend the Member for Torfaen about that. We would encourage such debates on proposed Orders in Council. If it were felt that such a debate in the Welsh Grand Committee would help the process, we certainly would not put any obstacles in the way of that. I also agree that it is important that all hon. Members have the opportunity to comment on a proposed draft Order in Council, to ask questions about its scope and to propose ways in which amendments could be made.

Mr. Roger Williams (Brecon and Radnorshire) (LD): Has the Minister made any assessment of how many Orders in Council might have been brought forward in any specific year, such as during the previous year? We must consider not only Wales-only legislation, but the Welsh elements of England and Wales Bills. The Childcare Bill is going through the House at the moment. Would that require a separate Order in Council? If so, how many times would the Welsh Grand Committee need to meet to consider all the Orders in Council?

Nick Ainger: It is difficult to give a totally accurate prediction of how many Orders in Council will come through. Orders in Council would not be required for primary legislation because the arrangements under which primary legislation gives secondary legislative powers to the Assembly would continue. It would be for Parliament to decide whether it was happy for such powers to be passed on, as is the case at the moment. I do not envisage that the number of proposals for Assembly Measures would be much greater than the number of requests for primary legislation that come through at present. However, the First Minister said that he would be surprised if there were more than five or six a year. I hope that that is helpful.

On the scrutiny and involvement of all hon. Members, my right hon. Friend the Member for Torfaen asked whether it was possible for those who are not members of the Welsh Grand Committee to attend its debates. Again, we cannot dictate to the House what should happen. That is for the House to decide under its Standing Orders. However, I am sure that if a good case were made for an amendment to the Standing Orders—perhaps to consider a particular Order in Council or Orders in Council in general—the House could change its Standing Orders to widen the membership.

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West) (Lab): Would the Minister support such an application?

Nick Ainger: I would have no problem with that. In addition, there is nothing to prevent a report by the Welsh Affairs Committee on a particular Order in Council from being debated in Westminster Hall. Again, hon. Members could make a contribution in that way, which would be open to everyone. That is an alternative to the Welsh Grand Committee.

The hon. Member for Beaconsfield asked how Orders in Council would be amended. Once pre-legislative scrutiny is complete, reports will have been produced by the Welsh Affairs Committee. The Welsh Assembly might also have produced a report, and there may well be minutes of the Welsh Affairs Committee or, perhaps, the debate in Westminster Hall. Those will be taken into account, along with changes or problems highlighted in the pre-legislative scrutiny. Once that has been put together, the Secretary of State will liaise with the Welsh Assembly Government to produce a finalised draft Order in Council. Then, and only then, would the Secretary of State lay the draft Order in Council in an unamendable form for the 90-minute debates in both Houses of Parliament, inviting their approval. I would expect those debates to take place on the Floor of the House, certainly in the early days of the process. That process follows the successful model, developed over a number of years, for the pre-legislative scrutiny of draft Bills, which has helped to improve those Bills and ease their passage through the House. It represents a good model to apply to the Orders in Council.

The Government welcome and encourage pre-legislative scrutiny of proposals for enhanced legislative competence. At the same time, there should be flexibility in the system. I would not wish either the Welsh Affairs Committee or the Welsh Grand Committee to have their business dictated by statute, which is the implication of amendments Nos. 187 and 212.

Amendment No. 187 would also set fixed time scales for the draft Orders in Council. I am not talking about proposed draft Orders in Council; it clearly refers to draft Orders in Council that have been finalised by the Assembly after pre-legislative scrutiny. The amendment would require those to be laid before Parliament for 60 days—the so-called super-affirmative procedure. As I said, there will have been ample opportunity for hon. Members to have taken part in the pre-legislative scrutiny, so there is no need for a fixed period.

The hon. Gentleman did not put much emphasis on draft Measures that are attached to the draft Order in Council. I remind Members that, by their nature, the Orders in Council do not change the substance of the law. Substantive changes of law would be made by the Assembly Measures themselves. Assembly Measures will be subject to detailed scrutiny by the Assembly. That is what we term the enhanced legislative process, which part 3 is all about.

Mr. Grieve: I suspect that I may not have spent as much time on this as I should have, in the hope that we would make some progress after yesterday's quite slow progress. There is an important issue, because it is far from clear—the Minister will appreciate this—to what extent the Order in Council will give an indication to Members of this House of what in reality will be in the Measure. I appreciate that there is a difficulty. The Measure has to be fleshed out by the Assembly and that cannot be done here, but how will reassurance be provided to Members of this House that they are not writing a blank cheque?

Nick Ainger: I am not sure whether the hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham gave the hon. Gentleman a copy of my letter of 17 January and the attachments thereto, but there will be a clear indication in the attached memorandums of what such Measures will cover, the reasons behind them, the policy development and so on. I am pretty certain that pre-legislative scrutiny will be able to tease out any other issues that may not have been fully explained in the explanatory memorandum. I am also pretty certain that the Welsh Affairs Committee, the Welsh Grand Committee or any other Committee of this House would be able to establish whether they were getting a pig in a poke. I hope that the hon. Gentleman is reassured on that point.

Amendments Nos. 122, 123, 181, 53 and 54 relate to the role of the Secretary of State. Much has been made of the fact that the Secretary of State has discretion whether to lay a draft legislative competence order—or an Order in Council—before both Houses, but that position is perfectly reasonable and rational. As I explained earlier, these proposals will not come out of the blue. Normally, the preliminary draft Orders in Council and the explanatory material that will accompany the draft would reflect the outcome of discussions between the Welsh Assembly Government and the UK Government, so that issues of scope, clarity and vires would have been thoroughly thought through before even the preliminary draft was laid before Parliament for pre-legislative scrutiny.

The Secretary of State should be cast not in the role of Napoleon, as the right hon. Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer) implied, but genuinely as an honest broker. It would in any event be unreasonable to force the Secretary of State to lay before the House a draft order that he or she felt was defective, unworkable or premature. The provisions will ensure not only that the proposals that are put before Parliament are properly prepared but that the Government's view on them is clear.

In new clause 4, the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Llwyd) proposes that the Assembly or Counsel General should be able to refer to the Supreme Court any decision by the Secretary of State to refuse to lay a draft Order in Council before each House of Parliament, so that the Supreme Court could decide whether such a decision was reasonable and intra vires. I do not believe that such a provision is necessary. The Bill already provides for the Secretary of State to give notice of his reasons for refusing to lay the draft Order in Council. That, in itself, is a powerful incentive to any Secretary of State to ensure that he or she has good reasons for any refusal to lay such a draft. The Assembly and the public at large would know the Secretary of State's reasons for refusing.

Mr. Elfyn Llwyd (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy) (PC): I hear what the Under-Secretary says, but the only reference in the White Paper to the Secretary of State's duty to provide reasons is a statement that the reasons he gives should not be trivial. That does not take us very far. Can the Under-Secretary provide examples of why the Secretary of State should refuse to lay a draft Order in Council?

Nick Ainger: Pre-legislative scrutiny might have failed to tease out an issue relating to whether the Measure fits correctly within one of the fields. The Secretary of State would therefore query whether the proposal is workable and firmly grounded. In such a case, he would say, "There is something wrong with this proposal—I cannot support it. The Assembly should consider the matter again." That is the type of case that we have in mind. Understandably, some have argued that the Secretary of State might block an Order in Council for purely political reasons—because he did not like the contents of the Measure—but we do not expect the process to work in that way. I hope that the hon. Gentleman is satisfied with that answer.

David T.C. Davies (Monmouth) (Con): I appreciate that the Minister is attempting to reassure us that the Secretary of State would never turn down an application for political reasons, but although that might be the present intention, the Bill as drafted allows the Secretary of State for Wales, now or in future, to turn down a Measure for political reasons, if he or she wishes to. I cast no aspersions on the present Secretary of State when I say that, although that might be the present intention, if the wording of the Bill is not amended, it might not necessarily be what happens in future.

Nick Ainger: The political reality is that if the Secretary of State's reasons were weak or unconvincing, he would come under considerable public pressure. In addition, the Bill provides powers for the Counsel General to refer questions to the Supreme Court—for example, whether a matter relates to a field listed in part 1 of schedule 5. However, careful thought must be given to when those powers are required. In general, we have provided such powers where the question is clearly one of legal interpretation and requires a decision of the senior judiciary, given the constitutional significance of the matter in question. In such a case, judicial review is available to anyone who thinks that the Secretary of State's decision is unreasonable. An additional power for the Assembly or the Counsel General to refer the Secretary of State's decision to the Supreme Court is not necessary. Furthermore, the Secretary of State's decision is an Executive decision and is therefore qualitatively different from matters in respect of which the Bill provides a power for the Counsel General and the Attorney-General to refer questions to the Supreme Court.

I have taken some time to respond to an important debate, which started last night. I hope that what I have said persuades Opposition Members that our proposal is reasonable and that we expect to have rigorous and effective pre-legislative scrutiny. I urge the hon. Member for Beaconsfield to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. Grieve: I thank the Minister for the way in which he has presented the Government's case, both yesterday and today.

I said at the outset that amendment No. 180 was probing in nature. It was designed to highlight the difference of approach in the part 4 and part 3 procedures. The Minister is right, and I accept that if the amendment were to be accepted, it would have a sclerotic effect on the way in which the Assembly functions. Although I may have serious reservations about the operation of part 3 in principle, as the Minister no doubt realises, it is not my purpose to scupper it by making it ineffective if Parliament decides it wants part 3 in place. For those reasons, I shall not press amendment No. 180 to a Division.

I hope that in due course it will be possible to press amendment No. 187. I continue to have serious reservations about the scrutiny procedure. I am grateful to the Minister for the letter that he wrote to my hon. Friend the Member for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan) on 17 January and the two memorandums attached to it, which I had an opportunity to read before they were put in the Library. They make interesting reading. I can see how the Government seek to involve the House and the Welsh Grand Committee in the formulation of policy in Wales and in taking a decision whether the Welsh Assembly should be allowed to pass an Assembly Measure.

However, as I am sure the Minister recognises, the word "amendable" in the context of what goes on in this House usually suggests that it is possible to table an amendment and carry it by some vote or other or with the agreement of all concerned, so that the text can be varied. That, of course, is not possible under the proposed procedure, which envisages a consultation mechanism by which a draft order can be scrutinised. If individuals in the House or elsewhere—the various public bodies that the Government intend to consult—succeed in raising sufficient objection to make the Government consider that there may be a mistake in the drafting of the scope of the order, or that they may have difficulty getting the order in its present form through the House, they can redraft it and present a new order. That, as I am sure the Minister acknowledges, is not the same as an amendable order. It is an entirely different creature.

In those circumstances, the House faces a possible difficulty. I shall not revisit the debate that we had yesterday on my first amendment, No. 161. That suggested to the Government that one possible way of proceeding was to hold a further vote after the Assembly Measure was drawn up and before it was submitted to Her Majesty in Council for ratification. In terms of the House having scrutiny of what is passed in Wales, that to my mind remains a better mechanism, but if that is not to be the course of action, we need to set out formally a procedure that will allow the House to undertake pre-scrutiny.

The Minister worried me a little in the course of his comments, because he made it clear, rightly, that the system could be short-circuited. We will be relying on the Standing Orders of the House. No formal mechanism will be prescribed. That is not adequate. The Government need to consider what mechanism they want for the proper scrutiny process to take place. If amendment No. 187 is not a suitable vehicle for that, I look forward to a Government alternative being tabled on Report.

As we are dealing with a novel area—I cannot think of previous legislation of this kind—I am not persuaded that the existing informal systems, which are enshrined only in convention and Standing Orders, are adequate. If the House is to have a proper role in deciding whether the Welsh Assembly should legislate, there is no reason why the scrutiny procedure should not be laid down in primary legislation. For those reasons, I seek to put amendment No. 187 to the vote. Even if it is not carried, it may be an inducement to the Government to consider the matter further. Subject to that, I seek leave to withdraw amendment No. 180, and to press amendment No. 187 to the vote.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

[Mr. Grieve]

Amendment proposed: No. 187, in page 51, line 29, at end insert—

'(5A) Any draft of an Order in Council laid before Parliament under this section must be accompanied by—

(a) a detailed memorandum setting out the scope of the proposal, its practical effects on Wales and the legislative authority that would pass to the National Assembly, and

(b) a draft of the proposed Assembly Measure.

(5B) Before an Order in Council is subject to a resolution of both Houses of Parliament, the Secretary of State must make a motion to refer the draft of the Order in Council, along with the draft Assembly Measure, to the Welsh Grand Committee for consideration.

(5C) A report of the debate in the Welsh Grand Committee on the draft Order in Council and Assembly Measure must have been available to both Houses of Parliament for a period of not less than 60 days before any Order in Council is made under this section.'.—[Mr. Grieve.]

Clause 95

Scrutiny of proposed Orders in Council by Supreme Court

Hywel Williams (Caernarfon) (PC): I beg to move amendment No. 28, in clause 95, page 52, line 11, after 'Counsel General', insert 'or the Assembly'.

The Temporary Chairman (Mr. Joe Benton): With this it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 29, in clause 98, page 53, line 44, after 'Counsel-General', insert 'or the Assembly'.

No. 41, in schedule 9, page 136, line 33, at end insert 'or the Assembly'.

No. 42, in schedule 9, page 140, line 14, after 'Counsel-General', insert 'or the Assembly'.

Hywel Williams: The amendments would enable not just the Counsel-General and the Attorney-General but the Assembly itself to appeal to the Supreme Court on disputes about whether the Assembly has acted within its powers. It seems entirely reasonable for the elected Assembly to have that power, and unreasonable that it should not. The Bill proposes a separation of the Assembly from the Government, which is very welcome, of course. But the two are being treated differently, with the elected body coming off worse.

The Counsel-General, as I understand it, is deemed to be a Minister. While the power of referral to the Supreme Court is appropriate as a ministerial power, why is it not so for the elected body? However much the Assembly might wish to do so, as things are it cannot appeal to the Supreme Court. In certain circumstances, it might be appropriate to confer on an elected body, because of its standing as an elected body, powers that it would be inappropriate to confer on an individual appointed Minister. However, in spite of that excellent principle, the elected body is coming off worse here. Furthermore, what recourse would there be for the Assembly if the Counsel-General refused to refer the matter to the Supreme Court for reasons that the Assembly might not accept? What recourse would there be for the Assembly and the Counsel-General if the Attorney-General refused to refer a matter to the Supreme Court for reasons that they might not accept?

We can speculate about disagreements on referral to the Supreme Court between the Counsel-General and the Attorney-General, but that probably goes beyond the scope of the amendment. Given the Assembly's status as the elected body and as something separate from the Executive, and given those potential problems, we think that there is reason for the Assembly to have direct recourse to the Supreme Court.

Mr. Grieve: I am not minded to support the amendment, but it raises a pertinent issue. It might be helpful if the Minister took the opportunity to explain the nature of the relationship that will exist between the Counsel-General and the Assembly. There is some lack of clarity in the Bill's text about whether the Counsel-General is the servant of the Executive and the Ministers or of the Assembly, or of both.

Of course, in this House, the Attorney-General fulfils a function both as the Government's adviser and, in theory, an adviser to the House, although because he is not a Member of the House, it is difficult for him to discharge that responsibility. I have not seen the Solicitor-General fulfil that function since he was appointed. It is an issue on which there needs to be some clarity.

On the face of it, I can see why the Government have restricted the right to make a reference to the Counsel-General or the Attorney-General, but it raises the question of what the Counsel-General's duties will be and how he should discharge them. I assume that by virtue of his office he has to cast a wholly impartial eye over legislation and, if he thinks that there is an issue of controversy or difficulty, to make the reference. However, that raises a question about the extent to which he should be seen to act and will act independently and the extent to which he will be seen as a creature of the Executive.

The standard problem that could arise, I suppose, is an issue on which there is disagreement between the Assembly and Ministers. We should like some reassurance from the Government as to how they see this working in practice.

Mr. John Gummer (Suffolk, Coastal) (Con): Could we have a clear explanation of this, for another reason? I am rather minded to support the amendment, which seems merely to point out the nonsense of so much of the interior tergiversations that are going on in this clause. The thing that concerns me is the role of the Counsel-General. If he can be shown to be an independent figure able to take a proper legal view of what the Assembly wants, there may be an argument for saying that the Assembly, separate from the Counsel-General, should not have an application to the Supreme Court. The Minister must convince us that the Counsel-General will not be a creature of the Government but a proper servant of the Assembly. If he can so convince us, it would be perfectly proper to leave the Counsel-General that access, because of his legal position, but the Minister would have to be significantly more convincing than either the explanatory notes or what we have heard so far from him. I hope that he will help me.

Nick Ainger: Clause 95 gives a specific power to the Counsel-General and the Attorney-General to make a reference to the Supreme Court, where they would like a decision on whether a particular matter specified in a proposed Order in Council actually relates to a field listed in part 1 of schedule 5.

We think that this should be a power for the Counsel-General or Attorney-General to exercise, because it is all about legal interpretation. Does the matter, as described in the proposed Order in Council, actually relate to a field as set out in part 1 of schedule 5? In most cases, it should be clear whether a matter relates to a specified field or not, so in most cases it will not be necessary to use this power. However, in the less clear-cut cases, the Counsel-General or Attorney-General will need to make a judgment as to whether a decision is required from the Supreme Court so that there is clarity on whether a matter is relevant or not.

On a technical point, the Assembly will be an unincorporated association of 60 members. As such the Assembly itself could not institute proceedings in court, but it is possible that the Assembly Commission could act on its behalf. However, that is just a technical point. On the principle that I think the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Hywel Williams) is proposing, I still believe that it is inappropriate and unnecessary for a legal representative of the Assembly, as a legislature, to have such a role. The Counsel-General would be acting to represent Welsh devolution interests in proceedings involving devolution issues. It would seem odd to have two people able to carry out this role.

The position of Counsel-General means that there is someone with status similar to that of Attorney-General—this touches on the points that the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) and the right hon. Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer) made—to represent devolution interests in proceedings.

[Nick Ainger]

Opposition Members should welcome the fact that the Bill creates a post that can represent Welsh devolution interests in proceedings. But the provisions in the Bill correspond with provisions made with respect to Scotland and Northern Ireland.

The Counsel-General's appointment will have to meet with the approval of the Assembly, which should also enable the Assembly to signal that it has confidence in that person's ability to represent Welsh interests.

Mr. Gummer: Would the Counsel-General be required to give advice to the Assembly? In other words, if the Assembly were to say to the Counsel-General, "We think this is a matter you ought to look at," will he be required to give the reasons for his decision not to refer it to the Supreme Court or would he be like the Attorney-General, who never gives the reasons for his advice?

Nick Ainger: I assume, bearing it in mind that the Counsel-General is a member of the Welsh Assembly Government, that when he is approached—we are talking about whether an Order in Council fits in with part 1 of schedule 5—he will be open in giving his opinion as to whether he thought that it did or did not fit in.

I hope that I have answered the point that the hon. Member raised in his amendment. I hope that I have been able to reassure him that the amendments are not necessary, that the Counsel-General will be able to ensure that advice is given to the Assembly and that if there is a question as to whether the issue relates to part 1 of schedule 5, he will refer the matter to the Supreme Court.

Mr. Grieve: The Counsel-General may be a Member of the Assembly, but then again he may not. The option is open. We know from clause 49 that his appointment has to be ratified by the Assembly, but it is not clear how the Assembly would apply pressure, for instance, for his removal. Indeed, this applies to all the Welsh Ministers. I do not know whether it would be possible for the Welsh Assembly to move a motion for someone's salary to be reduced or, indeed, extinguished, which is the way we in this House normally go around these things if we wish to register our displeasure with a Minister's conduct.

There are some issues of procedure. I accept that, ultimately, if the First Minister stands by a Counsel-General who is not performing adequately, that will lead to a crisis in which the Executive might be overturned by the Assembly. Nevertheless, that is a bit of a nuclear button option. In this House, we have other ways of showing clearly that someone has lost our confidence.

David T.C. Davies: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Grieve: No, I cannot. I was intervening on the Minister.

6 pm

Nick Ainger: It was a long intervention, but not that long. I think that it was an intervention rather than a speech. Perhaps I should have been urging the hon. Gentleman to give way.

Mr. Benton, I do not wish to go out of order. Strictly speaking, we are starting to discuss the issues set out in clause 49. The Assembly would have the power to vote for a reduction in salary. As clause 49 makes clear, proceedings are laid out in the Bill that would have to be followed either to appoint or to remove the Counsel-General.

I think that I have responded to the points raised adequately. I am conscious that we need to make progress, and I urge the hon. Gentleman to withdraw his amendment.

Hywel Williams: I thank the Minister for that response. We welcome the creation of the post and, given his reassurance to me and to the right hon. Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer) on the Counsel-General's role in advising the Assembly as well as the Government—notwithstanding that he is counted as a Minister—I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

David Mundell (Dumfriesshire, Clydesdale and Tweeddale) (Con): I beg to move amendment No. 188, in page 52, line 11, leave out 'may' and insert 'must'.

This is a probing amendment. I accept, before the Minister tells me, that "must" would be overly prescriptive, but the explanatory notes are, unfortunately, simply a replication of the clause and it would therefore be helpful if the Minister set out the criteria that would define "may" as it currently appears in the clause.

Nick Ainger: I am glad that the hon. Gentleman said that this is a probing amendment, because if accepted it would mean that every Order in Council would have to be referred to the Supreme Court. Clearly, he does not propose that. Occasionally, it will be necessary to obtain the opinion of the Supreme Court and the Bill provides for that. That is why the clause contains the word "may" and I invite the hon. Gentleman to withdraw his amendment.

David Mundell: I am disappointed that we did not get an example, or a definition of the criteria that would cause the process to be used. On other occasions on which the provisions in the Bill have not been entirely clear, the Minister has helpfully set out examples. Given where we are in our proceedings, I shall not press the matter further, but it would be helpful if the Minister could identify more fully the circumstances in which the process would be used. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 95 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 96

INTRODUCTION OF PROPOSED ASSEMBLY MEASURES

Hywel Williams: I beg to move amendment No. 30, in page 52, line 21, at end insert

', or

(c) by any committee of the Assembly established under section 28 or section 30.'.

Clause 96(1)(a) and (b) provide that an Assembly Measure may be introduced to the Assembly

"by the First Minister, any ... Minister ... any Deputy ... Minister or the Counsel General, or ... by any other Assembly member."

The amendment would add to that list any Committee of the Assembly. It is a probing amendment, but I hope that the Minister will respond to a couple of points.

Committees fulfil an important function in the Assembly. They are potentially a resource of great expertise and, in fulfilling their scrutiny function, they will be familiar with the detail of issues and in a good position to be innovative in their thinking. Any Measure proposed by a Committee would still be subject to all the scrutiny procedures that would apply to Measures proposed by Ministers or Back Benchers, but such a Measure would have all the advantages of having been scrutinised in detail beforehand by Members from all parties who would have reached a consensus. The Measure would be all the better for it. I hardly need remind the Committee that cross-party consensus is a prized commodity when promoting legislation. If, for some reason, a consensus had not been reached, the Assembly and, I dare say, this place and the other place could draw their own conclusions when giving the Measure further consideration.

It may be argued that the role of Committees is to hold the Government to account, but it is also their role to contribute to policy development. Committees will need to be reactive to the Government's legislative priorities, but it has been said that it is necessary

"to strike a proper balance between doing things that are the Government's agenda and setting your own agenda."

That quotation comes from evidence given to the National Assembly's Committee on the Better Governance of Wales White Paper—its report was published in September last year—by the Clerk to the House of Commons. I am sure that hon. Members will agree that it is an excellent recommendation.

6.15 pm

As Professor McAllister said, also in that report, we should see

"policy development and scrutiny as part of the same linear equation".

Hon. Members' grasp of algebra might be as variable as mine, but her point is clear. This amendment is based on solid experience. There have been several Scottish examples of Committees being successful in generating legislation, as was shown in the report. That was also the case in respect of the Northern Ireland Assembly in the past. The process works and has proven useful. That is one reason why the National Assembly Committee recommended that Committees should be able to propose Measures. We endorse that view and invite other hon. Members to support us.

David T.C. Davies: I offer my support for the amendment. It would appear to be anomalous that Assembly Committees cannot bring forward Measures. However, I wish to add a word of warning. In my experience of six years in the Welsh Assembly and my more limited experience in the House of Commons, I have noticed that the Committee system here works far better. I am not certain what the problem is, but it is probably to do with the number of Assembly Members and the fact that everyone knows everyone else so well. Also, most of the Committees are chaired by members of the governing party. Whatever the reason, the culture in this place is that Committees act independently and impartially and that, to some extent, people leave behind their political allegiances. That is certainly not the case in Assembly Committees, and I would therefore be cautious about suggestions that they function as well and as impartially as Committees in this place.

Hywel Williams: They might do so some day.

David T.C. Davies: My hon. Friend—if I may call him that—says that they may do so in the future, and I suggest that we wait and see. At the moment, the Assembly Committees are not as impartial and too many of their members are in the thrall of the party Whips.

Nick Ainger: It may assist Opposition Members if I say that I agree that it may in some circumstances be appropriate for an Assembly Committee to propose an Assembly Measure. For that reason, the Bill does not prevent Committees from doing so. Clause 96 ensures that Ministers and individual Members have the right to propose Measures, subject to the provision of standing orders. However, there is nothing to prevent standing orders from providing that Committees may also propose Measures. It is appropriate for the Assembly's Standing Orders to make any provision relating to the proposal of Measures that is additional to the minimum provision in clause 96. The amendment is not therefore necessary and I invite the hon. Gentleman to withdraw it.

Hywel Williams: I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 96 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 97

PROCEEDINGS ON PROPOSED ASSEMBLY MEASURES

Mr. Grieve: I beg to move amendment No. 170, in page 53, line 5, leave out subsection (2).

The Temporary Chairman: With this it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 172, in page 53, line 11, at end insert 'and'.

No. 173, in page 53, line 13, leave out 'and'.

No. 171, in page 53, line 14, leave out paragraph (c).

No. 174, in page 53, line 22, leave out from 'Welsh' to end of line 24.

Mr. Grieve: Clause 97 will regulate proceedings on proposed Assembly Measures. Subsection (1) provides that there should be a threefold procedure in the Assembly: a vote on general principles, an opportunity for the Assembly to consider Assembly Measures in detail—I take that to be a Committee or Report stage, adapted, obviously, due to the number of Members of the Assembly—and a final stage at which a proposed Assembly Measure can be passed or rejected. However, I am worried about subsection (2), which states:

"Subsection (1) does not prevent the standing orders making provision to enable the Assembly to expedite proceedings in relation to a particular proposed Assembly Measure."

There is a meeting of minds to the extent that part 3 of the Bill is not the same as part 4. Part 4 would, after a referendum, give the Assembly the legislative power to get on with it, for better or worse, but part 3 allows the Assembly to undertake detailed scrutiny of legislation in a procedure under which we retain, by virtue of the Order in Council, overall responsibility for the process. If that is indeed what we are doing, I have considerable anxiety about whether subsection (2) is appropriate because it provides a mechanism whereby the Assembly, having been given power by the Order in Council that we had enacted, could enact the Assembly Measure without giving it the consideration that is the very justification for granting the power in the first place.

The situation is quite different from that under part 4. I have tabled an amendment that is similar to amendment No. 170 to part 4, but that is a probing amendment because my attitude to part 4 is rather different. I understand that, if we are transferring legislative functions to an independent body, it is not for us to start telling it how to carry out its business. However, the Government are announcing to the people of Wales that part 3 offers a hybrid procedure under which the House retains control, but detailed scrutiny is carried out by the Assembly so that the minutiae can be thrashed out in a way that provides better legislation for the Welsh people. It is thus astonishing that subsection (2) provides a loophole under which the Assembly could decide not to carry out adequate scrutiny.

Mr. Gummer: Can my hon. Friend imagine a circumstance in which the House decided that it was suitable for the Welsh Assembly to consider a matter, yet the Assembly thought that the importance of the matter was such that it had to rush the process through? I think that those two things are utterly contradictory.

Mr. Grieve: I agree with my right hon. Friend and cannot imagine such a circumstance. The process under part 3 that must be followed to get the Order in Council, including the delay periods, shows that Assembly Measures are hardly the material of urgent business, so it is difficult to understand why subsection (2) is needed at all.

I hope that the Minister will accept that I say sincerely that subsection (2) is an invitation to possible conflict. Someone could decide to short-circuit the process, and the difficulty would be that the poor old Secretary of State would have to decide whether to apply his veto because hon. Members would make representations to suggest that the whole matter had not been considered by the Welsh Assembly and that full scrutiny had thus not been carried out.

I look forward to hearing the explanation for subsection (2) from the Minister. There is justification for including such a provision in part 4, if it is ever to be implemented, but I do not understand the justification for including it in part 3. If I understand the Government's position correctly—let me leave aside the question of whether I agree with the principle of the process—they are offering the reassurance that the people of Wales will get better governance because the Welsh Assembly will have more time to flesh out the details of a principle that has been approved by the House. However, subsection (2) is a mechanism by which the Government say that if the Welsh Assembly wishes to circumvent that principle, it may do so.

I look forward to hearing the Minister's response because unless it is adequate, we might well wish to pursue this important matter on Report, if not now. However, I do not want to provoke a conflict at this stage because even though I am not wildly happy with part 3 of the Bill, I want to improve it.

Amendments Nos. 171 to 173 are probing amendments that relate largely to the same point: the Standing Orders for private proposed Assembly Measures. The House has different procedures and Standing Orders for its consideration of private measures, so I understand that the Welsh Assembly would need different procedures, too. However, private proposed Assembly Measures would still need to be considered fully. We must not have a situation in which that process can be short-circuited. Although I accept that there must be a mechanism for a separate system, the amendments reinforce the point that I am making about subsection (2).

Mr. Llwyd: I support amendment No. 174. The hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) is on to a good point. I cannot imagine any circumstances in which an Assembly Measure should not be produced bilingually. It would be frankly unreasonable to expect all the paperwork generated by the Assembly to be bilingual, but an Assembly Measure, which will be akin to a parliamentary Bill, should be published in both languages. I fully support the hon. Gentleman and add my voice to his call for an explanation of the circumstances that would justify such an exemption.

Mr. Grieve: I regret that I failed to speak to amendment No. 174, but the hon. Gentleman gives me the opportunity to set out the precise explanation that I want from the Minister. Bilingualism appears to be absolutely embedded in the Assembly, so surely the idea of an Assembly Measure that is not bilingual is very odd indeed.

Mr. Gummer: I owe a filial duty to my Welsh-speaking father to support amendment No. 174 and the need for bilingual provision. I have always held it against him that we did not learn Welsh in the household, and I am pleased that the Welsh language is now much more widely spoken. I support the general idea that the Welsh Assembly should be bilingual in its entirety, although I understand that complex legal tomes or scientific articles could be excluded. There should be no possibility of the two languages being thought of as anything other than equal.

David T.C. Davies: I am happy to agree entirely with my right hon. Friend, but sometimes things can go too far. For example, the emergency signs for lifts in the Welsh Assembly were written in English and Welsh and also set out in both English and Welsh Braille. I am given to understand that during the first six months that the Assembly was in place, the Welsh Braille sign was upside down, so the only way in which people would have been able to use it would have been if they had stood on their heads.

Mr. Gummer: We can find the absurd in many such situations. It is the very nature of a law, although I do not know what to call it because one word that can be used is impolite in the House and the use of the phrase Murphy's law is now illegal because it is racist. Whatever the law is called, these things just happen.

The matter is crucial. It is crucial the other way round, too, because it is also important that English-speaking Assembly Members are not put in a position in which an important document is not available in English. Wales has done remarkably well in returning to a choice of languages. The fact that a great language was not lost is a rare and encouraging example. It would be odd if the Committee decided not to do everything it could to encourage that further.

6.30 pm

Nick Ainger: This has been an interesting and, hopefully, brief debate. Clause 97(2) enables the Assembly, in its Standing Orders, to provide for the circumstances in which a particular proposed Measure can come before the Assembly and be taken through a procedure that is different from that set out in clause 97(1). As the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr Grieve) said, there is an equivalent provision in clause 110(2), as regards Bills in the Assembly.

I am sympathetic to the concern that we ensure that all Assembly Measures receive proper scrutiny, but clause 97(2) does not circumvent that. Instead, it recognises that there may be circumstances in which the Assembly's standard scrutiny procedures would not be appropriate because the Measure concerned deals with a matter that requires urgent attention. Animal health, such as foot and mouth, is an example of that. The circumstances would arise when the Assembly has already been given powers to legislate by this place. If a foot and mouth outbreak, or another animal health issue, required it to legislate quickly, clause 97(2) would allow it to truncate the process, as we have done on occasion.

I imagine that the Assembly's standing orders set out the time between its equivalent of our Second Reading, Committee stage, and Report and Third Reading—the same stages as we go through. The standing orders could be amended to allow the scrutiny process to take place over one or two days. That is sensible. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman accepts that we have included the provision for those purposes. It will be used on rare occasions, but it would be wrong for the standing orders not to set out proceedings in which the Assembly can address urgent issues.

Mr. Grieve: I understand the force of what the Minister says, but the difficulty is that the expression "Assembly Measure" will cover the enactment of what we consider to be statutory instruments and secondary legislation, and the enactment of a form of primary legislation, for which we have given permission. The two things have been rolled together, something that we touched on yesterday. In those circumstances, should we not at least make an attempt to bring back a distinction, because the two are rather different?

Nick Ainger: I understand the hon. Gentleman's point, but there may well be a need for the Assembly to take advantage of the permission, given by this place, to legislate not just in secondary legislation but, in effect, through its Measures system. I would be surprised—it would be illogical and, possibly, irresponsible—if those standing orders did not allow for emergency legislation to be enacted by the Assembly.

Mr. Llwyd: Given that the Minister is unable to give an example, apart from animal health, why not leave it to the Assembly to create its own standing orders? Why do we need to tell it what to do? The clause says "must include" so and so. It is prescriptive and tells the Assembly what to do. [Interruption.] On any reading, that is what it says.

Nick Ainger: Subsection (2) states:

"Subsection (1) does not prevent the standing orders making provision to enable the Assembly to expedite proceedings in relation to a particular proposed Assembly Measure."

We are not telling it how to do it; we are just giving it permission to change its standing orders, in whatever way it wants, so that it can expedite a Measure. We are not being prescriptive in that respect. We are allowing the Assembly, under its standing orders, to address the problem that I set out. We are putting in the Bill the provision for the Assembly to come up with its own solution, through its standing orders, to the need to introduce urgent legislation.

Mr. Llwyd: I am talking about subsection (5), which is the subject of amendment No. 174. It states:

"The standing orders must include provision for securing that the Assembly may only pass a proposed Assembly Measure if the text of the proposed Assembly Measure is in both English and Welsh"—

Nick Ainger: I am not there yet.

Mr. Llwyd: I thought that the Minister had addressed that amendment. I will hold my fire.

Nick Ainger: For clarification, I was still addressing my remarks to amendment No. 170. I had not moved on to amendment No. 174.

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): On subsection (2), the Minister said that the provision will be used rarely. Will he give a rough figure of how many times that might happen in a year?

Nick Ainger: I would imagine that it would not happen every year. It would be a rare occurrence, for something like a major animal health problem, such as an outbreak of foot and mouth. It is rare for us to truncate our scrutiny of a particular problem.

Amendments Nos. 172, 173 and 171 relate to private Assembly Measures, and I recognise the comments made by the hon. Member for Beaconsfield. The provisions are similar to those that apply in this place to private and hybrid Bills, by which a special Committee is set up to take evidence. That is the thought behind them.

On amendment No. 174, we would be amazed if the Assembly did not produce its Measures in both languages. We have a simple reason for resisting the amendment. The Assembly may, on occasion, want to introduce a Measure on public health, for example, which lists dozens of micro-organisms known only by their Latin names. Would hon. Members want us to convert those into English and Welsh? Let me give the assurance, however, that we would expect any Measure to be produced in English and Welsh.

Mr. Grieve: At the risk of being pernickety, the wording of subsection (5), and the use of the expression "the text need not be in both languages", does not cover the possibility of the text being in Latin, because it is not one of the two languages specified? In those circumstances, the Minister would have to amend the legislation to say that the text does not have to be in either language, but some other.

Nick Ainger: All I can say to the hon. Gentleman on that point is that both he and the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Llwyd) are seeking an assurance that the Measures would be published in both English and Welsh, as was the right hon. Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer), and I can give that assurance.

Bearing in mind what I have said previously and the assurances that I have given on amendment No. 174, I hope that the hon. Gentleman will withdraw his amendment.

Mr. Grieve: Short debates can often be the most interesting. The Minister has persuaded me completely—indeed, I do not think that I needed much persuasion—on amendments Nos. 171, 172, and 173 about the proposed private Assembly Measures. Clearly, the Standing Orders of the Welsh Assembly will have to make provision for dealing with private business.

The Minister has also persuaded me, so far as amendment No. 174 is concerned, that there are good reasons for not fettering the Assembly by requiring that it can produce texts only in English and Welsh. However, I recommend that he and his legal advisers look again at the provision, because I wonder whether it has the effect of requiring that texts can be in English or Welsh but nothing else. Perhaps I am wrong about that, and I should be greatly reassured if that were so, but my reading of the provision is that texts normally have to be in English and Welsh or in English or Welsh. That might create a problem if Latin terms are to be included.

The Minister has only half persuaded me on amendment No. 170. This debate has highlighted the odd situation that we are creating: defining as an Assembly Measure that which in this House we would consider to be either primary legislation or statutory instruments. The Minister makes a persuasive case for urgency if the Assembly is enacting what we would normally call a statutory instrument. After all, we sometimes have to enact them urgently, and by their very nature a statutory instrument can in this House be passed rapidly. By virtue of the way in which the Welsh Assembly operates, however, statutory instruments are normally mulled over at considerably greater length, which was one argument for the original devolution proposals given to the Welsh.

Of course, if urgency is required, something can always be enacted by a statutory instrument in this place. It is clear that it is unacceptable that there should be short-circuiting of the primary legislative functions which could be transferred under the Order in Council procedure, as I think the Minister has acknowledged, but, as the Bill stands, there is a risk that that is exactly what could happen, which would defeat the entire object of the exercise of going through and enacting part 3.

Therefore, given the difficulty with the way in which we define Assembly Measures, I propose to consider the matter further, but I cannot rule out on Report our suggesting that some distinction must be drawn between different sorts of Assembly Measures. I urge the Government to consider that, because within the term "Assembly Measure" we are lumping together forms of legislation which in this House we treat very differently, both in their significance and in the way in which we proceed. With that in mind, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

POWER TO INTERVENE IN CERTAIN CASES

Mr. Llwyd: I beg to move amendment No. 125, in page 54, line 39, leave out paragraph (a).

The Temporary Chairman: With this it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 158, in page 54, line 41, leave out paragraph (b).

No. 126, in page 54, line 43, leave out paragraph (c).

No. 175, in page 54, line 44, after 'England', insert 'and Wales'.

No. 176, in page 55, line 22, leave out subsection (8) and insert—

'(8) No order under this Section may be made unless a draft of the statutory instrument containing the order has been laid before, and approved by a resolution of, each House of Parliament.'.

6.45 pm

Mr. Llwyd: I rise to speak to amendments Nos. 125, 158 and 126, which stand in my name and those of my hon. Friends.

The reason why the amendments have been tabled is very simple. The first amendment would deal with subsection (1)(a), which says:

"if a proposed Assembly Measure contains provisions which the Secretary of State has reasonable grounds to believe—

(a) would have an adverse effect on any matter which is not specified in Part 1 of Schedule 5".

That is terrifically broad to a point that it is almost nonsense. I hope that in responding the Minister will give us some detail, because in the hands of an unsympathetic Secretary of State it could be a tool to stamp on the Assembly and prevent it from proceeding in its normal democratic way. The notes on clauses are more obtuse than usual, so there is no help there. I press the Minister for as much detail as possible on that paragraph. I am sure that he will do his best to enlighten us in due course.

Amendment No. 126 relates to paragraph (c), which effectively gives the Secretary of State the same veto. It refers to whether a Measure "would have an adverse effect on the operation of the law as it applies in England".

Again, my objection is that that is nebulous. We would like to know more. In all the various reports and the notes on clauses that I have read, I have seen nothing of any great help. The provision is extremely broad and, again, an unsympathetic holder of the office could easily pray in aid such a power to prevent any legislation.

By far the most concerning is paragraph (b), which is the subject of amendment No. 158. For the record, I shall read the paragraph. It also provides for a veto and would come into effect where any Measure might have "a serious adverse impact on water resources in England, water supply in England or the quality of water in England".

I remember as a young boy going with my father to Tryweryn. I have the honour to represent that area now, and I shall deal briefly with the history of the drowning of the valley. I know some of the displaced people from the Tryweryn valley, and I know that never again will the people of Wales stand for such undemocratic, Mugabe-type dealings. Every single Member of Parliament from Wales was against the drowning of the valley, but it went ahead. I hope that we will never see such an event again, because I do not know what would happen, but this clause would enable it, and that is my concern.

The provision has touched a raw nerve, not just among people such as myself who support Plaid Cymru but among others, because once more they can see potential for conflict. The paragraph clearly refers to water resources in England, and I can easily envisage that in some years from now somebody might consider that there is a need to drown another valley in Wales. As that would be such a large planning operation, it would come under the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister and then bypass the planning procedures in the Assembly. The Government could rely on that paragraph, among others, to ensure that the plan went ahead, whatever the view of the Welsh Assembly, which would be expressing the view of the Welsh people.

We have experienced that once already. I know families who were displaced and who still live in the Bala area. Most of the elderly people have now passed away, but some remain; their wounds are still open and they still feel a great deal of hurt. Subsection (1)(b) therefore touches a very raw nerve.

Jenny Willott (Cardiff, Central) (LD): My reading of the clause is that it applies only to Measures proposed by the Assembly, so the paragraph refers to the Secretary of State's decision, not on legislation that is coming from Parliament to the Assembly, but on a Measure proposed by the Assembly that would have an effect on the water supply. Will the hon. Gentleman clarify?

Mr. Llwyd: By all means. If the Assembly of its own volition, through one of its Measures, wished to signal that it opposed any such thing happening, the paragraph would enable the Secretary of State to overrule it. Now that the hon. Lady is taking an interest, perhaps she will tell me how she squares what she has just said with what the Liberal Democrat leader in Wales said. His response to the clause, which has been described as "bizarre" and "patronising", was:

"We're not children. Does anyone seriously think that a future Welsh Government would turn off the taps to England? Or that we would poison the water in our reservoirs? If we are to be trusted with making our own laws, then surely we can be trusted not to damage the supply of water to homes in the neighbouring country. This clause is insulting, and we will be seeking to get it removed as the Bill goes through Parliament and the Assembly."

I emphasise the last sentence. Is the hon. Lady disobeying her Welsh leader?

Jenny Willott: I was actually asking a question, not stating a fact. The hon. Gentleman has not answered my question, but has merely quoted words back at me.

Mr. Llwyd: While I am at it, I shall quote the Conservative leader in Wales. He said:

"I find this clause odd. Things like this show the Secretary of State for Wales has the powers of a colonial governor and we are not being treated as grown-ups."

Plaid Cymru's Assembly deputy leader said:

"We don't want a Secretary of State telling us what we should do with our water. I thought the whole point of devolution was to transfer power from London to the democratically elected 60 Members of the National Assembly."

If the hon. Lady's reading of paragraph (b) is correct, her colleagues in the National Assembly and hon. Members here—myself included—will take some comfort from that; but my ordinary reading of it suggests that it goes far broader than she has implied. It seems to me that a future Welsh Government could say, for whatever reason, that they were not willing to accept further valley drownings, and be overruled. My reading of the provision might not be correct, but that is my understanding.

When the Government were asked to comment on the provision in Wales on Sunday, the Wales Office spokesman said only:

"It is a fallback provision, and would only ever be used in extreme circumstances."

That being so, may I ask the Minister what he means by "extreme circumstances"? If they include closing off the water supply or, worse still, fouling the water supply, does not the Civil Contingencies Act 2004 deal with them? We are owed a better explanation. I ask the Minister to give us examples of extreme circumstances and to tell the Committee that my reading of the clause is wrong and that it would not allow Parliament to override the democratic view of the National Assembly if it decided against another valley being drowned.

Mr. Gummer: The hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Llwyd) has understated his case. The three amendments are most important. Paragraphs (a) and (c) in subsection (1) differ from paragraph (b) because paragraph (b) contains the word "serious". I find that peculiar, because it means that the provisions that are the least precise may be activated when the consequence or effect of the Measure is not serious, but merely adverse.

It is extremely difficult to envisage how paragraphs (a) or (c) would be used. They can be used even in circumstances where the Minister would not have to show that the "adverse effect" was serious. Even the word "effect", used in paragraphs (a) and (c), is less powerful than "impact", which is used in paragraph (b); an effect is a passing matter. I imagine that the phrase "adverse effect" refers to a range of issues—the list of fields specified in part 1 of schedule 5 is considerable, encompassing a huge number of areas. Under the clause, a Secretary of State, by diktat, would be able to say that a Measure that has a passing or glancing effect on some matter of importance—sufficiently important for the Assembly to feel that a Measure is needed—should be stopped because he has "reasonable grounds to believe" that it would have an "adverse effect". It is difficult to imagine that a Secretary of State would not be able to stop anything that he did not like. The condition of having "reasonable grounds" does not help, so vague is the wording used in the following paragraphs.

In my opinion, paragraphs (a) and (c) are entirely otiose. Their presence suggests that the Bill will not do what it is supposed to. I have all sorts of doubts about the processes set out in the Bill—they are far too opaque. However, if we are to proceed, we must not pretend that the Bill is a means of enhancing the powers of the Assembly, when, just in case the Assembly does something of which we do not approve, we have put in a few get-out clauses to keep power in the hands, not of Parliament, but of the Secretary of State. That is the second reason why I feel so strongly about this matter: I do not like Ministers having such powers without reference back to Parliament. Through the Bill, in effect, Parliament is delegating further legislative powers to the Assembly, but the Government are ensuring that Ministers will still have power, even though Parliament has delegated it. Both paragraphs (a) and (c) are unacceptable.

On subsection (1)(b), I agree with the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy. Either we trust the Welsh people or we do not. It is extremely difficult for me to accept that the Welsh people have to be singled out and measures taken to ensure that, where water is concerned, they should not in any way or in any circumstances be able to do anything that might upset the plans of English Ministers.

I have another reason to object. These days, when even some of our less educated newspapers are beginning to understand the importance of climate change, the issues relating to water have become more important, not less. I do not want to give the impression to the Welsh people—or to the English people—that if we are short of water, our first response will be to extend the resource, rather than to improve retention and reduce use. The clause is very old fashioned. It suggests that Wales is a provider of water for England. It does not say that England and Wales together must deal with the problems of the shortage of water, the effect of climate change, the need to restrain our use of water, and the like.

The clause comes from a civil servant. Having been a Minister for 16 years, I know the sort of civil servant who would have drafted it.

Chris Ruane (Vale of Clwyd) (Lab): Name him.

7 pm

Mr. Gummer: It is for the Government to name him or her. I suspect that somebody came out of the woodwork one day and said to the Minister, "Ah, Minister, better not." That is a very dangerous part of the civil servant's language. "Better not give the Welsh the possible power to do something about water. Better remind them that it's not their water. It is, in effect, our water and we're going to decide what is done with it. Better not, Minister. Let's keep the powers that really matter."

That is offensive to Welsh people. One would not have said that about any other community in the United Kingdom, either historic communities or newly found communities. I invite the House to substitute the names of a range of newly found communities in the clause and see how well that goes down. The quality of the drafting is below even the low standard of the Bill.

I suggest that we use the Civil Contingencies Act to cover the problem of a revolutionary party in the Assembly bent on stopping people having water. There is no need for the clause. It is an unnecessary attempt to remind the Welsh where they really are—under the control not of the House, but of Ministers. If I were living in Wales, I would find the clause unacceptable, as the leader of the Conservative party in Wales suggested, and I hope very much that it is removed.

David Mundell: My right hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer) raised a number of interesting issues, which I look forward to hearing the Minister address. As I said in relation to an earlier amendment, the confusion derives from the explanatory notes that accompany the Bill and the lack of clarity about the meaning of nebulous phrases such as "adverse effect" and "serious adverse effect". It is incumbent on the Minister to define for us the difference between the two, and to explain the reason for two definitions in the same clause.

As there is a conjoined English and Welsh jurisdiction, subsection (1)(c) should refer to that, and not just to the law in England, which does not exist as a jurisdiction. That is the purpose of amendment No. 175. If the Minister is able to satisfy the House as regards the terminology in subsection (1), we propose in amendment No. 176 an affirmative procedure for orders brought before the House.

The Minister can hardly expect anything other than the reaction in the Chamber this evening to the clause, given that the definition is so nebulous and the potential impact of the clause is so serious. If the clause had been proposed as an amendment by the Opposition, the Minister and others would have called it a wrecking amendment tabled by people determined to ensure that the Bill and the procedures would not work. It is incumbent on the Minister to answer the questions that have been raised, and further questions that my hon. Friend the Member for Clwyd, West (Mr. Jones) intends to raise.

Mr. David Jones (Clwyd, West) (Con): I am concerned about clause 100(1)(c). As my hon. Friend the Member for Dumfriesshire, Clydesdale and Tweeddale (David Mundell) observed, we occupy a conjoined jurisdiction of England and Wales, yet the clause provides that the Secretary of State can effectively put a stop to an Assembly Measure only if it has an adverse impact on the operation of the law as it applies in England. We have a large body of law that may well be affected by an Assembly Measure not only in England, but in Wales. It is extraordinary that the Secretary of State has no power of intervention if an Assembly Measure has an adverse effect on the operation of the law as it applies in Wales also. The explanatory notes are silent on that point, so will the Minister expand on it?

Nick Ainger: The measures set out in subsection (1) replicate schedule 3, paragraph 6 of the Government of Wales Act 1998. There is nothing new in subsection (1). The provisions were discussed in this place and passed in 1998. That provides some context for the measure.

Mr. Llwyd: Is the Minister saying that paragraph (b), about water resources was in the 1998 Act?

Nick Ainger: I am assured that that is the case. Perhaps that will lower the temperature of the debate so that we can address the detail.

Clause 100 contains powers for the Secretary of State, by order, to prevent a proposed Assembly Measure from being submitted for approval by Her Majesty in Council. These powers are rightly constrained. The Secretary of State would be able to block a proposed measure only in certain prescribed circumstances. Moreover, the Secretary of State must have reasonable grounds to believe that those circumstances exist.

Hon. Members asked about the difference between paragraph (a), which refers to adverse effects beyond the Assembly's legislative competence, and paragraph (b), which refers to "a serious adverse impact on water resources".

An adverse effect on matters beyond the Assembly's legislative competence is an issue that we have already discussed. That could be addressed through the Counsel-General or the Attorney-General. I emphasise to the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy that the clause relates to Assembly Measures and their possible effect, not to a UK Department imposing some measure on Wales. There is a remote possibility that these circumstances may occur and as in the 1998 Act, we need to deal with that possibility.

The clause refers to an adverse effect on matters outside the Assembly's legislative competence. If the process already exists whereby such an issue may be referred to the Supreme Court in the Order in Council process, the provision in the Bill would mean that if, after a Measure had been completed, a problem—possibly purely technical—emerged in relation to whether the Measure would have an impact in an area for which the Assembly did not have legislative competence, the Secretary of State could prevent it from going forward, or perhaps suggest to the Assembly that it look again at the Measure and amend it.

Mr. Llwyd: May I take the Minister back to clause 100(1)(b), which deals with water resources? What would happen if the National Assembly wanted to pass a measure to outlaw any further drownings of valleys because it believed that water needed to be conserved and that a certain percentage of water was being wasted through leaking pipes every day of the year? Could the Secretary of State say, "No, we are not having that, because we might need compulsorily to acquire land to drown in the future." I believe that Parliament would prevail in those circumstances and that the voice of the Assembly would be drowned.

Nick Ainger: Let us examine the hypothetical case that the hon. Gentleman has raised, in which the Assembly said that there would be no increase in the amount of water available. As I read clause 100(1)(b), such a proposal would have a serious adverse impact on water resources, water supply or the quality of water in England. The proposal does not specify an increase; it describes the current situation and states that it should not be made any worse. Hon. Members were seeking an example of an Assembly Measure that would have such an impact, but I cannot think of one. However, there might be a measure affecting a major forestry issue, for example, that would have an impact on the water resources that are supplied to England. The provision might apply in that kind of area.

I repeat that this does not involve something being done to Wales. It would involve an Assembly Measure that was being introduced. The hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy referred to the drowning of valleys, but I just cannot see how that would relate to the circumstances to which these requirements refer.

Mr. Gummer: I ask the Minister to look again at his explanation of clause 100(1)(b). It seems clear to me that the provision could be used by a Minister against an Assembly Measure that related to the increase of water resources. If England thought that there was a need for such an increase, any such Measure could have a serious adverse impact on water resources. The provision does not mention present or previous water resources; it simply mentions water resources. The Minister is giving that opportunity; he might want to. I think that we ought to know.

Nick Ainger: We are starting to get into the realms of fantasy now. This provision has been on the statute book since 1998, and there has never been a problem with it. I simply cannot accept some of the arguments that have been put forward. These are perfectly reasonable proposals that were originally set out in schedule 3(6) of the Government of Wales Act 1998.

Mr. David Jones: I note that the word "effect" is used in clause 100(1)(a) and (c), while the word "impact" is used in paragraph (b). Will the Minister please explain—[Interruption.] Clearly, an Act of Parliament uses words in a particular manner in order to convey a particular meaning; at least, one hopes that it does. Can the Minister explain why the word "impact" is used in paragraph (b), and the word "effect" in paragraphs (a) and (c)?

Nick Ainger: No, I cannot. We are trying to scrutinise a very large Bill, and I think that we are now moving into an area in which our proceedings might fall into disrepute. We really need to move on.

Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire) (LD): Will the Minister give way?

Nick Ainger: I will give way to the hon. Gentleman, but I hope that he is going to make a sensible intervention.

Lembit Öpik: I only make sensible interventions. I have been listening very closely to the arguments put forward by the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy and to the Minister's response to them, and I must take issue with what the Minister has just said. As the hon. Member for Clwyd, West (Mr. Jones) has just pointed out, the wording of these provisions is very important, and it is our duty to get this right. If different terminology is used in paragraph (b) from that in paragraphs (a) and (c), one has to assume that there is some logic behind that. I know that this argument is taking a bit of time, but I hope that the Minister is about to receive some clarification on this, because for me at least, his answer will be salient to what we should do if there were a vote on the amendment.

Nick Ainger: This will really enlighten the Committee. The reason that the word "effect" is used is because it relates to the legislative environment. The reason that the word "impact" is used is because it relates to the physical environment. I hope that everyone is happy with that explanation.

As I was saying, the intervention powers are extremely limited, but they are important. It is absolutely right that the Secretary of State should be able to prevent proposed Assembly legislation from having adverse consequences of the kind set out in clause 100(1). It is unlikely that that would be necessary, but it is important that that power should exist.

Amendment No. 175 would give the Secretary of State the power to override proposed Assembly legislation just because he or she thought that it would have a bad effect. That would be completely unacceptable. We must strictly constrain the powers of the Secretary of State, and I would urge hon. Members not to support that amendment.

Amendment No. 176 would provide that an order preventing an Assembly Measure from being submitted for approval by Her Majesty should be subject to the affirmative rather than the negative resolution procedure. I suspect that it has been tabled in this way because the previous amendment, amendment No. 175, is so powerful. The reason that we have proposed to use the negative procedure, which could be implemented by either House of Parliament, is that the Secretary of State must make an order within four weeks. It would not be possible to do that, or to be properly accountable, if we were to use the affirmative order procedure.

In conclusion, the Conservative amendments and the Plaid Cymru amendments are poles apart, in that they seek to do completely opposite things. Any of them would unbalance devolution in one direction or another. The position that we have outlined in the Bill strikes a perfect balance, and I would therefore ask the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy not to press his amendment to a vote.

Mr. Llwyd: Perhaps unsurprisingly, I am far from satisfied. The Minister has not assisted us very much on amendment No. 158. We have had a discussion, and he has said certain things about it, but I am still unclear. From my reading of paragraph (b), I still believe that, were the Assembly to decide to introduce a measure to prevent the creation of any more dams or the drowning of any more valleys in Wales for any purpose, Parliament could lawfully override that measure via the Secretary of State. That is quite plain, because the provision does not use words such as "current" or "historical". It does not relate to the here and now; it is for the future. Let us be straight about this; all legislation is about the present and the future, not the present alone. We do not legislate for tomorrow alone; we legislate for 10 years from tomorrow, and for 20 and 30 years from tomorrow if the Bill is reasonable.

Unfortunately, I am dissatisfied. I know that time is short for our debate generally, but I wish to put amendment No. 158 to the vote.

The Second Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Sir Michael Lord): Does the hon. Gentleman wish to withdraw amendment No. 125?

Mr. Llwyd: I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed: No. 158, in clause 100, page 54, line 41, leave out paragraph 9(b).—[Mr. Llwyd.]

Question accordingly negatived.

Clauses 100 and 101 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 102

REFERENDUM ABOUT COMMENCEMENT OF ASSEMBLY ACT PROVISIONS

Mrs. Cheryl Gillan (Chesham and Amersham) (Con): I beg to move amendment No. 189, in clause 102, page 56, line 24, leave out subsection (3).

The Second Deputy Chairman: With this it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 184, in clause 102, page 56, line 24, leave out 'that does not prevent the making of'.

No. 185, in clause 102, page 56, line 25, at end insert

'may not be made in advance of two further Assembly general elections.'.

Mrs. Gillan: We move on to part 4 of the Bill. In the spirit of the welcome that I accord to this section of the Bill, we thoroughly approve of the provision for a referendum. As we have argued previously, we believe in asking the people of Wales for their views. Although the provision comes late in relation to the legislative devices encompassed in the Bill, certainly in part 3, we would not be so curmudgeonly as to fail to welcome the referendum should the Assembly receive full law-making powers.

I want to express an element of scepticism, however, on behalf of many who read that the Secretary of State does not envisage the provision being enacted before 2011—which, I understand, he has said on many occasions—and who believe that offering a referendum in such circumstances is merely a diversionary tactic. Certainly, by ostensibly offering a referendum in the Bill, the Secretary of State can point out that the Bill contains a provision that arranges to consult the people of Wales on a future occasion. In truth, however, it is so far into the future that it seems strange that we should be discussing it now. Therefore, while many continue to believe that the Secretary of Sate can achieve virtually full law-making powers through the convoluted Order in Council process contained in part 3, they remain to be convinced that the Secretary of State has any intention of ever holding this referendum.

I am a pleasant person, however—

Lembit Öpik: Hear, hear.

Mrs. Gillan: I thank the hon. Gentleman. I would like to give the Secretary of State the benefit of the doubt, and I will therefore assume that at some time in the future the provision will be put into operation. If it is put into operation, however, it would be inequitable to allow what is contained in the provisions—the ability for referendums to be repeated over and over again. Certainly, I am not the only person who is worried about that phenomenon in relation to the way in which clause 102 is drafted.

I am sure that the Father of the House, the right hon. Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams), whom I am delighted to see in his place, will want to make his contribution. As it happens, he tabled an amendment identical to mine, and I am slightly embarrassed that my amendment was selected first, as I would certainly have given way to the Father of the House if his amendment had been selected and he had wanted to move it. On Second Reading he made a great deal of sense, and he was particularly concerned that the Secretary of State had not even taken into account the First Minister's views, or, indeed, his own views, that a no vote would take the matter off the agenda for a long time.

The Government only issued their response to the Welsh Affairs Committee on 18 January, but that Committee had also been concerned about the chances of a referendum being repeated over and over again following a no vote. I refer in particular to the "Better Governance for Wales" scrutiny by that Committee, and to paragraph 135. I am sure that the Secretary of State is pretty intimate with its wording, because he must have examined it carefully to respond to the conclusion. It is worth repeating:

"The Secretary of State confirmed that there would not be specific provision in the Bill to outlaw repeated referenda, as that would be a 'matter for politics'."

There we have it—the consideration is not about the effect on the people of Wales, or the effect on the morale of people facing repeated referendums, but a "matter for politics" . The paragraph continued:

"Rhodri Morgan"—

the First Minister—

"believed that should a referendum fail 'everybody will have to take a deep breath and decide when they want to do this again' but was of the strong belief that a 'No' vote would put the issue 'off the agenda for a very long time', probably lasting a generation."

That is not what the Bill allows for, however. Even Professors Miers and Rawlings, in giving evidence,

"suggested that there was a case for 'a moratorium on further referendum initiatives for a specified period, for example, two Assembly terms'. In that event, the effect of a 'No' vote would be 'simply that the Assembly carried on as it was'."

I should have thought that that was the Secretary of State's exit route, and that the clause could have allowed for a referendum to be held, say, after two further Assembly terms, which might have been more reasonable and have found favour in the House and certainly in another place. However, the Government's response stated:

"The Government agrees that there should not be a cycle of essentially redundant or capricious referendums—not least reflecting voter confidence and the significant cost involved. However, the Government does not consider that explicit provision is needed to bar repeated referendums. The provisions within the Bill to ensure consensus, i.e., approval of any referendum Order in Council by both Houses of Parliament and by a two thirds majority of all Assembly Members, together with the role of the Secretary of State, should prevent this."

I beg to differ. Despite that response, I ask the Government to think again. If they are going to rely on the provisions that are retained in the Bill, if they believe that a no vote would put a referendum off for a long time, and if, as the Secretary of State confirmed, it should be a matter for politics, I ask him to practise good politics. He is capable of accepting the amendment and improving the Bill for and on behalf of the people of Wales.

The Secretary of State said that this piece of legislation would settle the question of devolution in Wales "for a generation". If the Government are allowing in the Bill the possibility for repeat referendums, how can the Bill be about settling the debate? It is quite the reverse. It is about prolonging the debate and achieving an end by a process of attrition. I am sure that that is not what he would want as a testimony to his stewardship of Wales: the prospect of a running sore in the history of devolution.

This is not an ambitious amendment. It is not a monumental change that is being requested. It is a sensible measure that would rule out using the referendum process improperly. I hope that the Secretary of State will consider the amendments and accept them in the spirit in which they were tabled.

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West) (Lab): I share the embarrassment of the hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan) at finding that our minds work alike and that we both tabled the same amendment. I hope that her colleagues will not hold that against her. I remind my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State that, when he first came to the Dispatch Box to announce what he had in mind, I welcomed the referendum, and he welcomed the fact that I supported what he said at that time. A week ago, I welcomed the referendum because I thought that a referendum meant that the people of Wales would make a choice. I did not realise that it was to be an ongoing saga until the people of Wales made the right choice, the choice that the Secretary of State wants and the only choice and decision that he is willing to accept, I have become disenchanted, to put it mildly.

I asked the Under-Secretary of State for Wales last week to confirm my reading of the Bill that we could get full devolution without a referendum just by the use of the order process. In fairness to him, he came back to me during the week and confirmed what I said: it would be slow but—this is the important point—inexorable. The people of Wales cannot escape that while Ministers who share the view of the Secretary of State are making the decisions. Full powers can be achieved by the order-making process alone. Yes, it is slow but virtually nothing can stop it while Ministers are so determined.

The Bill is clear. That consequence has already been described. A majority of one and we jump right through to full devolution. A defeat by 100,000 or 250,000 and we will come back again and again and again. Ministers have not even been willing to put in the safeguard of a time limit. They go to the Select Committee and indicate the time that they think would pass before anything different could be introduced, but they are not willing to put any time limit in the Bill.

Lembit Öpik: The right hon. Gentleman makes an interesting point. Cannot one argue that there is a presumption in favour of devolution on the basis that we had a referendum on the principle of devolution? Therefore, the Assembly having been set up, one can assume that there is a progression. As Ron Davies used to say, devolution is a process, not an outcome. I think that he had a lot of wise words to say about devolution. Does not the right hon. Gentleman accept that the principle of devolution was established in 1997 in the referendum and now we are discussing the pace at which it progresses? That is why one would establish the criteria that he described.

Mr. Williams: We can go forward, but we cannot go back. That is astonishing. It is a somewhat interesting perspective on what constitutes democracy. I will come to that in a moment.

Despite the Select Committee's recommendation that there should be a minimum of two full Assembly terms before there is a second referendum, the Government have not accepted that. Despite the First Minister's indication that a generation would be needed before there could be a second referendum, the Secretary of State has not accepted that. Despite his own declaration that it would be a very long time before there was a second referendum, he has not even been willing to incorporate a very long time in the Bill. Why? I have not seen the quotation that the hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham read out, but a time limit is not included in the Bill because he is waiting for a moment of political opportunism. That is what it is about. He will not put a time limit in. He will just wait for the opportunity, if there is one. If that opportunity arises, he will jump while he can to get the vote that he wants. Meanwhile, we shall still have the drip, drip, drip of the order-making process. For that reason, I welcome the amendment that was tabled by my hon. Friends; I apologise for jumping in before them. I wish that the interval had been substantially longer, but at least I agree with the principle.

I tabled my amendment not in the expectation that it would be accepted but because I want to alert the people of Wales to the fact that, as the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik) has just revealed, the people of Wales are trapped—they were trapped by the original Bill. I described it then as a constitutional mystery tour, but the mystery has gone. We are now on a one-way escalator with two buttons: slow and fast. There is no stop and certainly no reverse, as we heard from the hon. Gentleman. The devo-zealots will not contemplate the fact that the people of Wales have as much right to think of going back as they have of going forward. They are not willing to offer them that option. They could put it at nil cost on the ballot paper to resolve once and for all perhaps the issue of whether the people of Wales want devolution, but we can rest assured that that choice will not be offered.

The Secretary of State—I am not knocking him for this—is a self-declared enthusiast for full legislative power. I am as sceptical as he is enthusiastic. I respect his position, although I do not agree with it, and I hope that he respects the sincerity of my position and what I am saying. What worries me is the determination that he shows. He showed it in his evidence to the Select Committee. I quoted this last time but it is worth repeating. He was asked by my hon. Friend the Member for Clwyd, South (Mr. Jones):

"Have the people of Wales ever been consulted over the Order in Council procedure?"

He replied:

"There was a widespread process of consultation following the Richard Commission, in which both Rhodri and I were in exactly the same position, that we wanted to see the Assembly get on with its task of having greater powers following 2007 and did not want to wait".

He and Rhodri did not want to wait. That sounds like a great consultative process. He says that he consulted on the Richard commission. He consulted, and then he ditched it, because he and Rhodri did not want to wait.

There is something even more revealing, and I asked about it in my speech last week. When I was talking about consultation, I asked Ministers to put in the

[Mr. Williams]

Library the consultative papers that had been issued before the election. The White Paper and the Bill came afterwards, but what papers had been issued for the people of Wales, to consult them about this switch to the salami-slicing of the order-making process? In fairness, I must tell the House that the Secretary of State and the Under-Secretary gave me a firm answer: there were no papers to go in the Library.

There had been no consultative process—with one exception: there had been consultation within the party. That worries me even more. Of course the Minister should consult the party; that is right—but I am talking about what happened before the election. He knew his intentions before the election. He knew his intentions after the election as well—but he decided that he did not want to bother the people of Wales with them. Well, I think that the people of Wales deserve better than that.

Lembit Öpik: I have considerable issues with amendment No. 189, and I suspect that, on reflection, those on the Conservative Front Bench ought to feel the same. That is because there is a simple precedent for mechanisms with regard to holding referendums on constitutional issues affecting nations within the United Kingdom.

I am, of course, referring to Northern Ireland, where we have a clear structure that determines when and how often referendums can be held on the reunification of the north and south of Ireland. As far as I know, when that legislation was framed, the Conservatives did not object to the framework allowing a referendum to be held more than once. I certainly do not recall any Conservative spokesperson on the referendum provisions for Northern Ireland saying at any point that they thought that there should be only one referendum, and that if the idea were defeated, the question of reunifying the north and the south of Ireland would have to be shelved forever.

David T.C. Davies: As the hon. Gentleman will be aware, I was not in the House at that time, but surely he recognises that the situation in Northern Ireland is unique, and that Governments, particularly the last Conservative Government and the present Labour Government, had been trying to overcome a very difficult situation to bring peace there. It is unfair for the hon. Gentleman to use that as an example of a referendum framework that could be repeated elsewhere. A better example would be something like entry into the European Union, where there is scope for a further referendum that might change the direction of our European policy at some point in the future.

Lembit Öpik: The only reason why my example may seem unfair to the hon. Gentleman is that it utterly contradicts his party's position. The principle is the same: significant constitutional change to a nation state of the United Kingdom. The question is whether a referendum of this type can be held more than once, or whether one single referendum is binding. I am in no doubt that the comparison is entirely valid, so for the Conservatives to say, as they do in amendment No. 189, that we have the referendum once, and if the idea is defeated, never again, suggests that they feel that we could have a referendum once only in the north of Ireland, and if that idea were defeated, never again.

Mrs. Gillan: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Lembit Öpik: I will; just let me finish this point. Obviously, I am willing to hear any clarification that the hon. Lady can give me. I feel that we need joined-up thinking in such important constitutional debates, rather than having one argument in one debate about Wales, and a different argument in a different debate about Northern Ireland.

Mrs. Gillan: To equate Northern Ireland with Wales or Scotland is to misunderstand the situation entirely. I have a question for the hon. Gentleman: do he and his party, believe that there should be the same voting system and the same constitutional arrangements in Ireland, Wales and Scotland? That is where his argument is leading.

Lembit Öpik: The hon. Lady says that I am making a false equation between the two situations, and that I do not fully understand them. I humbly suggest that in the nine years that I have been speaking on Northern Ireland matters on behalf of the Liberal Democrats, in the various debates that I have had on exactly this point I may have picked up one or two salient points regarding the comparisons that I make. In fairness, I must recognise that the hon. Lady did not take part in those debates, but the Secretary of State for Wales, coincidentally—and, on this occasion, helpfully, I think—can provide his own perspective, if he is the Minister who will respond to the amendments. I suspect that he will agree with me that there is no fundamental difference in having a significant referendum on constitutional arrangements in Northern Ireland and having a significant referendum on constitutional arrangements in Wales.

As for the hon. Lady's second point, the issue at stake is not whether there is a difference of principle, but whether in Wales—I shall focus on Wales for the moment—it is acceptable to give the Welsh people one chance, and if the answer is no, to terminate any prospect of developing the devolution process further.

I was not sympathetic to the idea of having a referendum in the first place. However, that is not the main point with this string of amendments, so notwithstanding that, I shall turn to the comments made by the Father of the House, who paraphrased me and suggested that I had said, "We can go forward, but we can't go back." Actually, that is not far from what I said. More to the point, it is exactly what the leader of his party, the Prime Minister, has said; he said that he had no reverse gear. He has also said that every time that he has initiated a reform, he wishes that he had gone further. [Interruption.]

I hear howls of woe from the Government Benches, suggesting a rebellion among the Labour MPs from Wales who are here. I understand that they may not be happy with this. Nevertheless, my understanding is that if we initiate some constitutional changes, we must make the assumption that, the principle having been set, there will be an evolutionary process that goes with it.

The Father of the House is entirely justified in taking a different view. It is a difference of judgment. However, on behalf of myself and the Liberal Democrats, I would summarise the situation by saying that once the devolution process has been set in motion, there will be a momentum within it that will militate in favour of giving more powers to the Welsh Assembly, rather than stalling at some fairly arbitrary point by putting a cap on the number of referendums that can take place.

I understand the case for having some kind of structure and timetable governing the frequency of referendums. I am less unsympathetic to the attempt, rudimentary as it may be, in a couple of the amendments that have been tabled on that basis, because that more closely reflects the situation in Northern Ireland. However, the Liberal Democrats are not very keen on having a referendum on this matter at all, because we think that it is acceptable and appropriate for us to assume that the Welsh Assembly should have the same kind of powers as Scotland. I do not need to dwell on that, because we had a fairly significant debate on that subject yesterday in the context of changing the name from the Welsh Assembly to the Welsh Senedd.

In conclusion, I understand that there is a genuine difference of view. I believe that there is a contradiction between the way in which the Conservatives are approaching this piece of legislation and their approach to Northern Ireland legislation. I believe that that comparison is valid, and I look forward to hearing what the Minister has to say about it.

Mr. Grieve: The hon. Gentleman keeps on making comparisons with Northern Ireland legislation, but unless I am mistaken, the mechanism there limits referendums to once in a decade. Is he therefore suggesting that such a provision should be introduced into this Bill?

Lembit Öpik: I feel that I am almost negotiating with the Conservatives on this issue. If the hon. Gentleman is saying that he is so moved by my argument that he accepts the case for a structured revisiting of the referendum process on a limited time scale, that is progress. [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan) says that I did not listen to what she said earlier, but let me remind her of what I said. I said that we Liberal Democrats are not keen on holding a referendum at all, so for us, including this element in the Bill is otiose. I am suggesting to those who seek a referendum that it is inappropriate to hold one just once, and then to prevent one from being held ever again.

As I said, I look forward to hearing what the Government have to say about this issue. But I counsel those who seek to discuss the question of referendums, and other elements of such Bills, that it is vital that we learn lessons from other aspects of the United Kingdom devolution programme. In order to remain consistent, one must make sure that one does not introduce inconsistencies through amendments.

Dr. Hywel Francis (Aberavon) (Lab): The amendments tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Clwyd, South (Mr. Jones) and I arise out of recommendations made by the Welsh Affairs Committee, which I chair, and they enjoy broad cross-party support. The amendments deal with the possibility of subsequent referendums on the granting of primary legislative powers to the National Assembly. The Bill allows for a final stage of devolution, whereby the Assembly would become a fully functioning Parliament with primary legislative powers. I agree with the Government that a referendum of the people of Wales is necessary before that stage is reached, in order to achieve proper democratic legitimacy. However, should a referendum not deliver a decision in favour of giving such powers, it would be wrong for a series of subsequent referendums to be held until one of them delivered the desired yes result. I, along with many other Members, believe that such an exercise would diminish the democratic process.

Lembit Öpik: I shall resist intervening frequently on the hon. Gentleman, but I simply want to ask him this. Would he apply that same principle to Northern Ireland and the question of reunification?

Dr. Francis: We are discussing Wales, not Northern Ireland, which is another matter.

My Committee highlighted the concern to which I just referred and it recommended that, should a first referendum return a no vote, a subsequent one should not be held for a further two National Assembly terms. We believe that that is perfectly reasonable. Unlike my right hon. Friend the Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams), I approach this issue as an enthusiast for devolution. That may sound contradictory, but I believe that we have to show respect for the decisions taken by the people of Wales, and to give some time for reflection. I shall develop that point in a moment.

Both the Secretary of State and the First Minister acknowledge that, if a first referendum failed to deliver a yes result, a period of reflection would be necessary. Similarly, they are both of the view that a no result would put the issue off the agenda in Wales for a very long time. I agree with that view, as did my Committee, but I do not agree with the Government that the provisions already contained in the Bill are sufficient to prevent short-term repeated referendums, even if undertaken only as a political exercise. My amendment, which was inspired by the Welsh Affairs Committee's recommendations, would ensure that short-term repeated referendums could not happen. It would set a time limit within which a subsequent referendum could not be held—a further two Assembly general elections.

My amendments have two benefits. First, those in favour of granting primary powers, those against doing so, and the Welsh public at large—be they indifferent or undecided—would be clear about the implications of a no result. Such information is important if an informed decision is to be made.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): I am listening carefully to what the hon. Gentleman has to say, but is it not possible that his envisaged timetable might not be as long as he thinks? His amendment uses the phrase

"in advance of two further Assembly general elections", which does not rule out the possibility of a referendum being held at the same time as an Assembly general election. The time scale could therefore be shorter than he perhaps has in mind.

Dr. Francis: I hear what the hon. Gentleman says and I have noted it. I may deal with it in a moment, through the other points that I am about to make.

Secondly, my amendment would provide a defined time period, during which thoughts about, and plans for, a subsequent referendum would be unnecessary. That would avoid the potential for doing needless work and—dare I say it?—indulging in political posturing. In his response to my Committee's report, the Secretary of State argued that a subsequent referendum would need the approval of the National Assembly and both Houses of Parliament, and that that was a "sufficient safeguard". He is correct to say that that safeguard would prevent a subsequent referendum from going ahead, but it would not prevent the National Assembly from making premature requests for subsequent referendums. My amendment would prevent that problem from arising and avoid the need for making judgment calls on the appropriateness of the timing of subsequent requests for referendums.

Adam Price (Carmarthen, East and Dinefwr) (PC): Does the hon. Gentleman not agree that, in addition to repeated capricious requests for referendums, it would also be unacceptable to have a long delay such as we experienced between 1979 and 1997? The timetable that he describes would prevent repeated referendums, but it would also prevent—hopefully—an unacceptably long delay until another referendum.

Dr. Francis: Indeed, and that is a very important point. Those of us who experienced the wait to which the hon. Gentleman refers recall that it was a very long wait, whereas eight years is a relatively short time.

My amendment would provide the clarity and certainty in respect of referendum procedures that my Committee emphasised is necessary. I ask Members to support it, and I urge the Secretary of State, as a supporter of democratic devolution, to reflect on these issues.

Mr. Gummer: Not for the first time, I found the most surprising intervention in a debate to be one from a Liberal Democrat spokesman. On two different grounds, the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik) totally missed the point. First, he made the amazing suggestion that, having had a referendum of the people of Wales on the question of whether they wanted a very restricted form of devolution—many of the Members representing Plaid Cymru, along with others, were unhappy about that—no further reference to referendums should be allowed. This is a new constitutional concept, and evidently it is one that the Liberal Democrats might spread to other matters. The idea is that one makes a tiny decision and thereafter no movement from it should ever be allowed, whatever the circumstances, because one has signed up for ever to a rolling programme. The only question is whether it rolls fast or slow. This amazing and unusual proposal should have appeared in the Liberal Democrat manifesto. It took some doing, but I read that document. As far as I understand, it was never likely to contain such a proposal.

Lembit Öpik: The right hon. Gentleman has described my feelings about being in the Liberal Democrats over the past two weeks. His general point is correct, but it is not right to say that we would allow no further reference to the public. Manifestos for elections to the Welsh Assembly and to this House offer an authoritative way to consult the public.

Mr. Gummer: The hon. Gentleman's use of words allows me to explain my deep opposition to all referendums. When Parliament makes a decision such as this, it does so on behalf of the whole nation. People who are affected by it can vote on it, whether or not they are in Wales or Scotland. That would not happen with a referendum, even though UK citizens who live in England also have a part to play. A parliamentary democracy offers a much more sensible way to proceed.

The unfortunate thing for the hon. Gentleman is that we chose to proceed by referendum. When people are asked in a referendum to accept one form of devolution, it is very peculiar then to ask them to move to a different form of devolution that has been decided on in an entirely different manner. Indeed, that decision would be neither parliamentary nor derived from a referendum.

The Bill proposes a mechanism for devolution by salami slices. As the Father of the House pointed out, at the end of the process a referendum will be proposed, even though by that stage all the matters that could be decided by referendum will have been devolved. That is a unique and dangerous parliamentary concept—although no more so than the Liberal Democrat proposition that people are never asked at all.

Mr. Roger Williams: The right hon. Gentleman will accept that the Liberal Democrats, and various other parties, have always favoured devolution as a way of giving the Welsh Assembly primary legislative powers. As he said, a referendum would consult only the Welsh people and not the English, even though the outcome affects them as much as the Welsh. That is why we believe that there should not be a referendum.

Mr. Gummer: I have various problems with that observation. First, it is not true that the Liberal Democrats have always been in favour of devolution. When they managed to win an election in Britain as a whole, they were against it. They were happy not to have devolution when they thought that they could have power in the country as a whole. They became keen on devolution when they lost power, as devolution offered a different opportunity.

Lembit Öpik: The right hon. Gentleman is going back to 1922.

8.15 pm

Mr. Gummer: The hon. Gentleman says that I am going back to 1922, but that is how far one has to go back to find the last time that the Liberals played an active part in British politics.

We have decided that decisions on these matters will be made at a referendum. I oppose referendums, which I consider to be inimical to the British system. However, if the referendum mechanism is to be used, it is vital to ensure that major decisions are arrived at as a result. The affair in question must be settled, at least for a reasonable period of time.

We can argue about how long is reasonable, and I agree that a referendum cannot be held whose result is that no other referendum can ever be held. On the other hand, it cannot be desirable to have a system under which referendums are held so often that people become so fed up with voting that only a few zealots turn out. If those zealots should win by two votes, they would call it a remarkable victory. That is what the Father of the House is worried about, and any democrat should share his concern. The Select Committee was of the same opinion, even though its Chairman holds a view about devolution that is the complete opposite of the one held by the Father of the House.

That shows that serious people with different views can come to the same conclusion on the question of referendums. They agree that a proper timetable is needed to prevent referendums from being used for what may be called "partial" purposes.

The Secretary of State may say that we should not worry about what he and his Ministers do, as they will behave perfectly properly, but that is not my experience of the referendum process in England. The Government wanted to hold three referendums about the governance of the English regions, but when it became clear that they would lose at least two of them, they were not held.

The parallel that I am making is related to the amendment under discussion, as a referendum was held in the north-east. The Government thought that they would win it, but they lost so heavily that the result looked like a vote in an African dictatorship, only in reverse. The Government lost appallingly badly in an area where Ministers were very active and indeed represented parliamentary seats.

My point is that, although the Government failed to win the planned referendums, they nevertheless carried on implementing their regional policy, come what may. That is what could happen in Wales: a referendum is not held because it cannot be won, but the policy that would have followed a victory is implemented anyway.

I should point out that, under this Government, "regionalism" means taking away powers from local government and giving them to a regional assembly. The Government's failure in the first referendum of the proposed three was so bad that the other two were never held but, even so, they were determined to go ahead with the process that they had decided on. That is the problem with this Bill, and it is emphasised in this clause.

The Father of the House made the same point. On no other occasion over many years have he and I agreed on so much. I want to celebrate that: it does not embarrass me, even though it may embarrass him. His reverence for Parliament and his longevity—which I hope to emulate—

Ian Lucas (Wrexham) (Lab): This speech is longer than his.

Mr. Gummer: It is a pleasure for me to say that the observations of the Father of the House contain a very important truth—that the Bill, if it is not dishonest, is deeply flawed. The Bill pretends to have two parts. One part gives some additional powers to the Welsh Assembly, in accordance with the Labour party's manifesto. The other part gives full devolution to Wales, after a referendum.

Unlike many Conservative Members, I am not especially opposed to a devolved structure. However, I do oppose a devolved structure that disfranchises my constituents and renders English Members of Parliament second rate, at least in terms of the powers available to them. I am not opposed to the nature and principle of devolution. I do not stand on the same side as the Father of the House on that. I do think, however, that we ought to face all the issues at once instead of having the system we have, which is a dog's breakfast that fails to recognise the problems of the West Lothian question.

We are being asked to have a referendum on a new basis—that the referendum will be part of normal governmental activity until the Government have managed to achieve devolution. That is what the Bill means. My hon. Friend the Member for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan) made that very clear, and I believe her to be right.

The parallel with Northern Ireland is manifest nonsense. In the north of Ireland, we have had a continuing situation of violence and disorder. The six counties are constantly upset by two powerful tribal issues: unity and independence from the south. Those battles are unique to that part of the United Kingdom, and, happily, pretty unusual in the world as a whole. The House has always accepted that dealing with the six counties is a matter of total difference from what we do elsewhere because its history is totally different. It would be ridiculous to say that because we have to do X, Y or Z in the north of Ireland, we have to do the same elsewhere, or, indeed, to say that because we want to do something different elsewhere we have for some reason or other to do it in Northern Ireland.

If the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire does not remember what an 8th century pope said, it would be a good idea for him to do so now. In the 8th century, a pope very properly said that Ireland is different and has to be treated differently. It would have been wise of the House to have thought that in the 19th century and to have followed the views of Cardinal Manning instead of those of Lord Salisbury.

The referendum is being presented as a continuous part of governmental life. We shall have it again and again until the people of Wales make the choice that the Secretary of State wants them to make. That seems to me to be the opposite of democracy. It is an example, again, from the Government of Louis Napoleon—Napoleon III. It is how he used referendums. Whenever he found the Government a little difficult or whenever the structure that he had invented produced a result that he did not like, he had a referendum. He even had a particularly nasty and unpleasant one that he called "crowning the edifice". It was held to make sure that what he wanted was voted for, because he arranged for it to work like that. That is one of the reasons why I so deeply object to referendums.

[Mr. Gummer]

All referendums actually do is ask people the question we want to ask them in the way most calculated to get the answer we want and which is an answer that happens to be true on the day the referendum is held. It is often an answer that has nothing to do with the question, being about what people feel about the Government or whoever asked it. It is a load of nonsense and we should never have joined up to it. I am sorry that my party has agreed to referendums on a whole range of situations in which they are wholly unsuitable.

Having had a referendum in Wales, however, we cannot go for the Liberal concept of slipping a whole matter through because the electorate have made their bed and must lie in it. Nor can we go for the socialist concept of creating a part 3 of the Bill that makes sure that we deliver the whole thing by salami slicing it. Nor, if they do not get it that way, can we allow part 4 to let them have as many referendums as it takes for the Secretary of State for Wales to be able to say to his grandchildren that he was the one who forced devolution on the Welsh. Given the right hon. Gentleman's background, I am not sure that I think he is suitable to do that.

We ought to have a change to this part of the Bill for democratic reasons. We should change it because it makes referendums even more silly than they were in the first place. Above all, we should have a change to remind the people of Wales just how devious the Bill is and how much it is using time in the House of Commons to sew together the divisions in the Labour party.

Mr. Dai Havard (Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney) (Lab): I have a particular view on referendums. I have some sympathy with the right hon. Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer) on them. I do not really like them as a basic idea, but we are in the historical situation that, since Harold Wilson's day, on constitutional issues we have devised the mechanism of referendums. Sometimes we have done so for reasons of political expediency, but they have become part of the fabric.

Interestingly enough, there were thresholds in the referendums that were held in the 1970s. Some say that referendums should not be provided for in the Bill. I say that it is important that the Bill contains a measure that institutionalises the fact that if we are to have primary powers, we will have to have a referendum. There are those who would not want to have one even at that stage. That was part of the discussion that surrounded the Richard commission and so on. There were people who wanted to proceed without such a mechanism. We have to go back to the people.

Those who forget where the last referendums were would do well to go and revisit them. Let us be clear. Only half of the electorate turned out, and only half of those who did voted yes. So, in the words of Antonio Gramsci, we have to temper our enthusiasm with the pessimism of the intellect. We had better not run too far ahead of the people on these questions.

Interestingly enough, I remember the report of the Welsh Affairs Committee, of which my hon. Friend the Member for Aberavon (Dr. Francis) is a member. It was a unanimous report. It was certainly no minority report.

Adam Price: The full quote from Gramsci referred not just to the pessimism of the intellect but to the optimism of the will. How about some of the latter in the hon. Gentleman's remarks?

Mr. Havard: Perhaps I can help the hon. Gentleman. It will not happen very often, but perhaps on this occasion I will help him. What has happened here is that those people have gone away and looked at the reality of where we are now against the historical process that we have come through with regard to referendums in Wales and they have determined that what is more sensible is the sort of proposition that has come from my hon. Friend. It does not debar the process from being revisited within sensible periods of time, but it does stop—I dread to say this because I do not want to start the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik) off again about Northern Ireland. It is a strange twist on the "Vote early, vote often" theory that we have had from the Liberal Democrats.

There ought to be a great deal of support for the argument that has come from the Select Committee. It recognises that the mechanism needs to be enshrined in the Bill, but there is a tempered process that provides proper periods for reflection not only by the Houses of Parliament and the Assembly but by the people of Wales so that processes that have been put in place have the opportunity to mature.

The Assembly is a new institution. I forget when it was set up, but it has not had much of a life yet to mature. I differ from the right hon. Member for Suffolk, Coastal in that I struggle with this question. Is the process that we are putting in place sufficient to justify a referendum now? I come down in a different position to him, but if we are going to look for primary powers we have to have a referendum. This seems to me the sensible process that follows that.

David T.C. Davies: I was one of the people who was involved in that last referendum, very much on the "anti" side. It is my experience that a significant number of people in Wales then and now want primary legislative powers. It is also fair to say, and I hope that everyone recognises, that a large number of people in Wales preferred the status quo and believed that Wales best played out its destiny as an integral part of the United Kingdom. I was one of those people; I was proud to be Welsh and proud to be British; proud to be a Welsh Unionist, if you like.

Many people in my situation are disappointed that the door effectively has been slammed shut on any change in the constitutional direction. The hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Mr. Öpik)seems to think that we should never change direction constitutionally; that we can never make mistakes. Perhaps I may remind my two Liberal Democrat colleagues that one of the biggest constitutional changes this country has ever made was to get rid of the monarchy. The experiment lasted only 11 years. We recognised that we had made a mistake and we went back in the other direction. It is a shame that we slammed the door on doing that in Wales.

Mr. Roger Williams: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that the option of full primary legislative powers was never offered to the Welsh people? Is he saying now that he would be happy for the Assembly to be got rid of altogether?

8.30 pm

David T.C. Davies: I would be happy to see another referendum that included that question, but that is my preference, not my party's. There is a slight difference between us on that. I have never made any secret of my view and I shall not pretend that I have changed my mind in the past few weeks. As the hon. Gentleman says, the referendum was on whether to have an Assembly, not a Parliament with primary legislative powers. If we are to have such a Parliament, we should have a full referendum on it.

I do not accept the implication that perhaps more people would have voted in favour of a Welsh Assembly had they been offered a Parliament. Had the Government thought that there was any support for having primary legislative powers in Wales, that would have been on offer in the first place, not the model we have now. Indeed, that would have been a far more coherent way to go about the project.

Lembit Öpik: The hon. Gentleman wrote on 30 June 2005:

"The Government are in the process of giving extra powers to the Welsh Assembly at present. Given the dreadful lack of competence in the areas in which the Assembly has got powers this is something I will be opposing."

There is an enormous difference between what he and his Welsh Conservative colleagues say and what their Front Benchers say. Does he regard a referendum as a potential way to fulfil his own goal of reducing the level of devolution, rather than increasing it or maintaining it at its current level?

David T.C. Davies: Time is short and I shall not go over my views again and again. Suffice it to say that I have not changed my mind. I am one of many people in Wales who did not want the Welsh Assembly, but unlike those who want a Parliament, I accept the situation as it is. I accept that we have an Assembly and I want to see it work, but I cannot accept a situation in which those who want primary legislative powers can come back over and over again, with one referendum after another, until they get the result that they want. That is why I support the amendments.

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Peter Hain): We have had some interesting contributions, and some tantalising bait was dangled before me by the right hon. Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer), my hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Havard) and the hon. Member for Monmouth (David T.C. Davies). I shall not bite at that bait because I am concerned about meeting the terms of the programme motion that was unanimously agreed.

I am grateful to the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik) for his general support for the Bill, but a Liberal Democrat source was reported in The Times recently as saying that "the last thing anyone wants is for him to declare for them. They're calling it the curse of Lemsip."

I shall luxuriate in the fact that he does not support me on this occasion.

There is widespread agreement across the House, including the hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan), that there should be a referendum if we move to primary powers. I also agree with the spirit of amendment No. 189 in the sense that we cannot keep calling referendums until the voters, exhausted, simply say yes. That point was also made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams). The very idea that we should have an "everendum" that just kept going in the way that was described is completely unacceptable and I think that the people of Wales would revolt against it. We need to come down to earth politically on that point.

The hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham asked about my motives. My view on the time frame is straightforward. In the end, the question of a referendum is not up to me because it is for the Assembly to initiate the process with a two-thirds majority. If she was asking for my view, I do not think that there is a case for considering holding a referendum in the next term of the Assembly, which will run from 2007 to 2011, because there will be a new political architecture in the Assembly if the Bill is passed and the new streamlined process of powers will be bedding down. I do not think that the issue will arise until at least the following Assembly term. We can all agree that the additional procedures provided under part 3 will need to establish themselves. We will then be able to determine whether that process has provided the streamlined process of decision making for which the Assembly has asked, whether there is a need to call a referendum, or whether a period of conflict has existed between Westminster and Wales that has provoked conditions such as those in the late 1990s that resulted in a turnaround of opinion from that in 1979 and produced the yes vote in 1997.

Mr. Alan Williams: I am impressed that the Secretary of State finds distasteful what we find so distasteful. In that case, why does he not legislate against it?

Mr. Hain: For the reasons that I am about to explain to my right hon. Friend and the House.

The amendments are an attempt to address the perceived risk that repeat referendums could be held on the commencement of Assembly Act provisions. I do not think that an explicit provision is required to stop repeat referendums, whether that is of the type proposed by my hon. Friend the Member for Aberavon (Dr. Francis), or that proposed by the Conservative party, because the Bill provides for an environment of consensus. Hon. Members who have spoken do not seem to have recognised that a two-thirds majority of the Assembly would be required. I have been criticised for insisting on a two-thirds majority, and ardent advocates of primary powers say that it will create an obstacle. I make no apology for the proposal because I do not consider it to be an obstacle.

If we are going to go for a referendum, it makes elementary political sense to say that we must be satisfied that the conditions are at least those that existed in 1997, with Welsh Labour, the Liberal Democrats and Plaid Cymru—and probably sections of the Welsh Conservatives—being in favour of a referendum and full primary law-making powers. The two-thirds majority is an essential check on whether there is consensus. In addition, a vote in the House and the House of Lords will be required, so Parliament will have to endorse that position. The idea that a series of referendums could be called one year after another—Quebec-style—is not realistic given the need for a two-thirds majority in the Assembly and a vote in the House of Commons and House of Lords. My answer to the fair question asked by my right hon. Friend the Member for Swansea, West is thus that a process of caution is built into the Bill.

A further point, albeit not a decisive one, would be in the background and could figure in public debate. Referendums are costly. It is estimated that a referendum would cost about £7 million, which is another reason why the people of Wales would revolt at the idea of continual referendums. History teaches us the political reality. When the referendum was lost in 1979, it took until 1997 to create the conditions in which it was felt that there was consensus to move again. We do not need legislation on the matter because it would put rigid barriers in the way of the politics. We and the people of Wales want politics to reflect the centre of gravity of Welsh politics, which is where I humbly believe that the Bill is situated.

The problem with amendment No. 189 is that it would throw away the key for the future. In that spirit, I hope that the hon. Lady withdraws it and that my hon. Friend the Member for Aberavon will not push his amendments to a vote. There are sufficient locks to require political consensus to be created, through a two-thirds vote in the Assembly initially, and then with this House and the House of Lords having the final say. I do not think that Parliament would stand for continuous referendums to bully people into voting yes, even if the Assembly repeatedly requested them. There is no support for that in the House and I, as the Secretary of State responsible for introducing the Bill, would have no truck with it.

Mrs. Gillan: We have had an interesting debate, which has gone on longer than I anticipated because of the significant contributions by some hon. Members. To defer to the Father of the House, the right hon. Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams) summed up the situation well. The Secretary of State is a man in a hurry. He does not want to wait. In a devastating critique, the right hon. Member for Swansea, West outlined that there is an element of political opportunism. What came through was that the Secretary of State is not showing any duty of care to the people of Wales by allowing the Bill to stand in the form that is before us. What I derived from the Father of the House's contribution is that this is an experiment with the constitutional position of Wales, which is not advisable and will do no good.

The fact that the Secretary of State was invited to place papers in the Library and papers were there none is also fairly significant. The consultation appeared to be only within the party and not with the public. That also goes some way to revealing the mindset behind the Bill.

I shall touch only briefly on the comments by the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik), because his contribution was not one of his best. However, I want to defend him. The Secretary of State was unnecessarily cruel in his taunting. It is understandable that his arguments were not as comprehensive as usual in the circumstances.

Lembit Öpik: I thank the hon. Lady for her support. I have had a lot on my mind recently, and I give her my unequivocal backing in her career.

Mrs. Gillan: I am happy to receive it because fortunately I am not running for the leadership of the Liberal Democrats, although I might make a better job of it than some other people.

As Chairman of the Select Committee, the hon. Member for Aberavon (Dr. Francis) has done a sterling job in difficult circumstances. I do not think that his Committee was fully consulted by the Secretary of State. I certainly do not think that it has been taken along in the process. He approaches the problem from a different dimension. Whereas the right hon. Member for Swansea, West may not be a great enthusiast for devolution, the hon. Gentleman is, but even he has problems with the way in which the Bill stands.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer), in the bravura performance that we have come to expect, made the points in his inimitable fashion. It was interesting that the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Havard) was tempted to participate in the debate. He said that we must not run too far ahead of the people. I agree entirely. I was delighted that he participated because we have not been treated to many contributions by the Labour Members who represent Welsh constituencies. It was good to see the hon. Gentleman making a contribution. My hon. Friend the Member for Monmouth (David T.C. Davies) said that the proposals would make Wales a political football, and he was quite right.

I have listened carefully to the Secretary of State. He says that nothing will happen until 2011—it might be some time after that—but he is trying to legislate today. He also said that there might be a period when Westminster was in conflict with Cardiff; I am not entirely sure that Westminster is not in conflict with Cardiff at the moment, but I do not want to intrude on the private agonies of the Labour party. But that is no excuse for bringing forward this legislation. I do not accept his arguments.

I see, rather, a strange consensus. He said that he wanted consensus, and he has it; from Swansea, West, from Suffolk, Coastal, from Aberavon, from, I think, Merthyr Tydfil, and from Chesham and Amersham. Therefore, I have no choice but to put my amendment to the vote in order to place on record our belief that the Bill should not provide the opportunity for repeat referendums and for turning Wales into a political football. By not acceding to any of the amendments that I or the hon. Member for Aberavon have tabled, the Secretary of State has brought this vote on himself.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Question accordingly negatived.

Adam Price: I beg to move amendment No. 31, in page 56, line 25, at end insert—

'(3A) If a resolution passed by the Assembly under section 103 includes the text of the question which the Assembly proposes should be included on the ballot paper at the referendum, that text shall be included in any recommendation made to Her Majesty in Council to make an Order in Council under subsection (1).'.

The Chairman: With this it will be convenient to discuss amendment No. 194, in schedule 6, page 112, line 32, at end insert—

'1A Both the question to be included on the ballot paper and any statement to precede the question must first have been approved by each House of Parliament in a procedure where the question and statement shall have been capable of amendment by each House.'.

Adam Price: Amendment No. 31 seeks to give the National Assembly for Wales the right and responsibility of setting the wording on any future referendum under the provisions of clause 102. As the Library has pointed out, it is unusual for the wording of a referendum question not to be set out in a Bill. Indeed, there is only one other example of this not happening. We had a lengthy discussion recently on the uniqueness of Wales vis-à-vis Northern Ireland. Only in the Northern Ireland Act 1998 is there another example of the wording not being set out in the legislation.

The Conservative amendment, which we do not support, would provide the opposite solution to ours, namely that the wording should be set out by Parliament. We believe that the people of Wales should decide on these matters, and that their representatives should decide on the wording of the question in a referendum on the extension of the principle of democratic sovereignty. As we know, timing is a key parameter of success when it comes to calling a referendum. We had a lengthy discussion on such issues in our debate on the last few amendments.

The other key parameter is the wording on the referendum ballot paper, which can influence the likelihood of success. As opinion pollsters know, the wording of a question can affect the level of support that a proposal attracts. We have seen that in relation to questions of devolution over the years. I suggest that a question asking the people of Wales whether the National Assembly for Wales should have law-making powers would be more likely to succeed than a question asking whether it should have more power, in an open-ended way. These are subtle differences, but they can affect the likelihood of success.

The referendum question, as with every other referendum, will be subject to the provisions of the Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000, which will mean that the Electoral Commission will pronounce on the intelligibility of the question and produce a report, according to its guidelines, to ensure that the question is clear, concise and impartial. Nevertheless, the power to set the wording of the referendum question is an important one, and it should properly reside with the elected representatives in the national representative institution of the people of Wales—the National Assembly—which is what our amendment seeks to achieve.

The Welsh Affairs Committee's report suggested that the wording should be set out in the Bill in the interests of clarity. However, the Government's response rejected that proposal, saying, rather mysteriously, that the wording should reflect the circumstances and the timing of the question's being put. That almost suggests that the referendum might happen in some future century, when the English and Welsh languages might have evolved in some way. The Government's response proves my point that subtle differences can be introduced into the wording of a question. The power to set the wording is therefore an important one.

The other issue that the Welsh Affairs Committee was trying to resolve in its way, and that we are trying to resolve in ours, is that of the lack of clarity as to how the wording will be decided. This could become a major political issue. As we have seen, the issue of where the power to decide the wording lies became a major issue in Quebec following the 1995 referendum there. Even now, we can see the jostling between Ottawa and Quebec for the proper constitutional authority over that issue. Ottawa has passed the Clarity Act to give itself the constitutional authority over the wording of any future referendum question, but the Quebec Government insist that they still have that power. We, too, need clarity, because we do not have it at present in this regard.

Mr. Llwyd: My hon. Friend is making a powerful point, and I fully agree with him. Let me take him back a few sentences to when he said that the procedure proposed in the Bill would mean that the Government here would decide on the wording, and that that would be overseen by the Electoral Commission. Does he agree that this Government's track record of listening to the Electoral Commission is not all that good, given that the commission has said that there is no case whatever for banning dual candidacy?

Adam Price: As ever, my hon. Friend has made a strong point, which constitutes a trenchant criticism of the governing party. Presumably the Electoral Commission could produce a report criticising the wording, and its independent advice could be ignored again.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan) (SNP): As the hon. Gentleman knows, the Arbuthnott commission, appointed by the Secretary of State for Scotland, considered this very subject. It decided that the attempt to ban dual candidacy was undemocratic, and the work of a political party that did not understand the process.

Adam Price: The hon. Gentleman has made another excellent point. The Government do not have a very good record of listening to independent commissions when the results of their inquiries do not accord with their own narrow party advantage. That is why we do not propose that the wording should be decided by an independent commission. We should remember that the Government did not listen to the Richard commission.

The solution is clear: if the Secretary of State wants the referendum to work on the basis of party consensus, he should take account of the consensus that would have triggered the referendum in the first place. The National Assembly should decide this important matter—not this House or the other place, not English, Scottish or Northern Irish Members of Parliament, but directly elected Assembly Members in Wales.

Mrs. Gillan: My amendment No. 194 is straightforward, so I shall not detain the Committee for long. The amendment requires both the question on the ballot paper and the statements preceding it to be amendable and approved by both Houses of Parliament.

It seems only right to me for Parliament, when preparing to devolve primary powers, to have the right to approve and/or amend the essence of questions about the process being put to the public. That would help to ensure scrutiny of what is a bit of a political hot potato, and I do not believe that the Government have provided for it in the Bill.

I heard what was said by the hon. Member for Carmarthen, East and Dinefwr (Adam Price) and I admit that I have some sympathy with it. Like him, I hope that the spirit of consensus that the Secretary of State keeps dangling before us will come home to roost one day—that he may agree with something that Opposition Members say, and incorporate it in the Bill. I doubt it very much, but we live in hope. I shall listen carefully to what the Secretary of State has to say.

Mr. Hain: Despite the honourable and valiant attempt of the hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan) to build consensus with Plaid Cymru, there are two separate points here. The first is that Parliament is ultimately in charge, and has to be. I do not think that amendment No. 31—under which the Assembly would be in charge, and Parliament would simply rubber-stamp the wording on which it had decided—is acceptable.

Clause 102(6) requires the Secretary of State to consult widely, and those consulted will obviously include the Assembly. The Secretary of State will also have to consult the Electoral Commission on the referendum question in the draft Order in Council. That procedure was established by section 104 of the Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000. As the draft Order in Council will have to be approved by at least two thirds of Assembly Members, I put it to the hon. Member for Carmarthen, East and Dinefwr (Adam Price) that the Assembly's support will be needed. Consensus will be built into the whole process. I think that the Bill would handle the matter much better than either amendment No. 31 or amendment No. 194.

[Mr. Hain]

It is not in the interests of the Government, when about to embark on a referendum to trigger primary powers for the Assembly, to create controversy around the question. There will be enough controversy around the issue at the time. Through the consultation requirements with the Electoral Commission built into the Bill, the requirements of the Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000 and consultation with the Assembly, a consensus will emerge that it is in no one's interest to disturb.

Mrs. Gillan: The Secretary of State appears to have a crystal ball that is not available to the rest of us. He has already said that the provision will probably not come anywhere near us until 2011 plus plus. He has just said, however, that it will be a controversial matter when it does come before us. I contend that it might not be. What does he know that we do not know, and how can he be sure, looking so far into the future, that he knows what will happen? I think that that is slightly arrogant.

Mr. Hain: I will not rise to that accusation. All I am saying is that the issue before the people of Wales should be the question on the ballot paper—do they wish to proceed to primary powers for the Assembly or not? That will undoubtedly be controversial—I would be surprised if it were unanimous. That is the point.

In respect of amendment No. 194 tabled by the hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham, the problem with the procedure that she suggests is that it could be a recipe for endless ping-pong if the House of Lords amended an Order in Council, which would be an unusual procedure—half of the argument of the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) was, quite properly, that Orders in Council are not amendable—or if the House of Commons amended it and then the Assembly amended it. The truth is that we can all agree with the procedure laid down in the 2000 Act, and that is exactly what the Bill does. I ask the hon. Member for Carmarthen, East and Dinefwr to withdraw the amendment.

Adam Price: I am sorry that the Secretary of State believes that Parliament is in charge and not the Welsh people, because it was on the latter basis that we worked together to win the referendum in 1997. Nevertheless, I do not want to detain the Committee further. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Adam Price: I beg to move amendment No. 156, in page 56, line 28, after 'Council', insert '(a)'.

The First Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Sylvia Heal): With this it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 157, in clause 102, page 56, line 29, at end insert

'or

(b) has been laid before each House of Parliament and the Assembly, has been approved by a resolution of the House of Commons and of the Assembly, but has been rejected by the House of Lords.

(4A) If subsection (4)(b) applies, the referendum shall not be held until one year has elapsed since the date on which the House of Commons came to the resolution.'.

No. 186, in clause 102, page 56, line 33, leave out subsection (6).

No. 195, in clause 102, page 56, line 36, at end insert—

'(6A) The draft of any statutory instrument containing an Order in Council under subsection (1) laid before each House of Parliament shall be amendable by either House during its consideration and approval.'.

Adam Price: Amendments Nos. 156 and 157 would remove the absolute veto enjoyed by the other place over the Order in Council setting up the referendum and replace it with a suspensory veto, similar to that which it enjoys over primary legislation under the Parliament Act 1949. There is an important point of principle involved for our party. It would be entirely wrong for an unelected institution to frustrate the will of the Welsh people, as expressed through their directly elected National Assembly, to hold a referendum on the matters contained in the Bill. I hope that some Labour Members agree with that basic principle and will support the idea of democratic sovereignty in that regard.

The royal commission on reform of the House of Lords proposed replacing the absolute veto over statutory instruments, which is what we are discussing in this instance, with the suspensory veto. It is important to remember that the other place has used its power to reject statutory instruments on a number of occasions. The Secretary of State will remember the famous case involving sanctions against southern Rhodesia in 1968. The House of Lords struck down that order because it supported the white minority Administration in southern Rhodesia. That caused something of a constitutional crisis at the time. However, it has used the power more recently too, during the passage of the Greater London Authority (Election Expenses) Order 2000, on the issue of freepost. The other place has shown that it is willing to use its power to strike down statutory instruments in the case of elections. Our fear is that, unless the amendment is accepted, the other place, which is not representative of anything in particular—it is certainly not representative of Wales—will use its power in the Bill to frustrate the aspirations of the Welsh people and their representatives to move on to the next phase of democratic devolution. That cannot be right.

9.15 pm

The Under-Secretary said in the Second Reading debate that the Parliament Act would not apply to the legislation, so that cannot be used to protect us against the House of Lords striking down an Order in Council in this context. The Salisbury convention will not apply. All we are left with is the First Minister saying in his evidence that new conventions will develop over time, as is the practice in the British constitution. That provides us with no crumb of comfort as we face the possibility that, having achieved the two thirds bar in the National Assembly that has been set down in the Bill, having achieved the political consensus that the Secretary of State refers to constantly, and having achieved an affirmative vote in this House of directly elected Members, we will be frustrated by the unelected Chamber down the corridor. That would be entirely unacceptable and against every honourable radical tradition in Welsh politics.

We appeal to the Government and to hon. Members to think again about giving the House of Lords an absolute veto in this regard. If a suspensory veto is good enough as regards every other piece of primary legislation, surely it is good enough when we are talking about the historic decision and proposal emanating from elected representatives of the people of Wales to move on to the next phase of democratic devolution.

The First Minister in his speech in the National Assembly for Wales said that he did not believe that there would be any circumstances where the Order in Council procedure, whether in relation to the referendum or to other aspects of the Bill, would be used to frustrate the will of the Assembly, because to do that would be to "expose yourself to ridicule, and you would pay the penalty at the next election."

That argument may apply to the Secretary of State and to the Commons, but it expressly does not apply to the unelected, unaccountable and often unpredictable House of Lords. We cannot expect the House of Lords simply to accede to the demands of this place and the National Assembly in that regard. As Lord Morgan pointed out in his evidence to the National Assembly Committee on Better Governance for Wales White Paper, the House of Lords came very close to throwing out, purely adventitiously, the Health (Wales) Bill. Heeding the clarion call—the bugle call—all the Tory peers appeared just before the vote on the hunting ban was taken. They were there and they came very close to striking down the Wales legislation. Surely everything in our political traditions in Wales should tell us that we cannot trust the other place to have the final say on whether we can move on to the next phase in democratic devolution.

In closing, I shall quote the Secretary of State. This is what he called the House of Lords, which in this Bill he is giving the final say over democratic devolution:

"a rather fey survivor from the pre-democracy days; it is a constitutional dinosaur . . . Unelected peers reflect an elitist state, which is one of the most unaccountable and secretive in the democratic world. It wields power by a combination of the royal prerogative, massive patronage and centralisation, with only a nod towards democracy".—[Official Report, 31 March 1993; Vol. 222, c. 357–59.]

The right hon. Gentleman must have had better speech writers in those days, but surely the principles that he enunciated in that speech are the same today. The House of Lords should not have a veto over whether Wales moves forward to democratic devolution.

Dr. Francis: Amendment No. 186, in my name and that of my hon. Friend the Member for Clwyd, South (Mr. Jones), would limit the role of the Secretary of State to laying a draft order for a referendum, which reflects the recommendation in the Welsh Affairs Committee's report on the White Paper. As things stand, the Secretary of State could refuse to lay the draft order for a referendum even if the National Assembly had voted by a two-thirds majority in favour of holding the referendum. I believe that Parliament alone, not the Government of the day, should accept or reject a request for a referendum.

I was impressed by what the Secretary of State said in response to earlier amendments about the importance of the sovereignty and primacy of Parliament—and that certainly applies to my amendment. His response to our recent report argued that removing his power of refusal would "bypass" the Government of the day, but that argument does not stand up. The Government of the day would be able to put forward their position in the debate on the order, and could control the timing of that debate. They would also hold a majority in the House of Commons, which would provide them with the numbers necessary to win a vote. Their views could not and would not be bypassed.

Ministers also argue that the Government would be "entitled to test and satisfy itself that the question should be put to the people of Wales".

I do not understand what form such an additional test would take. Would the Government hold focus groups or phone-ins, or an informal pre-referendum referendum? The necessary test for the referendum trigger is whether two thirds of the Members of the National Assembly for Wales are in favour of a referendum. As the Secretary of State said in another context, such a high threshold would necessitate cross-party support, and would therefore reflect the clear policy view of those parties—and also, surely, the view of those who voted for them.

Once that test has been satisfied and a request has been made, it should be for Parliament to decide. The Secretary of State is right to say that a move to full legislative competency at the National Assembly would represent "a significant constitutional development", but that makes it more important that Parliament—the sovereign seat of the United Kingdom Government—rather than the Government of the day, should decide on the merits of the request.

The Secretary of State knows as well as I do that the Government of the day will decide the fate of a request for a referendum—but the Government should have the confidence to make that decision in Parliament, not in Whitehall. For that reason, I ask hon. Members to support my amendment. I am sure that, as a democrat and a supporter of democratic devolution, the Secretary of State will respond positively and wisely to this sensible and modest request. I shall end by quoting the Secretary of State's hero and mine, Aneurin Bevan, on these matters—and I notice that the right hon. Gentleman is listening carefully. Aneurin Bevan said:

"The purpose of getting power is to be able to give it away."

Mrs. Gillan: In reality, we are considering three groups of amendments. Amendment No. 157, tabled by the hon. Member for Carmarthen, East and Dinefwr (Adam Price), appears to give some breathing space before the referendum is held and after approval by the Commons and the Assembly. However, it also seeks to eliminate the role of the House of Lords, and I cannot agree with that, as the hon. Gentleman would doubtless expect me to say. Moreover, such a provision would presumably still apply even if the House of Lords became a wholly elected body; that would be rather anti-democratic.

I have some sympathy with amendment No. 186. Clause 102(6) is a delaying tactic that can be spun out for as long as the Secretary of State of the day wishes. Removing it would remove some of the Napoleonic powers that the Secretary of State has attracted to himself. If he really wants to keep them he could add a time limit, in order to avoid the Secretary of State of the day deploying such delaying tactics.

[Mrs. Gillan]

Our amendment, No. 195, is simple, and if the Secretary of State appreciates the principles of sovereignty and the primacy of Parliament, he will have great sympathy with it. It would allow both Houses to examine and amend Orders in Council under subsection (1), and he should have no quarrel that, given his own principles, which he has laid out. I therefore hope that of these amendments he will have the grace to accept mine.

Mr. Hain: I very much enjoyed hearing the hon. Member for Carmarthen, East and Dinefwr (Adam Price) quote my words from some 10 years ago. The burdens of office mean that I cannot indulge in such ringing rhetoric and narrative any more.

David T.C. Davies: Will the Secretary of State give way?

Mr. Hain: I am sorry, but no. I want to make some progress, so I cannot give way to the hon. Gentleman, who is another specialist in ringing rhetoric. I should also point out that he is a very able newcomer to the House.

The problem with amendment No. 157 is that it would introduce a pre-emptive, Parliament Act-type procedure in respect of the referendum order. As the hon. Member for Carmarthen, East and Dinefwr will realise on serious reflection, we cannot introduce into a Government of Wales Bill an entirely new and unprecedented constitutional revolution in the relationship between the House of Commons and the House of Lords.

Mr. Llwyd: The Secretary of State will doubtless reflect on the view of Lord Richard, who said in giving evidence to the Welsh Affairs Committee that it would be a devil of a job to get these orders through the House of Lords. So the point that my hon. Friend the Member for Carmarthen, East and Dinefwr (Adam Price) makes through his amendment is a proper one. Secondly, when I challenged the Secretary of State on this issue at a conference in Cardiff, he said that he would invoke the Parliament Act to ensure that this problem did not occur. So it was on his mind then and it is on ours now; so far, we see no way around it. My hon. Friend quoted earlier from an excellent speech by the Secretary of State. During that speech, he quoted Tony Benn, the former Member for Chesterfield, who said:

"The House of Lords is the British Outer Mongolia for retired politicians."

Mr. Hain: We are not debating the merits or otherwise of a second Chamber. To be fair, the House of Lords has behaved with great care and responsibility towards Welsh legislation such as the Transport (Wales) Bill, the Commissioner for Older People (Wales) Bill and the various legislation that has gone through Parliament in recent years following bids from the Assembly. I would not expect it to treat Orders in Council in any way differently. Therefore, I do not think it right, in the middle of the debate about the Government of Wales Bill, to aim for a revolutionary change in the relationship between Lords and Commons. That would not be appropriate.

9.30 pm

I remind my hon. Friend the Member for Aberavon (Dr. Francis) that the Secretary of State will lay the Order in Council triggering the referendum. The referendum cannot appear suddenly, all on its own. It needs a Secretary of State to lay the Order in Council, and that would present an opportunity for proper questions about the consultation process. That is why we have made the order a requirement: it is not a delaying tactic, but will mean that proper answers must be given to proper questions.

In any case, the Secretary of State will have to consult the Electoral Commission about the referendum question contained in the draft Order in Council. The commission's report on that question's intelligibility will have to be laid, together with any preceding statement, with that draft order, according to the procedure established by section 104 of the Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000.

The hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan) said that she wanted a procedure that would allow the Order in Council to be amended, by either House or by both. Her amendment is not explicit, but I presume that she would want the Assembly to have the same ability. That would be a recipe for endless ping-pong.

If the Assembly did not have the ability to amend an Order in Council, but was required by the legislation to pass it, we would get it into great difficulties. I hope that the hon. Lady will concede, on reflection, that the 2000 Act contains a procedure that requires the Electoral Commission to be the driving force, along with the Government, on the referendum question. The commission will also, of course, have to consult with the Assembly on that question. I hope that that answers the hon. Lady, and that she will withdraw the amendment.

Adam Price: It is a shame that the Secretary of State believes that he can use the Bill to impose a constitutional lock by an unelected Chamber on the ambitions and aspirations of the people of Wales to deepen and enhance their democratic sovereignty. That is what the Bill does, and it is deeply objectionable to me and my party.

Some Labour Members may share our belief that sovereignty lies with the people of Wales. It is insulting to give an unelected Chamber the power to reject a constitutionally based demand by the elected politicians who represent the Welsh people in the National Assembly. That such a demand can be flouted by an unelected Chamber that represents nothing, let alone the nation and people of Wales, is especially demeaning.

I shall withdraw the amendment, but we may want to return to the matter. A consensus exists across the Chamber on this matter that we can build on with useful discussion. It is entirely unacceptable that the House of Lords should have a constitutional lock on the development of democracy in Wales.

I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

The First Deputy Chairman: We now come to clause 102 stand part—

Mr. Dai Havard (Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney) (Lab): On a point of order, Mrs. Heal. As I understand it, my hon. Friend the Member for Aberavon (Dr. Francis) had an amendment under consideration by the Committee.

The First Deputy Chairman: That amendment is in this group, but this is not the appropriate time to deal with it. Was the hon. Gentleman seeking to divide the House on the amendment?

Dr. Francis: No, I was not.

The First Deputy Chairman: That is fine. We can proceed as I suggested.

Clause 102 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Schedule 6 agreed to.

Clause 103

PROPOSAL FOR REFERENDUM BY ASSEMBLY

Hywel Williams: I beg to move amendment No. 32, in page 57, line 7, leave out from 'which' to end of line 9 and insert

'a majority of Assembly Members present and voting vote in favour'.

I suspect that the debate may be rather short as it is likely that there will not be much meeting of minds between Plaid Cymru and the Government and other parts of the House. Clause 103 is concerned with the Assembly's power to pass a resolution that a recommendation should be made that a referendum be held on whether the provisions of Assembly Acts should come into force. The clause requires a two-thirds majority of Assembly Members to vote in favour. Our amendment would replace that with a simple majority.

A simple majority has been deemed quite enough in this place to pass even the most contentious of matters. Hon. Members will recall just such a matter squeaking through last autumn by a single vote. I refer to the Terrorism Bill, which was of the utmost importance and to do with the freedom of citizens and a great many other matters. It was hugely contentious and split the Labour party, but it was carried by a single vote. I well recall Labour Members—at least, some of them—cheering and waving their papers as that happened.

If a one-vote majority is sufficient here on such contentious and important matters, why is it not good enough for the Assembly? The vote concerned will not be a vote to change the law; we will not be bringing in some huge innovation. It will be a question as to whether the people of Wales should be asked their opinion. In that circumstance, it would be quite proper to put the question to the people if a majority of the Assembly Members voted in favour. That is particularly so given the other checks on action that the Government have insisted on. When the Assembly holds a vote, there are the checks of the Secretary of State, of this place and of the place down the Corridor, as my hon. Friend the Member for Carmarthen, East and Dinefwr (Adam Price) said. All we are looking for is a vote on whether the people of Wales should be asked their opinion. I think it is a matter of common sense to do that by a majority vote.

The research paper prepared by the Library notes that a two-thirds threshold is quite "unusual". It also notes that the nearest precedent for this unusual move was the 40 per cent. threshold required for the referendums of 1979 on devolution for Scotland and Wales. That is an unfortunate precedent, to say the least. I have no desire to replay the fierce arguments of 1979 as that would not be appropriate here.

Adam Price: Go on.

Hywel Williams: I shall resist the temptation and note only that the 40 per cent. threshold then imposed was widely seen in Wales and in Scotland as being a wrecking move. There is a great danger that the higher threshold in the clause—not 40 per cent. but 66 per cent. before even an application could be made for a referendum—will be seen, too, as a wrecking move. It will be seen in a similar light.

Of course, in 1979 the referendum in Wales was lost disastrously, and it took us many years to recover from that. However, if I may allude briefly to the situation in Scotland, it is significant that the vote was carried in Scotland, but the 40 per cent. threshold was not achieved. That gave rise to a great deal of conflict and argument—the very controversy that the Secretary of State said only a few minutes ago that he was mindful to avoid in Wales. However, the Government are in danger of sowing further seeds of controversy, not about whether part 4 powers should come into effect but about whether the people of Wales should even be asked their opinion on the matter. The Secretary of State has an aversion to controversy around this issue, as he noted in speaking to amendment No. 31. In that respect, he should take the opportunity now to avoid further conflict on the two-thirds majority issue.

The Government will contend, I suppose, that the two-thirds majority would indicate a consensus. We have heard the Secretary of State and the Minister say that a number of times and that we should not proceed without such a majority. It is for the Minister to answer the points that I and perhaps other hon. Members will make.

Mark Tami (Alyn and Deeside) (Lab): Clearly, under the hon. Gentleman's proposal there could be a narrow majority, perhaps of only one. That would be a difficult referendum. What would be his view if a referendum on the future of the Assembly were lost on that basis?

Hywel Williams: I am happy to leave the question whether to hold a referendum to the good sense of the Assembly Members. That is what they are elected for by the people of Wales. They represent the people of Wales, and as my hon. Friend the Member for Carmarthen, East and Dinefwr said, they carry the sovereignty of the people of Wales. Plaid Cymru Members are happy to leave it to their good sense.

The argument is to be made by the Minister. I suspect that he will not agree with me. I cannot see why a simple majority is not sufficient to call a referendum.

Mr. Hain: May I say to the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Hywel Williams) that he and I agree, and our parties agree, that primary powers should be in this Bill? His party properly and honourably has campaigned for that for generations. I am proud to be the first Labour Secretary of State to be putting primary powers in a Bill.

[Mr. Hain]

The hon. Gentleman referred to the 1979 referendum and the circumstances of it. I am haunted by that, although I did not take part in the campaign. From a distance I supported the yes campaign. I am also haunted by the narrowness of the vote in 1997. Unlike 1979, the Labour party was not bitterly divided on the question in 1997. In 1979, there was a minority saying yes and a majority probably no. The referendum was lost four to one. I do not think that we should go anywhere near a referendum that could produce those circumstances. That is why I built in carefully a two-thirds vote in the Assembly, which would require at least, in the current political configuration and that for the foreseeable future, Welsh Labour, Plaid Cymru and the Liberal Democrats to be united, as we were in 1997. Even then, the referendum was only narrowly won.

If we put in place a mechanism that could result in an opportunistic vote in the Assembly with the current political arithmetic, the Opposition, even for the sake of embarrassing the Government—it is difficult to foresee, but one could imagine it—could force on the ruling Welsh Assembly Labour Government and on the Government here a referendum that could not be won by any objective assessment. As my hon. Friend the Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mark Tami) pointed out, that would do terrible damage to the cause of devolution and to the cause in which the hon. Member for Caernarfon believes—that of an Assembly with primary powers. This is not a roadblock; it is a sensible precaution.

We would need a consensus in the Assembly, reflecting the views of directly elected Members only, and support in Parliament to follow. I ask the hon. Gentleman to withdraw his amendment, not because we disagree about the principle of primary powers in this Bill, or about having a strong Welsh Assembly or about the cause of devolution, but because if he were to get his way it could create circumstances that would take us nearer to 1979, which would be a disaster for the whole devolution cause.

9.45 pm

Hywel Williams: I must say that I take offence at the Secretary of State's comments about the possibility of the Opposition parties, especially my party, taking an opportunistic chance in the Assembly to embarrass the Labour Government. This issue is far too important for that and I hope that the Secretary of State will recognise that our party has acted very responsibly on this matter.

Mr. Hain: I am grateful that the hon. Gentleman has taken this intervention, but I have to say that in recent months his party has consistently allied with the Conservative party and the Liberal Democrats in the Assembly on opportunistic votes to defeat the Welsh Assembly Government. Why might not that happen again?

Hywel Williams: It is not opportunistic to vote against the Government on matters of principle and of great importance, such as tuition fees.

David T.C. Davies: I am not sure whether I should declare an interest at this point. However, I remind the Committee that different parties have voted in different configurations all the way through the Assembly. On many occasions—even quite recently—I have joined the Labour party in voting against the Welsh nationalists. I do not think that anyone should read anything into that other than that all parties will try to do their best for the people whom they serve.

Hywel Williams: I do not wish to continue this discussion, but it does appear that the Labour party thinks that genuine and honest opposition to the Labour Government is in some way dishonourable, and I reject that entirely. As the hon. Member for Monmouth (David T.C. Davies) said, we have voted with the Government on occasion, depending on the issue.

I suspect that we shall not have a meeting of minds on the amendment and I do not wish to prolong the debate in view of the amount of business remaining. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Ian Lucas: I beg to move amendment No. 110, in page 57, line 13, leave out subsection (3) and insert—

'(3) The Secretary of State must—

(a) within the period of 120 days beginning immediately after the day upon which it is received consult upon—

(i) the voting system, and

(ii) the number of Assembly members of an Assembly after the Assembly Act provisions have come into force, and

(b) within the period of 180 days after the end of the consultation—

(i) lay a draft of a statutory instrument containing an Order in Council under section 102(1) before each House of Parliament, or

(ii) give notice in writing to the First Minister of the Secretary of State's refusal to do so and the reasons for that refusal.'.

The amendment relates to the period after the Assembly has voted in favour of moving forward on the proposal to this place for an Order for primary legislative powers. This is an unusual section of the Bill because it addresses a period that most parties agree is some time distant from today. It is not within the contemplation—I hope—of the Government to bring forward proposals at this stage for a referendum to introduce the part 4 process. We are therefore talking about a period that is some years hence—my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State mentioned 2011-plus.

In those circumstances, it is appropriate that if we are to consider the position politically at that time, there should be some provision in the process for a broader reflection on the Assembly to take place. The amendment proposes that after the Assembly asks for primary legislative powers there should be a consultation process, so that the people of Wales can be asked two questions relating to the Assembly.

The first question relates to the voting system for the Assembly. We should not assume that the system that was put in place by the Government of Wales Act 1998 should be set in stone for ever. If we are to have an Assembly with primary legislative powers, we shall have a different creature to the body created by the 1998 Act. It would thus be entirely appropriate at that stage at least to consult the people of Wales on the voting system that should be used to elect the new Assembly—if I may call it that.

People have extremely different views on the appropriate voting system for the Assembly at present. I am satisfied that the legislative powers for the Assembly that are proposed by the Bill are not so different from the existing powers that they require the system to be reconsidered at the moment. A referendum was held in 1998 and an additional member system was introduced. When a further referendum is held, there should be at least consultation so that the people of Wales can consider whether it is appropriate to continue with the additional member system. I have strong views on the matter. The Richard commission put forward several views, and the parties have different views on the system that should used. It would thus be right and proper to ask the question at the time of the referendum.

Mrs. Gillan: I am listening carefully to the hon. Gentleman. Will he tell the Committee which voting system he prefers? He says that he has strong views on the matter, but has not explained the voting system that he would like to see at that stage.

Ian Lucas: I would like a first-past-the-post voting system with 40 constituencies in Wales represented by two Members each—one man, one woman.

Mrs. Gillan: That is very clear. Why has the hon. Gentleman restricted his amendment so that it allows consideration of the number of Assembly Members, but not commensurate consideration of the number of Members of Parliament at the same time?

Ian Lucas: The amendment proposes consultation. If primary powers are allocated to the Assembly following a referendum, the Labour Government are likely to reduce the number of Welsh Members of Parliament, just as they did with Scottish Members, because the Labour party is a generous party. When the Labour party considered voting systems, it even assisted the official Opposition by ensuring that they had additional Assembly Members in Wales although they could not win a first-past-the-post seat.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): Is it not the case that the number of Scottish Members of Parliament was reduced not primarily because of the increased powers of the Scottish Parliament, but because of the significant inequity that had grown up over the years due to the number of people represented by each Scottish Member compared with the number represented by each English Member?

Ian Lucas: I am afraid that I am not as familiar with the intricacies of Scottish politics as my hon. Friend, so I will not respond to his point.

David T.C. Davies: May I remind the hon. Gentleman that there are some honourable exceptions to the rule of Conservatives not winning first-past-the-post seats? We have held at least one ever since the first Assembly elections were held.

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. Perhaps we can resume debate on amendment No. 110.

Mark Tami rose—

Ian Lucas: I give way to my hon. Friend.

Mark Tami: Like my hon. Friend, I support the introduction of the first-past-the-post system. Perhaps those who want a full single-transferable-vote system would give us an opportunity for the debate to take place. Few people are wedded to the current system. Many people on either side of the argument think that the system is badly flawed.

Ian Lucas: Indeed. My hon. Friend makes a powerful point. It is for that reason that I suggested a consultation. The issues are controversial. The importance of raising the subject at this stage is that unless the Bill is amended, the issues cannot be considered within the context of the referendum debate that will take place so far in the future.

The second aspect of the consultation relates to the size of the Assembly in terms of the number of Members. Clearly, an Assembly that has primary legislative powers will have a scrutiny role that goes far beyond the existing scrutiny role of the National Assembly for Wales. It is not often that politicians call for more politicians. I am afraid that I will do so, because one of the most important aspects of any legislator's job is to scrutinise legislation. My personal sense is that it would be essential to increase the number of Assembly Members if primary legislative powers were to be granted to the National Assembly for Wales. Any sensible discussion in the lead-up to a referendum on primary legislative powers would inevitably touch on that issue. Again, with the Bill as it stands, it is difficult to envisage how that could be sensibly raised and how more Members could be introduced.

I have suggested a consultation. I know that the issues are controversial, but when a major constitutional debate takes place in Wales when the referendum is called—if ever such a referendum is called—it is important that we have the discussions, consult the people and hear what they have to say.

Mrs. Gillan: I have read the hon. Gentleman's amendment carefully. Has he given any consideration to the length of time that the consultation should take? Does he envisage there being a specific period of time, so that it would not be an open-ended process?

Ian Lucas: I did consider the length of time, because the amendment stipulates a length of time. However, it is optimistic. I am not wedded to it. I was conscious that I did not want an extended period of consultation because I did not want to delay the process if the decision had been made by the Assembly. On the other hand, it would be necessary for a consultation to take place over a period of time, and for that reason I included the 120 days.

Mr. Paul Murphy (Torfaen) (Lab): It is 18 years ago almost to the day when I was squeezed into such a debate, with two and a half minutes left at the end of business on Welsh questions. I hope that the rules of the House will permit me to continue my remarks when we return on Monday to discuss this important business.

I sometimes look at legislation and apply what a very good friend of mine calls the Splott market test, which is: what would the people of Cardiff who go to the market in Splott on a Saturday morning think of the legislation that we are producing? I suspect that they would not think an awful lot about some of the constitutional issues that we have debated. I am not underestimating the significance of those issues, but we have to understand that, at the end of the day, the Welsh people want to consider how devolution affects their lives. Are their hospitals any better? Are their schools any better? Has the system of local government or planning been improved by the existence of the Assembly? The answer, probably, is yes, because the Assembly has given accessibility to Ministers and the accountability of Ministers to the people of Wales in a way that was never there when we had the old Wales Office.

The amendment that my hon. Friend the Member for Wrexham (Ian Lucas)—

It being Ten o'clock, THE CHAIRMAN left the Chair to report progress and ask leave to sit again, pursuant to Order [9 January].

Health Services (Suffolk)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.——[Mr. Heppell.]

10.1 pm

Mr. Tim Yeo (South Suffolk) (Con): I am delighted to have this chance to raise in Parliament the crisis in the health service in my constituency and in particular the threatened closure of Walnuttree hospital in Sudbury, a highly valued community hospital. The closure of Walnuttree, the loss of its in-patient beds and the ending of many out-patient services that are at present provided at the hospital, will be devastating for the town and the surrounding neighbourhood. The proposal has been brought forward by the Suffolk West primary care trust—which I will refer to simply as the trust—at a time when the population of both Sudbury and Cornard is planned to grow significantly and when the trust itself has confirmed that Sudbury has the highest level of mortality in the county. The proposal runs directly counter to Government policy, and the way in which the trust has handled it has destroyed the faith of my constituents in the integrity of the consultation process and the decisions that are likely to follow it.

Walnuttree serves 20,000 people in Sudbury and Cornard and thousands more in the nearby villages. It enjoys very high respect because of the quality of care provided by the dedicated and outstanding staff, many of whom have worked at the hospital for years. However, the hospital building—a former Victorian workhouse—has long been regarded as unsuitable, and it is greatly to the credit of the staff that the patients who have occupied its 68 beds and the people who use the out-patient services rarely if ever complain about the service that they receive. That is in contrast to the experience of some of my constituents in West Suffolk hospital at Bury St. Edmunds, where complaints are, regrettably, not infrequent. Unfortunately, patients who in the past have used Walnuttree will, if it is closed, be forced to go to West Suffolk hospital instead.

Proposals for a new hospital in Sudbury to replace Walnuttree have been around for 20 years, and recently hopes were high that final approval for its replacement was imminent. It was a shock, therefore, in 2004 when local officials produced an apparently damning fire safety report and used it as a pretext to recommend the hospital's closure. A big local campaign was mounted, with all-party support, to fight that threat. In November 2004, my former Labour opponent, Kevin Craig, and I jointly delivered a 10,000-signature petition to Downing street.

Great was the relief when that campaign persuaded local officials to see sense and a programme of fire safety work was announced. The then chief executive of Suffolk West primary care trust promised that Walnuttree would remain open until a replacement was built. In February 2005, the outline business plan for that replacement was approved by the strategic health authority. The then Secretary of State for Health wrote to Kevin Craig before the general election and said:

"Kevin . . . you have ensured that the voices of local people have been heard at the highest levels of Government."

The Chancellor of the Exchequer, no less, was quoted in Kevin Craig's election literature congratulating him on his role in that successful campaign. By April 2005, plans for the replacement hospital were well advanced and had been endorsed by a Department of Health gateway review report on the outline business case. Days before the general election, another meeting in Sudbury was assured that the new in-patient hospital would be built prior to the closure of the old site.

Alas, with the election out of the way and a new chief executive in place at the trust, all those promises were suddenly cast aside. In June, the trust dropped its bombshell: Walnuttree was to be closed after all. No replacement in-patient beds were to be provided, just a glorified GP surgery. Even the in-patient services provided at Walnuttree were to be transferred to West Suffolk hospital 20 miles away.

The reaction in the town was outrage. Days after the news broke, I chaired one of the biggest public meetings ever held in Sudbury, and the Walnuttree hospital action committee was formed. In July, with other Suffolk Members of Parliament and Lord Phillips of Sudbury, I met the Secretary of State, who assured us that the consultation process would be taken seriously. However, the trust's consultation paper, "Modernising Healthcare in West Suffolk" was a seriously flawed document, which stressed the need for financial savings but suggested only one way of achieving them—through savage cuts in local services and the closure of Walnuttree.

Throughout summer and autumn, the community mounted the biggest protest campaign in my constituency in the past 23 years. I pay tribute to the action committee, including its chair, Colin Spence; Michael Mitchell, a porter at the hospital; Michael Mandelstam; the mayor of Sudbury, Lesley Ford-Platt; Richard Titford of Sudbury Churches Together; Sylvia Byham, and Peter Clifford. Those are just a few of the people who have done outstanding work.

The committee adopted a highly professional approach, raising money to commission an expert study of the proposal and its likely effects, and offering to work with the trust to achieve an outcome that was acceptable to the local community and more consistent with stated Government policy. Regrettably, the trust rebuffed that approach. I much regret that the trust's new chief executive, Mike Stonard, has obstructed the action committee's attempts to find a solution to the problem, to the extent of resorting on occasion to untrue statements and evasions when asked straightforward questions, and casting wholly unjustified aspersions on the integrity of people who are campaigning to protect our health service.

Truth has, on occasion, flown out of the window during the course of the argument. During Health questions on 22 November last year, I was told by the Secretary of State:

"Walnuttree . . . has already had £300,000 invested in it to bring it up to the standard required by fire safety regulations".—[Official Report, 22 November 2005; Vol. 439, c. 1358.]

When I challenged that assertion, the Minister of State, Department of Health, the hon. Member for Doncaster, Central (Ms Winterton), wrote to me on 24 December saying:

"I have noted your comments about the advice given by officials being misleading in relation to the £300,000 spent at the Walnuttree Hospital to bring it up to fire safety regulations. I should point out that I have been assured that this advice is accurate."

Last week, inquiries made under the Freedom of Information Act 2000 revealed that expenditure on fire safety works during 2005 actually amounted to £100,000, not £300,000. The Under-Secretary may like to apologise on behalf of both the Secretary of State and the Minister of State for their inadvertent misleading of the House. I hope that the Department will now examine the sources of the incorrect information that it was given.

The trust's consultation document refers to increased provision of intermediate care—something that everyone in Suffolk welcomes—but it utterly fails to make even a remotely convincing case for its claim that all those who in the past have received in-patient treatment at Walnuttree can be catered for in the community. Even the trust's own rules define a set of patients as ineligible for care in the community, which includes those without a carer at home, those whose home is unsuitable, those whose needs are too great, and those who do not have the potential for rehabilitation within six weeks. Nor has the trust explained how the cost of all that extra treatment in the community will be met.

Those proposals will also place a heavy burden on both Suffolk county council social services and on West Suffolk hospital. Unfortunately, in the current year—before the trust's proposals come into operation—the social services department already faces an overspend of £2.7 million. Far from being unable to cope with any extra burden, the department is looking for ways to make savings. West Suffolk hospital also faces a cash crisis and is planning to close beds.

The driver of the trust's proposals is not, as Mike Stonard claims, its desire to introduce an improved model of care. It is all about saving money. So desperate is the crisis that management is breaking all its previous promises and introducing measures that will clearly damage patients. Since it is only about money, why did the trust not consider whether it would be cheaper to keep open the in-patient beds at Walnuttree, as community beds are generally understood to be cost effective?

The truth is that if the trust wanted to improve services in Sudbury, it would revert to the previous evidence-based successful model of care, which included some in-patient beds at Walnuttree, alongside improved services in the community. Ramming through bed closures by alleging that none of the patients who has used them in the past will in future ever need to be treated anywhere other than at home is absurd. Some patients will be inappropriately left at home to suffer or even die without proper community support. Others, as the trust admits, will have to be accommodated within West Suffolk hospital, aggravating the problem of bed blocking and causing longer waiting lists, in direct contradiction of Government policy.

As the Audit Commission said in its report, "The Way to Go Home—Rehabilitation and Remedial Services for Older People",

"there is a danger that in the general confusion around the term 'intermediate care', older people will not receive the care they need".

Bear it in mind that less than a year ago the outline business case proposed, after months of consultation and with widespread local support, a model of care that included 32 new in-patient beds in the new hospital that would replace Walnuttree. What changed between February and June last year to render this model suddenly irrelevant? Not the evidence about patient need. Not the needs of the community. Not the number of people requiring care at Walnuttree. All that changed was the decision of the trust to put the demands of the accountants ahead of the interests of patients.

Ironically, the letter in which the Minister of State made her inaccurate claim about what had been spent on fire safety included a statement of policy on community hospitals. She stated:

"Our commitment to community hospitals is to support a new generation of community hospitals that can meet the needs of local people".

I invite the Minister to tell the House this evening that he will instruct the trust to honour that commitment. Or was it, like so many statements from Ministers now, just words, which the Minister never intended should have any real meaning?

Community hospitals are, after all, not just cheaper and more cost effective for in-patients than acute hospitals; they are closer to home, patient friendly and offer more continuity of care provision. What is more, the Minister of State has boasted of £100 million being available to develop them. What about a fraction of that for Sudbury?

It is not only in-patients who will suffer. Last year the outline business case included consultant clinics at the replacement hospital. These, too, have disappeared from the trust's plans for Sudbury and will instead be moved to West Suffolk hospital in order to save £40,000 a year. At least in this regard the trust admits that decentralised services can sometimes be more expensive, a factor that it conveniently overlooks when costing the extra intermediate care which it claims will be provided in future.

Centralising the clinics in West Suffolk hospital will greatly burden the patients who use them. The car journey to West Suffolk hospital from Sudbury takes half an hour at best, costs a significant amount and adds to pollution, including CO_2 emissions. Many elderly patients have no access to a car and will have to make the bus journey of more than an hour, which culminates in a five-minute uphill walk from the bus stop to the hospital—something that no one at the hospital was even aware of until I pointed it out.

I tried the bus journey myself last August and invited the directors of the trust to join me. None did, possibly fearing that first-hand knowledge of what they were planning to inflict on vulnerable patients, who until now have enjoyed a local service, might force them to admit their mistake. Incidentally, patients report that the hospital's own transport service is even worse and can take up to six hours door to door because of the need to collect patients from all over a dispersed rural area.

Ministers have stressed the Government's commitment to patient choice, but patient choice is not what the trust will provide. Ministers have spoken about care closer to home, but the trust is taking care for many patients further away from home. Not surprisingly, nobody affected by these proposals supports them. The three main GP practices in Sudbury, including one that could benefit if the proposals go ahead, have all rejected them. Rehabilitation clinicians and therapists within the Suffolk West primary care trust have protested internally. The BMA has condemned the plans. Sudbury town council has objected to them. Babergh district council said that the proposals "are not cost effective and will not deliver increased access to services" and that they

"will have an adverse impact on Babergh's disabled adaptations budget".

Suffolk county council passed a motion urging

"the Secretary of State for Health to instruct primary care trusts not to close Community Hospitals until some other means of intermediate care is up and running."

The local patient and public involvement forum stated that "the actual proposals appear to be ill-thought out, lack real factual cost justification and in our view are likely to cause unnecessary pain and suffering to those in need".

Five thousand letters have been sent to the Secretary of State, and 3,500 submissions have been made to the trust. There is not a shred of justification for the proposals. They will harm the population that they are supposed to serve, and they contradict Government policy. Understandably, residents now have little faith in the integrity of the consultation process.

In East Suffolk, where 90 per cent. of the responses to the consultation, "Changing for the better: next steps", criticised the proposals, the agency interpreting the data on behalf of the various trusts commented:

"The consultation questionnaire was assessed to have poorly drafted questions that tended to lead respondents towards an apparently "obvious" (and negative) answer ... What little evidence there is suggests the response sample was not representative ... the health community would be unwise to place excessive weight upon the quantitative views expressed during this consultation."

Would that have been the reaction if the public had backed the proposals? I fear that when the responses to the Suffolk West primary care trust consultation are analysed, a similar charade will occur. If the questions do not produce the answers that the trust wants, someone will say that they were the wrong questions, and the people who replied to them will not be considered representative. To make matters worse, the Suffolk West primary care trust will soon be abolished, before its bosses have to answer for the damage and suffering that their proposals will be inflicting.

One final point must be emphasised. Although the trust must bear a big share of the responsibility for what has gone wrong, it is also true that Suffolk West has been disgracefully treated in cash terms by the Department of Health. Serious underfunding from the centre has compounded the problems with which the trust has had to grapple. The tragedy is that, against that background, the solution that the trust proposes will not solve the problem.

Mr. Richard Spring (West Suffolk) (Con): May I express my admiration for the restraint with which my hon. Friend is delivering his speech? Does he agree that spending is at the heart of this matter? In Suffolk West, the per capita spend is £223 less than in the rest of the country. The fact that the changes in the funding formulae that have taken place under this Government are skewed against an area such as Suffolk West was confirmed this afternoon by the strategic health authority.

Mr. Yeo: My hon. Friend is quite right about that. We have a severe underfunding problem in Suffolk West.

It is not the Walnuttree hospital that has caused this crisis. It is a combination of unfair treatment by the Department and short-sighted incompetence by the trust. I urge the Minister to say three things in his reply. First, he should acknowledge that intermediate care is not suitable for every single patient. Secondly, he should instruct the trust to abort its consultation process at once. Thirdly, he should tell the trust to work with the Walnuttree hospital action committee to develop alternative proposals, based on a proven model of care, that will reflect the priorities of the Government and the needs of the patients. If the Minister does that tonight, I will launch a fund to erect a statue to him in the town.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Liam Byrne): I have not been in politics long, and I certainly have not had an offer like that before. Let me see what I can do this evening. I start by congratulating the hon. Member for South Suffolk (Mr. Yeo) on securing this Adjournment debate. He takes a keen interest in health matters in Suffolk, and he has recently raised the matter of health services in his constituency in parliamentary questions and correspondence, to which ministerial colleagues have recently replied. Indeed, the Secretary of State and other ministerial colleagues have also been fortunate enough to meet several of the hon. Gentleman's colleagues and fellow local MPs in Suffolk and the wider strategic health authority area to discuss local health services. I should also like to put on record my thanks and praise for the work done by Kevin Craig and local councillors in ensuring that this matter has been so thoroughly aired.

Before I turn to the vital local matters that the hon. Gentleman has raised, I hope that the House will permit me to sketch a little of the background to this debate. The national health service is now in receipt of record resources. Funding of the NHS has increased from £35 billion to nearly £70 billion, and by 2007–08, that will rise again to £92 billion. That is a huge increase. If the NHS were an economy, it would be the 33rd largest in the world, a little larger than that of Portugal.

That money has gone where it matters. It has gone towards boosting the numbers of consultants, GPs and nurses, which have risen by 47 per cent., by nearly 4,500 and by 67 per cent. respectively since 1997. I am glad that the hon. Gentleman emphasised the contribution made by NHS staff in his constituency.

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for South Suffolk (Mr. Yeo) on securing such an important debate. I hear what the Minister is saying, but if a record amount is being invested, why are hospitals such as Walnuttree closing?

Mr. Byrne: I shall deal with the question of investment in South Suffolk shortly.

Those new staff up and down the country have done an enormous amount of work in shortening waiting lists. The number of people receiving treatment in hospital has increased by three quarters of a million to over 5.5 million, up by 16 per cent. since 1997. The total number of people waiting is down by more than 25 per cent., and the number of people waiting for more than three months by more than 50 per cent. The result, quite simply, is the saving of lives. Cancer mortality rates in England are down by 12 per cent., and the mortality rate for circulatory disease in England has fallen by 27 per cent.

Suffolk has benefited greatly from that advance. The latest figures show that death rates from coronary heart disease in the Suffolk area have fallen by nearly 23 per cent. since 1997. That is not an accident; it has happened because there are 400 more consultants, 4,900 more nurses and 800 more doctors in the strategic health authority area. Those staff have done an enormous amount to cut waiting times, and the results are showing in the most important indicators, the mortality statistics.

Along with the extra money have come innovations such as the early intervention team that helps West Suffolk hospital to manage new demand; new community matrons; £26 million of investment in Ipswich to create a new critical care suite and planned treatment centre, scheduled to open in 2007; and the launch of a digital hearing aid service, Choose and Book, up and running in east Suffolk ahead of schedule. I could go on and on, but the debate is not about the past. It is about the future, and at the heart of the critique of the hon. Member for South Suffolk were two questions with which I wish to deal, about money and about services.

An extra £110 million or so has gone into the NHS in Suffolk since 2003. The hon. Gentleman's constituency has received an extra £49 million between 2003–04 and 2005–06. I am glad that he raised the issue of fair funding. Fair funding would not have been promoted by the patient's passport, on which he campaigned in his constituency during the election. I am glad that that policy has gone into the bin. The introduction of fair funding is important in Suffolk, because it will raise health funding to the necessary level. Between 2006–07 and 2007–08, the total amount of extra money for Suffolk is set to rise by £86 million. There are deficits in some Suffolk trusts, but it is important to note that the level of increased funding for primary care trusts in Suffolk is nearly 2.5 times that of current deficits.

The pace of change with which funds have been increased is important. The hon. Gentleman said he did not feel that his area had been treated well in the past. In the future, the rate of funding will rise by nearly 21.5 per cent. That is more than the national average, which is just 19.5 per cent.

At a time when the amount of money is rising, it is important for the local NHS to spend time on getting services right. There are no more important services than those that support older people and those with long-term conditions, not just because they have given their country and their community a lifetime's service but because they are the nation's biggest users of the NHS. Two thirds of NHS acute beds at any one time are occupied by someone over the age of 65, and we believe that about 80 per cent. of NHS costs are spent on the 15 million people with long-term conditions. Services for older people and those with long-term conditions need to be strengthened, in Suffolk as elsewhere. The principles that underpin the current consultation in the hon. Gentleman's constituency must be in line with the policy of transforming emergency care to support the care of both older people and people with long-term conditions closer to home, which is where they want it to be. That means supporting people in their own homes with integrated health and social care teams, often co-ordinated by community matrons, in a model of care that has been successfully introduced elsewhere in the NHS and already exists in many parts of Suffolk. Intermediate care is needed that progresses rehabilitation much faster, enabling people to maintain their independence, so they do not become completely reliant on episodic hospital care.

[Mr. Byrne]

Mr. Spring rose—

Mr. Byrne: I have two or three more important points to make in the last five minutes. If I get a pause, I will give way.

The key point about modernisation of services in Suffolk is that 20th century models of services, which often trapped patients in hospitals, simply do not meet the needs of patients, families and, importantly, carers, and nor do they exploit advances in assistive technology. The public have told PCTs that they need to co-ordinate services better with social care so that people do not spend unnecessary time in hospital.

Rightly, there will always be popular affection for well-established local institutions such as the Walnuttree. That is surely no crime—NHS professionals change people's lives. I will always remember the surgeon who struggled to save my mother's life and the midwives who delivered my children. Surely the 2,500 responses in east Suffolk, the 3,500 responses in West Suffolk and the 29,000 people who signed nine separate petitions across the county to show their support for the Walnuttree reflect that instinct. Such views must be balanced against the need for the NHS to modernise and provide the most appropriate care for patients.

The hon. Gentleman made an important point about statements made to the House about spending on the Walnuttree. The chief executive of the primary care trust will now write back to him explaining exactly how the £300,000, which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State gave as information to the House, was spent.

Over the years to come, important changes will be needed to the way in which money is spent. Surely it is good that the local community in Suffolk has to consider how to spend another £86.5 million over the next two years in delivering 21st century care. The White Paper on health and social care, which will shortly be presented to the House, will have a great deal to say about how care needs to be shifted much closer to the community, how we need to shift the balance of spending from acute hospitals into preventive services, and importantly, how health and social care must work more closely together.

Mr. Yeo: In the four or five minutes that the Minister has left, can he explain why what was such a good idea—backed by the Department of Health, the strategic health authority and the local trust—the day before the election, turned out to be such a bad idea a month later?

Mr. Byrne: Unfortunately, I was not party to the plans developed before the election, but the important point raised by the hon. Gentleman is how the proposals currently on the table, which I understand will be decided on and published after the board meeting at the end of February, match up to Government policy. When the primary care trust reaches its decision and publishes it to the local community, it is important that it explains how the proposals that it has considered line up against the White Paper to be published shortly. As I said, that White Paper will contain a number of important principles. It will talk about how we shift money into preventive services, how we give people far more control of their own care, and how we ensure that health and social care work much more closely together.

Mr. Spring: The Minister is replying with great courtesy but, with respect, he is living in complete fantasy. The idea that there are integrated care teams and that people can exist to be part of those teams is nonsense because there is already a shortage of people in the county of Suffolk who could undertake that job. Although he is talking about increases, already, pre-emptively, at the main hospital in West Suffolk, 260 people have had their jobs removed in the past few months, and 55 beds have been removed. The crisis is deepening. With respect, his words are not linked to the reality on the ground. I am sorry to have the tell him that.

Mr. Byrne: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for that intervention but services will often need to be changed as there are advances in the way people in social care and primary care work together. Of course, we would expect services to be reconfigured. We would also expect, for example, more services that are currently located in acute trusts to move closer to the community.

If we look at the way in which outpatient services are managed in every other modern health care system on the continent and the amount that is concentrated in primary care systems, there is a great contrast with our own system. We need to learn important lessons from that. We need to look at how, in certain disciplines such as ear, nose and throat, dermatology and a range of others, outpatient services can be moved into services that are closer to home. That will sometimes require reconfiguration of services that are centred on acute trusts. That agenda is based on strengthening services and that is why I want to underline—

Oral Answers to Questions

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

The Secretary of State was asked—

Protectionist Trade Policies

1. Mr. Stephen Crabb (Preseli Pembrokeshire) (Con): What assessment he has made of the impact of protectionist trade policies on poor countries; and if he will make a statement. [45074]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for International Development (Mr. Gareth Thomas): Current protectionist policies from OECD countries prevent developing countries from accessing our markets and trading their way out of poverty. If, for example, subsidies to US and EU cotton farmers were removed, it has been estimated that cotton exports from some of the poorest countries in sub-Saharan Africa could increase by up to 75 per cent. There was some progress made in Hong Kong, but more progress is needed to secure a truly pro-development outcome to the Doha development round. We are working to that end.

Mr. Crabb: Last September, the Prime Minister warned that failure at the World Trade Organisation ministerial meeting in December would echo right round the world. Given the disappointing outcome in Hong Kong, what can the Minister say to persuade the House and observers round the globe that the WTO is not a dysfunctional organisation in which the interests of the poorest people on the planet are betrayed time and time again?

Mr. Thomas: The hon. Gentleman's fundamental point that Hong Kong was disappointing is absolutely true. There was some progress on export subsidies, for example, and on special and deferential treatment. In the run-up to Hong Kong, there was some progress on allocating more resources to help countries boost their trading capacity. However, we will need to see more movement from all sides in the negotiations if, as I indicated, we are to be able to achieve the pro-development outcome from the Doha development round that I think we all want to see.

Kali Mountford (Colne Valley) (Lab): My hon. Friend will be aware that there are people meeting today to think outside the box. They will be meeting alongside people like Bono and Michael Douglas. If countries really are to be able to trade their way out of poverty, particularly those countries who need trade the most, is it not important that they too are brought inside the box for these discussions?

Mr. Thomas: I want to congratulate those who are thinking outside the box about trade and negotiations. The Government, as part of our contribution to help progress in the current round of talks and more generally, published in December our long-term vision of the future of the common agricultural policy, setting out our vision of a European agricultural industry that does not distort international trade. We published that document as an out-of-the-box opportunity for discussion in Europe and more generally. I hope that those who are taking part in the discussions in Davos, to which my hon. Friend alludes, will talk to all European states if they come up with useful ideas.

Mr. William Cash (Stone) (Con): Does the Minister accept that unless the Government address the problems that arise from the EU in the context of protectionism, there is no point in talking about whether we will be in the box or out of the box. The questions are perfectly clear. There is a determination in certain countries in Europe for protectionist policies to remain. Should not the Government ensure that they get the message across to those countries and do something about the matter?

Mr. Thomas: I recognise that the hon. Gentleman has a distinctive view on all things European. However, he is a little out of date on the CAP. I am sure that he would want to congratulate again my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs for the progress that we have made already on reform of the CAP, in 2003 and 2004. However, I welcome the hon. Gentleman's continuing encouragement for us to make more progress on the CAP. That is, indeed, what the Government are seeking to achieve.

Anne Snelgrove (South Swindon) (Lab): The Minister has identified some of the successes at the Hong Kong talks. Will he tell us what we are going to do as a country to support the World Trade Organisation's cotton initiative?

Mr. Thomas: My hon. Friend is right. We have continued to provide support to a range of developing countries to help them be in a better position to negotiate at the WTO talks. We strongly support the proposal to fast-track cotton in the agricultural negotiations, including providing support, for example, to the chair of the least developed countries group, Minister Patel from Zambia, who warmly appreciated our support and the way in which it had enabled him to make his proposals to our American friends.

John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): Given that the agreement on duty-free and quota-free access will still allow the United States to stop exports of textiles from Bangladesh and will allow Japan to resist exports of rice from Cambodia, would it not be accurate to say that the attitude of the United States and Japan to those developing countries is really, "You can export to us anything that you like as long as it is not competitive"?

Mr. Thomas: As I indicated in my reply to the original supplementary, all sides will have to give further ground if the talks are to be successful. We welcome the fact that some 97 per cent. duty and quota-free access has been offered, but we want to see agreement that 100 per cent. duty and quota-free access should be granted to all products from least developed countries. We will continue to make that argument over the coming months.

Andrew Gwynne (Denton and Reddish) (Lab): Clearly, it is important that the views and opinions of developing countries are heard at the WTO and in other international forums. What are the Government doing to facilitate a stronger voice for developing countries?

Mr. Thomas: One of the positive signs from Hong Kong was the continuing strength of the developing country voice, which was first evident back at the Cancun talks in 2003. Since 1998 we have given some £180 million to developing countries to help them increase their ability to negotiate and to do the research that feeds into those negotiations, and we have said that we will continue to provide such support in the coming months and years.

Andrew George (St. Ives) (LD): Before the Prime Minister arrives and just between ourselves, would the Minister care to share his views on why the Hong Kong trade talks were such a failure in development terms? After all, the UK held the presidency of both the G8 and the EU, and the Prime Minister's favoured son led for Europe. Does the Minister accept that the talks were a failure for the UK, and what does he believe needs to be done to bring Trade Ministers back together in order to iron out the problems as quickly as possible?

Mr. Thomas: As the hon. Gentleman knows, there are more than 180 members of the World Trade Organisation. All can veto progress in those talks, so it is a highly complex process to make progress. As I said in previous answers, we saw signs of progress in those talks and we need to build on that. All sides will have to give ground—within the European Union, the United States and developing country blocs. We will use all the opportunities available to us, and I welcome the fact that Peter Mandelson is meeting a number of his interlocutors at the Davos forum this week. That can only help.

Mr. Lindsay Hoyle (Chorley) (Lab): My hon. Friend is aware that it is about fair trade, not free trade, for the poorest countries. Does he recognise that special help and support ought to be given to Caribbean and African countries whose cane sugar market is disappearing and whose economies will disappear as a result?

Mr. Thomas: My hon. Friend is right to say that we must continue to argue for fair trade, as well as opening up markets, and that we need to help countries work out for themselves what reforms they want to introduce and the pace at which they want to bring them in. On his specific point about sugar, I accept that a number of countries are affected by the sugar negotiations, which we welcome in general terms. Some transitional assistance has been agreed for 2006. As part of the more detailed discussions about the 2007–2013 European budget, we need to agree further transitional assistance for those sugar-producing countries, and we intend to do just that.

Mr. Andrew Mitchell (Sutton Coldfield) (Con): In view of the widespread disappointment at the failure of the WTO talks in Hong Kong and the widely shared perception that the European Union is, at the least, a substantial roadblock to progress, what specific proposals is the Minister pressing the EU negotiators to put forward in Geneva? Does he agree that there is not much point in Commissioner Mandelson making dyspeptic speeches about the failure of others to perform at the WTO, when so much of the problem is clearly caused by EU intransigence?

Mr. Thomas: I would not characterise the Hong Kong talks as a failure. As I indicated, some progress was made—on export subsidies, for example, which we warmly welcome, and on special products and the special safeguard mechanism, which is important for developing countries. In the run-up to the Hong Kong talks the European Union made a particularly helpful contribution on the commitment to provide some €2 billion for trade-related capacity building. Clearly, on agriculture and a range of negotiating briefs, the EU and all member blocs in the WTO will have to give further ground. We will continue to encourage both Commissioner Mandelson and individual member states to be seized of the urgency of that.

Global Fund

3. Sandra Gidley (Romsey) (LD): What recent assessment he has made of contributions and pledges to the Global Fund to Fight AIDS, Tuberculosis and Malaria. [45076]

The Secretary of State for International Development (Hilary Benn): The international community pledged $3.7 billion at the global fund replenishment conference in September 2005. This will allow the continuation of all existing grants. A further $3.3 billion is needed to ensure that the global fund can approve new rounds of grants in 2006–07. A follow-up conference will be held in June to review the resources needed and to secure additional pledges.

Sandra Gidley: The Secretary of State has just announced that there is a $3.3 billion shortfall. In the light of that, will he explain how the universal access to AIDS treatment promised at Gleneagles will be delivered?

Hilary Benn: It is partly going to be about the money, which is why a further meeting is to be held in June. As the hon. Lady will be aware, the United Kingdom is playing its part, having doubled its contributions and then doubled them again. This is not just about funding the drugs, however. It is also about ensuring that the necessary health service capacity exists to test people, to administer the drugs and to ensure that people keep to their regimes. There is now more money in the international system than in the past. The three by five target—and now the target of treating as many people as possible by 2010—will help to make progress, but the truth is that we have a long way to go to bring prevention, treatment and care to all who need it, which is what the commitment that we entered into at Gleneagles is all about.

Mrs. Betty Williams (Conwy) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the fight against AIDS is not just a question of finance? Is he in a position to update the House on the progress made through the World Trade Organisation to ensure that multinational drug companies cannot prevent the worst-hit nations from importing and manufacturing drugs that will help the victims of AIDS?

Hilary Benn: Through the changes made under the trade-related aspects of intellectual property rights agreement—the TRIPS agreement—developing countries are now in a better position compulsorily to license the manufacture of such drugs, if they have their own manufacturing capacity and, under the most recent change, to import from others if they do not. We need to work with and support developing countries in using the powers available to them, to ensure that they can obtain the drugs at a price they can afford.

We also need to encourage the drug companies to undertake more research into antiretroviral treatment for children. One of the problems that developing countries face is that because AIDS did not develop in the west as a disease that affected children, the research went into the treatment of adults. Children have particular needs, however. We are funding some research to make progress, but I hope that the pharmaceutical companies will do more, because many children are born HIV-positive and they will need this treatment if they are to stay alive.

Mr. John Redwood (Wokingham) (Con): Do the Government have an estimate of how many people are suffering from these dreadful diseases in Africa? What proportion of them will be treated under the policies and programmes that the Secretary of State is describing?

Hilary Benn: There are 40 million HIV-positive people in the world, the bulk of whom live in sub-Saharan Africa. From memory, about 550,000 people in that region were on antiretroviral treatment as at June 2005. That was treble the number on that treatment 12 months earlier, but as the right hon. Gentleman can see from the statistics, it is still well short of the number required. However, a recent change has taken place in Nigeria—a large and populous country, where one in 10 of the world's HIV-positive population live—where the authorities have just stopped requiring co-payment from patients for antiretroviral treatment, because they realised that that was one of the obstacles preventing more people from getting access to the treatment there.

Mr. Neil Gerrard (Walthamstow) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend accept that one of the major problems with the global fund is the lack of long-term certainty over its funding? Yet again, it was only last-minute contributions—including some from this country—that allowed the round 5 talks to go ahead this year. If we are to plan for the future, we do not want continually to be in a position of not knowing how much money is going to be available even one year ahead. Will the Secretary of State press that matter at the next replenishment conference?

Hilary Benn: My hon. Friend, who does so much work on this, is absolutely right. The successful bit of the replenishment conference was indeed the fact that sufficient funding was made available to continue with all the current projects. We are looking to launch a round 6 this year. In the end, this is about encouraging people to contribute more through the global fund, because that is part of the fight against AIDS, as well as TB and malaria, and through supporting developing countries in improving their health services. It is worth reflecting on the fact that, as of December, the global fund was supporting 384,000 people on antiretroviral treatment. It helped to treat 1 million cases of TB and distributed 8 million insecticide-treated bed nets. Those are practical examples of the effect the fund is having.

Mr. Andrew Mitchell (Sutton Coldfield) (Con): The Secretary of State will know that the global fund is supporting several excellent programmes in Rwanda, where education, prevention and treatment, but above all the political will of the President and his Government, are making a real contribution to curtailing the AIDS epidemic there. Will the right hon. Gentleman contrast that with the lack of political will and the abject failure of leadership by the South African authorities? The President does not accept the gravity of the situation and the Minister of Health does not believe in antiretroviral treatment—that in a country that already has more than 1 million AIDS orphans.

Hilary Benn: I know that the hon. Gentleman has this morning returned from a visit to Rwanda, and I join him in paying tribute to the efforts being made in that country, including by the organisation Surf, which he was visiting as part of his trip, providing help to those who were infected in the genocide. It is doing remarkable work.

The hon. Gentleman is right about the need of Governments, wherever they are, to tell the truth about HIV, how it is contracted, how people can prevent themselves from becoming HIV-positive and what needs to be done to save people's lives. That includes all countries. There is a process of change taking place in South Africa, where, in the end, public opinion has, I think, encouraged the Government to change the view that they were taking. I hope that that will continue, because we are now very clear in our own minds about all the things that need to happen if people's lives are to be saved—tell the truth and give them the means to protect themselves.

Ms Sally Keeble (Northampton, North) (Lab): I welcome my right hon. Friend's statement about children and AIDS. Will he support the call by UNICEF for a £200 million fund to develop a combination formula for children and also to deal with the diagnostics, which are particularly important for young children? Will he give a commitment on that, or at least agree to take the issue away and look at it?

Hilary Benn: My hon. Friend, whom I know takes a close interest in these matters, raises an important point involving not just the question of the lack of availability of suitable medicines, but the practical problem of at what point children can be tested to find out whether they are HIV-positive. They will carry the antibodies of their mothers, but until they are two, current testing will not tell us whether they are HIV-positive. It is important that the global fund and others look at ways in which we can provide more support to this important area of work. That is why we are co-funding with the Medical Research Council a project considering attempts to trial new treatments to see whether they will work with children.

Asian Tsunami

4. Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): If he will make a statement on continuing aid for reconstruction purposes for those countries affected by the tsunami. [45077]

The Secretary of State for International Development (Hilary Benn): The majority of countries hit by the tsunami have pledges of aid sufficient to meet the funding required for reconstruction. For example, in Sri Lanka, the cost of recovery has been an estimated $2.2 billion, and the Sri Lankan Government have indicated that all pledges received total some $3.3 billion. However, in all the countries affected there are big challenges in turning that into reconstruction, some of which will take many years to complete.

Miss McIntosh: The Disasters Emergency Committee raised an unprecedented £372 million, only a third of which was spent in the first year. Does the Secretary of State share my concern that Indonesia suffered 60 per cent. of the damage caused by the tsunami, yet is having real problems with long-term housing and other long-term reconstruction projects? What is his Department doing to rectify the situation?

Hilary Benn: I acknowledge the point that the hon. Lady makes about the large amount of money that the Disasters Emergency Committee received in response to its appeal and the fact that it takes time in practice to spend it. The real obstacle at the moment, as she will be aware, is not the availability of funding, but the practical steps that need to be taken. All the records were destroyed, so there are arguments and disputes about who owns the land. People cannot decide where to build before land ownership questions are sorted out. There are problems with access to materials and so forth, but we are beginning to see progress in those countries. We continue to support livelihoods in Indonesia, and we are helping the Government to manage the money that is coming in.

One of the most important contributions in Indonesia has been the resolution of the conflict in Aceh, which has created circumstances that are much more conducive to addressing those problems.

Mr. Andrew Love (Edmonton) (Lab/Co-op): May I press my right hon. Friend on the issue of Sri Lanka? There is still a fear that aid is not reaching the north and north-east of the country. Can my right hon. Friend reassure us that both communities in Sri Lanka are benefiting from the aid, and that reconstruction projects are proceeding in all parts of the country?

Hilary Benn: I am well aware of the concern expressed by my hon. Friend and other Members about the situation in Sri Lanka, where, sadly, there has not been the same progress in resolving conflict as there has been in Indonesia. The original agreement between the Government and the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam to govern the terms on which reconstruction took place collapsed, but has now been replaced by the establishment of the north-east provincial council, whose job is to co-ordinate reconstruction efforts in north-east Sri Lanka. One of the practical measures that we have taken is the granting of £1.5 million of additional finance to the council to help its work.

Mr. Elfyn Llwyd (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy) (PC): The right hon. Gentleman will know that I have an interest in this subject. We have corresponded recently on the issue raised by the hon. Member for Edmonton (Mr. Love). May I stress the urgency of the need for action to ensure that the Tamil people are given the funds that they require to deal with the aftermath of the tsunami? I know that the right hon. Gentleman shares my concern; may I ask him please to address the issue?

Hilary Benn: I can assure the hon. Gentleman that we will continue to do what we have done since the start of the terrible earthquake and tsunami, which is to encourage and support all the people in Sri Lanka to ensure that help—including money for reconstruction—goes where it is needed. As the hon. Gentleman will be only too well aware, it would help enormously if the parties to the conflict could reach agreement on solving the political problem. That would deal with many of the difficulties about which people have expressed concern.

Mark Simmonds (Boston and Skegness) (Con): The Government have reneged on their promise to match public donations after the tsunami, providing only £290 million as against the £450 million donated by the generous British public. The vast majority of the Government money consisted of tax relief on public donations, European Union spending and debt relief.

Partly because of broken promises, reconstruction progress has been frustratingly slow. Some 1.5 million people remain without adequate shelter and, as the Secretary of State rightly pointed out, land disputes are numerous as boundary markers and records have been destroyed. What specifically are the Secretary of State and his Department doing to facilitate secure and formal property rights, which are an essential component of economic reconstruction and wealth creation in tsunami-affected areas as elsewhere?

Hilary Benn: The Government made a substantial contribution. Money that goes through the European Union ultimately comes from the taxpayer: I do not accept that it is somehow different in character. As the hon. Gentleman knows, the issue is not really the availability of resources. There is enough money; it is a question of turning it into practical help on the ground.

The principal responsibility for progress on land ownership and property rights rests with the Governments and communities of the countries concerned. Only they can sort out the problem. We are encouraging them as best we can, but they are in a position to make the decisions that will, in the end, provide the key to further progress and ensuring that permanent rebuilding can take place so that people are rehoused where they need to be.

EU Trade Policies

5. Mr. Graham Stuart (Beverley and Holderness) (Con): What recent discussions he has had in the EU on the impact of its trade policies on poor countries; and if he will make a statement. [45078]

The Secretary of State for International Development (Hilary Benn): The Government have regular discussions about EU and other countries' trade policies, including the current World Trade Organisation negotiations. At the European Development Ministers' informal council in October we discussed aid for trade, and agreement was reached on a package of support the following month. In Hong Kong, I hosted an informal meeting of EU Development Ministers to discuss how Europe could contribute to a successful outcome to the talks.

Mr. Stuart: The year 2005 was to make poverty history, yet our EU presidency has come and gone with much noise and little achievement. What lessons have been learned, so that when we next have the EU presidency we can bring trade justice, not a continuation of selfish protectionism?

Hilary Benn: The hon. Gentleman should acknowledge the strong lead that the UK gave when we had the EU presidency, and will continue to give. The truth is that there are 25 EU member states and they have different views. However hard the presidency pushes, if people have different views, it cannot take the decision on behalf of all 25 member states. What is the lesson that we must learn and the conclusion we must draw? All of us have to work even harder now to ensure that the blockage to the negotiations is removed in the short time that we have in the first part of this year, so that we can see progress on the things that will make a difference to developing countries.

PRIME MINISTER

The Prime Minister was asked—

Engagements

Q1. [45059] Anne Moffat (East Lothian) (Lab): If he will list his official engagements for Wednesday 25 January.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Tony Blair): This morning, I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I will have further such meetings later today.

Anne Moffat: I am sure that you, Mr. Speaker, will be aware, as the whole House will, that today we are celebrating Robert Burns day. Has my right hon. Friend had a chance to read a speech given last week describing Scotland as "Third Scotland" and likening us to Bosnia, Iran, North Korea and the Gaza strip? Does he know which wee, sleekit, cow'rin', tim'rous beastie made that speech?

The Prime Minister: I do, actually. First, may I wish my hon. Friend and all Scots well for Burns day and Burns night? Secondly, may I point out that since the Government came to power, there are about 200,000 more people in work in Scotland, unemployment is down by a third, employment is at its highest level since records began, and over half a million people have been lifted from absolute poverty in Scotland? The Scottish economy is thriving. There is investment in the public services and poverty is getting better, not worse.

Mr. David Cameron (Witney) (Con): I am glad that the Prime Minister is reading my speeches. That is very welcome. I want to know whether he is reading the Deputy Prime Minister's speeches. The Deputy Prime Minister said:

"If you set up a school and it becomes a good school, the great danger is that everyone wants to go there".

Does the Prime Minister agree that he should not compromise with people who think that creating good schools is a bad idea?

The Prime Minister: I, of course, want to see more good schools, which is why I am delighted to say that since this Government came to power, the number of schools where over 70 per cent. of the pupils get five good GCSEs is up from just over 80 in 1997 to over 500 today. Thanks to the investment and reform introduced by the Government, there are more good schools and more pupils going to them.

Mr. Cameron: The Prime Minister knows that there are still 1 million children in failing schools, so the need for reform is vital. On Monday, the Prime Minister rightly ruled out inserting the 76-page admissions code into his education Bill. On trust schools, will he confirm what he said to me in our first exchange in the House? Will he state categorically that all the freedoms in the White Paper—schools owning their own buildings, employing their own staff, developing their own culture—will not be watered down and will arrive in the education Bill?

The Prime Minister: Yes, I will confirm that. What is more, let me tell the right hon. Gentleman why that is important. He is absolutely right: I have been reading his speeches recently. I have read some on education as well and I am delighted to note that he now agrees with us that there should be no return to academic selection, so we are in favour of greater freedom for schools and no return to academic selection. Therefore, I look forward to his support.

Mr. Cameron: The Prime Minister will have our support, but I have to say that I love these lectures on consistency from him. His first act as Prime Minister was to abolish grant-maintained schools, and his last act as Prime Minister is to bring them back again. This is someone who came into politics to soak the rich and ban the bomb, and ever since he has been sucking up to the rich and dropping bombs. But enough of that—back to education.

The Prime Minister told us that every time he has introduced a reform, he wished that he had gone further. So will he accept our offer of support in the Division Lobby, so that he can put the whole of his White Paper into the Bill, and will he put the Bill to the House without delay? Time is running out for the Prime Minister, so will he get on with it?

The Prime Minister: First, of course we will publish the Bill shortly and put it to the House, and I look forward to the right hon. Gentleman's support on it. But when he talks about consistency in politics, he should be a little wary. He may have a point about the Labour 1983 election manifesto and what we have done subsequently, but let me point out to him some of the things that he has changed his mind on within the last few weeks, not the last few months. He said of the patient's passport:

"We will say to people languishing on waiting lists that if they ... go private they can take with them one half of what the operation would have cost on the NHS."

That was the right hon. Gentleman in June 2004. In June 2005, he said:

"I think we were wrong to have a patient's passport that took people off ... "

On foundation hospitals, in May 2003, he said:

"This week the Labour Government ... brought forward their plans for Foundation Hospitals ... the Conservative party voted against them—a decision I wholeheartedly supported."

In November 2005, he said:

"It was a mistake frankly to oppose foundation hospitals".

Shall I go on? [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think that the Prime Minister has made the point.

Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock) (Lab): This House has comity with the Government and is not subordinate to them; therefore, instead of abrogating the Wilson doctrine, will the Prime Minister beef it up to take account of modern forms of communication? Failure to do so will send all the wrong signals to the Lukashenkos and Mugabes of this world—that it is all right to go down the slippery slope of abuse. Bearing in mind that Back Benchers' stock-in-trade is dealing with whistleblowers and other people who irritate the Government of the day, I will do a deal with John Scarlett and Manningham-Buller: they can listen to my telephone conversations if I can listen to theirs.

The Prime Minister: Obviously, that is an immensely tempting offer, and personally I have never found my hon. Friend irritating in any shape or form; I have always welcomed him as an independent thinker. I am afraid that he will have to wait until we make our announcement on the Wilson doctrine, but let me repeat what I said, I think, to the House last week. This issue arises for no other reason whatever than recommendations put to us by the interception of communications commissioner. We are considering it carefully and once we have come to a decision we will of course announce it to the House.

Sir Menzies Campbell (North-East Fife) (LD): The Prime Minister rightly said that Africa is a scar on the conscience of the world, and he made Africa the focus of the British presidency of the G8. With hundreds of thousands of people dead and 2 million displaced, have we not failed the people of Darfur?

The Prime Minister: The international community is failing people in Darfur, which is why it is so important that we take the measures for which the Secretary of State for International Development and, indeed, the Government, have been pressing. Those measures have got to include not just immediate humanitarian help, but making sure that the African Union peacekeeping force comes up to its full strength. The only way that the situation in Darfur is going to improve is when there are sufficient peacekeeping forces on the ground to keep the combatants apart, when the process of dialogue and peace takes place that we have been calling for and, obviously, when the measures are in place to improve humanitarian help. So we have to do more, but we are doing more, and I should point out to the right hon. and learned Gentleman that we, as the British Government, have been leading the efforts in this area and will continue to do so.

Sir Menzies Campbell: But as we talk about these matters, the killing, violence and rape continue. Will the Prime Minister confirm that the UK and the Security Council will press for an increase in the size of the African Union force and ensure that it has a strengthened mandate? Will they also press for a commitment that it is fully funded, equipped and supported?

The Prime Minister: We are doing precisely that. We have pressed for the AU peacekeeping force to be increased, and we fully support its proper funding. I am sure that the right hon. and learned Gentleman wants to be fair about this matter, so I can tell him that I think that this country can be very proud of what it has done in respect of Africa over the past few years. We have trebled our aid to Africa, and we have played a major part in getting aid obligations increased all around the world. We have also played a major part in securing debt relief. There is much else to be done, especially with regard to the killer diseases—HIV/AIDS, tuberculosis and malaria, and so forth—but over the past few years this country, in particular through the Department for International Development, has led the way in bringing change to Africa.

We will continue to do our best in respect of Sudan, where I agree that the situation is very serious, but I think that this country should be proud of what it has done.

Helen Goodman (Bishop Auckland) (Lab): Is my right hon. Friend aware that for every acre of children's playgrounds, this country has 80 acres of golf courses? Will he join me in congratulating Councillor Lucy Howells, the deputy mayor of Sedgefield borough council, who has secured funds for playgrounds across the borough? Does he also agree with the all-party parliamentary group on play that adequate space for play should be incorporated in all new housing developments?

The Prime Minister: I am delighted to add my congratulations to Councillor Lucy Howells. She is well known to me, and has done an immense amount of work for young people in our communities. It is worth emphasising that the respect action plan goes beyond tougher powers and extra community support officers. It is also specifically about the help that will be available to aid young people and to increase youth services. That is an important part of making sure that we tackle antisocial behaviour and give our young people the opportunities that they need.

Q2. [45060] Jo Swinson (East Dunbartonshire) (LD): British crime survey figures show that almost half of women in the UK experience domestic violence, sexual assault or stalking. Last November, victims of violence presented the Prime Minister with the "End Violence Against Women" report, which gave his Government one out of 10 on the issue. Will the right hon. Gentleman therefore commit to developing an integrated strategy to ensure that he does not come bottom of the class this year?

The Prime Minister: In fairness, the Government and the police have done a great deal of work to ensure that victims of domestic violence report the offences committed against them. The hon. Lady should look at the domestic violence programmes introduced by the Government, and she will see that we have a strategy in place for the first time. That has to be implemented and driven through across the country, but it would be wrong to suggest that no progress had been made.

Q3. [45061] Ms Diana R. Johnson (Kingston upon Hull, North) (Lab): In Hull, more than 300 young people have volunteered as junior community wardens to work alongside the extra bobbies on the beat and the police community support officers. Will my right hon. Friend maintain his focus on the respect agenda and not do what the Opposition do—that is, come up with new gimmicks every day that do not work?

The Prime Minister: It is important to recognise, as my hon. Friend does, that the respect action plan includes the strong new powers that are necessary for communities, but she is also right that community support officers and local volunteers play a very important part. The Russell commission proposals are backed by Government funding and will make a lot of difference to youth volunteering. However, my hon. Friend is right to say that it is when local communities get the power in their own hands that a real difference can be made.

Mr. David Cameron (Witney) (Con): On police force amalgamation—[Interruption.] This is an important issue, affecting many communities in the country. Last week, the Prime Minister said that he would listen to local people, and that

"many different things could happen, including forces coming together for certain strategic tasks that they are better able to fulfil on a common, rather than singular, basis."—[Official Report, 18 January 2006; Vol. 441, c. 836.]

Will the Prime Minister say exactly what he meant? Was it that amalgamations do not have to go ahead?

The Prime Minister: We have to listen to what people are saying and, obviously, there are different views about police reform. One possibility is for strategic coming together on certain issues, rather than mergers, but that has to be looked at on a case-by-case basis. We should listen carefully to what people are saying, but the reason why this has come forward as an issue is that the Association of Chief Police Officers said that it believed that the present configuration of forces was not satisfactory in fighting crime. As a result, we commissioned a report from the inspectorate of constabulary. That report said very strongly that fundamental reform was needed, and that is why the proposals have been brought forward. I agree that it is important that we listen carefully to what people are saying. The trouble is, as always in such situations, that not everyone is in agreement about the right way forward. The aim should be the most effective way to police local communities with the greatest amount of accountability and effectiveness. Obviously, we will listen carefully to what people say.

Mr. Cameron: No one denies the need for reform, but the Prime Minister should accept that he is striking a very different tone from the Home Secretary, who has said that smaller forces must be abolished and larger ones created. The Prime Minister says that they could survive if they share certain tasks strategically. Will he ensure that the Home Secretary thinks again and does not force through amalgamations?

The Prime Minister: It is not a question of forcing them through—[Interruption.] No, it is not. It is a question of answering the point made by the inspectorate of constabulary. If I read out its report to the right hon. Gentleman, he will see why we embarked on the process. It said:

"The 43 force structure is no longer fit for purpose. In the interests of efficiency and effectiveness of policing it should change . . . We now firmly believe that some reorganisation of forces and re-configuration of protective services is inescapable."

It is obvious that the inspectorate does not think that reform is incidental to better policing, but that it is fundamental to it. As I say, we will listen carefully and there are several different directions that reform could take. It could be different in different parts of the country. However, I hope that the right hon. Gentleman understands that it is no use being in favour of police reform in general if he opposes it all in particular.

Mr. Cameron: But is not there a much more important reform agenda that will address the fact that only one in four crimes is detected, police officers spend less than a fifth of their time on the streets and it takes three and a half hours for every arrest to be processed? Is not the real police reform agenda about changing working practices, cutting paperwork and making them properly accountable to local people?

The Prime Minister: That is precisely what we are doing—[Interruption.] Yes, it is. For example, the summary powers and fixed penalty notices are a massive saving on bureaucracy, as chiefs of police often point out. The right hon. Gentleman talks about police reform, but I think that the most important thing is that the police get the right, visible and uniformed presence out on the street. That is why it is important not merely that we have record numbers of police officers, but that we supplement them with community support officers and that all of them are given the powers they need in local communities. It is all very well to talk, as the right hon. Gentleman does, about incompetent or lazy police officers, but I do not think that that is the problem with the police. The problem is that they need the powers that we have agreed to give them—I hope that he will support us on that—and they also need to be backed up by the right support staff, and that must include community support officers. If he were able to support that agenda—as well as, incidentally, not only the antisocial behaviour agenda but the organised crime proposals that will be made soon—we would have a far better opportunity to achieve effective policing in our communities.

Q4. [45062] Dr. Alan Whitehead (Southampton, Test) (Lab): What estimate has my right hon. Friend made of the carbon emission savings arising from the introduction of the climate change levy? Does he favour the introduction of further fiscal measures to save carbon emissions and, if so, would he welcome a degree of consensus on their introduction?

The Prime Minister: I would welcome a degree of consensus, yes, but unfortunately the Conservatives have made it clear yet again that they are opposed to the climate change levy. I think that that is their position—[Interruption.] No, that was only just a few days ago and I would say that it is at least valid for this week. My hon. Friend is right, and the climate change levy has made a real difference in the reduction in CO_2 emissions by several million tonnes. Therefore, it is extremely important that we keep it. I am also pleased to note that the UK was ranked fifth best in the world in the independent environment league table. That is extremely good news and it shows that this country has been at the forefront on the issue of climate change and will continue to be so.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan) (SNP): Does the Prime Minister accept that there will not be much of a Burns night celebration for the 720 workers who have been made redundant as a result of the closure of Lexmark in the small community of Rosyth? Is he really unaware that 7,000 industrial manufacturing jobs have been lost in Fife—and 100,000 in Scotland—since he took office? What level of industrial disaster is required to shake this Prime Minister and his Chancellor out of their totally unjustified complacency on the competitive position of manufacturing in Scotland?

The Prime Minister: I am not the slightest bit complacent about that. Of course, we deeply sympathise with the people who have recently lost their jobs. The only way to support those people is to do what we will do: ensure that we give them every help with training and other jobs and put in place the same type of package of assistance that we have implemented in many situations when jobs have been lost—either in the manufacturing or service sector—in the whole of the UK in the past few years. I have to say to the hon. Gentleman that it is no use claiming sympathy with those people unless we are actually prepared to act to help them. He is effectively saying that he could somehow prevent manufacturing jobs ever going in Scotland, but that is simply a cruel deception of people. It would do them no good whatever to pretend that that is the case. We will give every support to those people in the difficult times that they face ahead.

Q5. [45063] Mr. Neil Turner (Wigan) (Lab): The Prime Minister is an avid reader of the back pages of the national press, so he will be aware, as is the rest of the world, that Wigan Athletic humbled the mighty Arsenal on its own pitch last night to reach the Carling cup final. However, Wigan is more than just a football and rugby league premier town—we have other facilities. However, if we are going to attract a national team to Wigan for the Olympics, we need more and better facilities. Will he have a less than quiet word in the ear of the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport, through the nations and regions group that she is setting up, to ask whether we can have an international swimming pool so that we can have a legacy and the ability to train athletes who will be world champions in the future?

The Prime Minister: At the risk of alienating every Arsenal supporter in the country, I congratulate Wigan on its progress. Unfortunately, I had the poor judgment to switch off in the 28th minute of extra time. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport was nodding throughout my hon. Friend's question. I was not quite sure whether she was nodding when he got to his swimming pool point, but I am sure that she will listen carefully to what he says. The Olympics has tremendous potential for every region of the country. My hon. Friend is absolutely right to say that Wigan has come an enormous way in the past few years in every sporting sense, so I am sure that it will benefit enormously from the Olympics, which, as I say, I believe will benefit not only London, but the whole of the country.

Q6. [45064] Mr. James Clappison (Hertsmere) (Con): Whether or not we are to have a Great Britain day, will the Prime Minister at least do what he can to help to keep the UK theme on British early-morning radio so that we can promote a UK theme, especially on Burns night?

The Prime Minister: Obviously, my influence with the BBC is legendary. I know that it will be aware of the strong feeling that is being expressed by the hon. Gentleman and many others in the House and throughout the country.

Mr. Eric Joyce (Falkirk) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that strong intergovernmental relationships in Europe are of great importance to this country and that they are enhanced by strong fraternal relationships among our European sister parties?

The Prime Minister: The relationships across Europe among the political parties and their different groupings have a beneficial impact on parties themselves and are important for the country. In the European Parliament, it is important that the Labour party is able to work with other Labour parties and that the Conservative party is able to work with other Conservative parties. I look forward to that Conservative policy being changed as well, so when that happens, of course I will welcome it.

Q7. [45065] Mr. Bernard Jenkin (North Essex) (Con): May I point out to the Prime Minister that he said that we should listen carefully to what people are saying four times during his reply on policing to my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition? These police mergers represent exactly the kind of remote regionalism that was rejected by the people of the north-east in the referendum a year ago. Is it not somewhat Orwellian to argue that by abolishing the Essex chief constable and transferring his responsibilities to a regional super-force, policing will be somehow more local?

The Prime Minister: How things are policed in the basic command unit and in local communities is also extremely important, but the hon. Gentleman makes a somewhat exaggerated point. As I said, we have brought forward the proposals because of the inspectorate of constabulary report, at the prompting of ACPO itself. I entirely accept that some people are in favour of mergers, that some are against them and that some are in between. We will have to take a decision on what is best for local police forces, but we will do so listening to what local people say. In the end, surely what we both want to see is the most effective form of policing.

Mr. Kevan Jones (North Durham) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend join me in congratulating Chester-le-Street in my constituency, which tomorrow celebrates the fact that it has had Labour representation in this House for more than 100 years? Does he agree that a fitting tribute to those early Labour pioneers is the national minimum wage, which was a commitment of the 1906 Labour party? The fact that this Labour Government have introduced it is a tribute to those early pioneers.

The Prime Minister: First, long may Labour representation continue in Chester-le-Street. Secondly, my hon. Friend is right about the minimum wage. It now helps well over 1 million people in this country. It has made a huge difference. Again, I am pleased to say that everyone now accepts that it is right. Along with the support given through the tax credit system to families so that they can work and raise their families properly, it is one of the things that has helped to prove that we can combine economic efficiency and social justice.

Q8. [45066] Stephen Hammond (Wimbledon) (Con): Earlier, the Prime Minister spoke about the number of schools at which 70 per cent. of the pupils achieved five A to C grades. Is he aware that in my constituency no non-faith state secondary school achieves that? The dead hand of Merton local education authority deprives those pupils of achieving standards similar to those in surrounding boroughs. Will he assure my constituents that local authorities will be commissioners, not providers, of education services? Will he give trust schools the necessary autonomy to secure an increase in standards?

The Prime Minister: It will be important that we use the new powers to raise standards in the hon. Gentleman's constituency and elsewhere, but I am sure that he will accept that one of the benefits of this Government is the massive investment in education. That has meant, for example, that in an area such as his, the number of 11-year-olds passing their exams has increased dramatically over the past few years; the number of 16-year-olds getting five good GCSEs—[Interruption.] It is true. In Merton and elsewhere, that is exactly what has happened. That is why the process of investment and reform will continue, but under this Government.

Q9. [45068] Keith Vaz (Leicester, East) (Lab): The Prime Minister will recall meeting the family of the murdered Leicester teenager Stefan Pakeerah. They believe that the perpetrator of the savage attack on him was influenced by the video game "Manhunt". Is he aware of the new research published by the university of Missouri, which shows a link between violent video games and the greater propensity of people to act with violence? Will he look at that area of policy to see whether there are any further measures that can protect our children? This is not about adult censorship; it is the protection of young children and young people.

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend has campaigned on that issue for a long time, and I pay tribute to his work. It was partly as a result of his representations that we announced last year that we had commissioned our own research to establish whether there was any substance to the allegations of a link between playing violent computer games and violent behaviour in real life. The Department for Culture, Media and Sport intends to publish the results of that research shortly. We are also aware of the Missouri-Columbia research to the same effect. We will look carefully at the research and study its impact. We will then have a debate on how we take it forward.

Q11. [45070] Mr. Ben Wallace (Lancaster and Wyre) (Con): Will the Prime Minister tell the House the difference between a grant-maintained school and one of his new trust schools?

The Prime Minister: There will be fair funding and fair admissions. There were neither with grant-maintained schools.

Q12. [45071] Mrs. Siân C. James (Swansea, East) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend join me in expressing concern about privatised water companies who threaten to cut off people's water supply? Residents in Sway road, Morriston, in my constituency have been threatened with such action because of a fault with the main water supply. Will he ensure that people always have access to running water?

The Prime Minister: I know that there are protocols in respect of which the water companies are supposed to operate. I do not know about the particular instance that my hon. Friend raises, but I will look into it and write to her.

Q13. [45072] Sandra Gidley (Romsey) (LD): When the Prime Minister reshuffles his Cabinet, will he ensure that the Minister for women receives a salary?

The Prime Minister: I am afraid that the hon. Lady will have to await the news of the reshuffle along with everyone else.

Q14. [45073] Mark Lazarowicz (Edinburgh, North and Leith) (Lab/Co-op): As my right hon. Friend will be aware, my private Member's Bill on climate change begins its Committee stage this afternoon. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] I am grateful for support from the Government and Members throughout the House. Will my right hon. Friend look very closely at the possibility of ensuring that the Bill is able to bring into law an analysis of the way in which we can use economic and fiscal measures to promote the Government's policies to tackle climate change?

The Prime Minister: The Government support the Bill, so we will obviously look for ways to ensure that it comes into effect.

Troop Deployment (Afghanistan)

Dr. Liam Fox (Woodspring) (Con) (Urgent Question): To ask the Secretary of State for Defence about the proposed deployment of British troops in Afghanistan.

The Secretary of State for Defence (John Reid): I am grateful for the opportunity to set the record straight in the light of today's press reporting on possible future British military involvement in Afghanistan. First, may I say that no decisions have been taken about the deployment of British forces to Afghanistan; nor will they be taken until such time as I have had the opportunity not only to tell the House, but to consult my Cabinet colleagues?

Secondly, Mr. Speaker, as you will know, we have continually tried to update and inform the House on Afghanistan in written statements, debates and questions as recently as Monday of this week.

Thirdly, as I assume that today's urgent question has been prompted by, in particular, a report in The Sun this morning, let me say that, as far as I can see, there is absolutely nothing in today's media about our potential deployments that has not been reported before. Indeed, if hon. Members would like to read The Sun of 22 August last year, they will see that almost every element of this morning's story was reported as being imminent on 22 August. In The Sun in particular, the reporting reprises themes in that article. The only new element is the suggestion that I would be making a statement to Parliament tomorrow on our plans on which the article speculates.

I want to make it clear that there is nothing more important to me and to the Government than the need for Parliament and my Cabinet colleagues to hear of our plans before anyone else, and certainly before the media. I therefore want to make it equally clear that my officials did not speak to the press about the contents of any such statement. Let me explain precisely what did happen, as I think that that will be at least partly the concern of the hon. Member for Woodspring (Dr. Fox).

Conscious of next week's landmark London conference on Afghanistan, and the interest in the subject which has gone on for some considerable time and was reflected on Monday at Question Time, the Ministry of Defence offered an article under my signature to The Sun. [Interruption.] The right hon. and learned Member for North-East Fife (Sir Menzies Campbell) laughs, but he should allow me to continue—I understand that he has a contest on.

The article set out in broad terms the achievements of the international community, and of the United Kingdom in particular, since our intervention in Afghanistan in 2001, and the importance of maintaining that commitment to see the job through. It was of the flavour of the answer that I gave to the Chairman of the Defence Committee on Monday, when I said that we were not about to hand Afghanistan back to the Taliban or the terrorist.

The article specifically did not go into detail about possible future military deployments or commitments. Indeed, when the article was suggested to the newspaper, it was rejected on Monday as being insufficiently newsworthy. Ironically, therefore, it was rejected precisely because we refused to leak details of any future possible statement. We never got to the stage of handing over the draft article. Secondly, it was suggested that I might do an interview on the matter of British deployment, and we refused that as well.

There has been endless media speculation for months on radio and television and in magazines about a possible announcement on Afghan troop deployment. I recall arriving home in the last week from Kuwait to hear that the headline article on the "PM" programme was yet further speculation about troop deployments to Afghanistan. On radio, television, the web and in the printed press, everyone has had an opinion, more or less well informed. This morning's reporting is a summary of that speculation—nothing more. The Ministry of Defence's press office has been, and continues to be, besieged by inquiries concerning our plans for Afghanistan; there are up to 20 a day.

Let me tell the House why I have refused at this stage to make an announcement about deployment. As I continually said to the House under questioning more than four months ago, I will not announce the detailed deployment to the south, although the principle of deploying to the south has already been announced, until I am absolutely satisfied about three things. The first is that the British military configuration is sufficient to meet the task in hand in the opinion of my commanders who advise me. The second is that the economic development aid and moneys are sufficient to offer alternative livelihoods and development if we are to tackle narcotics. The third is that we have a NATO configuration of military troops around us that satisfies me. As I pointed out to the House on Monday, I am satisfied on the first and I am satisfied on the second, but I am not yet satisfied on the third.

However, I noted at oral Defence questions on Monday that a statement would be imminent. If Members look at Hansard of only three days ago, column 1158, they will see that I said in relation to a possible statement:

"I do not think that that will be too long from today."—[Official Report, 23 January 2006; Vol. 441, c. 1158.]

I can only assume from the various indicators and the facts that I had announced an imminent statement, that it is Wednesday today, that we do not make statements on Friday and that the Afghan conference is to start on Monday, that it did not take a genius to work out that I was perhaps intending to make a statement tomorrow. Let me be absolutely clear that it was, and continues to be, my intention to make a statement on Afghanistan in the House tomorrow. The media this morning have guessed correctly on that.

I will not, however, make such a statement until I have consulted my Cabinet colleagues. Indeed, I chose to ask—if the authorities in the House think it appropriate—to make the statement tomorrow precisely so that the distance between my consultation with my Cabinet colleagues and the communication of any views to the House was so close together that, on such a sensitive issue, that we would not have leaks of this nature.

I want to make a statement tomorrow for the reasons I have already intimated. The London conference will take the development of Afghanistan to the next stage, and a statement will help the House to understand better how the UK military fits into that picture. I also want to lessen the uncertainty affecting service families in the wake of months of speculation about possible deployments, months during which I have refused to make any comment about those deployments. I wanted to tackle that further speculation head on. It is unfortunate that there has been another bout of it at such an untimely juncture.

I repeat that I did, and still do, plan to make a statement tomorrow if the House authorities and you, Mr. Speaker, think that that is appropriate. However, I cannot say today precisely what will be in that statement. It was my decision some weeks ago to make it in order to update the House, but the details and decisions will not be finally decided until I have completed the full consultation today and consultation tomorrow with my Cabinet colleagues. The media speculation, therefore, could turn out to be right or it could turn out to be very, very wrong indeed. I plan to discuss the issue with Cabinet colleagues over the next 24 hours, and that will determine the precise nature of the statement that I make.

I hope that I have explained the circumstances that have led to the most recent—and only the most recent—bout of speculation about deployment to Afghanistan. I hope that the House understands that I regret that as much as anyone else, not least because my Cabinet colleagues will ask the same question as the House.

Dr. Fox: I am grateful for both the tone and content of the Secretary of State's response. It is a pity, given the open nature of discussions on this issue between those on the two Front Benches, that he finds himself a victim of the briefing culture of his Government.

Today is an opportunity, however, to give the Secretary of State notice of the sort of issues that we will want to discuss in the House when it comes to his statement. After Iraq, it is essential that the House asks detailed questions and that the Government answer in a detailed way and with great clarity.

We know what many of the large issues will be. We will want to know about the security situation in the south of Afghanistan, what the current assessment of risk is, and what the intelligence is about further insurgent activity. We will want to know about the integration between the international security assistance force—ISAF—and Operation Enduring Freedom and command lines in those operations. We will want to know about Treasury funding for anti-narcotics and the potential conflict between the strategic objectives of anti-narcotics and anti-terrorism activity. We will also want to know exactly what powers of arrest and detention are available for prisoners and how they will be handled. There are many questions, which we will examine properly tomorrow, and Members on both sides of the House will want detailed answers about what will be a dangerous deployment of British troops.

The defence of our national security and the construction of a free and democratic Afghanistan are noble ideals shared by those on both sides of the House. We cannot fail to act in Afghanistan, but neither can we act and fail. Therefore, we will support the Government's objectives, our troops and our allies, but we will hold the Government responsible for the implementation of those objectives, as is our duty. We look forward to the details of what the Government have to say tomorrow.

John Reid: I thank the hon. Member for Woodspring (Dr. Fox) for the discussions that we have already had and for the tone of his comments today, too. It is entirely appropriate that Her Majesty's Opposition and others ask the sort of questions that he is asking. It might be of some assurance to him to learn that part of the reason that we have not yet announced any deployment is precisely that I have been asking some of the same questions. When we send our young men and women into a dangerous area, we ought to ask those questions.

I will not answer those questions today, however, because as I said—and it is absolutely truthful—I cannot make an announcement about a specific deployment until such time as I have consulted. If other questions are raised that cause me to reflect further, I assure the hon. Member for Woodspring that I shall not hesitate to come to the House to update it tomorrow and say that we have decided that we need further time on any of those matters.

The questions that the hon. Gentleman has raised—the environment and ambience of the space in Helmand into which our troops will enter, right through to the chain of command, the clarity of mission, the adequate resources to accompany the military presence, the funding, the nature of handover of prisoners and the nature of our allies—are all perfectly legitimate. I will do my best today to assure him that I have already been addressing those questions, and that the answers are sufficiently robust to allow us to think that, in some areas at least, on the basis of the two big criteria that I mentioned, we might proceed.

On the question of the sharing of ideals, I have no doubt whatsoever that the hon. Gentleman shares the ideals of the whole House and of the whole world. It was, of course, United Nations auspices that caused us to go into Afghanistan. Whatever we do tomorrow in the statement or in the coming months, there is no one in the House who wants to see Afghanistan handed back to the terrorists or to the Taliban.

Mr. Michael Moore (Berwickshire, Roxburgh and Selkirk) (LD): May I say to the Secretary of State that we would echo the international consensus about the need for support for Afghanistan, which he has expressed? Clearly the Secretary of State and the House are caught in a somewhat difficult position today. I look forward to the statement that the right hon. Gentleman promises us tomorrow, or whenever he deems it appropriate to make it. While he is properly focusing on the issues to do with the NATO configuration, he has already said that he is satisfied about the British configuration and also with the economic development and other assistance that will be made available to the Afghanis in the future. In his statement, when he makes it, I appeal to the right hon. Gentleman to cover details about those two issues as well.

John Reid: I undertake to do that. This may sound pedantic, but I do not want anyone in the House to assume genuinely that I will come to the House tomorrow to say that we are deploying, and deploying in a said fashion. That would be to pre-empt the consultations that are yet to take place. I can assure the hon. Gentleman that in our deliberations and discussions so far, and in the questions that we have been rightly asking, as have our commanders, both the points that he has raised have featured highly. I will address them, one way or the other, tomorrow.

Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North) (Lab): Can the Secretary of State at least tell us what requests or information have been received from the United States about the reduction of their troop numbers in Afghanistan because they are needed in Iraq, and whether or not there has been a direct request to Britain to replace those troops so the same number of forces remain in that country?

John Reid: On the first point, my hon. Friend is labouring under a misapprehension. The idea that the United States would be reducing its troop numbers in Afghanistan from about 18,000 to supplement them in Iraq, where at one stage there were about 180,000 troops, is an incorrect assumption. It is likely in both areas, depending on conditions, that US troop numbers will diminish, probably by the order of 2,000 in Afghanistan and in Iraq, where the deployment was as high as between 160,000 and 170,000, to possibly under 100,000 by the end of the year. None of what we have been discussing today is related to any of that reduction. What has been a feature of discussion in NATO and wider, as I think the House will be aware, is to what extent we can synergise—bring together—while keeping separate, the American-led mission of anti-terrorism, Operation Enduring Freedom and the NATO-led mission of reconstruction, under United Nations auspices, ISAF, which we will take over in May of next year.

There have been discussions on how the two missions relate to each other, but to reduce that to an assumption that an entry into the south is based on the fact that the Americans want to reduce troop numbers is a gross and misleading over-simplification.

Mr. James Arbuthnot (North-East Hampshire) (Con): The Secretary of State has always been entirely straightforward with the House, and I fully accept what he has said today. Will he accept the apologies of many members of the Defence Committee who, tomorrow, will be visiting the Defence Procurement Agency in Abbey Wood, and may not be able to be here to ask questions? Will he confirm, to counter the impression that has grown up, that his decision on the strategic context of NATO being involved in Afghanistan apparently does not rest on the decision that the Dutch are likely to make next week?

John Reid: First, I accept the right hon. Gentleman's apology. I thank him for his kind words about trying to be open. As he knows, I believe that the defence of the realm should be well above party politics. That does not mean that it is above criticism. It is the job of everyone in the House critically to analyse what the Government are doing when life-and-death matters are concerned. In his own case he will be on a visit with the Select Committee. I can tell him that today members of the armed forces parliamentary scheme are visiting the preparations being made for a potential deployment. The more open one is with such information, the more chance there is of the sort of thing that we saw this morning in the media.

On the multinational dimension, I welcome the fact that the Dutch Cabinet has unanimously recommended that the Dutch go into the south, along with the British. That is likely to be backed by the Dutch Parliament as well, although it does not have a formal mechanism for expressing such approval. The United States, Denmark, Australia and Canada, as well as the United Kingdom and perhaps others whom we continue to talk to may be part of that configuration in the southern area.

Dr. Gavin Strang (Edinburgh, East) (Lab): The whole House will welcome the clarification that the Secretary of State has given us this afternoon. Surely there is nothing more important than the decision to deploy our service people in a country where their lives are at risk. I hope that my right hon. Friend agrees that on narcotics, the best contribution that we could make would to limit the consumption of narcotics in this country. I trust that we will not make the mistakes that were made in south America. There is no military solution to the drugs problem. The only solution is to get involved with communities and provide encouragement and incentives to the small farmers to produce alternative crops. Of course, that will displace some of the narcotic crop to other countries.

John Reid: I take the point that my right hon. Friend makes. I am sure he was not suggesting that there is no role for police intervention and the judicial process, or that when dealing with drug barons and warlords who are willing to commit violence to protect the trade, it may not be necessary to give protection to the police. That would be one of our roles, were we to go into the south of Afghanistan. But he is right. There is no straight military or police solution to the problem. We can tackle the drugs barons and the warlords—the mafias who make money off the drugs trade—but the Afghan farmers have nowhere else to go. If they are relieved of their income from an illicit trade, unless there is an alternative income we will create not stability there, but insurgency. My right hon. Friend makes a good point. Again I say that no decision has been made. I am trying to avoid getting involved in any discussions that should properly take place tomorrow, if such a statement is allowed.

Mr. Iain Duncan Smith (Chingford and Woodford Green) (Con): May I urge the Secretary of State to clarify tomorrow, if not today, what is becoming an artificial definition of the division of labour between allied forces in Afghanistan? The Americans are engaged in search and destroy anti-terrorism activities, and the proposed British deployment in the south would be engaged in reconstruction. That clear distinction is made in the House and among cognoscenti who discuss the subject, but people on the ground in Afghanistan make little or no distinction. One soldier is just like any other soldier. The Secretary of State should be robust and clear to the media that when we put our troops on the ground in Afghanistan, they will face genuine dangers. We should not shirk from that, as they are part of an overall effort to bring peace, reconstruction and democracy to that benighted country.

John Reid: I will, if the right hon. and gallant Gentleman will allow me, answer that point directly tomorrow. I know he speaks with some authority, having been in the British armed forces, possibly even the Scots Guards, if my memory does not deceive me, so he speaks with double authority.

Bob Russell (Colchester) (LD): The Secretary of State is aware that two battalions of the Parachute Regiment are officially stationed in Colchester. One is on a return visit to Iraq. There is a general feeling among military folk in Colchester and the wider population that the newspaper article is correct, and that the other battalion, along with other elements of 16th Air Assault Brigade, will be going to Afghanistan. Does he agree that the overreach of our troops and the fact that they are under strength are getting to the stage where cuts in the Army should be revisited?

John Reid: The assumption in certain quarters that 16th Air Assault Brigade may be involved could be due to the fact that people in Colchester, and hopefully at some stage the hon. Gentleman, read written ministerial statements that I make to the House. The one on 14 November stated:

"Preparations"—

that is, for deployment—

"are also underway in the United Kingdom. Some units, predominantly drawn from 16 Air Assault Brigade and the Joint Helicopter Command, will shortly commence collective training on a contingency basis."—[Official Report, 14 November 2005; Vol. 439, c. 42WS.]

So that would be a rational conclusion drawn by soldiers whom the hon. Gentleman meets and, indeed, by journalists writing for some papers. Perhaps I should have mentioned earlier that not only has all the material that appears in the press this morning appeared in the press before, but much of it has appeared in written ministerial statements to the House. I shall send the hon. Gentleman a copy.

Mr. Michael Ancram (Devizes) (Con): The Secretary of State rightly complains about the damage that can be done by speculation about announcements about deployments, particularly in terms of unsettling the troops and their families, but is it not the case that the Government were prepared to make a statement on deployment in early November, which was postponed because the Dutch had second thoughts about the nature of their participation in the operation—the deployment to south?

John Reid: Yes.

Angus Robertson (Moray) (SNP): The Chief of the Air Staff, Sir Jock Stirrup, said that

"two operations"—

simultaneous operations—

"will put considerable stress on our air transport fleet".

The Ministry of Defence is aware that that already poses problems for the service personnel. The Minister of State kindly wrote to me yesterday saying:

"I regret the inconvenience that this causes to troops, and to their families, when returning from deployments."

Will the Secretary of State please bear that in mind before any announcement, to try and ensure that there is an optimal transport configuration and to minimise the inconvenience to personnel of all the services?

John Reid: Yes. I would love to make this three in a row.

Dr. William McCrea (South Antrim) (DUP): I thank the Secretary of State for his openness with the House today in his statement. Will he rest assured that my right hon. and hon. Friends will fully support the continued efforts of our troops in Afghanistan, and that we wait with interest for his statement, if it comes tomorrow?

John Reid: I very much thank the hon. Gentleman and his colleagues.

Patrick Mercer (Newark) (Con): I respect absolutely what the Secretary of State said, but there is no doubt that if the deployment goes ahead, yet again it will fall predominantly upon infantry soldiers. Will he look at whether we have the correct number of infantry soldiers, and will he guarantee that the brave and overworked men of the 3rd Battalion the Parachute Regiment will be given some time with their families to train and recuperate and to get their lives together when they come back from their latest dangerous mission?

John Reid: Without prejudice to any decisions, yes. I will look at that.

BILL PRESENTED

Police and Justice Bill

Mr. Secretary Clarke, supported by the Prime Minister, Mr. Secretary Prescott, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Secretary Ruth Kelly, Hazel Blears and Mr. David Miliband presented a Bill to establish a National Policing Improvement Agency; to make provision about police forces and police authorities; to make provision about police powers and about the powers and duties of community support officers, weights and measures inspectors and others; to make further provision for combating crime and disorder; to establish the office of Her Majesty's Chief Inspector for Justice, Community Safety and Custody; to amend the Computer Misuse Act 1990; to make provision about the forfeiture of indecent images of children; to provide for the conferring of functions on the Independent Police Complaints Commission in relation to the exercise of enforcement functions by officials involved with immigration and asylum; to amend the Extradition Act 2003; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time tomorrow, and to be printed. Explanatory notes to be printed [Bill 119].

Point of Order

12.58 pm

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. In the wake of "The World at One" on Monday, in which an Opposition Member who serves on the Education and Skills Committee made remarks on an unpublished report of that Committee, may I approach the Speaker's Office in writing or in some other way to establish whether a breach of trust or confidence may have occurred?

Mr. Speaker: On a matter of privilege, the best thing the hon. Gentleman could do would be to raise the matter with me in writing.

Palliative Care for the Terminally Ill

12.59 pm

Jim Dobbin (Heywood and Middleton) (Lab/Co-op): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to require the provision of palliative care for persons suffering from a terminal illness; and for connected purposes.

Palliative care is about enhancing quality of life and enabling patients to live as actively as possible until they die, naturally and peacefully and, whenever possible, with their families around them. I am proud of the fact that the UK leads the world in palliative care, but the reality is that we are not doing enough because the service remains underfunded.

The all-party parliamentary group on dying well was launched on 10 January to ensure that we all have the opportunity of a good death and that we die with dignity, by pressing for better and more widely available palliative care, by promoting greater support for friends and family members who care for the dying, by opposing euthanasia and assisted suicide, and by encouraging debate and promoting understanding of how people can achieve comfortable and natural deaths.

There is strong objection to the recent attempt by the Voluntary Euthanasia Society to rename itself Dignity in Dying—a name synonymous with the hospice movement and with palliative care. The chief executives of Marie Curie Cancer Care, Help the Hospices, and the National Council for Palliative Care said yesterday:

"We deplore the misleading use of the phrase Dignity in Dying as the new proposed name and trademark for VES, an organisation whose clear intent is the promotion of euthanasia. We urge Alan Johnson, the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, and the Charity Commission to ensure that this is prevented."

They added:

"We believe the development of excellent palliative care at the end of life in the last decade has ensured that hundreds of thousands of people have experienced a dignified death."

The quality of palliative care in Britain has made huge strides during the past 10 to 20 years, but its quantity and distribution have not kept pace. As a result, there is something of a postcode lottery for the terminally ill. Inadequate funding is allocated to palliative care in the NHS and there are not enough trained specialists in practice. Two recent parliamentary reports drew attention to these shortfalls and the Government have indicated that they are investing more money in palliative care. For example, in 2003–04, the NHS cancer plan promised an extra £50 million per annum specifically for specialist palliative care. That addition is welcome, but it is thinly spread across the country. Progress is slow and not all the resources are reaching front-line specialists.

In a recent Adjournment debate initiated by the hon. Member for Tiverton and Honiton (Angela Browning) on care of the dying, the Under-Secretary of State for Health, my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Byrne), reaffirmed the Government's commitment to "ensuring equality of access to high-quality palliative and end-of-life care, regardless of age or condition".—[Official Report, 12 January 2006; Vol. 441, c. 544.]

[Jim Dobbin]

I welcome that commitment, but much more needs to be done. According to a survey commissioned by Marie Curie Cancer Care, 90 per cent. of people believe that the Government have responsibility for maintaining and improving the standards of care for terminally ill people. My Bill seeks to oblige the Government to meet that responsibility.

In the same Adjournment debate, the Minister highlighted the fact that palliative care was "heavily weighted" towards cancer patients. The National Council for Palliative Care estimates that, while 95 per cent. of patients using hospice or palliative care have cancer, 300,000 people with other terminal diseases are excluded. It is a fact that cancer patients have access to the most and the best palliative care. Yet even for those with cancer, the provision is far from satisfactory. According to Marie Curie Cancer Care, more than 155,000 people die of cancer every year, yet Help the Hospices points out that there are only 3,250 hospice beds available, and that 2,489 of them are supplied by the voluntary sector. Half of all patients diagnosed with motor neurone disease die within 14 months of diagnosis, yet a survey carried out in 2005 found that only 39 per cent. of such patients were referred to specialist palliative care services. Is it any wonder that people take fright when diagnosed with MND?

My Bill will seek to broaden the scope of palliative care so that it encompasses all those with a terminal illness. This is an ambitious aim, but it can be achieved with sustained Government investment and support. Only last December, the NHS Confederation report highlighted the pressing need to improve end-of-life care for the terminally ill. The report pointed out that 56 per cent. of terminally ill patients would prefer to die at home, but that only 20 per cent. do so. Another statistic showed that only 11 per cent. of people want to die in hospital, yet 56 per cent. spend their final hours there.

Inconsistent community provision and ineffective co-ordination between service providers affect people's ability to die where they choose. Unless we get to grips with the problem, the situation will get worse. According to the NHS Confederation, care of the dying is the cause of repeated complaints to the health service ombudsman. As far as the NHS Confederation is concerned, all that points to an increased need for integration of "health and social agendas". Just as pregnant mothers have birth plans, there should be advanced end-of-life care plans, to be based on a full assessment of each patient's needs, including the need for good-quality palliative care. Good examples of such plans are already in place, including the gold standards framework, the NHS end-of-life care programme and the Liverpool care pathway. I hope that the Government will use their forthcoming White Paper on health and social care outside the hospital to show how they will meet the five key recommendations in the NHS Confederation report.

Palliative care does not require expensive treatments or technology, because its essence lies in specialist knowledge of how to use pain-relieving drugs and how to give holistic care to ease the dying process. A relatively small refocusing of NHS resources could bring disproportionate benefit compared with other branches of medicine. Only a minority of us will need cardiac surgery or neurosurgery, but one in two of us will be in need of good palliative care when we die.

Marie Curie Cancer Care points out in its "Dying at Home" report that every pound invested in home palliative care services will free up £2 in the national health service. By extending palliative care to all terminally ill patients, the Government would save the NHS money. That is an attractive proposition, yet, despite increased funding commitments, the number of cancer patients dying at home has remained the same, and 80 per cent. of the resources allocated to specialist palliative care are allocated to hospital-based care.

A Help the Aged report found that older people were "less likely than younger people to receive support at home, in hospital or in a hospice, or to receive attention from GPs or district nurses during the last year of their lives. Older people are often described as the 'disadvantaged dying'."

Children are at a disadvantage, too. There is an acute shortage of paediatric palliative care medicine consultants. That is not surprising, when one considers that children's hospices receive only about 5 per cent. of their funding from official sources, while adult hospices receive 30 per cent. from the same sources.

Comprehensive palliative care legislation should be our priority. Legalising euthanasia or physician-assisted suicide would undermine the values and ethos of palliative care, a field in which Britain has led the world. For that reason, my Bill will specifically prohibit the wilful killing of patients. It will ensure that everyone has the right to a good death, regardless of age, diagnosis, ethnicity, background or postcode. I commend this patient-centred Bill to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Jim Dobbin, Mr. Frank Field, Dr. Brian Iddon, Mr. David Crausby, Mr. Lindsay Hoyle, Mr. Iain Duncan Smith, Mrs. Claire Curtis-Thomas, Paul Rowen, Mr. David Amess, Mr. Julian Brazier, John Robertson and Mr. Joe Benton.

PALLIATIVE CARE FOR THE TERMINALLY ILL

Jim Dobbin accordingly presented a Bill to require the provision of palliative care for persons suffering from a terminal illness; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 17 March, and to be printed [Bill 118].

Orders of the Day

Merchant Shipping (Pollution) Bill [Lords]

Order for Second Reading read.

Mr. Speaker: I inform the House that, in my view, the instruction that appears on the Order Paper is not in order, because it refers to matters that are quite unrelated to the content of the Bill. I will therefore not call it after Second Reading.

1.9 pm

The Minister of State, Department for Transport (Dr. Stephen Ladyman): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

When debating a Bill such as this, it would be normal for many of us to look to the wisdom of Lord Donaldson of Lymington for advice. As he passed away during the summer recess last year, I hope that the House will not mind if I pay a few words of respect to him before I begin my speech.

Anyone with the remotest connection to the shipping world will know of Lord Donaldson's immense contribution to improving the safety and environmental performance of the shipping industry worldwide. One consequence of the 1993 Braer disaster was Lord Donaldson's examination of how shipping could be systematically improved. His 1994 report, "Safer Ships, Cleaner Seas", led to a radical reform of standards required internationally by the International Maritime Organisation, nationally in our merchant shipping legislation and across the European Union in a series of directives and regulations aimed at consistent application of those standards.

Shipping, already among the greenest of transport modes, raised its game as a result and Lord Donaldson's work set the agenda for that improvement. He was a wise and trenchant adviser to many, Ministers included, and we are much in his debt. I am pleased that he was in his place when the Bill received a Second Reading in another place last summer. It might be tempting fate to say that the Bill completes his work, and one should not tempt fate at sea, but it follows his logic in adding to our ability to deal with the consequences of pollution and with preventive measures.

Since I have been Shipping Minister, I have made it clear that it is absolutely necessary to address critically the serious implications of any new legislation for the shipping industry. We must not add to burdens borne by an industry facing international competition without clear justification. We should, if possible, proceed only with implementing agreed international standards and enforce those standards fairly. We are therefore selective in what we seek to regulate. That said, we believe that the Bill is justifiable, proportionate and essential.

First, I would like to explain why the Bill has been drafted so narrowly. We have deliberately produced a precise, targeted Bill to deal with specific problems relating to pollution from ships. I should add that it has been my intention throughout that we should try to move forward with it as consensually as possible.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): I am grateful to the Minister for giving way and I appreciate that he is about to outline the benefits of the Bill. There was talk some time ago of banning single-skin tankers. What is the state of play on that? Should we not focus on prevention rather than on clearing up the mess after an accident has happened?

Dr. Ladyman: I agree with the hon. Gentleman that prevention is vital. The phasing out of single-skinned vessels and their replacement with double-skinned ones is proceeding at a pace and needs to continue, but I do not believe that the Bill is an appropriate vehicle for measures such as those he describes for this reason, which I will flesh out in a moment. It is important to get the Bill on the statute book as quickly as possible. Without it we are exposed, and if there were a serious accident, we might be unable to compensate people as fully as they ought to be compensated.

Were we to move ahead with preventive measures in the same Bill, there would have to be further debate. Even if at the end of that debate we all agreed on those measures, there would be areas of controversy that would have to be resolved, which would delay the legislation getting on to the statute book. That is why we have gone for a precise target with the Bill. We have not tried to include things that are equally important or, as the hon. Gentleman suggests, perhaps even more so.

As I said, we have deliberately produced a precise, targeted Bill to deal with specific problems that relate to pollution from ships. In particular, we have provided for considerable additional compensation in the event of oil pollution around our coast. I shall go on to explain that further, but because such a large amount of compensation rests on this legislation, it is important to keep the Bill as focused as possible. That has resulted in a small Bill, which I hope we can get on the statue book as soon as possible.

Mr. Greg Knight (East Yorkshire) (Con): Will the Minister comment on the definition of "pollution"? For example, does non-fuel oil such as olive oil fall within that category? Does "pollution" cover an oil that, in effect, has been solidified, such as grease?

Dr. Ladyman: I will certainly deal with those points, if not in this speech, then after seeking the leave of the House to make the winding-up speech.

As well as the issue of oil pollution around our coast—the Bill specifically deals with oil pollution—we have the opportunity to provide for an important measure to reduce air pollution from ships, which could not be missed. Again, international text for that exists, so we believe that it is possible to achieve agreement on a consensual way forward.

Merchant shipping legislation already contains provision to implement, by secondary legislation, most international maritime instruments. We already have powers to implement basic compensation for oil pollution, and we have secondary legislation in hand to implement compensation arrangements for chemical pollution and for pollution from ships' fuel—the so-called Bunkers convention.

The narrow purpose of the Bill is to close remaining gaps in our primary powers and to make adequate provision for future changes in the relevant international instruments. We therefore have before us a short, focused

[Dr. Ladyman]

Bill whose purpose is to allow the UK to implement two important international treaties, one greatly to improve compensation for oil pollution and the other to introduce measures to reduce air pollution from ships.

On compensation for oil pollution, ours is an island state with a coastline of over 10,000 miles, so the Government are very conscious of the potential environmental impacts stemming from a major pollution incident. We are surrounded by a number of major shipping routes and the English channel is the world's second busiest international waterway, after the Malacca straits.

Marine oil pollution can have devastating effects. The public are familiar with the dreadful images of polluted coastlines and of oiled seabirds and mammals, but the effects go much further. The economies of coastal communities and their fishing and tourism industries can be shattered following a major oil spill. The costs to local authorities and the Government of responding to an oil spill can be exorbitant. Following the Torrey Canyon incident off Land's End in 1967, it was evident that the compensation arrangements were inadequate. That led to the development of an international system to ensure that victims of oil pollution damage would be fully and promptly compensated.

The resulting international regime was founded on two treaties: a liability convention, which made shipowners strictly liable for pollution damage and required them to maintain insurance, and a fund convention, which provided additional compensation to victims of oil pollution damage when they were unable to obtain full compensation under the liability convention. The additional compensation provided under the fund convention is paid for by oil receivers in state parties to the fund convention.

The original instruments have since been superseded, but the international regime remains in place and, to date, 98 states have joined it. Since it was established, the UK has experienced two further major incidents, involving the Braer off the Shetlands in January 1993 and the Sea Empress off Milford Haven in February 1996. The international fund provided compensation of £52 million in respect of the Braer and £37 million in respect of the Sea Empress.

The compensation available through the international system was significantly increased in 1996 and the basic regime now provides for an overall limit of £168 million of compensation.

Mr. Knight: If the Minister cannot answer straight away, I invite him to do so in his winding-up speech. The international convention is reviewed and amended from time to time. When a review or amendment takes place, is it by majority voting or does the UK have a veto if it does not like what is proposed?

Dr. Ladyman: I will indeed confirm that in my winding-up speech, but I understand that we do not have a veto. However, it is the normal practice that we work closely with the other states and try to achieve a consensual way forward. It is usually possible to achieve that.

Unfortunately, the compensation available—£168 million—is not always sufficient. Under the system, full payment for claims has often been delayed until the full extent of the damage is known and the final costs of an incident can be assessed more accurately, a process that can take a number of years. We experienced such delays following both the Braer and the Sea Empress incidents.

In the case of the worst incidents, when total costs exceed the amount of compensation available under the system, claimants may never receive full payment. The total cost of the 2002 Prestige incident, which affected Spanish, French and Portuguese coasts, far exceeds the limit of the basic regime, and it is expected that victims will never receive more than 30 per cent. of their claims. The membership of the international regime agreed that it was necessary to address that fundamental shortcoming and the supplementary fund protocol was developed.

Tom Brake: The Minister may be about to deal with my point. The supplementary fund, together with the original fund, will amount to £600 million, but the cost of the Prestige damage was £700 million. Even with the new arrangements, it would appear that, in the event of a repetition of that incident or an incident on the same scale, the fund would not cover it.

Dr. Ladyman: That may be so. The hon. Gentleman is right that the total compensation that will be available from the supplementary fund will add £453 million for oil pollution victims, which means that, according to the latest prices, £621 million should be available. Those matters will, however, be kept under review. The legislation that we will pass today will allow us to use the supplementary fund, but it will also allow us to engage in further negotiations about the amount of the fund, and to agree to increases in future years through secondary legislation.

I am pleased to report that the United Kingdom played a prominent part in helping to develop the necessary reforms. The supplementary fund came into force in March last year and has so far been ratified by 15 states including most of our European neighbours. Through the Bill, we can ensure that the UK can also enjoy the additional financial protection that the fund can provide. The Bill allows the UK to implement the supplementary fund protocol and the Government intend to do that as soon as possible.

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury) (Con): We strongly support the Bill. The Minister has stressed the role of the UK in promoting the fund. What sanctions does he envisage in the long term applying to countries such as Panama and Liberia that will effectively be free riders?

Dr. Ladyman: The hon. Gentleman talks of free riders, but if those countries do not ratify the fund, they will not be able to take advantage of it. Only nations that will be party to the convention will have to contribute to it or be able to benefit from it. We shall talk to all concerned, through the International Maritime Organisation and other mechanisms, to ensure that there is wide collaboration.

Mr. Brazier: Surely the Minister appreciates that it is the people who need the money who will lose it if a company registered in Liberia has a big oil spill and goes bust. People in this country who cannot be compensated will be the losers as a result of that free riding.

Dr. Ladyman: The risk will be spread among all the nations of the world. The extent of the fund as defined under the convention will always be available. Even if a company went broke, we would still have access to the money that was to be contributed to the supplementary fund. The hon. Gentleman may be thinking of the 1992 international convention on civil liability for oil pollution damage—known as the liability convention—which requires a shipowner to be insured for personal liability. I shall have to check on what happens when someone does not carry that necessary liability insurance. I may be able to give the hon. Gentleman the information later during the debate.

It is expected that the costs of all but the most extreme incidents will continue to be covered by the existing fund. The main benefit of the Bill is that the supplementary fund will enable claims to be met from the existing fund without delay. In the vast majority of cases, it will no longer be necessary to delay payment until the overall costs of the incident are determined, because the supplementary fund will be there to provide additional compensation as necessary. That should ensure that claimants are spared the frustration, and indeed the hardship, of delays in full payment.

Following enactment of the Bill, the United Kingdom would be able to join the supplementary fund protocol and benefit from the financial protection offered by it within a relatively short time. Until that happens, the UK cannot gain access to the substantial additional benefits conferred by the protocol. If an incident of the magnitude of the Prestige or the Erika affects our shores, the compensation available through the existing regime may well be inadequate. That explains why I am so keen for the Bill to be enacted as soon as possible.

The supplementary fund protocol would be implemented in the UK by secondary legislation. An Order in Council has been drafted and copies are available from the Library. It contains detailed provisions implementing the supplementary fund protocol in the UK. The provisions are technical and amend those in the Merchant Shipping Act 1995 relating to the international convention on the establishment of an international fund for compensation for oil pollution damage 1992—known as the fund convention—to extend them to the supplementary fund protocol. The order will require major oil receivers in the UK to contribute to the supplementary fund just as they currently do in respect of the existing fund. Contributions will be needed only if the £168 million available from the existing fund proves insufficient.

UK oil importers already contribute to the existing international fund. They were consulted in 2004 on the proposal to implement the supplementary fund protocol. The oil industry clearly favours a predictable and international approach to providing compensation for oil pollution damage and supports implementation of the supplementary fund protocol as part of a wider strategy to improve the existing regime.

As recently as last week, tanker owners agreed to share the costs of the supplementary fund, thereby reducing the burden on the oil industry. We fully support that move. It is vital for the compensation regime to be funded in a sustainable, equitable manner, with the right balance between shipowner and cargo interests. If all parties are not satisfied by the contribution arrangements, that could in the long term be very damaging to the international regime. The agreement proposed by tanker owners will help to ensure the continued success of the regime. It is due to be adopted by the governing body of the supplementary fund in February.

The Bill also provides for the implementation of future instruments governing compensation for oil pollution damage. As I said earlier, the original instruments were superseded some years ago. The fundamental principles of the regime remained unchanged, but improvements were made to, for example, widen the scope of application. The regime now provides for reasonable environmental reinstatement measures. It has also developed considerably in respect of compensation for the economic consequences of an oil disaster; it was originally conceived as being primarily concerned with clean-up. No doubt it will continue to evolve. Indeed, it must if it is to remain viable and successful, and meet legitimate claims. It is therefore important for the Bill to provide for any future instruments that may be developed to improve the regime still further. Such instruments are, of course, agreed only after extensive debate in which the industries concerned participate fully.

The UK Government will always want the option of being part of the international regime at the earliest opportunity. That is why the Bill provides for the UK to become a party to any instrument that modifies or replaces the existing regime. Of course, such a power would not be used before the usual public consultation and regulatory impact assessment exercises had been carried out. The provision was included so that the Government of the day could, if they so decided, implement any new, internationally negotiated instruments governing oil pollution compensation without first having to pursue primary legislation. Parliament would retain active scrutiny of the future proposal by virtue of the affirmative resolution procedure, which would apply to any secondary legislation made under the provision.

The last provision relating to compensation for oil pollution is a minor amendment relating to the existing international fund as contained in the Merchant Shipping Act 1995. The 1995 Act includes a provision relating to the time within which claims must be brought against the existing international fund. To ensure that the provision in the Act is interpreted consistently with the text of the fund convention, the Bill modifies the language used in section 178 to follow the wording of the treaty more closely. The Bill also provides for a power to make secondary legislation regulating air pollution from ships. It does so by amending section 128 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1995, so removing a doubt on the current scope of that section. The secondary legislation would implement annexe VI to the international convention for the prevention of pollution from ships, commonly known as the MARPOL convention. Again, we are seeking to implement domestically what we have negotiated internationally.

The secondary legislation would apply the series of internationally agreed technical standards which form annexe VI to UK-flagged vessels. The aim of those standards is to reduce air pollution from shipping through controls of emissions of nitrogen oxides, sulphur oxides and ozone-depleting substances.

Mr. Knight: On that point, can the Minister confirm that those regulations are designed to affect only ships currently being used on a commercial basis and that they would not affect historic ships that may be used in a regatta to celebrate the second world war, for example? Will he confirm that the powers will not be drawn so widely that they prevent the use of historic vessels for celebratory purposes?

Dr. Ladyman: That is my understanding. I will try to confirm that later for the right hon. Gentleman.

The pollutants that I mentioned have been identified as causing environmental degradation and damage to human health. Nitrogen oxides react with hydrocarbons at ground level to form ozone when exposed to sunlight. Ground level ozone exacerbates pre-existing lung complaints including asthma and has been demonstrated to increase hospitalisation and use of medication.

When released into the atmosphere, sulphur oxides and nitrogen oxides react to form acidic compounds. Those can fall as acid rain or be deposited as dry particles and cause localised acidic damage. Acid deposition in both forms can cause severe damage to forests and water bodies and damage man-made structures.

It is important to tackle emissions from shipping through internationally applicable technical standards. By 2020, the total number of ships worldwide is expected to be double what it was in 2000. That growth will be reflected in increasing traffic calling at UK ports and transiting UK waters.

Generally, shipping is a friend to the environment, but there is considerable room for improvement in atmospheric pollutant emissions from ships and implementation of the annexe would be a positive step towards greener shipping.

David T.C. Davies (Monmouth) (Con): I thoroughly agree with the Minister about the green credentials of shipping. Does he agree that more needs to be done to extend port capacity around the UK to ensure that, as well as the large ocean-going vessels that come into certain ports, mainly Felixstowe and Southampton, we have smaller feeder vessels using the many existing ports throughout the UK to get container shipments as near to their final destination as possible?

Dr. Ladyman: There is considerable work to be done on port capacity and on facilities for trans-shipping using in-shore waterways to provide a greener form of transport for many of the goods that are brought into this country. We will shortly launch a ports policy review that will look at exactly those issues and at how we can plan appropriately for port capacity of all types.

Tom Brake (Carshalton and Wallington) (LD): Can the Minister explain what in practice it will mean once the UK has signed the annexe? What action may we expect to see at UK ports or against vessels in UK waters?

Dr. Ladyman: We will inspect to ensure that all the ships that are affected by the provision are properly maintained, operated in accordance with international technical standards and certified as meeting the criteria set down in the MARPOL convention. Essentially, that is what would be seen at ports. We expect the people who are responsible for inspecting ships at British ports to ensure that ships that use British ports are in accordance with those conventions.

Tom Brake: Can the Minister clarify whether that would mean, for example, boarding ships in UK waters when they are at sea?

Dr. Ladyman: I will have to reflect on that and perhaps answer in my winding-up speech. It would be unusual for us to board ships at sea, but I will need to find out whether that is possible under the legislation.

I am pleased to say that the proposal to implement the annexe of MARPOL that we are discussing has been welcomed by the UK shipping industry and by marine engine manufacturers in their response to consultation. It is important for the UK economy that the UK introduce legislation implementing MARPOL annexe VI as soon as possible. If the UK does not do so, UK-flagged ships will be at risk of detention or delay in ports of states that have implemented it. Needless to say, that could have a severe impact on the UK merchant fleet.

Above all, it is important for the environment both of the UK and the wider world where UK ships ply their trade that the UK should implement MARPOL annexe VI. The Bill will enable the Government to implement it by secondary legislation. Draft secondary legislation containing the detail of the regulations contained in annexe VI has been prepared and copies have been placed in the Library.

Mr. John Randall (Uxbridge) (Con): I understand why the Minister is introducing the Bill and the urgent need for it, but he has talked a lot about the environment. He will be aware that the Government in the Queen's Speech mentioned a draft marine Bill. Has his Department been talking to other Departments about the need for that and is there any news on when it may appear?

Dr. Ladyman: I can confirm that we are talking to other Departments about that legislation. It is not for me today to give an indication of when it may be forthcoming, but I am sure that the ministerial colleagues concerned will have heard the hon. Gentleman's question.

James Duddridge (Rochford and Southend, East) (Con): Will the Minister confirm to my constituents that the Bill applies not only to ships at sea, but to ships coming down estuary areas such as the Thames? Furthermore, will the compensation arrangements include ships once they are docked and static?

Dr. Ladyman: Is the hon. Gentleman referring to oil pollution from ships in those waters?

James Duddridge indicated assent.

Dr. Ladyman: I think it unlikely that we would have an accident in estuarial waters that required the use of the supplementary fund because of the scale of accident required to trigger the use of the fund, but liability arrangements are in place to compensate people who are affected by pollution in those areas.

I reiterate that the Government are determined that the UK should have the best possible financial and environmental arrangements available to protect our coastal interests from the effects of oil pollution from tankers and from air pollution from ships. Recent oil pollution incidents in France and Spain have demonstrated that costs of major spills can far exceed the compensation that is currently available. The additional sums available through the supplementary fund should ensure that, in virtually all circumstances, compensation can be paid promptly and in full. We wish to have that protection in place as soon as possible.

Mr. John MacDougall (Glenrothes) (Lab): I am grateful for the meeting that we had on ship transfer in the River Forth. As my hon. Friend is aware, the main concern is that should an incident take place, albeit that the likelihood of that happening is minute, the scale of the problem would be enormous. Is he satisfied that the range of compensation suggested in the Bill would meet such a situation? Is there any way in which further compensation can be offered should an incident cause a much larger problem than the scale of liability covers?

Dr. Ladyman: I am confident that were an incident to occur in the firth of Forth—let us hope that we are never in that position—arrangements are in place that would adequately compensate people, or that would require those making oil shipments there to have liability cover such that they can provide compensation. Although such an accident would be devastating, I doubt whether one could occur of sufficient scale to trigger the supplementary fund that we are discussing today. But I am confident that the range of provisions that will be available once the Bill is enacted will be sufficient to compensate people. That does not detract from the seriousness of the issue facing people in the firth of Forth. As my hon. Friend knows, consultations are under way on what may or may not be allowed there.

The Bill allows the UK to implement two important international treaties that will benefit both the environment and the financial protection of UK coastal interests. It is also important for the UK to be seen to be actively adopting these measures, especially bearing in mind the prominent role that we played in negotiating them. Many Members may wish to comment on measures not in the Bill that we could have taken to protect the marine environment and to deal with marine pollution, but as I said, including them would have delayed the Bill. Urgency is appropriate here to get these provisions into place, so that we are fully protected. I shall do my best to answer Members' detailed questions in the winding-up speech, if the House grants me leave to give it. I want to be as helpful as possible in order to encourage consensual and rapid progress. I look forward to the debate today and in Committee, and I commend the Bill to the House.

1.42 pm

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury) (Con): I begin by associating the official Opposition with the tribute that the Minister rightly paid to Lord Donaldson. He will be a great loss to the shipping world and if I may, I shall return to some elements of his report to which the Minister did not refer in his speech.

I am delighted to be leading for the Opposition on the Merchant Shipping (Pollution) Bill. Given that today is my first outing on merchant shipping since taking over this brief, I hope that it is in order briefly to stress just how important this industry is. It has taken over from aviation as the third largest service industry in the country, with a turnover of almost £10 billion a year. It carries 95 per cent. of our visible trade, and the importance of our merchant fleet to an island bordering the second busiest international waterway in the world cannot be overestimated. It is no wonder that Admiral Jervis—here, I am recalling recent celebrations—famously said the following to William Pitt the younger:

"I do not say that the French will not come. I say only they will not come by sea."

Indeed, the merchant navy has given extremely gallant service in two world wars, in the Falklands and, most recently, in the Gulf.

We welcome the Bill. As we discuss pollution today, we should remember that, as the Minister briefly mentioned, shipping is by far the cleanest form of transport in terms of carbon dioxide emissions. On average, per tonne mile, shipping produces about 10 per cent. of the CO_2 produced by road haulage. That is why, despite its brevity, this is a very important Bill. It allows for faster payments of more substantial sums in the aftermath of a major oil spill through the supplementary fund protocol, and it will cut emissions of nitrogen oxides from marine diesel engines.

The Bill enables me to demonstrate two of my party's approaches: the new consensus and the longstanding Conservative commitment to the environment. By far the most important post-war environmental legislation was Harold Macmillan's Clean Air Act 1956.

Mr. Greg Knight: In rightly placing on the record his concern for the environment, does my hon. Friend agree that nothing in the Bill ought to be used to prevent the use of historic vessels for regatta purposes? Any new restrictions imposed on diesel-engine emissions must not, therefore, be retrospective to that extent.

Mr. Brazier: I entirely agree with my right hon. Friend on that point, and I was very glad to hear the Minister promise, following my right hon. Friend's intervention, to come back to that matter. It would be quite wrong for the Bill to interfere in any way with historic celebrations of the gallantry of our sailors in two world wars, for example. The Minister gave him a tentative assurance, which I hope he can firm up at the end of the debate.

[Mr. Brazier]

We all know the consequences of major oil spills. We have seen the pictures on television of dead and dying birds and of coastlines ruined, in some cases perhaps for ever. Local economies are often stunted and tourism blighted. We should also remember those who live off the sea. After the Braer disaster off the Shetlands, to which the Minister referred, three quarters of the compensation went to help the fishermen whose livelihoods had been destroyed overnight.

There have been a number of other terrible spillages, such as the Sea Empress at Milford Haven, to which the Minister rightly referred. The cost of the Braer and Milford Haven disasters were $83 million and $62 million respectively—disasters that left tens of thousands of birds dying in the slick, and ruined hundreds of miles of beautiful coastline. The old liability and fund conventions made available up to $300 million to cover such costs. Those British disasters fell well within that fund but, as the Minister rightly said, that is not true of all oil disasters. When the Exxon Valdez ran aground on Prince William Sound, 37,000 tonnes of crude oil were spilled and 270,000 birds were killed. The cost of the clean-up operation was a staggering $2.5 billion.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): It is of course right to establish appropriate regimes to compensate for accidents and incidents such as those that the hon. Gentleman is describing, but is he concerned that almost three quarters of all tanker incidents are either accidents by collision and contact, or are due to machinery problems? A substantial number of foreign-flagged vessels are involved in tanker accidents—I am thinking of the Bahamas, Norway, Gibraltar, Liberia and Malta—so would we not be equally well served by pressing for improvements in the quality of the maintenance and operation of foreign-flagged vessels in British waters, as well as compensating for some of the errors that they have made?

Mr. Brazier: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for that intervention, with which I have considerable sympathy. I shall raise two points that relate to his intervention in a moment, if I may, rather than doing so now. He makes a very strong point and I hope that the Minister has taken it on board.

It is estimated that when the Prestige sank in 2002 after releasing 64,000 tonnes of crude oil, more than 3,000 km of coastline were ruined. Almost 800,000 birds were killed and the Iberian guillemot became extinct. The financial cost of the spill is expected to top $1 billion. To date, only 15 per cent. of the compensation has been paid, causing untold harm on the coasts of Spain, Portugal and France. That is why the supplementary fund protocol is so important. Not all spills will cost less than $300 million in future, just as they have not in the past. Clean-ups need to begin immediately—not after a long period of ascertaining the final cost of the operation.

The new fund, which we support strongly, will provide $1 billion, which is a big increase, and will rush in aid when it is needed. However, in moving on to the ground covered by the hon. Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) in his earlier intervention, I want to press the Government to tell the House what progress is being made on preventing disasters from affecting the most environmentally important areas of this country.

The British Chamber of Shipping told me that, worldwide, oil pollution fell by just over 90 per cent. between 1992—a carefully chosen year—and 2004. Nevertheless, what are we doing in terms of prevention? There is a slight danger that the Bill will mean that we focus on locking the porthole after the oil has bolted.

Lord Donaldson's inquiry contained more than 100 recommendations, and the Minister was right to say that some had been adopted. However, nothing has been done yet about one of the main suggestions, although the Government have long promised to act. Lord Donaldson recommended the creation of marine environmental high-risk areas, so that tankers and other vessels carrying dangerous cargoes would be routed away from environmentally sensitive regions. The Minister is my constituency neighbour, and we share a stretch of coast on a very busy shipping lane. It would be difficult to route vessels away from that lane, but that would be practical for other areas where there is a particular concern for environmental factors. Will the Minister say what progress has been made with that proposal?

Dr. Ladyman: I cannot give a date for that announcement today, but I assure the hon. Gentleman that it will be made very shortly.

Mr. Brazier: I am delighted to hear that.

In recent years, huge strides have been made in reducing oil pollution. I said a moment ago that the latest available figures showed that a fall of just over 90 per cent. had been achieved, but I remind the Government that that success is partly due to the support shown by the industry and individual members of the merchant navy. They are the ones who have had to amend many practices to achieve that dramatic fall.

I am worried that a new European directive might criminalise accidental discharges that are due not to reckless disregard, but to accidents involving a small amount of negligence. The directive comes from a section of the European Commission that used to be led by Spain but is now led by France—the two countries in Europe that have suffered most from oil pollution. As so often with measures from Brussels, the intention is good but the consequences may be counter-productive. First, there is a real chance that the directive may contravene international law. That would lead to the absurdity that European law could pull in one direction and international law in the other. Secondly, whatever the legal position, I share the industry's concern that young people could be deterred from joining the merchant marine.

The Government rightly can take some credit for the large expansion in British-registered tonnage as a result of the tonnage tax. I was very pleased that the Minister recently reiterated his determination to defend the Red Duster, now that the Government have acknowledged that it is under threat from Brussels. However, the recovery in tonnage has not been matched by any great increase in the numbers of British crew members. The directive means that merchant navy crew members could be sent to prison for a very long time as a result of genuine accidents in which there was no reckless disregard, but merely an element of negligence. That could have a significant effect on the recruitment of talented young people into our merchant navy.

Considerable concern was expressed in another place about vessels flying flags of convenience of countries that have not signed up to the protocol. When I asked the Minister about that earlier, his answer was very much the same as the one given by Baroness Crawley. Both said that there is a compulsory requirement to have insurance, but both must know that that insurance does not cover the really large spills. Ships from Panama, Liberia and other countries that have not signed up to the protocol are the metaphorical stowaways on the great vessel that is the international merchant fleet. They weigh the rest of us down, while using everyone else's resources.

David T.C. Davies: My hon. Friend will no doubt be aware that the largest oil tanker ever to be built will be registered in Majuro, the capital of the Marshall islands. Many people will not know where that is, and I admit that I had to look it up myself, even though I worked in shipping for many years.

Mr. Brazier: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that, and he is right to be concerned. I mean no reflection on that particular ship, but some of the most unseaworthy vessels on the high seas belong to the fleets that I mentioned. For instance, the Prestige, which sank in 2002 and caused a great deal of chaos, was registered in Cyprus' large offshore register. At least Cyprus is applying for EU membership, which means that there will be more scope to deal with the problem that its register poses.

Dr. Ladyman: I want to deal with the point about ships registered in the Marshall islands. We must be careful not to suggest that, just because a place is small, it does not have a high quality flag. Many smaller nations with large fleets have high standards, but all vessels must be insured to cover their liability for any pollution that might be caused, and no uninsured vessel should be in our waters or come near our shores. The Government have powers to deal with any uninsured vessel travelling through our waters. The supplementary fund would be available to pay compensation as a result of accidents caused in our waters by uninsured vessels. The hon. Gentleman is right to say that, because some countries have not signed up to the fund, the burden will fall on the signatory countries. However, there are 98 signatories, so at least the burden will be spread out among them.

Mr. Brazier: We have come full circle, as I said earlier that the countries that have not signed up to the fund are freeloading on the rest. Britain has set a positive example by joining the supplementary fund, but the Opposition would welcome measures, perhaps in the long term, to put pressure on countries such as Panama and Liberia to sign up to the fund so that they can bear their share of the burden.

I come now to the MARPOL convention. At present, ships account for 4 per cent. of global sulphur emissions and roughly 7 per cent. of nitrogen emissions. New technologies can reduce those figures substantially. Recently, P&O installed the new Krystallon water scrubber in the Pride of Kent—great name, good ship—and announced that there were "no measurable" sulphur emissions from the vessel, while nitrogen oxide emissions had fallen by 80 per cent. That is a really good example of how new technologies to reduce the levels of dangerous chemicals being pumped into the atmosphere can play such a big role. It is vital that companies with the financial base to test new inventions are given as much encouragement to do so as possible. Targets to cut emissions are an important part of the campaign against global warming, but they will be reached much more easily if there is also a focus on new technology.

The figures also show that transport by boat for both goods and passengers is considerably more environmentally friendly than transport by road. In Britain, light and heavy goods vehicles pump out an estimated 8.2 million tonnes of carbon dioxide each year. In contrast, our entire domestic shipping industry, which carries 95 per cent. of the goods traded with Britain, produces less than 1 million tonnes a year.

Occasionally, hon. Members find time to sip a drink on the Terrace. Each tug that we see pulling a large barge behind it carries enough waste to take 100 lorries off the road. The barges carrying cement up the Thames save 5,000 lorry journeys a year. The more transport we can shift on to vessels, the fewer road freight journeys will be made and the whole system would benefit. Fewer vehicles on the road mean less pollution and less congestion. I hope that the Government are giving serious thought to how to promote what is potentially by far the greenest form of transport.

Two matters are not, unfortunately, covered in the Bill. Because of an entirely understandable ruling by Mr. Speaker, we will not have an opportunity to debate in Committee the measures that would have been in the Bill on port capacity. They are too far removed from this subject, but it is vital that something is done to address our shortage of port capacity and the farcical arrangements for public inquiries on that. As my hon. Friend the Member for Uxbridge (Mr. Randall) pointed out, the Bill on marine issues was promised in the Queen's Speech and is a close cousin to this Bill—saving bird life is, after all, one of the main aims of this Bill—but the Government still have not found time for it.

Nonetheless, we congratulate the Government on this Bill and hope that it will be the first of several steps to promote safety on the high seas, protect our coastline from pollution and promote greener technologies in our excellent merchant navy. I commend the Bill to the House.

2.1 pm

Tom Brake (Carshalton and Wallington) (LD): I also welcome the opportunity to debate this short Bill and wish to echo the Minister's comments about Lord Donaldson. I also welcome the hon. Member for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier) to his first outing on the subject of merchant shipping. I do not anticipate that the Bill will detain the House until late this evening because it commands all-party support. It will not need any Punch and Judy politics—although I was interested to note that Punch and Judy were back at Prime Minister's questions earlier.

[Tom Brake]

In the other place, the Bill was dispatched in just over an hour and a half. Peers received no approaches from lobbyists and suggested that the Bill was uncontroversial. I concur with that assessment and do not wish to delay matters and leave the UK vulnerable in the way that the Minister spelled out in his opening remarks. The main purpose of the Bill is to allow the UK to implement two important international treaties. The first would greatly improve compensation for oil spills and the second would introduce measures to reduce air pollution from ships. A further minor purpose is a useful clarification of the claim period during which compensation claims can be made.

I come now to the supplementary fund protocol. The present regime, the liability convention, now includes 98 member states, although at the time of the debate in June 2005 it had 93 signatories. The present regime provides for an overall limit of £168 million of compensation. At the time of the debate last June, it was £160 million or £162 million. The present figure, £168 million, is compensation paid for by ship owners and oil importers. In the past 25 years, the regime has provided compensation in more than 130 oil pollution incidents. The Bill makes provision for the UK to implement the supplementary fund protocol and make available an additional £440 million for compensation in the event of a major oil spill from a tanker.

The fund was developed to provide additional compensation for victims of oil pollution in states that choose to ratify the protocol and are content for their oil industries to make the financial contributions. It was helpful of the Minister to clarify the point raised by the hon. Member for Canterbury and confirm that the UK, if it is affected by an oil spill involving a vessel that is not covered, will still be able to access the full funding available in the supplementary fund. The total amount, taking into account the existing fund and the supplementary fund, will be £600 million-plus.

The supplementary fund entered into force in March last year and has so far been ratified by 15 states. By June 2005, it had been ratified by only 10—Japan and nine states in Europe—and that underlines the Minister's legitimate concerns that the UK should join the club. Membership is now growing rapidly and we support the Government in their desire to ensure that the UK has the additional financial protection that the supplementary fund can provide.

In the other place, Baroness Crawley described the fund as follows:

"The supplementary fund should ensure that in future the regime bears the full cost. The shipping and oil industries will pay. That is in line with the 'polluter pays' principle to which the UK fully subscribes."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 14 June 2005; Vol. 672, c. 1149.]

My party also subscribes to that principle. The Bill will also ensure that the costs of funding compensation are shared by major oil importers internationally, rather than falling on national budgets. The Bill will also allow the UK to join any future regime governing oil pollution compensation.

I wish to return briefly to the polluter pays principle. I intervened on the Minister on the subject of the Prestige and the fact that the estimate of the damage is more than £700 million, whereas the supplementary fund, together with the original fund, will cover only just over £600 million. What is the thinking behind setting up a fund that does not have sufficient funds to cover an incident that has already taken place? That is rather illogical, and one would have expected agreement to be reached that the fund would have in it at least as much as would be required to cover such an incident. I hope that the Minister will be able to clarify the thinking on that when he winds up.

Air pollution from ships is not something to be sniffed at—if hon. Members will pardon the pun. Emissions from shipping are set to be larger than emissions from all UK land-based sources by 2020, according to a report from the European Parliament's Environment Committee. We therefore support the measures that allow the UK to implement annexe VI of the international convention on the prevention of pollution from ships, commonly known as the MARPOL convention. I intervened on the Minister on that point and, when he sums up, I hope that he will be able to give more detail on what the implementation of MARPOL will mean in terms of the actions that UK port authorities can take when vessels dock in UK ports. Does the UK have powers to board ships to check whether they have the insurance required under the liability convention, as the Minister implied? If a dirty-looking steamer came over the horizon, would the UK have powers to board that vessel to see whether it complied—

Dr. Ladyman: I have reflected on that matter and I am now able to tell the hon. Gentleman that we would not normally board a vessel at sea. Should we wish to do so, we have powers under section 259 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1995. Normally, we would wait for the ship to arrive at a UK port where it could be detained if necessary.

Tom Brake: I thank the Minister for that intervention. I see that he sometimes has difficulty in reflecting at speed, as I do, but I am glad that some clarification arrived as he was sitting on the Front Bench.

Hon. Members will be aware that there were 23 signatories to annexe VI of MARPOL in June, but the number might have moved on by a further five since then. The signatory countries range from Azerbaijan to Sweden to Vanuatu. I agree with Baroness Crawley that in coastal and port communities, human health benefits will result from the reduction of localised pollutants such as low-level ozone. She said:

"It is estimated that implementing MARPOL Annex VI will result in 20 fewer deaths and a £26 million reduction in associated economic loss annually."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 14 June 2005; Vol. 672, c. 1147.]

That information is extremely helpful. Can the Minister tell us how many deaths and what costs have arisen since the point at which the annexe was available to be signed by the UK?

I promised not to detain the House at great length and I will be true to my word by bringing my speech to a conclusion. Liberal Democrats believe that the Bill will deal effectively with the matters that it is intended to address: the compensation available to cover the cost of oil spills and air pollution from shipping. The Bill will receive our support.

2.11 pm

Mr. Robert Goodwill (Scarborough and Whitby) (Con): This is almost a case of déjà vu, because before I elected to this Parliament I was a Member of the European Parliament, where I got off on things like this. I took through some of the Euro IV legislation and the legislation on motor cycle emissions, N1 vehicles—vans—and small spark-ignition engines, such as those in lawn mowers and chain saws. I was pleased that we managed to save the chain saw for our foresters and farmers from legislation that would have meant that the engines' catalytic converters were too heavy and hot for practical use.

My swan song was my involvement in the regulation on the quality of marine fuel. That started with Mrs. Hautala, from the Green party, as rapporteur, and then Alexander de Roo, who is a Dutch Green, took over. May I put on the record my thanks to officials from the British Department for Transport, who were supportive during that time? I also thank the officials who were co-opted to the European Commission from the Department. By and large, we managed to follow the British line, although I could not say the same of my Labour colleagues in the European Parliament on every occasion. I would especially like to mention Chris Parkin, who was very supportive.

I welcome the Bill. As we have heard, marine transport is very efficient. A ship produces a quarter of the amount of carbon dioxide per tonne kilometre as a lorry. The UK is an island and we need cast our minds back only to the second world war to remember how the submarine blockade threatened the very survival of our nation. Although we have a connection to the French mainland through the tunnel and several pipelines—others are being built—we still rely primarily on our maritime transport for survival in the global economy. Many businesses cannot survive without access to global markets through our ports and merchant fleet.

Of course, maritime transport is not as environmentally benign in other ways. There have been improvements to vehicle technology due to several pieces of European legislation, such as the introduction of catalytic converters, common rail technology and more advanced engine management systems. There have been advances in fuels. There is a perennial battle between the manufacturers of vehicles and the manufacturers of fuels about who should be making moves to improve our environmental standards further. Such an argument also goes on in the area of marine engines.

Tremendous progress has been made on sulphur. In 2000, we reduced the amount of sulphur in diesel fuels for road vehicles to 350 parts per million. We now have a regulation to provide that the amount of sulphur is 50 ppm, and there are low-sulphur diesels on the market at 10 ppm. In fact, a new Ford Focus that operates on the hottest and most polluted day of summer in the middle of one of our big European cities is as likely as not to clean the environment once its catalytic converter has reached its operating temperature. We have thus moved an awfully long way.

On power generation, the dash for gas has reduced the use of coal, which can be dirty. Power stations, such as Drax in my area, have exhaust flue desulphurisation, which has reduced the amount of sulphur to such an extent that families such as mine now have to buy sulphur fertiliser because we no longer have a free supply of sulphur from above, courtesy of the Central Electricity Generating Board. Of course, we will have an opportunity this year further to reduce the pollution caused by power generation if we take the decision to build a new generation of nuclear power stations.

When the sulphur is removed from oil that is used for petrol and diesel—for road transport—we are left with bunker oil, which is notoriously high in sulphur. Even bunker oils that are derived from our pretty high quality North sea crudes can be between 2.5 and 3 per cent. sulphur, which is equivalent to 27,000 ppm of sulphur compared with the level of 10 ppm in the new advanced diesels. While we might not have such a big problem with our North sea crudes, many southern European states have serious problems with the crudes that they receive from Russia and Saudi Arabia, because their levels of sulphur may rise well above 3 per cent. Bunker fuels derived from crudes from the Gulf of Mexico can be 4 per cent. sulphur.

As we heard from the hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Tom Brake), by 2010 shipping will produce half the sulphur emissions in the European Union. The majority of that sulphur is not a major problem because it goes up at sea and falls down at sea. Some 80 per cent. of the sulphur dioxide emitted by a ship in the mid-Atlantic will go into the sea and its effects will be relatively benign. However, in MARPOL annexe VI sensitive areas in the English channel, the North sea and the Baltic, there is a specific problem due to high amounts of sulphur dioxide that is derived from our ships. Some 90 per cent. of the sulphur in some such coastal areas derives from shipping.

Despite the fact that ships might travel across the North sea, most of the shipping hugs the coast. For example, the North sea ferry from Hull to Zeebrugge does not go in a straight line, but hugs the coast. The pollution from such ships thus has a significant effect on coastal communities. I welcome the action that the Government are taking following European agreement on the MARPOL annexe VI sensitive areas. I am sure that it will considerably reduce the pollution that we experience, which is becoming increasingly significant.

Pollution is also a significant problem when ships are in port. That can be called hotelling—I guess that it is not to be confused with cottaging. Ferries can cause a specific problem because they spend a lot of time in port. The Commission proposed that auxiliary engines should be run on 0.2 per cent. gas oil, but that has been a problem for some ferries, especially cross-channel ferries such as the Pride of Kent and the Pride of Canterbury. Those ferries spend about 50 per cent. of their time in port, so it would be especially expensive for them to use such low-sulphur fuel. I was thus pleased that when we considered the legislation in the European Parliament, we allowed trials to be held on the new Canadian-developed abatement technology that can reduce pollution at source and also contribute towards energy savings at refineries. The production of low-sulphur fuel has an environmental cost at the refinery, so if ships are fitted with seawater scrubbers, the pollution can be reduced at source. Not only would that reduce the sulphur dioxide that is derived from fuel, but it would make significant reductions in nitrogen oxide, which is derived not from the fuel, but from the nitrogen in the air that is in the engine's combustion chamber.

I hope that the Minister has seen the results of those two trials with the Pride of Kent and the Pride of Canterbury. The Pride of Kent is fitted with abatement technology, but the Pride of Canterbury—an identical ship—is not. If the technology is successful, there could be ways to encourage more ferry and shipping companies to fit it. It would also reduce the particulate matter from the engines, which can be a problem. Abatement technology also reduces volatile organic compounds.

Some countries have tried market-driven solutions to the problem. I am not sure whether the Minister is aware of the Swedish approach, which has a graduated system of port dues. Shipping companies that opt for even higher environmental standards receive rebates on the port dues. The British Government might want to consider that as a way of encouraging companies to go further. A similar scheme operates in Helsinki harbour.

Another option that was suggested when the directive was discussed was to encourage more ships to opt for an electric feed while in port. The Pride of York and the Pride of Hull spend all day in Hull harbour with their main engines ticking over and their auxiliary engines running. They may well benefit from plugging into the mains. Has the Minister received representations from the industry on how we can make progress on that?

On marine fuel and tankers, a practical problem in complying with the MARPOL annexe VI on sensitive areas is when a tanker leaves its home port in Saudi Arabia or wherever and finds that it is diverted to another port. I would be concerned if our security of supply were compromised because a ship had bunkered with high sulphur fuel and could not discharge in a UK or other European port. There is a problem with the discharge of tankers. I am sure that the Minister is aware that a tanker burns around 200 tonnes of heavy fuel oil in just raising steam to discharge. I have had representations from the tanker industry, which is concerned that many of the boilers fitted to those ships cannot be run on dual fuels. That may limit the number of tankers that could discharge in the UK without expensive retrofitting.

Perhaps I can crave your indulgence for a second, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and address the issue of fuels for recreational pleasure craft. I am sure that the Minister is aware that we benefit from a derogation to allow such craft to use rebated fuel, and that that runs out at the end of they year. I was in correspondence with him last year to encourage him to apply for a renewal of that derogation. Having reflected on that, I hope that he will make an announcement fairly soon. I am sure that the European Commission will look favourably on such an application. It would reassure many of the people in my constituency who enjoy recreational activities on the sea.

A couple of years ago, I went to Galicia to see the effects of the Prestige disaster. I was not prepared for what I saw. The word "devastation" does not describe the black hell of the beaches in Galicia. Hundreds volunteered to clean it up, and many of those came from all over Spain. They wore those white overalls that we saw on our television screens. That brought home to me the extent of the disaster and how we cannot allow it to happen again.

We must not forget that the Prestige disaster was a result of a catalogue of mistakes. First and foremost, there was a major mix-up between central and regional government. I am slightly concerned that, in one way or another, we are moving to regional government in this country. I would hate to think that we could have a similar mix-up. The people in Galicia thought that it was up to them to decide how to act, but the people in Madrid thought that it was their responsibility. In the end, vital hours were lost at the start. Instead of bringing the Prestige into a safe haven and putting a boom around it, which would have caused considerable devastation but on a small scale, the ship was ordered out to sea, where it broke up and damaged 250 miles of coast, with devastating effects on tourism, fishing and wildlife.

Some 63,000 tonnes of heavy oil escaped from the Prestige and important oyster beds in France were devastated. In addition, 250,000 sea birds were killed. Some 90 species made up the 23,000 that were collected, and 17,000 of those were already dead. We often see pictures of birds being cleaned or treated in centres, but I am sad to have to relate that the majority of those birds die anyway, having ingested fuel. Having spoken to some of the bird charities, I know that they think that they must do something, but perhaps we should not expend too much money on birds that are, sadly, a lost cause, and put more resources into ensuring that a spillage is quickly contained so that we do not repeat the mistakes of the Spanish.

I note the comments by my hon. Friend the Member for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier) about boats that can be described as freeloaders—those that sail under a flag of convenience. The Prestige was an accident waiting to happen. It was a rust bucket. I was led to believe that it was registered in the Bahamas, but I bow to my hon. Friend's better knowledge. It was registered by a British broker. It had a Filipino crew and a Greek captain. The ship was owned by a Liberian firm, but was controlled by a Greek shipping magnate. The oil was being ferried from Latvia to Singapore. The oil itself was owned by a Gibraltar-based firm, with a headquarters in Switzerland run by a Russian parent company. No wonder something went wrong.

Does the Minister have information on what percentage of the world fleet falls into the category of using a flag of convenience and does not comply with the same standards as we do? What proportion of the ships that enter British waters would fall into that category? I am concerned that another Prestige is waiting to happen. It is only by the grace of God that such a disaster has not happened more often in our waters, with devastating effects.

Mr. Lee Scott (Ilford, North) (Con): This is a Bill of only a few pages, yet it has the potential to make a significant increase in the level of financial compensation available in the event of a large oil spillage from a ship. It will also allow the United Kingdom further to control emissions from ships.

Most of the goods and food imported or exported to and from Britain travels by sea. Britain is surrounded by major shipping routes and the English Channel is the world's second busiest international waterway. In the main, transporting goods by cargo ship is an environmentally friendly form of transportation. However, when it goes wrong, it can go spectacularly wrong.

The United Kingdom's miles of coastline are at high risk from spills from tankers, and three of the world's worst oil spill disasters have occurred in UK waters. We need only remember the Torrey Canyon off the Isles of Scilly in 1967, the Braer off Shetland in 1993, and, as we have heard, the Sea Empress off Milford Haven in 1996, to illustrate how damaging such an incident can be. Oil slicks do not respect maritime national boundaries, so it is only through co-ordinated international action that we can arrive at a successful solution to that type of pollution.

This Bill will bring the United Kingdom into line with international efforts to tackle the appalling effects of oil spillages. It will allow the UK to implement two important international treaties: the first greatly to improve the compensation for oil pollution and the second to take measures to reduce air pollution from ships.

Over the years, we have seen graphic television images of the effects of oil spills on the environment, on wildlife and on local people. Sadly, the effects can be very long term, and they can wipe out species in an area and destroy local livelihoods. Marine oil pollution can have devastating effects. The television pictures of disasters, such as the Exxon Valdez incident that took place in Prince William Sound, Alaska, in 1989, made us all too familiar with the dreadful images of polluted coastlines, oiled sea birds and mammals and the other damage caused to wildlife. The local coastal communities lost their fishing and tourism industries to this major oil spill. The sinking of the Prestige in 2002 saw the discharge of 63,000 tonnes of oil [illegible] fishermen, local hoteliers, restaurant owners and others along the Portuguese and north Spanish coast were all badly affected. In the Torrey Canyon incident off Land's End in 1967, it was quickly clear that the then existing arrangements for compensating those who suffered damage were woefully inadequate.

It has to be recognised that the recent figures from the International Tanker Owners Pollution Federation show that the number of oil spillages has reduced by around one-third since the 1970s. Large spills have reduced dramatically. Most spills from tankers result from routine operations such as loading, discharging and bunkering. These most often occur in oil terminals or ports, and most result in an oil discharge of less than 7 tonnes. Incidents in which the tanker collides with another ship or harbour facility or when it runs aground are what normally lead to the larger oil spills. Almost 20 per cent. of these result in spills where more than 700 tonnes of oil are lost.

The one third improvement in reducing oil spills is explained by the introduction of better crew training, improved terminal handling facilities, better technology and, most significantly, by the introduction of double-skinned hulls for tankers. Unfortunately, numbers of older singled-hulled vessels still operate, many under flags of convenience. Inspection shows that one in 12 of the foreign vessels inspected in the United Kingdom are unseaworthy and have to be detained. This is a disgrace. Elsewhere in Europe the situation is worse, with almost three quarters of ships inspected found to be suffering from severe deficiencies.

I am concerned that some countries have not yet announced plans and a timetable to sign up to the supplementary fund protocol. A number of these countries are flags-of-convenience carriers or open-register countries and have significant registered tonnage. Most are party to the old fund regime, but not to the new one. It would be common sense for those countries that join the new protocol to deny access to their waters and ports to ships from countries that do not sign up to the scheme by the deadline date. If this is not done, tanker operators from the countries signed up to the protocol will be working at a competitive disadvantage.

Given the greater risk of catastrophic oil spillage from a singled-hulled tanker, these should certainly be banned from entering European Union waters. There was discussion some time ago on this matter, and I would like to know from the Minister whether the Government would support such a ban.

The Bill also enables the UK to reduce air pollution from ships by implementing measures to control emissions. Ships are getting ever larger, as are their engines, and they produce a great deal of sulphur and nitrogen emissions. Some improvement can be made by reducing the sulphur and nitrogen content in marine fuel, but more innovative ideas are being tried by firms such as P&O. It has fitted a device to one of its Dover-Calais cross-channel ferries called an eco-silencer—a "scrubber", in effect. This is designed to cut sulphur emissions by 95 per cent. and nitrogen oxides by 80 per cent. I understand that many other companies are considering similar proposals.

A number of ports in the USA and Canada have introduced revised structures that allow ships in harbour to draw electrical power from shore. This has the great advantage that it enables the ship to turn off its engines in port while it loads or unloads, thereby reducing pollution in the port and the surrounding area.

There are two other areas of ship-produced pollution that I would like to discuss. The first is the improper disposal into the sea of rubbish and human waste. The second is the transportation of non-native species in the ballast water of a ship that is then disposed of at sea thousands of miles away. These exotic newcomers can then become a serious threat to native plants and animals. These issues are covered, as is oil pollution, by international laws, rules and agreements. However, in too many cases, the polluter is not prosecuted or even identified. I seek an assurance from Ministers that this is an issue that they will look at.

Like my colleagues, I fully support the Bill and welcome it.

2.35 pm

David T.C. Davies (Monmouth) (Con): I am grateful for the opportunity to speak and perhaps I should declare an interest. I worked for several years in a shipping company that is owned by my parents. I have no financial interest whatever in it at the moment. Perhaps I should also come clean and say that I suppose that it could be argued that, because of some of the things that I saw going on there, we have contributed directly in a very small way to pollution for reasons that I shall come to shortly.

The other side of the coin is that perhaps I have a unique perspective on the issue. At the time that I worked for the company, I would also leave at about 4 o'clock, travel down the coast and go surfing off the coast at Porthcawl. I would do that week in, week out for most of my 20s. On one occasion, we were ordered not to go into the water by the police because of a spillage that had taken place. I can therefore say that I have been both a contributor to, and victim of, maritime pollution.

There is a lot of good news and, in commending the Bill, it is worth picking up on the statistics that were mentioned earlier. I do not want to undermine anything said by my hon. Friends, who are quite correct about the problems that exist. However, there is a lot of good news and, in a spirit of consensus, we should pay tribute to this Government and previous Governments going all the way back to the 1960s. There has been a growing realisation of the importance of better standards of maritime cleanliness.

When one talks to people who have worked in the industry for years, they will speak about some of the bad practice that has gone on, but has now largely been stopped. I refer to the emptying out of tanks and bilges. That was absolutely commonplace a few years ago. It may still happen—I do not deny that—but much of it has been stopped because of the good work of organisations such as the International Maritime Organisation and the Maritime and Coastguard Agency. They are able to go on board ships to check logbooks and to ensure that ships docking at UK ports make use of the facilities that have been put in place to clean out tanks and bilges.

Collisions are now less of a risk because in busy sea lanes, such as the Dover straits, there are clear shipping lanes that ships must go up and down. They cannot just set their compass and go anywhere they want. As the Minister has said, there is now an ongoing programme to phase out single-hulled tankers and to bring in double-hulled ones. We have certainly come a very long way; there is a lot of good news.

I do not, however, think that we should be too complacent. Headline-grabbing disasters still take place and, as I saw in the office when I worked for the company, many smaller incidents of spillage and pollution happen regularly. We used to find that we were regularly told that containers coming into the UK for which we had responsibility had been washed off a ship as a result of bad weather. I said that we were responsible for a bit of pollution, but the containers for which we were responsible contained only tea. Presumably, that does not do a lot of damage. Nevertheless, many nasty things are carried around in containers, and it is not uncommon for them to be washed over the sides of ships. Perhaps the Minister will bear that point in mind and confirm that the fund, if it is ever needed, will also apply to such small-scale incidents that could turn out to be very expensive if the wrong types of goods are washed overboard.

There are two reasons for the problem. The first is bad weather, and I appreciate that there is not much that the Minister can do about freak weather conditions and tidal waves. We do not expect him to stand there like Moses with his staff, ordering the storms to calm down and the waves to part. However, I sometimes think that his leader thinks that he could probably do that.

One issue that the Minister could consider is training. The comments that have been made about levels of training, particularly on flagged vessels from certain countries, are very relevant. Tragically, within the past fortnight, a seaman was killed on a ship that was leaving the port of Newport where I used to work. I know something about that incident, but I will not say much while it is under investigation. Suffice it to say, however, that basic safety procedures were not being carried out at the time. The Minister must agree that the issue of training arises over and over again, and it is particularly pertinent to flagged vessels. I hope that he will look into that.

When ships come into UK ports, they must take on board a pilot for many of those ports unless the master can get the exemption licence. To do that, he would have to undergo some tests within the UK. I am told informally that many of the masters tested, from certain countries, are found to have such a poor sea knowledge that not only will they not qualify for the exemption, but had they taken the test in the United Kingdom they would never be allowed to be put in charge of a UK-flagged vessel. Clearly, training is a real issue in relation to some of the vessels coming in. I will not specify any country in that regard, because some of the countries mentioned today have taken steps to raise their standards. The Minister will be aware, however, that not all such countries have done so, and that overall training levels can be poor.

On air pollution, I echo the comments of those who pointed out that whatever problems are sometimes caused by ships, shipping is one of the greenest ways of moving goods from A to B. It is of great concern to me that, at the moment, much of the freight destined for the United Kingdom on ocean-going vessels goes straight into one of two ports, usually Felixstowe. Sometimes Felixstowe is skipped altogether and it goes into Rotterdam. From there, UK forwarding companies must arrange the delivery of vast numbers of containers to their final destination by lorry. I know that rail freight services are available, but without going into too much detail, they do not operate as efficiently as one would hope. Many movements take place by road, which results in additional expense for the consumer, the environment suffering and the roads getting clogged up.

Much greater use of the current facilities around the United Kingdom would be desirable, and it should be fairly easy for the Minister to do that. I will not stretch your patience, Mr. Deputy Speaker, by talking about the amendment that I tabled but that was not called. It would be completely wrong to do so. Suffice it to say that the Minister can do a lot to help the environment by ensuring that more of our goods are moved around by ship.

I recognise that there are problems, and that the Minister recognises that we do not live in a perfect world. Things sometimes go wrong, and that is what this Bill is all about—putting in place a mechanism for dealing with something that, we hope, will not take place. I wish the Bill God speed, and I hope that it sails through Parliament's legislative channels as easily as a supertanker through the straits of Dover.

2.43 pm

Stephen Hammond (Wimbledon) (Con): The Minister said in his opening remarks that the Bill was precise and targeted, and it is. Essentially, it provides the United Kingdom with protection and the best compensation in relation to pollution from oil, and reduces air pollution from ships. We support the UK getting protection from the supplementary fund protocol.

The Bill deals with our environment, and my right hon. Friend the Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron) reaffirmed recently in an excellent speech that the Conservative party has a long history and a bright future in environmental matters. That is certainly true today—it is 3-0 to the Opposition on environmental matters.

I look forward to the Minister's response to the three excellent points made in interventions by my right hon. Friend the Member for East Yorkshire (Mr. Knight). He asked for clarification of the definition of pollution in the Bill, and whether it would extend to non-fuel oil and oils that have formed a solid. Perhaps more importantly, he asked for confirmation that the Bill would not act retrospectively to prevent the usage of historical vessels in regattas. I am sure that the Minister will provide clarification in his winding-up speech.

I also want to return to the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier) in his opening remarks. What pressure might be applied to non-signatories of the supplementary fund protocol? While non-signatory country vessels might have insurance, they will not have enough insurance to deal with major spillages. We welcome the fact that the fund will pay out, but will the Minister explore what pressure might be exerted by the Government on non-signatories, who are nothing more than freeloaders, to sign up?

We have had an excellent debate. I did wonder whether my hon. Friend the Member for Scarborough and Whitby (Mr. Goodwill) started his speech injudiciously by saying that he got off on things like this. When I remembered that he was a Conservative, not a Liberal Democrat Member of Parliament, I knew that he would talk only about matters environmental and nothing more inappropriate. He brings his extensive experience in the European Parliament to the mother of Parliaments.

My hon. Friend raised some interesting questions. He referred to the high level of sulphur dioxide that is emitted from shipping in coastal areas around the UK, and welcomed the Government measures, as we do. He also referred to shipping in port, the need to fit seawater scrubbers, and the efficacy of those mechanisms. I trust that the Minister will have noted the distinction that he drew between the Pride of Kent and the Pride of Canterbury. Perhaps he will want to reflect on that when he replies to the debate. My hon. Friend also expressed his desire to see the renewal of the derogation for leisure craft. I know that he has written to the Minister about that, and the hon. Gentleman might wish to comment on that in his reply to the debate.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ilford, North (Mr. Scott) reminded us all of the potential threat to the UK coastline and of the need for coherent and co-ordinated international action against pollution to stop the damage to wildlife and local industry. He pointed out that despite many improvements in safety measures, one in 12 vessels inspected in the UK is unseaworthy, and most of them appear to be from non-signatories of the supplementary fund protocol. Again, he asked whether the Government should take some action in that respect or ban non-signatories from sovereign waters or ports. I look forward to the Minister's comment on that.

My hon. Friend the Member for Monmouth (David T.C. Davies), who is another of the excellent 2005 club additions to the Opposition Benches, made a contribution based on his considerable experience of the shipping industry. He pointed out that, over many years, several improvements have been secured under Governments of both hues. He stressed that that was not grounds for complacency, and spoke about the importance of safety measures on some vessels and the need for better training. He also stressed both that shipping was the green way of moving most goods and the environmental importance of that. To digress slightly, the Government have not addressed the issue of a northern rail link for freight through the midlands to Felixstowe. Such a link would continue the green trend, but freight continues to be moved by road rather than rail.

The debate has been short but excellent—it has been one of quality not quantity. I confirm that the Opposition support the Bill. We are prepared to do all that we can to ensure that it moves expeditiously through the House.

2.50 pm

Dr. Ladyman: I beg leave of the House to reply.

This has been an enjoyable debate. I am delighted, for the first time, to cross swords with some of the new Conservative Members, who made knowledgeable and authoritative speeches. Given that they all seem to be so knowledgeable and authoritative, I hope that none of them is available for consideration of the Bill in Committee, to guarantee that I have an easy time. I suspect that they have cooked their goose and they are on the list of Members who will be on the Committee, whether they like it or not.

Before I go into some of the detailed questions specifically, I should like to respond to the comment made by the hon. Member for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier) about the instruction that, rightly, Mr. Speaker has ruled out of order. Effectively, it would have allowed the Harbours Bill, a private Member's Bill that is currently being guided through the House by my hon. Friend the Member for Dover (Gwyn Prosser), to be included within the scope of the Bill. I believe that Mr. Speaker was right to rule that that would not have been an appropriate mechanism for inclusion. However, the Government offer full support to the Harbours Bill and we are keen to see it make progress. If there is any way that we can facilitate its progress by working with the Opposition, I will be keen to explore it.

Mr. Brazier: We are perplexed. Why could not the Government have made time for it today? We are to finish at around 3 o'clock.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): Order. We should stick to the winding-up speech on the Bill that is before the House.

Dr. Ladyman: I shall address some of the specific issues that were raised by various Members. I agree with the hon. Member for Monmouth (David T.C. Davies) about the training of ships' officers and the need for high international standards of training and competence. That important requirement bears directly on the threat to our coastline. We try to work within the International Maritime Organisation to raise the standards of shipping generally. Indeed, one of the things that we must do to raise standards and to reduce the threat of pollution to our coastline is to show leadership within that organisation. That goes back to the issue raised by the hon. Member for Canterbury and by other hon. Members. To prevent pollution, we are showing such leadership in a number of areas. For example, within the IMO, we have started to move forward on the introduction of e-navigation. We are trying to create an international standard whereby all ships on the high seas will work with electronic navigation systems to the same standard. Those systems will work together and allow ships to be recognised from the shore and to recognise one another while at sea, to avoid collisions and groundings. There is a great deal of support for that work within the IMO, and I hope that we can reach agreement on a standard for e-navigation.

We have also shown strong leadership within the IMO's flag state audit scheme under which a flag state agrees to have the quality of its fleet audited. I am proud to say that we were the first state to support the scheme and to commit the UK fleet to being audited. Also, we were the first state to promise that, once that audit is complete and we are ready to respond to it, we will make it public. That demonstrates our strong leadership in raising standards. A number of other states have responded to our lead by saying that not only will they have their fleets audited, but they will consider making the audits public. By adopting such a positive approach, we are doing what we can to raise international standards.

Mr. Brazier: The Minister has been generous in giving way. We welcome what he has just said, but he still has not addressed the issue of freeloaders in that context and that of the new protocol. What are we doing about Liberia, Panama and other such countries?

Dr. Ladyman: Short of invading them, all we can do is engage with them diplomatically. I encourage Opposition Members to be realistic about what I can and cannot do. All I can do is to engage with these countries, to speak to their Ministers and to raise these issues with them—and I do. We show leadership through the IMO and use international agreements to drag up standards generally. In the world of shipping, we cannot make unilateral decisions that put our industry at a commercial disadvantage to the rest of the world. The best way to progress is through international agreements, and that is what we are trying to reach. We will continue to do the best that we can to get those countries to engage.

We should not assume automatically that because those flag states are just that, flag states, they are not alive to some of the issues with which we are dealing. Some of them are considering closely the idea of being part of the audit scheme. We are helping them to make that decision. Other states, although they may be very small places, operate to high standards under their flags and work with other major nations to ensure that their flag fleet is properly inspected.

The hon. Member for Ilford, North (Mr. Scott) asked whether I would agree to a proposal under which we would deny entry into UK ports to vessels that are flagged in states that are not party to the supplementary fund protocol. I suppose that that echoes the issue raised by the hon. Member for Canterbury. I do not think that such action is necessary. It does not matter if a vessel is flagged in a state that is not party to the supplementary fund protocol because that vessel must have insurance to cover the shipowner's liability. That is a requirement for entry into a UK port. In addition, we benefit from membership of the protocol because we are the ones who will get the money from it should that be necessary.

I was asked by the hon. Member for Scarborough and Whitby (Mr. Goodwill) whether we were considering other issues such as ships at berth using mains electricity or cold ironing, as it is known. I have not received any representations on that, but it is being considered by the UK and other states in the context of sustainable shipping. I will continue to keep an eye on it.

During the debate, my hon. Friend the Member for Glenrothes (Mr. MacDougall) asked about estuarine damage to the Firth of Forth, and other hon. Members asked about the possibility of compensation should there be damage to estuaries. I replied that I was confident that the various funds available would cover us. I can now confirm that that is the case. Money can be paid from the supplementary fund if the damage is caused as a result of a sea-going vessel being involved in an incident.

The hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Tom Brake) asked about the total size of the fund and why we have negotiated a pot that is less than the damage from the Prestige is estimated to cost. That is an unfortunate side effect of the fact that it takes so long to agree such an international convention. When we set out to get states to be a party to the convention, the US$1 billion mark was far more than we thought would be necessary. Subsequently we found that even that was too little, but that is the sum available. After we get all the parties signed up, we need to address that issue.

I do not want to mislead the hon. Gentleman. He noted in his comments that the level of funding seems to have changed by a few million pounds since the debate in the other place. [Interruption.] That, as the hon. Member for Canterbury says from a sedentary position, is down to exchange rates. The amount of money available in the supplementary fund is intended to be 750 million of a unit used by the International Monetary Fund to reflect the average value of currencies across the world. It more or less works out to US$1 billion, but according to how the various currencies move, from time to time it will be 600 million, 602 million or 612 million. The figures that I quoted in my speech are based on the level of the exchange rates on 1 January this year, which are the latest figures available.

I was asked by the hon. Member for Canterbury about the EC directive that criminalises seafarers for accidental pollution. I share his concerns about that.

We are wofking with EU colleagues on how that should be addressed. He also asked what we are doing to expand the UK shipping industry. He rightly gave credit to the Government for the increase in the size of the British fleet as a result of the tonnage tax. I remind him that the training commitment that comes with the tonnage tax means that in 2005 and 2006 there are 1,300 UK trainees in cadet ships, so there are many benefits from the tax. I will shortly make an announcement about how I intend to move forward on issues related to the tax to continue to encourage the UK fleet to expand.

The right hon. Member for East Yorkshire (Mr. Knight) asked me about historic vessels. I am not sure that I will be able to convince him 100 per cent. today, but I undertake to look into the matter further for him. There is no specific exemption for historic vessels, but our view is that they will probably not be affected by the MARPOL convention because they do not use the sort of fuels and engines that generate such pollutants. However, I expect the right hon. Gentleman is not entirely satisfied with that answer, so I shall write to him or, if he serves on the Standing Committee, we can discuss it there.

A number of other issues were raised with me by various Members. The hon. Members for Kettering (Mr. Hollobone) and for Canterbury spoke about other measures we might take to reduce the threat of pollution. The hon. Member for Kettering asked me why we did not include in the Bill measures to replace single hull vessels with double skin vessels. We do not need to do so because the Merchant Shipping (Prevention of Oil Pollution) (Amendment) Regulations 2005 already implement that change. The IMO is engaged on various measures to improve standards, including the issue of ballast water. A ballast water convention was agreed at the IMO in 2004.

Mr. Greg Knight: I hope the Minister will pursue the matter of historic vessels and if necessary raise it in the appropriate international meeting. I am sure that other nations would not want to affect them unintentionally. Will he please answer my second question about the scope of the definition of a polluting oil?

Dr. Ladyman: Yes, I can answer that. The Bill deals only with hydrocarbon-based fuel oils, so olive oil would not be included in the measure. However, negotiations are taking place on that type of cargo to put in place measures to deal with it. I can clarify that further for the right hon. Gentleman in writing. I assure him that I will look into the historic vessels issue. Clearly, it is more complicated than I suggested it might be in my opening speech. If historic vessels are not affected, fine, but it might be difficult to negotiate an exemption for historic vessels without creating a loophole that would allow other ships to sail through it.

Several hon. Members mentioned the experiment that P&O is conducting on vessels sailing out of Dover, which is an excellent initiative. However, if the company did not retrospectively have to address the regulations, would it be doing that? It is important that we do not rule out retrospection. We need to find a way that will allow historic vessels to sail when necessary without creating a loophole. I will write to the right hon. Gentleman about this.

The provisions of the Bill relating to oil pollution compensation will greatly improve the protection that we can give to those who suffer the consequences of tanker disasters. The experience of dealing with the effects of tanker incidents on our shores has ensured that the UK is an attentive and active participant at meetings of the International Maritime Organisation and the International Oil Pollution Compensation Fund. Through the work conducted by its technical committees, the IMO provides the framework of international standards that apply globally to maritime activities.

Working collaboratively with our maritime industry partners, we will continue to create the conditions needed to provide, in the words of Lord Donaldson, safer ships and cleaner seas. Our goal should be to encourage the highest technical and human standards in the transport of oil by sea, so as to prevent shipping incidents from happening in the first place, and to prevent the operation of substandard shipping. Whatever mechanisms are put in place, and no matter how safe modern ships and navigation systems have become, we must accept that the sea can be an unpredictable and dangerous environment, and that, by force of nature, accidents will occur from time to time, some regrettably affecting our seas and coastlines. When they do so, we must ensure that the communities, businesses and those engaged in clean-up operations are not subjected to needless difficulties when recovering their legitimate costs. The Government are determined to ensure that we provide our citizens and our coastal environment with the best legal and financial protection available.

It is also important that the UK implement annexe VI of the MARPOL convention, which the UK played a key role in negotiating at the IMO. Major oil spills are a rare occurrence, but atmospheric emissions from ships are constant. The new international standards and requirements are important because they will help to reduce air pollution from ships trading worldwide.

The UK coast is interspersed with both large and small ports. The large ports are mainly concerned with international trading ships such as container ships, tankers, bulk carriers and cruise ships. The smaller ports deal with passenger and cargo ferries and fishing vessels, and are predominantly used by domestic trading ships, although some have international trade routes to the continent. This results in many ship movements every day. Clearly, if those ships were required to make fewer polluting exhaust emissions through the use of cleaner fuels or improved technology, the air quality around UK sea ports, and hence around the UK coastline, would be improved.

For those reasons, the measures in the Bill relating to the MARPOL convention are essential. There is a vital need to provide proper compensation to our citizens in the event of oil pollution and to ensure that we are adequately covered in that regard. I look forward to engaging with hon. Members on these matters in Committee, and to working together to get the Bill on to the statute book so that our citizens can be protected as quickly as possible. I commend the Bill to the House.

PETITIONS

Children's Hospices

3.9 pm

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): It is with a mixture of joy and humility that I rise to present this petition calling for much-needed improvement in the funding of children's hospices. The people of the United Kingdom are deeply concerned that the hospices caring for the country's sickest children get, on average, just 5 per cent., with some getting only a miserly 2 per cent., of their budget from the authorities while adult hospices get about 30 per cent. Even that is extremely low.

I have campaigned for 15 years for fair funding for children's hospices, with the support of Members of Parliament on both sides of the House. I pay tribute in particular to the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South (Mr. Flello), who is doing great work on this, along with others.

I hope that we are, at last, on track to success, greatly helped by the massive and timely hospice petition organised by The Sun and its online reporter, Dave Masters. It has been signed by more than 220,000 caring and thoughtful people. Presenting such a massive petition to the House would give me great difficulty, so we shall shortly present it in bulk at No. 10 Downing street to the Prime Minister, direct. Meanwhile, I present this proxy petition. It represents that of The Sun newspaper, which teamed up with Somerfield and Kwik Save supermarkets to collect the signatures. I pay tribute to those three excellent organisations and all petitioners.

The petition states:

To the House of Commons,

The Petition of residents of Essex and others,

Declares that there is a scandalous lack of proper funding for children's hospices which care for the most poorly kids, which means many are forced to rely on charitable and public donations.

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons call upon the Government to drastically improve funding for children's hospices and further urge the Government to do all within its power to ensure that children's hospices are, at the very least, funded at the thirty per cent. level awarded to adult hospices.

And the Petitioners remain, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Essex Police Force (Mergers)

3.11 pm

Bob Spink: I have a second petition to present, although I shall be briefer this time as I have presented another petition in similar terms. The petition rails against the merger of police forces and relates in particular to Essex police force.

The petition states:

To the House of Commons,

The Petition of residents of Essex,

Declares that they wish to support option four of a stand alone strategic police force for Essex and they object to Government plans to merge police forces which would lead to unacceptable centralisation with the possibility of political control and higher costs, and with less local control and accountability of the police; and they welcome the cross-Party actions of Essex MPs to save Essex Police Force.

The Petitioners therefore request the House of Commons to call upon the Government to withdraw its dangerous and politically motivated policy of merging police forces and retain Essex Police Force in its current format.

The Petitioners remain, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Fire Service (Northumberland)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Coaker.]

3.12 pm

Mr. Ronnie Campbell (Blyth Valley) (Lab): I never thought that I would be staring at four hours of debate on fire services in south-east Northumberland. This is obviously a narrow subject, but I am sure that some Members will try to get in to speak in any case.

I have raised this issue before on the Floor of the House, in a debate on the fire and rescue service initiated by the Opposition. The question involves south-east Northumberland and the loss of four fire stations. I have a picture of them here, and some are fairly new. The one in Cramlington was built only nine years ago, while the one in Blyth was built just as I was elected, nearly 18 years ago. I remember it well. The other two are a bit older—25 and, I think, 26 years old.

These fire stations are in the townships of Morpeth, which has a population of 20,000; Ashington, which has a population of 30-odd thousand; Blyth, which has a population of 30,000; and Cramlington, which has a population of about 25,000. The Bain report on fire services says that the fire stations should remain at the crux of the townships, but in south-east Northumberland we have a chief fire officer who wants to change that all around. He wants to close these stations. I believe that he wants to demolish two of them, most probably to sell off the sites for housing. That will rake a bit of money in, I suppose.

The chief officer wants to build two new super-fire stations, as they are called, but at what cost? Who knows? It will be a private finance initiative project. The PFI does not affect anyone now, but it will affect a good many people in the future. Obviously someone will build the fire stations—most probably a firm called Jarvis, which I believe is building fire stations elsewhere. We do not know what the costs or the rents will be. The existing four fire stations are perfectly adequate. Even the Fire Brigades Union says that it is quite satisfied with their condition. Indeed, money has just been spent on them: I believe that about £70,000 was spent on new showers and lockers in two of them for the female fire brigade staff who are coming on board.

There is a lot of money at stake. We talk of value for money, but where is the value here? There are four perfectly good fire stations in the townships, with staff doing their job. They can go anywhere. They can deal with road accidents and fires. I shall say more about that later. Yet the council is taking the PFI route. I do not know how much it costs to build a fire station, or a super-fire station, as the new stations are called, but I know one thing: not one of the proposed new stations is to be built in any of the four townships in south-east Northumberland. They will all be on the outskirts. The one in my area will be on an industrial estate in East Hartford.

Why is this happening? I do not know, but I have tried to find out. It seems to be the brainchild of the chief officer, but I have talked to county councillors who will have to pass the proposal, and they seem to think it is a good idea. However, in Blyth, Ashington and other areas a petition has been circulating for several months, signed by some 25,000 people who do not want their local fire station to close. That is a large number of signatures—I may even present the petition here—but as the decision has not been made yet, I hope that the petition is gathering pace. There may eventually be 27,000 or 28,000 signatures.

The county council organised a survey. It sent a questionnaire to every house to ask for people's opinions. When the response arrived, lo and behold, it was against the council. Most people said that they wanted the fire stations to remain in the townships. The council got cracking: it moved one of the PFI fire stations and then launched another consultation. I think that it hoped it would receive the response that it wanted on this occasion. It is the same with referendums: those who keep organising referendums will win eventually. I think that that is what the county council is trying to do.

Members can imagine what my meeting with the county councillors was like. They appeared to favour the proposal, whereas I totally oppose it, as do other people whom I meet and talk to regularly in my town. I had the strong impression that the councillors were telling me, "We are not to blame. The Government are telling us to get rid of the existing fire stations, to go down the PFI road and to build these smart, brand-new stations." I asked "Has the Minister been on the phone to you? Has he talked to you about the plan?" They said "Not really, but we have been told to use resources more lucratively." That means closing the four fire stations and building two new ones through the PFI.

Northumberland county council has had to raise its council tax enormously over the past few years. It has not yet proved that the PFI route will save money, although I have asked the question. I should like to see proof. It has had those fire stations for years. I do not whether any of them are paid off. As I said, the Fire Brigades Union is satisfied with the facilities, so why go down the road of the PFI and cause more disruption in raising council tax in Northumberland? The Chancellor may want to look at that. He has gone mad to save money. He has to save it. He is looking at an empty box at the minute, so it would be interesting to know whether that was costed by the Minister. He may be able to tell me whether it has been costed and whether it is cheaper to demolish some pretty new fire stations and build two new PFI stations.

I come to where the fire stations are situated. A tragedy happened a few weeks ago in Blyth town centre, not far from where I live. We have a lot of terraced houses in Blyth. One caught fire. Three people were in the fire. At the time, the two fire appliances at Blyth were on another call at a fire at a factory, so the fire appliance from Cramlington had to come down and cover for Blyth. That was well planned. The bell went. The message was sent that there was a big fire in a house in the centre of Blyth. The Cramlington appliance, which was situated at Blyth station, was there within three minutes.

Firemen pulled three people from the top part of the smoke-filled house. They brought them out. One was unconscious, another was semi-conscious. Unfortunately, the other, an older man, died on the way to hospital of a heart attack. Under fire brigade and Government statistics, he is not a casualty because you have to be burnt to death, or in hospital more than 24 hours, to be classed as a casualty.

Mr. Denis Murphy (Wansbeck) (Lab): My hon. Friend gave an excellent example of how it is vital to have fire stations close to the centres of population. Does he agree that that was no ordinary house? It was a series of flats that had recently been inspected. It had fire doors and hard-wired smoke alarms. Everything that could have been fitted was fitted. The firemen who attended the fire said that, if they had arrived two minutes later, there would have been three fatalities. Does he agree that it is important to retain fire stations close to the centres of population?

Mr. Campbell: I thank my hon. Friend for that intervention. Obviously he, too, has been briefed by firemen in my area, as I was going to come to that point. There was all that fire apparatus in that house. I thank him for making that point for me. There could have been more deaths. That is the sad fact.

We have the figure that 80 per cent. of people who are in fires are dead before the appliance gets there. That magic figures has come from somewhere. Whether it has come from the Minister, I do not know, but 80 per cent. are dead before the appliance gets there. What about the other 20 per cent?

What are people saying? Are they writing 20 per cent. off? That is basically what they are saying. The Minister should take a cool look at the idea that we are getting into our head: people are dead, so why bother? Why bother about house fires? We are more interested in someone stuck on the motorway or jammed in a car following a car accident than we are in fires. I know that fires have decreased and we should do a lot more but, as my hon. Friend said, that house had been inspected and had all the gear: fire alarms, smoke alarms and everything were fitted. It still did not stop that fire or those people being trapped in it.

Another fire occurred a week later, just up the road from the first, on an estate called North Farm. A lady was trapped in her house, but because the fire station is at the bottom of the road, a fire engine was there in less than a minute. She was unconscious and had to be taken to hospital to be revived. Fires remain a danger, yet fire appliances are being taken away from the townships where they are needed—appliances that were put there to deal with such fires. Of course, if the Minister intends to stick to the principle behind the 80 per cent. figure, we will be writing off the other 20 per cent. If the fire engine that dealt with the fires in Bondicar terrace and North Farm had had to come from the posh new PFI fire station, it would have taken eight to nine minutes to get there.

That is the situation in a nutshell: people will die. This is a matter of life and death, yet Northumberland county council is running headlong into this issue. The fire chief says that the engines will get to the fires, but they will have to use rocket fuel. These days, getting through Blyth is very difficult. The roads are clogged—in fact, it is pandemonium. There are only two entrances into Blyth and at certain times of day, it is impossible to get through. That is a big worry. If the rail link that we have been arguing for for many years is established, problems will arise when the train barriers come down on the two roads.

We can do something to deal with these problems—there can be a plan. We can retain the existing four fire stations in the townships, which is what the people want. Of course, we can never be sure whether new Labour will go along with the people. It sometimes ignores them, but it does so at its peril. I am not ignoring my people—I am listening to them very carefully. A lot of council tax payers' money has been spent on modernising the four existing stations, which are in good shape. We could build a new station at the big training facility, and we could get PFI funding. As the fire union said to me, Blyth could transfer one of its appliances to the new fire station. We have two appliances but we only really need one—Cramlington could cover us and we could cover them. So far as I am concerned, the new station can be located anywhere in south-east Northumberland, and it can have the desired modern facilities. But we could also retain our existing township stations, which are important to the people who live in the area.

I realise that the Minister cannot tell the county council what to do—no one can—but I ask him to examine the feasibility of retaining the four existing fire stations alongside the big, PFI-financed station. I should also point out that a local business man is prepared to provide financial backing for the new fire station. That might be worth exploring, because after all, that is all PFI is: someone lending money to help build something. Of course, it is then their project, and they can do what they like with it. This man, whom I know very well—he lives in Blyth, so he must have a lot of money—is prepared to back the scheme. I hope that the Minister will consider that idea, because it is no good talking to the fire chief. His head is buried in the sand: he wants two super-fire stations, by hook or by crook. He is making a bad mistake. This is a matter of life and death for the people of Blyth Valley.

3.30 pm

Mr. Denis Murphy (Wansbeck) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Blyth Valley (Mr. Campbell) on securing this debate. When Northumberland's fire chief, Mr. Hesler, first proposed the changes to the fire and rescue cover, his department had spent about two years working up the proposals. All aspects of the current service were examined in great detail to ensure that, as he said,

"the people of Northumberland would have the very best fire and rescue cover coupled with a massive drive on fire prevention."

To that end, the proposals contained details of two new-build fire stations combining an academy and community facilities. The stations would be situated where they would provide the quickest response to the most vulnerable parts of Wansbeck and Blyth Valley. The fire chief said that the locations were crucial to providing good cover for the whole of south-east Northumberland.

I met Mr. Hesler and he took me through the project's details. He assured me that his was the very best possible model for delivering a much improved service. I was disappointed that he and his management team had not worked closely with firefighters in drawing up the new structure. In fact, from discussions that I had with firefighters, it became obvious that I had more information than the Fire Brigades Union. I was surprised that an organisation undergoing such a major restructuring did not feel it worth while to involve in their discussions the very people who are responsible for delivering the service.

During the public consultation process, a problem arose in obtaining planning permission for the new fire station at East Sleekburn, as it was to be located in the centre of the village. The planning authority offered two other sites: the first to the west of the spine road on Brock lane and the second to the east of the spine road by the East Sleekburn bypass—in effect, just across the road from the original site. Both sites would have offered a much larger and more open space for the new community fire station. More importantly, they were in line with the original model.

For reasons that my hon. Friend the Member for Blyth Valley alluded to but which have never been clear, the fire authority rejected the offered sites and proposed instead to relocate the new station to West Hartford, five miles away. It had taken two years to complete the model for public consumption. It was the best available, but within 48 hours it had been changed dramatically.

If the latest proposals are accepted, the people that my hon. Friend the Member for Blyth Valley and I represent will be subjected to much greater fire-response times. I understand that the brigade's target is to get two pumps to a domestic house fire within 10 minutes. The available statistics make it easy to work out the highest-risk areas, and to make plans about where to target fire prevention and where fire stations should be sited to ensure the quickest response. I am informed that the new structure will cost more than £10 million. That money would be well spent if it improved fire cover and fire prevention. However, serious questions are being asked about the proposals.

Comparing the blue-light response times in the current and the new proposals shows that, taking geographical information into account, the run times from East Sleekburn would be better than the existing times in three out of four cases. However, the proposed change of location to West Hartford would lead to slower response times. For example, it would take more than six minutes longer to travel from West Hartford to Asda Ashington. Starker differences in response times are evident if we compare the East Sleekburn and West Hartford proposals. For example, the response time for the journey between West Hartford and Cambois is slower by almost five minutes. The average run time from West Hartford to Ashington is more than 10 minutes, so the implications for the journey to Newbiggin cause great concern.

It is acknowledged that the initial response for Wansbeck will come from the nearest fire station, but problems will arise when only one appliance is available, and the second appliance has to be despatched from the alternative station. A much greater proportion of Wansbeck and other areas would be at risk if the new fire station were located at West Hartford. The area north of Stakeford and south of Bedlington would be at increased risk if a second appliance had to be despatched from the other station.

Additionally, there are discrepancies between the table of run times and the geographical information supplied by the fire service. A run time from West Hartford to Woodhorn roundabout is shown as 8.2 minutes. However, the 10-minute run time boundary for West Hartford stops just north of Stakeford, which is some five miles away. Similarly, the average run time from the existing station at Ashington to Woodhorn is 5 minutes and 51 seconds, but the run time from the new station at Pegswood, which is a mile further away, is given as 5 minutes and 44 seconds.

The area to be covered by the new fire stations will be much larger and the fire crews could be anywhere in that area at any given time. It is essential, therefore, to have times from one side of the area to the other, using real addresses. A timed run is exactly that. The chief fire officer has not included the time from when a 999 call is answered to the pumps being deployed and the time it takes the fire crew to arrive at the address of the incident. In a real situation, it would obviously take longer than the quoted response times.

As my hon. Friend said, we currently have four stations covering both constituencies, providing excellent response times. For a fraction of the cost of the new structure, the existing facilities could be improved to provide a training academy and community facilities. The headquarters at Morpeth were recently refurbished at substantial cost to provide modern accommodation. There was extensive rewiring for the provision of IT facilities, and new carpets and redecoration, providing first class office accommodation. The fire station at Morpeth is also in good order and includes facilities for female staff.

The Ashington station has also received substantial investment to provide new female facilities. It has also been rewired. The Blyth station is less than 20 years old and has recently had an £80,000 extension to provide female facilities. The station is in very good order and situated in the heart of Blyth. The Cramlington station is only nine years old and understandably is state of the art. When the land was provided for the station, there was a covenant demanding its restoration to wetland in the event of the building becoming redundant. This station is not part of the new proposals, and it would be a huge waste of public money for the new facility to be demolished. It would be possible to site the academy and the garage at any existing site in south-east Northumberland, enabling the CCBRN—conventional, chemical, biological, radiological and nuclear—unit to be situated along with one pump, enabling two crews to be available for community safety.

I am confident that with a small investment we could improve the existing excellent facilities, providing a new academy with first class community facilities, which would give the response times that would protect the public and roll out the fire prevention programme. I urge my hon. Friend the Minister to question closely the new proposals from the chief fire officer as they leave important and dangerous gaps in fire cover for south-east Northumberland.

Several hon. Members rose—

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): Order. I remind hon. Members that although on this occasion we have more than the usual time for an Adjournment debate, this subject has a narrow geographic focus.

3.38 pm

Mr. Peter Atkinson (Hexham) (Con): I shall take the chance that I can stay in order in this debate on the perhaps slightly tenuous ground that I represent a constituency in another part of Northumberland. However, fire appliances from Morpeth have been called to the eastern side of my constituency, so I have a peripheral interest that I hope will keep me in order.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Blyth Valley (Mr. Campbell)—I call him my hon. Friend because he used to be my pair in the days when we had such things—on introducing a debate on this issue of wide public concern in the county of Northumberland. I also echo the point that the hon. Member for Wansbeck (Mr. Murphy) made about that public concern. If changes are to be made to the fire service, it is essential that the public are carried along with them, but that has clearly not happened. Many people in south-east Northumberland are worried about the proposals, as are my constituents who might be affected.

Interestingly, a few years ago, the fire station in Hexham—it is not in south-east Northumberland, but is part of the Northumberland fire and rescue service—was reorganised. It was changed from a 24-hour manned station to a daytime-only manned station. The point was made that it was important that the fire station should remain in the centre of Hexham, which, despite the changes, was precisely where it went. As there was a problem serving one part of the town, a secondary unmanned fire station was built to allow a pump to be maintained there so that time constraints could be met. That station has closed for various reasons, but a few years ago the fire service was absolutely certain that it needed a fire station in the town centre.

I would like to make only one other point. The hon. Member for Blyth Valley said that he could not understand why the change was needed and the money had to be spent. I do not know whether the Minister can answer that good question, but I will be interested to hear his remarks. I suspect that there is a different agenda. It is in the back of people's minds that the fire service might be regionalised.

Mr. Ronnie Campbell: I missed that point, but the hon. Gentleman is right. There is a question of regionalisation and, at the end of the day, a question of privatisation.

Mr. Atkinson: I am not sure that I would go quite as far as that, so I will stick to regionalisation at the moment. Every other emergency service has gone that way. Even now it is proposed that Northumbria police will become even bigger through its amalgamation with the police forces of Durham and Cleveland. I cannot believe that the regionalisation agenda will not be extended to include the fire service in time. People have long said that there is no logic in having an independent fire service in Northumberland and that it should certainly amalgamate with Tyne and Wear—who knows what would happen from then on?

A person who was thinking of going for a regional service might find that the proposals and the places in which the new fire stations may be built would make absolute sense, because a much wider area would be covered that than covered by the existing four stations. I suspect that the regionalisation of our Northumberland fire services will occur, which I would oppose because I think that local services are best dealt with locally. If the Northumberland fire and rescue service needs extra equipment or specialist pieces of equipment, it has a long-standing arrangement to use the Tyne and Wear fire and rescue service's equipment. The arrangement works extremely well, and I would hate regionalisation to be extended to our fire services.

3.42 pm

John McDonnell (Hayes and Harlington) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Blyth Valley (Mr. Campbell) on securing the debate. I also congratulate him and my hon. Friend the Member for Wansbeck (Mr. Murphy) on their excellent speeches. I declare a registrable interest as the secretary of the Fire Brigades Union parliamentary group, in which capacity I wish to speak.

The decision in Northumberland has national significance. It was based on the new approach introduced by the Government, which moved away from national minimum standards towards a system of integrated risk management planning. That has enabled the fire authority and fire chief to reach a decision that has not been supported by local Members, the local population, or the FBU.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Wansbeck said, there has been hardly any consultation with the union. I am as sceptical as my hon. Friend the Member for Blyth Valley about the consultation with the general public. I have decided to speak in the debate because this is the test case for the new system to determine whether the Minister has the power to intervene so that he can at least undertake a reconsideration of decisions that have been taken to date, if not override the local decisions, which we believe may be wrong. It is quite clear from the evidence presented by my hon. Friends that serious risks could be caused by the decision to invest significantly in establishing stations that might well be white elephants and certainly will not perform effectively and with public support in the same way as the existing stations.

In the comprehensive assessments on fire authorities, Northumberland has come out not as "good" or "excellent", but simply as "fair". One key element in that document is the importance of communicating with the general public and consulting on such matters. In my view, Northumberland has not been assessed as "excellent" or "good" because it has fallen down badly in terms not only of its relationship with the union and its members, but of its communication with the general public.

The specific case, in a narrowly drawn debate, throws up a national issue. Has the Minister the powers to intervene now that we no longer have minimum standards? What is the role of the Government when a decision is made which we believe is not only inappropriate but possibly dangerous? What powers are still available to him and how will he exercise them? More importantly, will he bring to the House a report on how he will intervene? If he cannot intervene, can we consider the system again, re-examine the integrated risk-management plans and go back to the establishment of minimum standards, which served the country well and ensured the safety of the general public?

I would also welcome the Minister's comments on the fire authority's lack of consultation with the trade union and the general public, and how he will address those matters, if only to issue guidance to the authority to improve its performance.

3.46 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister (Jim Fitzpatrick): My hon. Friend the Member for Blyth Valley (Mr. Campbell) has raised this subject with me in the Lobby for some weeks, so I am pleased that he has been successful in securing time to raise it on the Floor of the House.

Mr. Ronnie Campbell: I did not call the Minister a murderer this time.

Jim Fitzpatrick: My hon. Friend puts that on the record before I have had a chance to do other than congratulate him on securing the debate.

We heard interesting contributions on the fire and rescue service in south-east Northumberland. Its overriding objective is to save lives. That has not changed since I was a firefighter and a Fire Brigades Union official. The Government have set out ambitious targets to drive down accidental fire deaths.

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): The Minister mentions targets. Is not it true that the Government abolished minimum response times?

Jim Fitzpatrick: The hon. Gentleman is correct and my hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington (John McDonnell) referred to that. As a result of the Fire and Rescue Services Act 2004, we have delegated responsibility for integrated risk-management planning, the determination of the siting of fire stations, the deployment of fire appliances, and the employment of crews and equipment to local chief fire officers and to fire and rescue authorities locally. There are no set national prescribed attendance times in the sense of those outlined in the Fire Services Act 1947. However, we have established public service agreement targets, the first of which is to reduce the number of accidental fire-related deaths in the home by 20 per cent. and to achieve a 10 per cent. reduction in deliberate fires by 31 March 2010.

John McDonnell: My hon. Friend the Member for Blyth Valley raised the contentious issue of the use of a PFI scheme to develop the new facilities. Has the decision making on the mechanism for use of the PFI or mainstream funding also been delegated to individual fire authorities, or is that determined by the Treasury and Government policy?

Jim Fitzpatrick: The Treasury and Government policy facilitate the use of the PFI as a mechanism for procuring and constructing assets. It is a matter for local authorities how they use the resources that are devolved to them. This is the second time that my hon. Friend and I have debated fire issues. Having started in Committee Room 10 at 9.30 this morning, I am pleased to see him back in his place and continuing to demonstrate his interest as secretary of the Fire Brigades Union parliamentary group.

We also have a floor target: by 2010, no local fire and rescue authority should have a fatality rate from accidental fires in the home higher than 1.25 times the national average. We have set performance targets for the level of protection that the public should anticipate receiving from their local fire and rescue service, but through the local consultative programme we have greatly devolved and delegated responsibility for how that is accomplished to the authorities and the chief fire officers.

The Government have put in place the framework to achieve those targets, and we believe that it is working. Our latest figures show that there was a 16 per cent. fall in the number of accidental dwelling fires between 2003–04 and 2004–05, a major achievement for the service that we must now make sure is sustained. We have put in place the framework to make the achievement of our PSA targets possible.

The 2004 Act has put prevention at the heart of the Government's agenda for improving the fire and rescue service by creating a new duty to promote fire safety. As we were discussing this morning in Committee Room 10, that is unfinished business going back to the '60s and the '70s. A number of major inquiries, including a royal commission, have said that the fire and rescue service was providing an excellent emergency response but ought to be addressing fire prevention much more in its culture. It was not until the introduction of the 2004 Act that we had the drive to accomplish that, notwithstanding the good fire prevention work that the service has been providing over recent decades. This is taking that work on to a completely different plane. It is a vital part of the work of the fire and rescue service. It is only through fire prevention that we can ensure that the risk to property and to lives is reduced.

Northumberland fire and rescue authority introduced a focus on community safety education and prevention in 2001, and it is now reaping the benefits of that approach. It achieved zero fire deaths in the home in 2004–05 and a 30 per cent. reduction in the number of deliberate fires in 2003–04, a record of which it can be proud and which it attributes to adopting a preventive approach to its work.

Mr. Campbell: I hear what my hon. Friend is saying, but in the case of the Bondicar fire in Blyth, the fire safety gear was all in place, yet a fire still occurred and the house was gutted. It is nice to have these smoke alarms and safety doors, but they are not the end of the matter—fires do happen.

Jim Fitzpatrick: My hon. Friend makes the key point that fires will happen—notwithstanding the best efforts of the fire and rescue service and of householders, accidents will occur. The Government have been trying, supported by Members on both sides of the House, to decide how best to deploy the resources of the fire and rescue service to deal with fires when they occur and now also to determine how best to prevent fires in the first place. Rather than setting prescriptive dictates in Whitehall, we delegated responsibility for that to local fire and rescue authorities because, as they know the area best, they are best placed to be able to determine the needs of local populations and the risks confronting them.

[Jim Fitzpatrick]

The tragic incident in Blyth last month to which my hon. Friend referred demonstrates the importance of working on fire prevention issues. As he said, despite the first fire crew reaching the scene in three minutes, one life could still not be saved. I argue that only preventive measures might have helped in that situation. He quoted the estimate that 80 per cent. of fire deaths occur before the 999 call is made. I had not heard 80 per cent.; I have heard 50 per cent. It is certainly accepted that a considerable number of people who die in fires do so before the call is made.

Mr. Campbell: That figure of 80 per cent. came from the fire chief himself. Is that the correct figure, or is it what my hon. Friend said?

Jim Fitzpatrick: I was trying to explain that I had not heard the figure of 80 per cent., but that I had heard the figure of 50 per cent. I cannot definitively say from the Dispatch Box what the figure is, but I can say that it is estimated to be substantial. Even if a fire station is next door, the prospects may be that some people will still die. The questions are how to deploy and balance resources, how to ensure that we have the most effective preventive arm to stop fires happening in the first place and how best to protect the most vulnerable in the community. As all hon. Members know, the majority of people who die in fires are the elderly, the sick, those with substance or alcohol abuse problems, people with disabilities or the poor who live in houses with bad or no insulation, no central heating and no double glazing.

That is one reason why the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister has embarked on its ambitious £25 million programme to carry out home fire safety checks in the 1.25 million most vulnerable homes in the country and to install smoke detectors as the best initial way to protect people by alerting them to the fact that there is a fire in their dwelling and enabling them to escape. We have already carried out almost a third of a million visits and more than 300,000 smoke detectors have been installed particularly in the premises of the elderly and the most vulnerable people in our communities. We believe that that is an important way of demonstrating that fire prevention can work and protect the most vulnerable.

We are also introducing suppression systems in homes where a smoke detector would not be of use. There is no point in introducing a smoke detector in the home of someone with disabilities and mobility problems, because it would wake them up just to tell them that there were about to suffer a major fire. Sprinkler and suppression systems provide additional protection in those circumstances. They are also being introduced across the country.

I was referring to the tragic situation in Blyth. As my hon. Friend said, it was a recent event and, at this time, there is still work to be done to ascertain the facts. A formal investigation will find out exactly what happened and the facts will be given to the coroner at the inquest. I am sure that we will all be interested to discover whether there are any lessons to be learned.

The national framework emphasises that, to make a difference, the service needs to move towards a culture of effective prevention and community fire safety work alongside its already excellent 999 response. That is exactly what is happening. My hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington mentioned the move away from prescriptive national standards to locally determined integrated risk. It is not the role of Ministers to agree the operational proposals in an authority's plan. That is for elected members of the fire authority concerned. They are best placed to act on the professional advice of principal officers and to balance the competing local demands on available resources for the benefit of the whole community that they serve.

I understand, however, that Northumberland has based its proposals on carefully gathered and validated risk assessment data, using the fire safety emergency cover toolkit provided by the ODPM. It has consulted the local community fully on all proposals contained therein and I will come back to the consultative aspects towards the end of my speech.

Mr. Denis Murphy: To be fair, that would be true of the very first set of proposals. Two years were spent working them up, but the point that I and my hon. Friend the Member for Blyth Valley (Mr. Campbell) have made is that the proposals were changed within 48 hours. All the data were pushed aside and a site five miles away from the original one was then chosen. The Minister needs to address that point with the chief fire officer to see why that happened.

Jim Fitzpatrick: I made a note of the comments that my hon. Friend made and will come to something of an explanation later. However, I also undertake to seek more information than I have at present to respond to that point. I am confident that the chief fire officer and the elected members of Northumberland county council have at heart the interests of the community, just as have my hon. Friends. I do not in any way, shape or form underestimate the integrity or seriousness of everybody involved in the issue.

The officers and elected members have at the heart of their work the best interests of their community. The chief fire officer and the fire and rescue authority are in the best position to decide where the resources of the fire and rescue authority should be deployed, using the robust data that they have available. I am sure that the fire and rescue authority would be willing to take my hon. Friends through the evidence on which its decisions are based, notwithstanding that, as they described, the position has changed since the original explanation. As I will mention later, there is still time for further discussion.

Fire and rescue services have, in general, responded well to the challenge presented by the introduction of IRMPs. They have achieved much in a short time. The introduction has given senior fire and rescue service managers flexibility to make decisions about fire cover based on existing and potential risks to their communities, within a strategic framework set by locally elected members. They have long sought that freedom and are starting to make the most of it. Fire and rescue authorities are shifting the emphasis from intervention to prevention and progressing objectives to free up resources to direct towards community safety activity. Northumberland fire and rescue service is no exception. It has pursued a number of initiatives, including working with care providers such as Sure Start to promote safer communities. It has also sensibly joined other fire and rescue authorities in the north-east, such as Tyne and Wear and Darlington and Durham, to take forward a private finance initiative project that will help to further their objectives.

On the concerns that this is some covert path towards regionalisation, there is evidence from the Bain inquiry, and from research carried out by the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, that collaboration and co-operation within brigades will mean better ways of working. It is not a covert regionalisation plan—nothing could be further from the truth. I have given those assurances to the Local Government Association and a variety of fire service gatherings up and down the country. There is no doubt, however, that closer co-operation and collaboration—I know that brigades in the north-east are engaged in such discussions, as are several other fire authorities across the country—will provide dividends in areas such as combining fire investigation units, human resources facilities and, as my hon. Friends will know, in relation to plans to provide a regional network of control and communications mobilisation centres, which we announced late last year.

The private finance initiative can help to provide fire and rescue authorities with the necessary infrastructure on which to base a truly modern fire and rescue service. It will assist the Northumberland fire and rescue service in achieving its aims by enabling more resources to be put into prevention work, training, community education and equipment across the whole county. The service will therefore be better prepared to deal with all risks to life—one of the fundamental aims of the fire and rescue service as a whole.

The Northumberland plans are to reduce even further deaths and injuries throughout the county, within a range of risks including road traffic accidents and potential major incidents. They will allow the whole service, across the county, to benefit from investment in better training, community safety work and equipment, through the generation of efficiencies allowing reinvestment in prevention.

John McDonnell: What will happen if they do not work? The Minister has said that we no longer have minimum standards and that we have risk management plans, but he has neither the political will nor the powers to intervene.

Jim Fitzpatrick: My hon. Friend has articulated that concern a couple of times, but the Secretary of State has reserve powers, and the Department offers professional assistance for brigades introducing new IRMP systems, which are now in their third year, to make sure that they are working effectively. The Audit Commission comprehensive performance assessment inspects fire and rescue authorities in the same way as it inspects other local authorities. At present, we are working up an operational assurance section to assist the Audit Commission in its examination of fire and rescue authorities to make sure that fire and rescue authorities and services are working effectively for their communities.

John McDonnell: I am grateful to the Minister for his explanation of the process. Will the reserve powers enable him to call the decision in if it is not operationally effective in the area?

Jim Fitzpatrick: Where there has been concern about the decisions that are being proposed, we shall take a close interest, but we are not in that position. We are confident from the evidence that we have seen, which has been presented to the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister by a research unit, that this work has been quality assured. We are confident that it will provide better protection for the people in Northumberland.

John McDonnell: I am sorry to persist and to delay the debate. The Minister said in response to a direct question about whether he has reserve powers to call the decision in that a particular interest will be taken. I ask my hon. Friend again: has he the powers to call the decision in?

Jim Fitzpatrick: I have responded to my hon. Friends in indicating that the Secretary of State has the reserve powers to direct. I cannot go further than that now. I have said also that, in this instance and at this time, from the information that has been supplied to us from the determination of the research unit within the ODPM, we are confident that these plans stand up to scrutiny. It is not the role of Ministers principally to agree operational proposals. That is a matter for the fire and rescue service.

As for the consultation exercise, from July to November the public and stakeholders were consulted on these proposals. In December 2005, the county council's executive agreed in principle to the plans and the new preferred site. The council has gone back out to engage with the public on the new preferred proposals. A letter has been sent to households in the county. Information is on the council's website and in the media. Work is planned with the key stakeholders group. It is my information that the county council will make a final decision on the proposals in March. There is an opportunity. I know that the chief fire officer and, I am sure, the fire and rescue authority, will be only too happy to meet my hon. Friend to talk through the proposals in detail. My information is that the final decision will not be made until March.

Mr. Campbell: I have not met the chief fire officer although I tried to arrange a meeting on several occasions. I wanted that meeting to include the trade union representatives. The chief fire officer would not meet me with them. If there was a meeting, he wanted it to be with me on my own. I said that I would not go unless the trade union representatives were present. We are stuck now. He will not meet anybody in the presence of the trade union representatives.

Jim Fitzpatrick: It is most unfortunate that a meeting between my hon. Friend and the chief fire officer cannot be arranged if for no other reason than to allow him to present his petition. As he suggested, it carries the weight of 25,000 signatures. Given this exchange and the concerns that my hon. Friends and the hon. Member for Hexham (Mr. Atkinson) have articulated in raising the principal issues, I hope that the fire authority will extend an invitation. Whether that means that he will meet my hon. Friend with the local trade union representatives is something that I cannot dictate to the chief fire officer. However, dialogue is clearly the way forward. I hope that there will be an opportunity for everyone to sit round the table to talk through the issues that are clearly of concern to my hon. Friends. The county council will make its final decisions in March, and that makes it clear to me that there is an opportunity to present the issues in due course.

The hon. Member for Hexham raised public opinion. Local authorities have many difficult decisions to make such as on the closure of a local library or other forms of public property. People are attached to such institutions and clearly have an affinity with fire stations in particular. The fire service is held in great regard and high standing by the community even if people have never used 999. They are reassured by the very presence of a local fire station. If a fire station is likely to be moved, people are naturally alarmed. That is why there has to be even greater effort to reassure them on the nature of the proposals and to try to ensure that public confidence can be maintained.

I do not for a second imagine that people will be happy about fire stations and fire appliances being moved. The important thing is to make sure that there is a major exercise in reassurance for the public. Fire authorities and fire brigades are practical organisations and they support one another across county boundaries, as described by the hon. Member for Hexham and back each other up in various situations as my hon. Friends described.

Mr. Murphy: Initially, I was persuaded that the proposals would improve fire cover for the people whom I represent. My mind was changed dramatically by the fire chief's about-face and the decision to move the station some five miles away. That is what I do not understand and will not accept. It is not acceptable for all that work to be put in and then for the proposals to be changed overnight.

Jim Fitzpatrick: My hon. Friend has effectively expressed his concern and his dissatisfaction with the late change. I hope that a meeting can be arranged to go through, again, the nature of the changes and why they are needed. As he said, he was reassured by the explanation given for the first changes, so it is only appropriate that he be reassured about the final changes.

Mr. Campbell: I may be able to provide some clarification. Under the original programme, the two new PFI fire stations were to be built in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Wansbeck (Mr. Murphy). There were to be none in mine—all the fire stations would have been closed. There was a reaction to that in Blyth Valley because there was no cover. That was a big problem. There seems to have been a change of mind, and instead of both fire stations being in my hon. Friend's constituency, one is to be on the outskirts of my constituency. That has made the situation worse, but that might be the explanation—the fire chief was trying to balance the two constituencies.

Jim Fitzpatrick: The Government have put in place a comprehensive and robust framework that will ensure that the fire and rescue service will be fit to meet the challenges of the future. There will be locally determined IRMPs that best meet the risks facing our communities and offer safety and value for money to local people, notwithstanding the genuine concerns articulated by my hon. Friends. As I mentioned earlier, a national network of regional fire and rescue control centres will increase resilience, cut response times and provide more effective fall-back. Both will contribute to increasing public safety and firefighter safety and creating fire and rescue services that save more lives, including in south-east Northumberland.

Question put and agreed to.

Oral Answers to Questions

TREASURY

The Chancellor of the Exchequer was asked—

Self-assessment Tax Returns

1. Andrew Rosindell (Romford) (Con): What estimate he has made of the number of individuals who will miss the deadline for submitting the self-assessment tax return in 2005–06. [45613]

The Paymaster General (Dawn Primarolo): About three quarters of returns have already been received by Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs, and we expect the overwhelming majority to arrive by the deadline.

Andrew Rosindell: Does the Minister agree that hard-working British taxpayers are facing fines because they are overburdened by a highly complicated tax system? Will she give an assurance today that she will simplify the tax system and spend more time chasing those who habitually avoid paying tax?

Dawn Primarolo: I can confirm to the hon. Gentleman, as he has not noticed, that we are already doing that. We have removed more than 1 million—[Interruption.] I cannot help it if the hon. Gentleman does not do his research properly. He may have noticed that more than 1 million taxpayers have already been removed from self-assessment, and 1.5 million are now using the shortened return, which has been welcomed by the National Audit Office. In addition, the NAO's reports specifically recommended that the HMRC should use penalties in order to pursue those who persistently fail to submit their tax returns on time. That is precisely what we are doing. It is in the interest of all taxpayers and I am sure that, on reflection, the hon. Gentleman will agree that the Government are pursuing the strategy that he advocates.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): It is a bit much for Conservative Members to talk about complexity. The system that we inherited—I speak as an accountant who was involved at the time that it was implemented—was a disastrous mess in 1995–96. It was a shambles. Will my right hon. Friend accept my thanks for improving it in the intervening nine or 10 years and introducing internet filing? Can she reassure me about one aspect on which the hon. Member for Romford (Andrew Rosindell) is right when he says that that there is unacceptable complexity—namely, the account statements sent to individuals and clients? They need to understand hieroglyphics and ancient Greek to be able to plough through such a statement.

Dawn Primarolo: I assure my hon. Friend that the self-assessment system, the returns, the forms and the advice are constantly under review. It is because of those reviews that we have been able to make returns unnecessary for 1 million people, and allow a further 1.5 million to use a shortened return. I pay attention to the points that my hon. Friend makes, but I remind him and the House that the self-assessment regime collects some £117 billion a year, and the overwhelming majority of taxpayers are complying with their obligations.

Mr. Nigel Dodds (Belfast, North) (DUP): The HMRC is encouraging more and more people to submit their returns via the internet, and as the deadline looms for this year, a number of my constituents and businesses have reported problems with using the internet and downloading the various forms. Can the Paymaster General look into that and reassure people that it will be a smooth process?

Dawn Primarolo: I shall certainly look into the point that the hon. Gentleman has raised. Internet filing has expanded considerably and is working well, but if a huge number of people leave it right to the deadline and then try to get on to the system, I cannot say what the consequences will be in terms of waiting time. All the information provided to me as the Minister is that e-filing is working very well and taxpayers should have access to it.

UK Economy (Growth)

2. Mr. James Gray (North Wiltshire) (Con): What his latest estimate is of growth in the UK economy in each of the next three financial years. [45614]

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Gordon Brown): The latest estimates for growth are contained in full in the pre-Budget report. I can announce that as part of our growth strategy for equipping ourselves to tackle globalisation, we will be holding a series of international forums attended by global business leaders on the future of financial services, digital electronics, science, education, health care and modern manufacturing, the conclusions of which will inform our Budget and spending review.

Mr. Gray: Is it not astonishing that the Chancellor of the Exchequer cannot even bring himself to say the figure included in the pre-Budget report—1.75 per cent. growth for the United Kingdom? That compares with 3.6 per cent. in the United States, 2.9 per cent. in Japan and 2.6 per cent. in Australia. Why is it that those countries, which are just as exposed to the world economy and to oil prices as we are, have higher growth than ours? Why are we 19th out of 25 countries in the European Union and bottom of the growth league?

Mr. Brown: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman would add that we have been growing faster than France, Germany, the euro area and the European Union as a whole. Perhaps he will also add that since 1997 the growth rate of the British economy has been far superior to the growth rate achieved in 18 years of Conservative Government. Perhaps he would like to remind the House that inflation is half what it was in the Conservative years, and interest rates and mortgages are half what they were in the Conservative years.

Mr. Sadiq Khan (Tooting) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that one of the reasons why we have had a record period of economic growth is our commitment to economic stability and social justice? In that regard, does he welcome the consensus—for this week, anyway—on the fact that economic stability should take priority over tax cuts?

Mr. Brown: The shadow Chancellor might want to stand to remind us of the remarks that he made only a few weeks ago congratulating Labour's success on macro-economic policy, telling us that Labour has improved the macro-economic management of the UK economy, and saying that there is public confidence in Labour's ability to manage the economy. That, I believe, is what the public think as well.

Sir Peter Tapsell (Louth and Horncastle) (Con): Are the Chancellor's growth estimates influenced by the strictures from Europe on his failure to remain within the public expenditure limits imposed on him by the stability and growth pact, of which, unlike me, he was such a great admirer when the Bill on the Maastricht treaty was before the House?

Mr. Brown: The answer is no. The reason is that we have two fiscal rules. One is the golden rule, where current expenditure should be paid for by revenues—a golden rule that we are meeting and will meet. That is in contrast to the last—[Interruption.] If I may so, the last Conservative Government had two economic cycles. They failed to meet the golden rule in the first economic cycle by £150 billion and they failed to meet it in the second cycle by £250 billion, so we will take no lectures from the Conservatives on that. As for the hon. Gentleman's advice on economic policy, I would have thought more of it had he supported the independence of the Bank of England.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover) (Lab): Is the Chancellor of the Exchequer aware that growth in the Bolsover economy is pretty good, continuing on track? The Shirebrook pit enterprise is nearly completed—2,000 jobs in that area alone. There will be another 5,000 at the Markham and Bolsover industrial site, when the new motorway intersection, which I have championed for the past five years, starts at Easter. We have got unemployment down to half of what it was when the Tories carried out their brutality of closing the pits. Everything is on stream—[Interruption.] I want the Chancellor—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Skinner: I have not dealt with—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Bolsover sounds like Utopia.

Mr. Brown: I think that the whole House would agree, not just in Bolsover but across the United Kingdom, that there are 2.3 million more jobs in the British economy than there were in 1997. Even in the most difficult circumstances of last year, an extra 220,000 jobs were created. Unemployment is half what it is in Germany, half what it is in France, and virtually half what it is in the euro area. Unemployment is lower than in the United States of America.

Sir Michael Spicer (West Worcestershire) (Con): Why has the rate of productivity gone down ever since this Government took office?

Mr. Brown: Productivity has been rising every year. The only years in which it has fallen in Britain were years of Conservative Government. The only years in which manufacturing productivity fell were years of Conservative Government. Productivity has been rising in every year of this Labour Government and manufacturing productivity has been rising as well. The hon. Gentleman is chairman of the 1922 committee and he should get a researcher to get his facts right.

Mr. Brian H. Donohoe (Central Ayrshire) (Lab): I disagree fundamentally with the Chancellor of the Exchequer when it comes to that God-awful tune at half-past 5 in the morning. Its demise will certainly do something to improve the economy of the country. On a particular constituency point that worries me, there are problems attached to high energy costs. I understand that assurances are about to be given to the Chancellor about that, and will he reinforce that this morning?

Mr. Brown: The signature tune at 5.30 in the morning is a good one, even if it does not include the music of Ayrshire, which is my hon. Friend's home county. On energy prices, we recognise that there has been a doubling of oil prices over the past 18 months—it has affected every economy in the world. What is remarkable in those circumstances—the Monetary Policy Committee of the Bank of England has referred to it—is that inflation in this country remains low. We remain on target for inflation, and I can think of no decade in which oil prices have doubled when inflation has been kept so low. That is a tribute to the macro-economic framework that we have developed over the past eight years.

Dr. Vincent Cable (Twickenham) (LD): As the Chancellor is committed to locking in the benefits of growth and financial stability, why has he not done more to take advantage of the extraordinarily low prevailing long-term interest rates by converting a large amount of public debt—not just a token 0.1 per cent.—through refinancing, thereby saving the taxpayer a great deal of money? Is the Treasury asleep?

Mr. Brown: We have taken advantage of that. It was this Government who announced the 50-year issue, and I hope that the hon. Gentleman will acknowledge the fact that we did so. I have to say to the hon. Gentleman, who is a rock of stability in this changing Liberal landscape—even though one of the people he is not supporting for the leadership is keeping a close eye on him today—that not even a 50-year issue would solve the problems that the Liberals have with their public spending policies. He has dropped his tax policy, but even in the past few days all his spokesmen—on children, on transport and on London—have been announcing increased public spending plans. One time, one day, his figures will have to add up.

Anne Snelgrove (South Swindon) (Lab): What matters most to hard-working families in my constituency—which, coincidentally, is next door to that of the hon. Member for North Wiltshire (Mr. Gray), who asked the original question—is maintaining a stable economy. What assessment has my right hon. Friend made of how best we can equip workers and families in our constituencies for the future challenges of globalisation?

Mr. Brown: The first thing for families is the child tax credit. I am very disappointed that the shadow Chancellor wants to cut that credit. The second thing is education spending, which we are doubling in my hon. Friend's constituency and throughout the country. The hon. Member for North Wiltshire (Mr. Gray) complains about our economic policy and implicitly suggests that we are spending too much, but I have here the statement that he issued on his website on 11 January 2006. He stated:

"MP outraged at level of secondary school funding".

demanding that we spend more, not less. Perhaps he should have a word with the shadow Chancellor.

Mr. George Osborne (Tatton) (Con): The Office for National Statistics confirmed this week that the Chancellor's growth forecasts for last year were hopelessly wrong. Looking forward to his next growth forecasts, what does he identify as the greatest risk? Is it the inadequate savings, the large and persistent current account deficit or the slowdown in productivity growth?

Mr. Brown: The greatest risk would be to pursue the policies of the shadow Chancellor. It is absolutely clear that he would put stability at risk: he is considering a flat tax; he would introduce a third fiscal rule; he would cut the new deal; and he would cut the child tax credit. All those policies that are giving stability and prosperity to the British economy, but the hon. Gentleman's policy would put that at risk. He likes to give the impression to the public that he is a policy-free zone, but the abolition of the new deal, cuts in tax credit, the consideration of a flat tax and, if I may say so, the third version this week of a third fiscal rule, would all put the stability of the economy at risk.

Mr. Osborne: The Chancellor says that we are the same old Tories, yet the Prime Minister says that we are changing our minds. One day, they will sort out their attack. In the meantime, assuming that the Chancellor has finished planting Union jacks in everyone's front garden, will he turn his attention to productivity growth? The trend rate of productivity growth has fallen while he has been Chancellor, as the Monetary Policy Committee noted this week. In 1998, he said that productivity growth was "the fundamental yardstick of economic performance".

How is he measuring up?

Mr. Brown: Productivity has risen every year under this Government. Manufacturing productivity continues to rise. Growth in the British economy is higher every year on average than it was in the Conservative years. The Conservatives are going to have to face up to that. Let us have a bit of consistency from the shadow Chancellor. He congratulated me on my success with macro-economic policy and said that I had improved the macro-economic management of the UK economy. He said that there was public confidence in Labour's ability to manage the economy. He said that Labour had established economic credibility. He said that it was the Conservatives who had lost their reputation for economic competence and that it was the Conservatives short-term opportunism that was hampering long-term policy. If he agrees with that, it is his own party that he should be criticising, not me.

G8 Ministerial Meeting

3. Mr. Tobias Ellwood (Bournemouth, East) (Con): If he will make a statement on his proposed post-Gleneagles agenda to be presented at the meeting of G8 Ministers next month in Moscow; and what discussions he has had with G8 partners on this. [45615]

9. Judy Mallaber (Amber Valley) (Lab): If he will make a statement on his priorities for progress towards relieving international poverty and debt relief at the forthcoming international Finance Ministers meeting. [45621]

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Gordon Brown): Our priorities for the G8 are to extend debt relief to further numbers of the poorest countries; to ensure that aid promises that have been made are delivered in free universal education and universal health care; to set up a $20 billion fund for the environment in the poorest countries; to build on the innovative $4 billion international finance facility with new advanced market mechanisms for the purchase of life-saving drugs; and the advance of the launch tomorrow of the global plan to stop tuberculosis, which even now kills 2 million people a year. The Secretary of State for International Development will announce this morning £41.7 million from Britain for anti-TB drugs for India.

Mr. Ellwood: The Chancellor mentioned poorer countries. I think that the House will welcome many of the initiatives that resulted from the Gleneagles summit, but at the next summit in Moscow will the Chancellor take the opportunity to speak to his French and German counterparts and establish whether we can review the common agricultural policy? It is hurting those poorer countries, and hurting farmers in particular.

Mr. Brown: The answer is yes. The hon. Gentleman may know that only a few weeks ago the Treasury, together with the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, published our proposals for the reform of agriculture policy, to be implemented over the next 10 years. We will submit them to the review of agriculture policy that is taking place.

I have already expressed my belief that a trade deal in the world will require movement from America and Europe on agriculture policy. I hope that there is unanimous support for the proposals in the House.

Judy Mallaber: Pupils from 21 Amber Valley schools filled Christmas boxes for children in Mozambique who were affected by HIV/AIDS and poverty. I have also engaged in talks in many schools about the 100 million children who are not being given an education. How can my right hon. Friend convince my young constituents that Finance Ministers talking about debt relief will have a concrete effect in meeting our millennium goals, getting children into school and tackling the AIDS epidemic in Africa?

Mr. Brown: I visited Mozambique, and I think that the children in my hon. Friend's local schools should be congratulated on what they have done. Only 6,000 people in Mozambique are being helped with retroviral drugs for HIV/AIDS, when 600,000 are suffering from the disease. Until we can provide more money, either through the global fund to fight AIDS, tuberculosis and malaria or through other measures, many people will not be able to obtain the treatment that they need.

Debt relief does help, however. I believe that £6 billion of Mozambique's debt has been written off as a result of the decisions that we made last year. Mozambique is one of the biggest beneficiaries from the £170 billion of debt that is to be written off as a result of the cumulative effect of all the decisions—and so it should be, because it is an economy that is trying to grow. It is eradicating corruption, taking action to improve the functioning of its economic policy, and deliberately putting more money into education and health. When I am in Davos tomorrow, I will meet the President of Mozambique, and will be able to tell him that we shall do more in the next few years to support the global fund.

Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): Two days ago, I had the honour of meeting the recently appointed Bangladesh high commissioner here in London. He is immensely grateful for the aid and assistance that this country gives his country, which is one of the poorest in the world, but he was very disappointed by the outcome of the meeting in Hong Kong, and particularly by the lack of progress in the introduction of genuine fair trade by Europe. What can the Chancellor do to persuade Europe, and all the countries of Europe, to support a policy of genuine free trade so that countries such as Bangladesh can trade their way out of poverty?

Mr. Brown: I know that the hon. Gentleman has taken an interest in such issues, especially those associated with countries that have been part of the British Commonwealth or the British empire in the past. I think that the proposals from India and Brazil to break the deadlock in the trade negotiations should be taken seriously. I believe that a further meeting of major players will take place in Davos this week. I hope that we shall see further progress over the next few weeks, because the longer it takes us to reach a trade settlement the more not just our country and others that are part of the advanced industrial economies, but—most of all—the poorest countries in the world, particularly those in Africa and Asia, will lose out. I hope that during the next few weeks we shall see a further attempt to restore the momentum.

Mr. John McFall (West Dunbartonshire) (Lab/Co-op): The Treasury Committee's report on the 2005 pre-Budget report, published this week, welcomed the doubling of aid to Africa, as well as the 100 per cent. multilateral debt write-off for the 38 highly indebted poor countries, but the documents issued at Gleneagles contained 212 separate commitments. Given that the G8 has no independent secretariat, will the Chancellor ensure that there are adequate mechanisms to monitor the commitments, so that we can deliver to those poor countries on the ground?

Mr. Brown: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend, who has taken a big interest in those matters over the years and has visited Africa on many occasions. The G8 Finance Ministers are meeting in Moscow in the middle of February, and I have asked that it be put on the agenda how we follow through the commitments made at Gleneagles. We will discuss education, debt relief, the health programmes and the follow-through from the commitments made on aid. I can assure him that we will do so.

I know that many people involved in the G8 summit, and some of the celebrities in particular, are following this through. Today, Bono is making proposals for enhancing the global fund, and I shall be meeting him tomorrow to discuss them. I know that another member of the Gleneagles delegation, Bob Geldof, is now on missionary work in relation to the Conservative party.

UK Economy (Competitiveness)

4. John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): What factors he takes into account in assessing the competitiveness of the UK economy. [45616]

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Des Browne): We assess economic performance over the economic cycle using a range of measures, including gross domestic product and productivity growth, labour market performance and economic stability. The fact that the UK is the only G7 economy to have avoided any quarters of contraction in output since 2001 shows that the UK is highly competitive in today's increasingly global economy.

John Bercow: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for that lamentably complacent reply. Given that skills shortages are endemic, productivity growth is at record lows, the regulatory burden upon business is more onerous than ever and this country has slumped from fourth to 13th in the international competitiveness league table since the Government took office, why does he not now accept that the Government and the Chancellor are wrong and that respected commentators—from the CBI to the Institute of Directors and from the British Chambers of Commerce to the London School of Economics—are right to criticise him?

Mr. Browne: I am disappointed that the hon. Gentleman thinks my answer is complacent.

John Bercow: Lamentably.

Mr. Browne: "Complacent" will be quite sufficient to support my disappointment. I took care to answer specifically the hon. Gentleman's question. He asked what factors are taken into account in assessing competitiveness and I answered the question. It did not seem to me that, in a factual question, there was room even for his extravagant expressions of regret.

The hon. Gentleman has expressed judgment on whether the steps that the Government have taken were appropriate, and he will recollect that he was one of the most vociferous and consistent critics of the Government's decision in the early days to give the Bank of England independence. He may well, like most of his colleagues on the Conservative Benches, have changed his view on that, and now has to accept the judgment made by the Government. He nods to indicate that he has.

The hon. Gentleman will know, from his experience and knowledge of this area, that the most important thing in relation to competitiveness and productivity for the UK is macro-economic stability. Indeed, the shadow Chancellor effectively said that in the speech that he made on Monday, when he said that he would not sacrifice the stability that we in government have won for this country for any other purpose, even tax cuts. I suggest to the hon. Gentleman that a significant number of factors are involved on which there may be differing views, but stability has been achieved.

Mr. Jim Cunningham (Coventry, South) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend recall that under the previous Government, some of the major companies in this country refused to or could not take on apprentices?

Mr. Browne: Of course I remember that, and my constituents remember it even more painfully because they lived through those times, when they saw their young people being deskilled, effectively and substantially, by that. I celebrate the fact that, across the UK, there are now 300,000 apprentices in training.

Mr. Richard Spring (West Suffolk) (Con): What role does the Chief Secretary think the collapse in our world competitiveness has played in the fact that we have the worst trade imbalance in our history?

Mr. Browne: There has not been a collapse in the competitiveness of the UK. In fact, only this week an independent survey indicated that the UK is the No. 1 place in the world for inward investment. That is the view that other businesses take of the competitiveness environment and productivity of this country. As my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has already told the House, productivity has grown in every year of our stewardship of the economy. The hon. Gentleman's party could not say the same.

Rob Marris (Wolverhampton, South-West) (Lab): As my right hon. Friend says, one of the measures of competitiveness is productivity. There are different ways to measure productivity, one of which is average output per worker per hour. Another, and a major measure for our economy, is the average output per person of working age per year and the Government have a wonderful record in that regard because of high employment. Will my right hon. Friend assure me that we will continue with our policy of high employment because work is the best way out of poverty?

Mr. Browne: My hon. Friend is entirely correct. The challenge for the Government is to increase productivity year on year while increasing the number of people in work. We have achieved that to such an extent that there has been a record increase in the number of people in employment. I must remind Opposition Members that that contrasts with the record levels of unemployment when they were in charge of the economy.

John Hemming (Birmingham, Yardley) (LD): Is the Chief Secretary aware of the substantial damage done to competitiveness by relative gas prices in the UK vis-à-vis the continent? Prices in the forward market are around 40p a therm on the continent, while they are about twice that in the UK. What are the Government going to do about the incompetent way in which they have handled the gas market?

Mr. Browne: I do not accept that the Government have been incompetent in our handling of the gas market. I am not immediately able to confirm the particular statistics that the hon. Gentleman quoted, but I will accept them from him. Recently, however, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry explained from the Dispatch Box exactly what we were doing to ensure that industry in this country is properly served in energy, despite the fact that we live in a globalised economy in which energy prices have increased significantly.

Mr. Lindsay Hoyle (Chorley) (Lab): Drag factors on competitiveness are over-burdensome regulation and the gold-plating of EU regulation. I know that the Government are working hard to reduce regulation, but could we set higher targets to ease the burden on small companies?

Mr. Browne: My hon. Friend will be aware that in the pre-Budget report my right hon. Friend the Chancellor announced a review of this very phenomenon—the gold-plating of EU regulation. The Government believe, as does my hon. Friend, that inefficient and over-burdensome regulation can impose a significant cost on business and we have introduced, and are seeing through, radical and thorough-going reforms to business regulation across the Government.

Mrs. Theresa Villiers (Chipping Barnet) (Con): Does the Chief Secretary accept that in a globalised economy, it is vital for our competitiveness that our tax system be as simple, efficient and user-friendly as possible? If so, is he concerned that the World Economic Forum now ranks the UK as low as 67th in the world for tax efficiency; that the length of Tolley's standard textbook on tax has doubled since Labour took power since 1997; and that only this week Mike Brewer, of the Institute for Fiscal Studies, said that the Chancellor had "done damage to our reputation" as a country with

"an efficient and transparent tax system"?

Mr. Browne: First, I welcome the hon. Lady to her position and congratulate her on her promotion. I look forward to working with her. I ask her to pass on my appreciation to her predecessor for the good working relationship that we had.

Mr. Gordon Brown: Her eight predecessors.

Mr. Browne: My right hon. Friend reminds me that the hon. Lady has eight predecessors.

Mr. George Osborne (Tatton) (Con): How many Chief Secretaries has the Chancellor had?

Mr. Browne: I am not sure, but I think four.

Unfortunately, the hon. Lady is wrong in her analysis of the tax situation in the UK. Since we came to power, we have cut corporation tax, income tax and small business tax and introduced research and development credits, to such an extent that many international studies consistently show the UK to be an attractive place to do business, with a relatively low tax burden. In fact, the latest OECD figures show that the UK tax burden is well below the average for the EU 15 and the EU 25 countries.

New Deal for Young People

5. Ms Dawn Butler (Brent, South) (Lab): What assessment he has made of the economic effects of the new deal for young people. [45617]

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Des Browne): Since 1998, the new deal has helped more than 630,000 young people to find jobs, contributing to a fall in long-term youth unemployment from 210,000 in May 1997 to 52,700, which compares with a high of 400,000 in the mid-1990s. Independent research has shown the new deal for young people's positive impact on the economy, with estimated benefits to the economy of up to £500 million a year.

Ms Butler: In my constituency, 3,699 young people have participated in the new deal, with 1,200 of them obtaining sustainable employment. Scrapping the new deal would have a detrimental effect on those young people, who are finally finding a means to work their way out of poverty. Will my right hon. Friend assure me that we have no intentions of scrapping the new deal?

Mr. Browne: My hon. Friend can be assured that we have no intentions of scrapping the new deal. As my right hon. Friend the Chancellor explained in the pre-Budget report, we intend to build on the new deal going forward, to learn from its success in the past and to create better opportunities for those who will take advantage of it in future. Let us contrast that with the policy of the Conservative party, which would scrap the new deal, and by doing so effectively scrap and throw all those young people who have benefited from it—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Adam Afriyie (Windsor) (Con): Of course there are individual success stories under the new deal, and they must be welcomed. My concern continues to be for the least well-off and most vulnerable in society. With one in 10 people struggling with dyslexia or some other learning disability, will the Government persist in inflicting their complex tax system on the most vulnerable in society?

Mr. Browne: I welcome the hon. Gentleman's recognition of what he describes as the individual successes. In fact, the success of the new deal is the aggregate of all those individual successes. In all our constituencies, including his I am sure, it has taken significant numbers of young people from having no future to having significant opportunity to move themselves up the labour market and to improve their conditions. The challenge that we face in relation to the people whom he describes is that they have not had an opportunity to work in the past, rather than that they are faced with the complexity of income tax forms. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions has set out our plans for the coming years to deal with the challenges that those people face, and to move them nearer to and into the labour market. I was delighted that those on the Conservative Front Bench supported those plans.

Mr. Wayne David (Caerphilly) (Lab): Does the Chief Secretary agree that the new deal for lone parents has been particularly successful? Reforms are needed to the welfare system, however, to enable more lone parents to work.

Mr. Browne: My hon. Friend is right. When we came into power, about 45 per cent. of lone parents were working, and that figure is now slightly beyond 55 per cent.—56 per cent., I think. There is still significantly more to do. That is why, in the pre-Budget report, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor announced additional support through the new deal for lone parents, which was augmented by the announcement this week by the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions. He is entirely correct to identify the challenge that we face, but we will only meet that challenge by redoubling our efforts through the new deal.

Mr. Paul Goodman (Wycombe) (Con): To be a success, however, the new deal could reasonably be expected to produce a consistent fall in the number of young people who are neither in employment nor full-time education. New data released since the previous Treasury questions show that number to be 1.2 million. If the new deal really is such a success, can the Chief Secretary explain why that number is now 180,000 higher than when the Chancellor launched the new deal, and at its highest since he took office?

Mr. Browne: The hon. Gentleman articulates an argument for doing more on the new deal—more investment and, as I described it, redoubling our efforts—not for scrapping it. The fact is that the statistics that he quotes do not show the whole picture. That 1.2 million includes some people who are in part-time education or training. The situation is not nearly as bad as he describes it. I do not demur from the challenge—it is significant. We will only deal with this group of young people, however, if we are prepared to invest in them, not if we ignore them.

Barbara Keeley (Worsley) (Lab): Last Friday, a group of young people from high schools in my constituency came in to discuss their issues with me. The interesting thing is that worries about future employment did not rank among the concerns even of young people from a ward that is among the top 3 per cent. most deprived in the country. Does my right hon. Friend agree that we must redouble our efforts on the new deal, so that those young people can continue to feel that confidence?

Mr. Browne: My hon. Friend describes one of the remarkable contrasts between the situation only a decade ago and the situation now for young people. Most young people in most of our communities now have the opportunity of a job, which they did not have before this Government came to power, but there are—it has already been highlighted in some of the supplementary questions—continuing challenges. Because of the state of the labour market, the bulk of the people coming into the new deal now are those who present the greatest challenge. We need to build on, to revise and to reform the new deal in order that it can address those issues more consistently.

HMRC Estate

6. Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): When he next expects to meet senior representatives of HM Revenue and Customs to discuss the outsourcing of their buildings and other assets. [45618]

The Paymaster General (Dawn Primarolo): I meet with senior HMRC officials regularly on a range of issues. There are no meetings planned to discuss the matter to which the hon. Gentleman refers.

Mr. Bellingham: Is it true that as part of an outsourcing deal in 2001, 600 HMRC buildings were sold to Mapeley, an offshore Guernsey company, for £220 million? Is it also true that Savills recently valued those buildings at £566.6 million, a staggering 150 per cent. increase? Is not that a rotten deal for taxpayers? Does the Paymaster General agree that if she and the Chancellor were investment bankers and made such a duff deal, they would not just be in line to lose their bonuses, but would be facing the sack?

Dawn Primarolo: No, that is not true. Let me give the hon. Gentleman the facts. The HMRC estate was independently valued prior to the Mapeley contract at £370 million. That money was paid to the Department: £220 million first, then £150 million in facility payments. The National Audit Office looked at the report, published a report on 7 May 2004, and found that the deal had delivered benefits, that more was expected over the duration of the contract, and that therefore it represented value for money for the taxpayer. Those are the facts. The speculation is incorrect.

Mr. Bob Blizzard (Waveney) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend assure me that in future the buildings and assets of the HMRC will not be used to collect the flat tax, which has been continually advocated by the Conservative party this morning?

Dawn Primarolo: I have been the Minister responsible for the two departments for rather a long time now. I do not know how much longer that will last, but may I say on behalf of the Government that we intend to make absolutely sure that there is not an introduction of a flat tax, which would be unfair and significantly reduce resources into the Exchequer. It does not operate in any of the substantial industrial economies. It would be a disaster for us and take us away from what is a fair and proportionate tax system that ensures that public funds are invested in line with the requirements and aspirations of our electorate.

Debt Relief

7. Ms Celia Barlow (Hove) (Lab): If he will make a statement on proposals for debt relief to be discussed under Russia's presidency of the G8. [45619]

12. Chris Bryant (Rhondda) (Lab): What assessment he has made of the likely impact of Russia's presidency of the G8 for cancellation of debt in the world's poorest countries. [45624]

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Gordon Brown): Since our last Question Time, 100 per cent. multilateral debt relief has been finally achieved for the first 19 heavily indebted poor countries, of 40 countries that are now eligible to share in the £170 billion write-off in debt. In Britain's view, however, all 67 of the poorest countries of the world should have debt reduction. By paying our share of their debt service, we will unilaterally lead debt collection for those non-HIPCs, and when I am at the G8 in Moscow I will urge other countries to follow us.

Ms Barlow: I am proud of the many achievements in international development secured under our stewardship of the G8 last year. However, those should be seen as merely one important step along a long road. Can my right hon. Friend outline what he is doing to keep those issues at the top of the agenda during the Russian presidency, and what are the prospects of future successes for the world's poor this year?

Mr. Brown: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. She has done a huge amount in her constituency to make people more aware of these important issues. Indeed, around the country hundreds of thousands of people are campaigning for greater debt relief. I will meet other Finance Ministers at Davos tomorrow when we shall undertake a session on this very set of issues. When the G8 meets in Moscow on 14 February I will propose that we go further on debt relief. We will pay 10 per cent. of the share of the debt interest payments of the non-HIPC countries—that is more than 30 countries who are not in the first list for debt relief, but who in our view should receive debt relief. Other countries, including Canada, have already announced that they will do likewise. We are trying to persuade yet other countries that this is the right step forward. Although we have had an enormous advance in the past few months, with multilateral and bilateral debt relief agreed at 100 per cent. for some of the poorest countries in the world, there is still a great deal more to do. Our aim is that nearly 70 countries will receive the debt relief that is necessary for them to begin their economic reconstruction.

Chris Bryant: Largely thanks to this Government's determination to get a better deal for the poorest countries in the world, we have seen an amazing turnaround in the last 10 years in international public opinion on debt relief. Does my right hon. Friend the Chancellor worry a little, with changes of Government in some G8 countries, particularly with Conservatives coming to power in Canada, that sometimes Conservatives are a little Johnny-come-lately on these issues? They say a lot of things, but then never put them into practice. Earlier, my right hon. Friend talked about the missionary work of Sir Bob Geldof. Will he be undertaking it with the Conservatives in Canada?

Mr. Brown: That is all the more reason for the missionary work about which I talked earlier. I am sure that it could be effective over a period of time. Let us not forget when we are facing up to problems that involve public expenditure that the last Conservative Government halved overseas development aid; we have now doubled overseas development aid. If the Conservatives are going to support us in increasing overseas development aid, I welcome that, but it means a commitment of additional resources to enable poorer people in the world to have education and health.

Miss Julie Kirkbride (Bromsgrove) (Con): In relation to the G8, I was delighted to hear what the Chancellor said earlier about free trade and the importance of allowing countries to trade their way out of poverty. To that end, what negotiations has he had with his erstwhile friend, or perhaps foe, Commissioner Mandelson, whose support for French farmers seems to be one of the principal obstacles to freer trade in the world today?

Mr. Brown: I think we know that the European Union has made proposals which reform the agricultural policy, but that more must be done. I was describing how, at the G8 meeting in December, India and Brazil joined our discussions and made proposals to modify their position, subject to America and Europe looking at theirs. It is important over the next few weeks that America and Europe look at their position and see whether they can make the concessions that are necessary for a trade agreement to take place. Again, I hope that there will be all-party support for this.

Damian Green (Ashford) (Con): In recent years the G8 has quite properly concentrated on African debt relief. The Chancellor will be aware that in other parts of the world, notably eastern Europe, there are countries afflicted by poverty and debt. It would be particularly ironic if during the Russian presidency of the G8 those countries continue to suffer, especially as many of their economies—Ukraine and Moldova spring to mind—have been damaged by Russia's recent actions which not only threatened the cut-off of gas supplies, but the growth potential of their economies. Will the Chancellor ensure that during the Russian presidency that country does not continue to try to bully its poor neighbours, but concentrates on debt relief in that part of the world as well?

Mr. Brown: Sometimes it is difficult to see the connection that the hon. Gentleman is making between debt relief and Russian policy towards Ukraine. Two of the countries to receive debt relief under the proposal passed by the International Monetary Fund board and the World Bank board are eastern European countries. They will benefit from the measures that we are taking.

As for countries toward the east of Europe, it is remarkable that some of the poorest countries, which have now joined the European Union, are prepared to contribute aid themselves. That is a welcome sign. We will of course look at the debt relief proposals of other eastern European countries, but the priority countries are obviously those that, according to income per head, are the poorest in the world, and they are mainly in Africa, Asia and Latin America.

Public Finance Forecasts

8. James Duddridge (Rochford and Southend, East) (Con): What measures he is taking to improve the reliability of public finance forecasts. [45620]

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Des Browne): Since 1997, the Government have introduced a number of changes that have improved forecasting performance. They include the introduction of reasonable and cautious assumptions, independently audited by the National Audit Office. The Treasury regularly reviews its fiscal forecasting performance and publishes the results in end-of-year fiscal reports. They demonstrate that the Treasury's forecasts since 1997 compare well with those of major international organisations and of other EU member states.

James Duddridge: Does the Chief Secretary agree with the Treasury Committee, which said:

"It is important that official forecasts for tax receipts avoid any systemic bias either to exaggerate or underestimate revenue receipts, particularly towards the end of the economic cycle when forecasts are likely to come under particular scrutiny"?

Mr. Browne: I do agree with that. I have yet to have the advantage of reading all the Treasury Committee's report on the pre-Budget report. However, it was precisely in order to achieve that objective that we went to the trouble of introducing rules and a level of independence concerning the assumptions that underlie such forecasts.

Mr. Andrew Love (Edmonton) (Lab/Co-op): Can my right hon. Friend explain to the House the impact on public finance forecasts of the possible introduction of a flat tax?

Mr. Browne: As everybody knows, a flat tax would be significantly expensive in terms of the damage that it would do to this country. Some estimates suggest that if a flat tax were operating now, much-needed investment in public services would be reduced by as much as £7 billion for this year alone. I understand that the Conservatives, some of whom advocate a flat tax, are keeping their powder dry on this issue—or trying to—but it is hardly likely that it will remain dry for very much longer, given that they have put Michael Forsyth in charge of consideration of taxation. Of course, and as Scotland knows, he is the ultimate flat-tax—

Mr. Speaker: Order. We are going beyond the question.

Chris Huhne (Eastleigh) (LD): May I ask the Chief Secretary—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I called the hon. Gentleman because he is a Back Bencher, and for no other reason. Please listen to him.

Chris Huhne: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for that promotion. May I ask the Chief Secretary carefully to consider the course of action promoted by my hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable), who points out that the issuance of long-dated Government debt would of course improve the reliability of public finance forecasts? Does the Chief Secretary recognise that not increasing such issuance would constitute a substantial threat to the sustainability of pension funds?

Mr. Browne: First, Mr. Speaker, without wishing to encourage your wrath, may I recognise that the hon. Gentleman is, I think, his party's shadow Chief Secretary to the Treasury and is in fact speaking from the Front Bench?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am going to make something plain. I called the hon. Member for Eastleigh (Chris Huhne) as a Back Bencher, not as a spokesman. There is only one allocation to the Liberals.

Mr. Browne: I apologise, Mr. Speaker—I should have known better than to try to be that clever. I am glad to hear from the hon. Member for Eastleigh (Chris Huhne) today. He is perhaps the only candidate for the leadership of his party whom we have not heard from this week, so I am pleased that he has had an opportunity to say something. In answer to the question, I assure the hon. Gentleman that the Government appreciate his point. That is exactly why my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has introduced appropriate mechanisms.

Andrew Miller (Ellesmere Port and Neston) (Lab): But will my right hon. Friend explain the difference between the mechanisms in place now and those that applied on Black Wednesday? Could it be that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has better special advisers?

Mr. Browne: It is substantially because this Government have learned from the mistakes of the previous Administration. When we came to power in 1997, we set out principles for fiscal management and a code for fiscal stability. We have implemented significant changes that have helped to deliver improved forecasting performance. They include, for example, the publication of full fiscal projections at each PBR and Budget that are based on all Government decisions and circumstances that may have a material impact on the fiscal outlook, the audit of key assumptions—in particular the cautious assumptions for trend growth—and the publication of a full backward-looking analysis of forecasts in the end-of-year fiscal report.

Mr. Mark Hoban (Fareham) (Con): In 1995, the then shadow Chancellor called for an independent audit of the sustainability of public expenditure and the golden rule. What progress has the sixth Chief Secretary to the Treasury since this Government came to power made in that regard?

Mr. Browne: I have already set out the rules that we have introduced. What the hon. Gentleman is arguing for requires consideration of where the proper political accountability for such decisions lies. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor has made it clear that the Government are accountable for the decisions that they announce to this House.

Manufacturing Industry

10. Michael Fabricant (Lichfield) (Con): What recent assessment he has made of the competitiveness of UK manufacturing industry; and if he will make a statement. [45622]

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Des Browne): The pre-Budget report provided an assessment of all areas of the UK economy, and action taken by the Government to provide the right environment for business competing in a global environment. Manufacturing productivity in the UK rose by 30.9 per cent. between 1997 and 2004. The Government want a successful and dynamic manufacturing sector with more companies moving to high-value production to meet the challenge of globalisation, for which the best foundation is, of course, macroeconomic stability.

Mr. Speaker: I call Mark Hoban. [Interruption.] My apologies; I meant Mr. Fabricant.

Michael Fabricant: We look so alike, Mr. Speaker, that getting us mixed up is easily done.

I know that the Chief Secretary will join me in offering sympathy to the 175 workers at GKN Lichfield who have just lost their jobs because the company is moving its manufacturing plant from the UK to Europe. However, that is not so surprising, given that the Engineering Employers Federation has said that extra taxes placed on manufacturing directly amount to £2.2 billion since 1997, and that the total for extra taxes in that period comes to £5.5 billion. That compares with what has happened in Europe and the US, where the overall tax burden has fallen since 1997. What can the Chief Secretary do to reverse that trend?

Mr. Browne: First, may I take the opportunity to express my condolences and support to the workers at the GKN Lichfield plant, which is now to be closed? My understanding of the situation is not exactly the same as the hon. Gentleman's. We are dealing with his constituency and I accept that I may be wrong, but I understand that GKN announced at the same time that it would relocate all the jobs to its 10 other UK plants.

That is not entirely consistent with what the hon. Gentleman said, but I recognise that he will have more accurate information.

The loss of manufacturing jobs in the west midlands and the rest of the UK has been going on for some time, but I point out that the service sector in the west midlands has expanded significantly, with more than 300,000 jobs created since we have been in government. Job opportunities exist, and I assure the hon. Gentleman that the Government will support the people who have lost their jobs today.

In relation to the meat of the hon. Gentleman's question, I suggest that his analysis of why this is happening is slightly skewed. I understand why, for political reasons, he wants to skew it, but corporation tax has gone down in this country from 33 per cent. to 30 per cent. We support manufacturing industry through research and development credits, 80 per cent. of which go to manufacturing industry.

The global challenge that we all face in relation to manufacturing will have to be met by a number of activities, and most of those my right hon. Friend the Chancellor announced in the pre-Budget report.

Mr. Michael Foster (Worcester) (Lab): Cadbury's is a highly competitive manufacturer of chocolate based in the west midlands. Does my right hon. Friend understand the dismay felt by workers in our region that Opposition Members have signed an early-day motion urging people to boycott the products—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I was doing the hon. Gentleman a favour by calling him late in the day, but he is out of order.

Business of the House

11.30 am

Mrs. Theresa May (Maidenhead) (Con): May I ask the Leader of the House to give us the Business for the next week?

The Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Geoffrey Hoon): The business for next week will be as follows:

MONDAY 30 JANUARY—Conclusion of consideration in Committee of the Government of Wales Bill.

TUESDAY 31 JANUARY—Consideration of Lords amendments to Racial and Religious Hatred Bill, followed by a debate on pensions on a motion for the Adjournment of the House.

WEDNESDAY 1 FEBRUARY—Opposition Day [12th Allotted Day]. There will be a debate on police force amalgamations, followed by a debate entitled "Failure of the Government's 10-Year Transport Plan". Both arise on an Opposition motion.

THURSDAY 2 FEBRUARY—A debate on defence procurement on a motion for the Adjournment of the House.

FRIDAY 3 FEBRUARY—The House will not be sitting.

The provisional business for the following week will be:

MONDAY 6 FEBRUARY—Motions relating to the police grant and local government finance reports.

TUESDAY 7 FEBRUARY—Opposition Day [13th Allotted Day]. There will be a debate on an Opposition motion. Subject to be announced.

WEDNESDAY 8 FEBRUARY—Business of the House motion, followed by motions relating to parliamentary allowances and financial assistance for the representative work of Sinn Fein.

THURSDAY 9 FEBRUARY—Second Reading of the Legislative and Regulatory Reform Bill.

FRIDAY 10 FEBRUARY—The House will not be sitting.

I should also like to inform the House that the business in Westminster Hall for 2 and 9 February will be—

THURSDAY 2 FEBRUARY—A debate on employer engagement in further and higher education.

THURSDAY 9 FEBRUARY—A debate on the report from the Health Committee on new developments in sexual health and HIV/AIDS policy.

Mrs. May: Last week I asked the Leader of the House for an early statement on troop deployments in Afghanistan. That statement of course will be made today, and I should like to thank the Leader of the House for the alacrity with which he responded to my request. Dare I say it, this could be the start of a beautiful relationship—[HON. MEMBERS: "Ooh."]—that is, of course, unless it is rudely interrupted by a Cabinet reshuffle.

Talking of which, as we have Cabinet Office business in the House in a couple of weeks, will there be a Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster in post by then? If not, I have a suggestion for the Government. Perhaps the money saved could be used to pay the Minister for women and equality. After all, a pay gap for the Minister for women and equality of 49 per cent. is hardly a good example for others.

May I ask the right hon. Gentleman to give us the date of the Budget?

Given the constitutional implications of the Government of Wales Bill and the fact that so far only a quarter of the Bill has been discussed in Committee on the Floor of the House, will the Government give consideration to a further day of Committee debate on the Bill?

The Health Secretary's statement yesterday showed that Ministers have lost financial control in the NHS. Will she come to the House to make a statement on the financial position of the NHS? We heard only today of a hospital serving the constituents of my hon. Friend the Member for Tunbridge Wells (Greg Clark) which, as in the "Yes, Minister" sketch, seems to think that it is okay to pay staff to keep operating theatres open but then cancel operations and leave theatres lying empty. May we have a debate in Government time on health issues and their impact on patients?

Last week there was an excellent debate on international development matters. Given the importance of the issues that the Department for International Development deals with, and the fact that its budget is now larger than that of the Foreign Office, will the Government consider giving more time to oral questions for DFID?

Finally, we now know that the Government's scheme for bus passes is giving real problems to local authorities, that libraries are being closed across the country because of financial problems and that the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister has spent £168 million on consultants advising on knocking down 168,000 houses. A survey of experts involved in the Thames Gateway found that only 13 per cent. described the Deputy Prime Minister's leadership as "effective or broadly ok". Today, a Select Committee report accused the Department of double counting on efficiencies and reported that 10 per cent. of staff felt bullied in the last year, and an earlier MORI opinion poll of Government officials said that the ODPM was lacking leadership and comparable to a "pantomime horse". Given that under this Government council tax has risen by 76 per cent., may we urgently have a debate on the burdens placed by Government on local councils and the implications for council tax payers?

Mr. Hoon: I am at least grateful that the right hon. Lady's shopping list today is shorter than it was last week—

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): Not a lot.

Mr. Hoon: Well, I will leave others to judge whether it is a lot shorter: it is at least shorter. I am delighted to have the opportunity again to pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Cabinet Office for the excellent work that he is doing on behalf of the Cabinet Office and the excellent way that he comes to the House to answer questions. I am sure that he is earning every penny, as is every other Minister.

The question of financial control in the NHS is of course routinely raised by Opposition Members and I understand why they have concerns about financial management in their local hospitals. Some three quarters of NHS bodies are in balance or in surplus and it is important to the Government that that should apply across the country. I am always slightly surprised when Opposition Members raise such issues, because if the Government were not tackling the question of the deficits in NHS bodies, they would all rise in righteous indignation to complain about that. We are of course tackling the problem and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has announced measures to assist those organisations to achieve financial balance and surplus. That applies just as well in Tunbridge Wells, and I was able to listen this morning to the chief executive of the primary care trust giving an extremely satisfactory explanation of the position. I suspect that the right hon. Lady did not hear that, because if she had, she might not have raised the issue today.

As for international development matters, it is important to devote the appropriate time to the very important work that the Department does on behalf of the United Kingdom, but if more time is made available for that, less time is available for other issues. That is the balance that must always be struck in the House.

The right hon. Lady also mentioned housing. I cannot resist making the point that investment in housing has risen from some £1.65 billion in the last year of the Conservative Government to more than £5 billion now. That is an astonishing improvement. It means that housing has been improved across the country. It also means that some housing has been demolished, but that is because that housing is incapable of being improved. Where it is possible to improve housing, it is being improved, but where demolition is necessary, there are demolitions. The space can then be used for better housing for people in the areas affected. There will be an opportunity next week for all hon. Members to ask questions of my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister on Wednesday, and I am sure that there will shortly be an opportunity to deal with matters affecting the NHS.

Mr. George Mudie (Leeds, East) (Lab): The Leader of the House will be aware of the questionable decision to withdraw support from Post Office accounts. That will leave 4.5 million pensioners stranded, the majority of whom were persuaded to give up pension books on the basis that Post Office accounts would be available. With no bank nearby, they will not be able to get their money. The decision will also put the viability of inner-city and rural post offices in question. Will the Leader of the House arrange an early debate and at least draw the matter to the attention of his Cabinet colleagues?

Mr. Hoon: My hon. Friend is right to raise what is an important issue, especially because it affects pensioners. I know that the matter has continued to cause great concern to hon. Members. I assure my hon. Friend that the arrangements that he describes are interim measures and that the Government are examining the ways in which the support that rightly must be given to pensioners is made available. I shall also ensure that his concerns are brought to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and that he is contacted directly.

Mr. Heath: The hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Mudie) is absolutely right and I am afraid that the Leader of the House's answer to his question was entirely complacent. Recent parliamentary replies reveal that 5 million people use Post Office cards each week, and the revenue to the post office network is £1 billion, so the Department for Work and Pensions proposes to scrap them. That will have a real impact on sub-post offices, so we need an urgent debate on the matter.

I also support the view that there should be a debate on health, not only to deal with the efficiency and effectiveness of health expenditure—I remind the Leader of the House that hospitals are there not to make surpluses, but to treat patients effectively and efficiently—but to deal with the issues raised by the Public Accounts Committee report on cancer, which shows that there are huge inequalities throughout the country.

May we have an early debate on the report—or should I say reports—of the Education Committee, which we anticipate will be published this evening? It would be extremely useful to know whether Labour Members support the Prime Minister, whether Conservative Members support the Prime Minister, whether Conservative Members support their position of only a few weeks ago—whatever. Such a debate would be a good expedition so that we could discover people's thoughts before the publication of the education Bill.

Lastly, may we have a debate on the Arbuthnot report? Many see it as a missed opportunity, but it is nevertheless of great importance to many Scottish Members. It would be useful if the House had the early opportunity—[Interruption.] The Leader of the House does not know what the report is about. That is unfortunate, but no doubt he will be briefed if I carry on talking long enough.

Mr. Hoon: I do express considerable disappointment about the hon. Gentleman's decision not to stand as a candidate in the leadership election of the Liberal Democrats. All of us who routinely attend business questions on a Thursday devoted considerable effort to trying to persuade him to participate in what is quite a narrow race. There was a remarkable shortening of his odds. As I reported to the House, at one stage he was as far out as 100–1, and hon. Members piled in at those generous odds. The odds came down considerably, but he still resisted the opportunity that was made available to him. I hope he understands that I am answering his questions with the spirit of disappointment that is shared by all hon. Members, although sadly, apparently, not those in the Liberal Democrats, but then one cannot have everything.

I made it clear that the post office issue is important. All hon. Members face the problem in their constituencies. Pensioners and others throughout the country are affected, so the Government are determined to get the situation right.

The Government are delighted to debate health issues. We would be delighted to debate them every single day of the week, if only there were time, not least because we have a remarkable record of success on increasing available funding massively, dramatically reducing waiting lists and ensuring that the national health service is a national health service of which the country can be proud.

The hon. Gentleman made reference by implication to a recent report of the Public Accounts Committee. I thought that I might read him an extract from the report. It says that "across the country significant improvements have been made in improving cancer services and managing them more effectively, in particular, speeding access to cancer diagnosis and treatment."

There is not a doctor in the country who does not recognise that there has been significant improvement, but that is not to say—no one on the Government Benches would in any way suggest—that there is not still more to be done. We are committed to improving the position, and certainly remedying inequalities.

I am sure that in due course there will be significant opportunities for debating education. I am sure that all hon. Members will welcome that. I can confidently say that that will be happening sooner rather than later.

When I find out what the Arbuthnot report is, I will ensure that the hon. Gentleman is written to about it.

Barbara Follett (Stevenage) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend give serious consideration to holding a debate to mark international women's day, which this year falls on Wednesday 8 March?

Mr. Hoon: My hon. Friend has raised this subject with me on a previous occasion. I know that the request will have wide support around the House. I will try to consider the request favourably, but I cannot guarantee that time can be found to hold the debate on the Floor of the House on the appropriate date. I can assure my hon. Friend that we will find time for a debate, perhaps in Westminster Hall.

Mr. Owen Paterson (North Shropshire) (Con): May I pick up the points of the hon. Members for Leeds, East (Mr. Mudie) and for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) about sub-post offices and the impact of withdrawing the benefits card? I was involved in this at meetings with Ministers, on a constituency basis and in working with the all-party group. At no stage was it ever mentioned that the card, despite all the Government's attempts to bully people into direct payments, once established, would not be permanent. Driving down on Sunday, I heard some form of ministerial pond life suggesting that the card was only temporary. [Interruption.] I did not catch the Minister's name. I am amazed that the Leader of the House says that it was intended to be a temporary scheme. At no stage was it ever discussed. I rang Colin Bateman of the National Federation of Sub-Postmasters on that basis. Could we please have a statement—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Hoon: I can see that we are going to have an interesting linguistic debate. The word that I used was "interim" rather than "temporary". The hon. Gentleman has used the word "temporary" to suggest somehow that the scheme was always designed to come to an end, with the risk that somehow it would fall over the edge. Temporary arrangements have that sort of feeling. If the hon. Gentleman had used the word "interim", which was the word that I used, he would recognise that we were talking about moving from one sensible arrangement to another. I know that the use of that language might appear to be something that the hon. Gentleman would not entirely share. If he thinks about the matter carefully, he will agree with what I have said.

Mr. John Spellar (Warley) (Lab): May I draw my right hon. Friend's attention to early-day motion 1479?

[That this House recognises the pleasure given to early rising listeners to BBC Radio Four by the subtle and evocative medley of British folk tunes in Fritz Spiegl's UK Theme which starts daily broadcasting and has become embedded over the years in the affections of listeners; and urges the BBC to reconsider its decision to drop this popular medley and to continue to use the UK Theme in the proud place it has occupied with such success and charm for so many years.]

The motion has received support across the House. Interestingly enough, it now has support from my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the previous Home Secretary, my right hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Brightside (Mr. Blunkett). In the light of that, can my right hon. Friend arrange an early debate so as to get some sense into the BBC management for restoring the UK theme to Radio 4?

Mr. Hoon: The one thing that I notice about this particularly important debate is that it divides those who get up early from those who stay in bed. I know well from my hon. Friend's time in the Ministry of Defence that he is an early riser. I have always been impressed by how well the theme was put together. It is certainly a startling beginning to the day. It is important that people who are listeners to Radio 4 at that time in the morning are given the opportunity of expressing their views clearly. Unfortunately, I suspect that many people who are not up at that time in the morning are also expressing their views.

Stewart Hosie (Dundee, East) (SNP): The Leader of the House may be aware that the Scottish quarterly GDP figures were published yesterday, which are equivalent to the UK index of production. The figures show three consecutive quarters of falling manufacturing output, the manufacturing recession in Scotland. Given the three consecutive quarterly falls in manufacturing output, can the right hon. Gentleman organise an early statement from a Treasury Minister to explain what more can be done to turn around the competitive situation in the Scottish economy and end the manufacturing recession?

Mr. Hoon: We have just had Treasury questions and the hon. Gentleman would have had the opportunity of raising that matter with my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I am sure that he would have received a robust and prudent answer. The Government take the position of manufacturing industry extremely seriously. We have given a great deal of support, not least in relation to training and education to provide the British people with the appropriate skills to contribute to our highly successful manufacturing industry. Where there have been closures—I know that some have recently been announced in Scotland—a significant level of assistance is given to those companies to ensure that their work force have the opportunity of retraining and developing the skills that they require to participate in an economy that is still very healthy. As I have seen in my constituency, when closures occur they are a huge shock and worry to the people affected, but in the healthy economy that we have, it is remarkable that those people are able to get opportunities of retraining and, crucially, of finding alternative employment.

Mr. Peter Kilfoyle (Liverpool, Walton) (Lab): The Leader of the House may be impressed by the way that the UK theme is put together, but like many colleagues I am not very impressed by the way that the Criminal Records Bureau has been put together. It is a valuable resource, but it has been bedevilled by problems since its inception. Within the past couple of days in my area alone, I have come across three major bungles, including one of identity theft. Can the Leader of the House provide some space wherein we may debate how the Criminal Records Bureau is functioning, or at the very least, will he arrange for one of the Ministers at the Home Office to make a statement to the House?

Mr. Hoon: I certainly agree with my hon. Friend that it is important that everyone can rely with absolute certainty on the records and statistics compiled in relation to crime. I accept that from time to time there are difficulties in that respect. That is one of the reasons why, for example, the Home Office recently launched a review of the way in which criminal statistics are compiled. That does not entirely deal with my hon. Friend's concern about the accuracy of the information supplied by the CRB, but I know that the matter is taken extremely seriously in the Home Office and by my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary.

Greg Clark (Tunbridge Wells) (Con): May I support my right hon. Friend the Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May) in her request for the Secretary of State for Health to be brought to the House to explain the crisis in NHS financing? Two weeks ago the Department of Health said:

"There is no question of doctors being asked to play games to improve finances and we have always said that improving financial management does not mean compromising patient care".

In Tunbridge Wells operations are not taking place and out-patient appointments are not been given, except in urgent cases, until 31 March. That is compromising patient care, and it exposes the gulf in perception and understanding between Ministers and doctors and nurses on the ground, who are very concerned about that.

Mr. Hoon: If there were the kind of crisis that the hon. Gentleman describes, Ministers and Labour Members would share his concern, but he must face up to the fact that huge sums of extra money have been put into the national health service, including in Tunbridge Wells. It is important that those responsible for managing that extra money do so successfully. As I told the House earlier, if the Government were not taking action to ensure effective control of that extra finance, Opposition Members would be complaining about it. I accept that it is important to deal with these matters. From what I heard from the chief executive of the PCT on the radio this morning, action is being taken in Tunbridge Wells to deal with the situation.

Mr. Jim McGovern (Dundee, West) (Lab): My right hon. Friend will no doubt be aware of the early-day motion signed and tabled by members of the Scottish National party which states that Scottish hon. Members should not vote on issues that do not directly affect Scotland. May we have a debate on that motion, which would allow the Scottish National party in particular to tell us how the Government of Wales Bill directly affects Scotland and why its Members felt compelled to vote on such burning Scottish issues as the name of the Welsh Assembly?

Mr. Hoon: My hon. Friend has made his point more effectively than I can, but as someone who believes in the Union and in the importance of the House reflecting opinion right across the United Kingdom, and who does not believe in separation and independence in the way in which the Scottish nationalists do, I believe that that is the best for this country and the best future for this country.

Mr. Peter Robinson (Belfast, East) (DUP): Will the Leader of the House reflect on the wisdom of tabling a motion for Wednesday 8 February to provide funds for IRA-Sinn Fein, and not only to provide them with the representative funds that they had on a previous occasion, but to give them a bonus of the Short funds? I expect that the Government know the outrage in Northern Ireland at the fact that at a time when IRA-Sinn Fein continue to use the proceeds of the largest bank heist ever to take place in the British Isles, and while the police are reporting the high level of criminality within the republican movement, the Government intend to reward them.

Mr. Hoon: Having just indicated my support for the Union and the importance of ensuring that the views of all parts of the United Kingdom are properly reflected in our debates here, I hope that the hon. Gentleman will accept from me that it is vital that we encourage organisations that have in the past engaged in terrorist activity to participate effectively and peacefully in the work of this country. We shall have the opportunity to debate these questions and vote on them on 8 February. This is a matter for the House to decide, and one that I am sure will be fully and thoroughly debated on that occasion.

Julie Morgan (Cardiff, North) (Lab): Is my right hon. Friend aware that the Legal Services Commission has announced the ending of all its specialist support services from July this year, without there being any apparent immediate replacement? The Welsh specialist support service provides expert advice to solicitors and front-line advisers on issues such as housing, debt and welfare benefits. Those issues are all tremendously important in Wales because of the poor housing stock and the pockets of deprivation there. Will my right hon.

Friend arrange a debate on this matter, so that we can discuss whether this decision can be reversed? It is causing extreme concern in Wales.

Mr. Hoon: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for raising this issue. It is a matter with which I am familiar from previous ministerial responsibilities, and I know how important such specialist advice services are. I will certainly ensure that the Minister of State, Department for Constitutional Affairs, my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Camberwell and Peckham (Ms Harman), is made aware of my hon. Friend's concerns.

John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): May we please have a debate on brain tumours, with particular reference to early-day motion 1424?

[That this House notes that 16,000 people, including 450 children, each year are diagnosed with brain tumours; is disturbed that brain tumours have become the biggest single disease killing children; acknowledges that survival rates have not increased in line with the rate for childhood leukaemia and some other adult cancers; applauds the work of scientists and clinicians; supports the efforts of United Kingdom brain tumour charities which support research and raise awareness of issues surrounding brain tumour care; further notes that NHS expenditure on brain tumour patients is well below that devoted to other cancers; recognises the problems faced by brain tumour patients in accessing treatment; seeks improved NHS funding and care, including approved access to radiotherapy and rehabilitation services and treatments, such as carmustine implants and temozolomide, which are better tolerated, offer the best hope of improved survival and/or rehabilitation; and calls upon the National Institute for Clinical Health and Excellence to act quickly to approve clinically and cost effective new treatments so that they are available to all NHS patients.]

Given that 16,000 people a year are diagnosed with brain tumours, and that such tumours have now overtaken leukaemia as the biggest single cancer killer of children, would the Leader of the House accept that a debate on the matter would allow hon. Members to express their concern at the preliminary recommendation of the National Institute for Health and Clinical Excellence that carmustine implants and temozolomide should not be used in the treatment of newly diagnosed high-grade glioma? There is widespread concern about this issue, and the denial of such treatments would be a savage blow. The matter ought to be aired fully on the Floor of the House, sooner rather than later.

Mr. Hoon: The hon. Gentleman has made his point with his characteristic fairness and shown detailed knowledge of the issue. I suspect that, now that he has done so, we shall not need a debate on the subject. Nevertheless, I assure him that that matter is taken extremely seriously by the Government. We have sought always to support hon. Members' concerns about the way in which treatment in the national health service is distributed. There will be an opportunity for the hon. Gentleman to raise the issue again next week in Health questions. This issue is always taken very seriously by the Government.

Mr. David Chaytor (Bury, North) (Lab): If it were possible to have a debate on international women's day, as my hon. Friend the Member for Stevenage (Barbara Follett) suggested, it would provide an opportunity to press the case for proper payment for the post of Minister for Women and Equality. It would also provide an opportunity to remind the House that, until very recently, the Tory shadow Minister for Women and Equality was actually a man.

What I really wanted to ask my right hon. Friend was whether he would endorse the calls for a debate on the Post Office, and particularly on the way in which it renews its franchises. My constituency has been without either a sub-post office or a main post office for nine months, in spite of frequent correspondence between me and the Post Office, and between the leader of the local council and the Post Office. Does my right hon. Friend agree that that is completely unacceptable? May we have a debate on the Post Office to consider all these controversial issues?

Mr. Hoon: I think it is fair to say that questions of ministerial remuneration are above my pay grade—one step above my pay grade, anyway. Nevertheless, I will certainly ensure that that matter is drawn to the attention of the appropriate person. On the question of post offices, I do not believe that I can add to what I have already said to the House on that matter. It is an important issue, and the Government take it very seriously. It has been an issue over a number of years, and I believe that the Government have found the right answer, but that answer will need to be updated in the light of changing circumstances. That is the Government's position.

Lorely Burt (Solihull) (LD): May we have a debate on the level and allocation of this year's revenue support grant for local government? It cannot be right that some of the most deprived areas in the country, in the borough of Solihull, receive £237.86, while next door in Birmingham the rate is almost double at £560.40. We need a debate on the Floor of the House so that we can discuss that gross imbalance in local government finance.

Mr. Hoon: It will take place on 6 February.

Mr. Lindsay Hoyle (Chorley) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend allow a debate on Lancashire county council's disgraceful proposal to withdraw funds for hot meals from the Women's Royal Voluntary Service? Thousands of volunteers in Lancashire go out to ensure that old-age pensioners have a hot meal during the week. It is not just the hot meal that those pensioners require; it is the contact with those who visit. All that is being put at risk for the sake of a few thousand pounds.

Mr. Hoon: I share my hon. Friend's admiration for the excellent work of the meals on wheels service. It does a tremendous job up and down the country, and I am sure that it does a tremendous job in Lancashire. My hon. Friend has made his point, and I entirely agree with him.

Grant Shapps (Welwyn Hatfield) (Con): Jack Saywood, a 14-year-old in my constituency, found that his details were on the national DNA database, although he had committed no crime whatever. It was purely a case of mistaken identity. I was shocked to discover that 24,000 other people were in exactly the same position—all of them children who had never committed a crime. Their details should be removed from the database. Will the Leader of the House ask a Minister to come to the House and tell us when they will be removed?

Mr. Hoon: I have seen a number of references to the issue in the media. The hon. Gentleman has been assiduous in raising the case of his constituent and other such cases. My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary is currently considering the matter.

Rob Marris (Wolverhampton, South-West) (Lab): The Leader of the House may know that some avaricious train operating companies are talking of getting rid of saver tickets. The first-class return fare from my constituency is about £182, the standard return fare is about £105, and the saver ticket—which I try to buy to save the taxpayer money—costs £37.50. May we have an early statement from the Secretary of State for Transport?

Mr. Hoon: I have seen a number of rather mischievous headlines on the subject, and I have had cause to discuss it with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. I understand that the Department for Transport remains committed to saver tickets and to off-peak travel. The Government's ambition, in which we have largely succeeded, is to ensure that more and more people use our railways, and that will continue to be the case.

Mr. John Hayes (South Holland and The Deepings) (Con): As the Leader of the House will know, in December schools across Britain received important assessment and performance data which is considered vital both by schools and by Ofsted. It has become clear that that data was flawed and misleading. Students who received A* results at GCSE were counted as failures, and GNVQs were not included at all.

The Department for Education and Skills has said that it will withdraw and reissue the data. I want to know from the Department—I hope that the Leader of the House will arrange for a statement accordingly—how that fundamental error occurred and what it has cost the taxpayer. I also want to elicit an apology to all the teachers and students whose efforts and achievements were disregarded by the Government, and, if I may, the definition according to a simple—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. If it helps the Leader of the House, I know that the hon. Gentleman wants a dictionary definition.

Mr. Hoon: I am grateful for your consideration, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will drop a note to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Skills, whose responsibility that is. I take entirely seriously the concerns that the hon. Gentleman has expressed. This needs to be thoroughly looked at and investigated, and I am sure that my right hon. Friend will be contacting him about it.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): May I refer my right hon. Friend to early-day motion 1481, which refers to the dispute within the Department for Work and Pensions?

[That this House notes with concern that members of the PCS trade union working in the Department for Work and Pensions (DWP) have felt that they have no other option but to take industrial action in the face of the Government's proposals for 30,000 job cuts and the adverse effect this is having on the DWP's services; further notes the staffing requirements of the Government's incapacity benefit reforms and that the DWP is running ahead of its job reduction target having already cut 15,000 jobs; and therefore calls upon the Government to introduce a moratorium on job cuts within the Department to enable an objective assessment to take place, in full consultation with the unions and service users concerned, of the DWP's staffing needs for delivering services.]

Today and tomorrow, a number of members of the Public and Commercial Services Union are out on strike because of the job cuts that have been imposed in their Department. Is it not appropriate that we discuss those job cuts in this place, ensure that union members are properly consulted and treated with dignity, and, more particularly, realise that those who use jobcentres and other such services within the benefit service need the best reception from people working in the service? Maybe this is not the way to go ahead. We should treat those people with dignity, because disputes do not help anyone.

Mr. Hoon: My hon. Friend is right. It is important that those who provide a vital public service are properly consulted. As I understand it, they have been. It is important that we ensure that proper support is given in the important work that they do, but may I make it clear to him that the adjustment in numbers in the service is directly the result of the significant reduction in unemployment and the significant technological improvements in the delivery of the service? I am sure he accepts very fairly that the money we devote to the Department is best paid to those who are in need of its assistance. That has to mean a balance between those who work in the service and, crucially, those who receive the benefits. Obviously, the more money available for benefits, the better the service will be.

Dr. William McCrea (South Antrim) (DUP): Can the Leader of the House find time for a debate on the review of public administration in Northern Ireland? The Government propose to remove the 26 borough, city and district councils and replace them with seven regional councils. That proposal is supported only by Sinn Fein-IRA. When will the Government unlock themselves from Sinn Fein-IRA and back the democrats?

Mr. Hoon: May I invite the hon. Gentleman to stand back a little from the rhetoric and consider the proposal? I will give him the same answer that I have just given my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew): in the delivery of all public services, whether national services of the kind dealt with by the Department for Work and Pensions or local government services, it is crucial that as much as possible of the money provided by the taxpayer is spent on the service, and as little as possible on unnecessary bureaucratic support. The more sensible and rational the delivery arrangements, the better it is for his constituents and those of all Members of the House.

Mr. Clive Betts (Sheffield, Attercliffe) (Lab): Can my right hon. Friend arrange an early debate on the future of regional casinos? Before the election, the House concluded that there could be regeneration benefits from such casinos and that we should run a pilot scheme, but, unfortunately, we agreed that that pilot should be simply one project. I am not sure that I could find one Member of the House who now thinks that one is the right number. What might work in an old industrial area such as the lower Don valley in my constituency will not necessarily work in seaside resorts or in London. Can we have a debate so that we can reach a sensible conclusion? Yes, we should have a pilot project, but the number involved should be eight, not one.

Mr. Hoon: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for raising that issue. I recognise the importance of those questions for a number of areas that are looking to achieve the regeneration benefits that the provision of larger casinos can provide. I assure him that I will ensure that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport responds to him directly.

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): The right hon. Gentleman is an excellent and assiduous Leader of the House, so he will be aware that there is rising public concern about the funding of children's hospices. I know he will be sympathetic to this concern as well: some children's hospices get just 2 per cent. of their funding from the authorities, the rest having to be raised through charitable good-cause work by excellent volunteers. Is he expecting the Secretary of State for Health to come to the House in the near future to make an announcement on Government policy changes on the funding of children's hospices?

Mr. Hoon: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his comments, surprising though they are, and for raising that issue. I have been routinely involved not in the question of children's hospices, but in supporting a local hospice. I know—he put it better than I can—the excellent work done by volunteers, with the support of the national health service, in hospices up and down the country. He is right to draw attention to the work that they do.

Keith Vaz (Leicester, East) (Lab): Could we have an early debate on the progress of the Lisbon agenda? In six weeks' time, there will be a European business summit, at which EU leaders will look at the progress of the agenda over the last five years. We have reached seven of the 17 quantifiable benchmarks, whereas France has reached only three. Could we have a debate on this important issue?

Mr. Hoon: My hon. Friend worked assiduously as an effective Minister for Europe in promoting the Lisbon agenda, something that has been at the top of the Government's agenda for the EU. Providing that we continue to concentrate on the forward-looking programme that Lisbon set out—not least because it emphasises the importance to Europe and the EU of concentrating our scarce resources on investment in skills and training and on the challenge of competing with far-eastern economies—that is still the Government's agenda, and we want to see progress. But, obviously, we must persuade our partners to put the same emphasis on it as we do.

Tim Loughton (East Worthing and Shoreham) (Con): Despite being dropped from yesterday's business, and despite the fact that we finished in Committee early, back in mid-December, the Childcare Bill still does not feature in forthcoming business. Will the Leader of the House explain why that business was mysteriously dropped and replaced with a Bill that collapsed early yesterday in any case? Also, the Children and Adoption Bill, which left the other House back in November, still has to rear its head in this House. When might we see it? May I return yet again to the subject of the Mental Health Bill, which for three years has been in draft form one, draft form two and at the pre-legislative Scrutiny Committee stage, and still we have no mention of it? Is it going to appear in this Session or not?

Mr. Hoon: I take the hon. Gentleman's observations as being a considerable tribute to the energy, hard work and determination of the Government in passing a whole series of important measures to improve child care and mental health in this country, but each has to take its place in a crowded and busy programme, one that the Government will deliver during this Session, as we have set out. Obviously, the management of the business is a sometimes difficult and challenging task and that is something that business managers must take account of in bringing business to this House.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): The minerals extraction and building materials industry is economically crucial to north-west Leicestershire and to the UK as a whole in the role that it plays in delivering new and improved infrastructure, public buildings, economic growth and so on. In light of the seriously slowed construction product activity in my area, is it not time that we had a debate on the progress towards the Government's key targets? There is a debate next Wednesday on transport in Opposition time. Could we have a debate on housing in Government time within the next two or three weeks? Also, what has happened to the Health Bill? Has it disappeared in a puff of smoke?

Mr. Hoon: I know that my hon. Friend would accept that the construction industry has boomed in recent years as a result of considerable Government investment in new hospitals, roads and schools, providing a range of opportunities for the industry. Necessarily that has implications for my hon. Friend's constituency. On the Health Bill, I hope not to delay my hon. Friend too long on a matter on which we will be able to give information to the House in due course.

David Howarth (Cambridge) (LD): I was glad to hear the Leader of the House say that he would like to see more debates on the health service in this House. May I therefore ask him for a debate on mental health services in this country, in which the Government could explain to my constituents why, yesterday, our primary care trust announced cuts of nearly £3 million in mental health funding?

Mr. Hoon: I recognise that the hon. Gentleman has taken up these issues on previous occasions and he is right to point out that, sadly, mental health has not always received the focus within the NHS that it deserves. That is something that the Government are determined to put right. I cannot answer his specific constituency point but I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health will be able to do so.

Andrew Miller (Ellesmere Port and Neston) (Lab): My right hon. Friend might have seen an article in The Daily Telegraph today that reports that "three Appeal Court judges ruled that publication of" certain

"documents by the newspaper was in the public interest and that their authenticity had never been challenged."

Would it not be helpful if those documents were made available to the Library and if we had a debate on the public interest issues to which that article refers?

Mr. Hoon: My right hon. and hon. Friends are showing more than considerable skill in bowling obscure balls to me this morning. I have not had the joy of reading The Daily Telegraph today, but no doubt I will do so in due course, and I will be able to answer my hon. Friend's question more effectively.

Mr. Ben Wallace (Lancaster and Wyre) (Con): Some three weeks ago, the Government announced by written statement that they would begin the process of privatising Qinetiq. Today, they published the brochure, effectively, for investors. Will the Leader of the House consider having a debate or asking the Secretary of State to make a statement on the future of Qinetiq? A number of questions need to be answered, such as why members of the British public are being denied a right to buy a stake in the company when it is floated, whether it is likely that the chief executive will get a £22 million bonus for a £150,000 investment, and what protection there is from the family secrets being flogged to the highest bidder overseas.

Mr. Hoon: The hon. Gentleman could have raised all those questions in Defence questions earlier this week, but I am grateful that he has saved them up for today. Certainly, it is important that the British taxpayer gets the best value from such sales. It is somewhat ironic that Conservative Members are raising questions of privatisation in relation to something that was done in a proper, perfectly competitive way, unlike some privatisations, of which I could give him a long list. I will simply park that. What is vital is that the process delivers the best return for the British taxpayer while safeguarding important research done by British scientists. That was part of the original way in which Qinetiq was organised. As well as the return to the British taxpayer, I am sure that the hon. Gentleman would want to see that the money invested through Qinetiq delivers material that can be sold competitively and used for the greater interest of the British taxpayer. I assure him that that is the position.

If I may deal with this point, the hon. Gentleman has revealed that he is a regular reader of The Daily Telegraph. I think that even readers of The Daily Telegraph would accept that what is important is to deliver the best return to the British taxpayer. This arrangement will do that.

Mr. Mark Lancaster (North-East Milton Keynes) (Con): Can we have an early debate on the future funding of fire authorities? Buckinghamshire fire authority has one of the lowest precepts in the country, and yet no account has been taken by Government of the rapid expansion of Milton Keynes. In addition, the blanket 5 per cent. cap disproportionately affects low-charging authorities such as Buckinghamshire rather than higher-charging authorities elsewhere in the country.

Mr. Hoon: I have indicated that there will shortly be opportunities to discuss local government financing. The hon. Gentleman is right to raise the important issue of the fire precept. The Government keep such matters under constant review. Where there are changes in population, the ways in which financial assistance is calculated are appropriately adjusted.

Mr. Nigel Dodds (Belfast, North) (DUP): The Leader of the House will be aware that his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland has said that he is considering withdrawing emoluments and allowances to Members of the Northern Ireland Assembly, because even though they do their representative work, they do not engage in the Assembly. How on earth, therefore, can the Government justify bringing forward a motion to restore allowances, and increase them, for Sinn Fein Members for their representative work, when they do not attend the House? Will the Leader of the House give a commitment on behalf of the Government that if the Independent Monitoring Commission report confirms that, as the Chief Constable remarked recently, the IRA is still involved actively in criminality in Northern Ireland, he will withdraw the motion?

Mr. Hoon: That is an opportunity for the House to determine important questions about allowances, and I am not making observations about other institutions. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland has made clear the importance of finding a way back to the arrangements that previously operated in Northern Ireland. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman shares that determination, but I accept his argument entirely. If organisations are not committed to a peaceful process and to democratic work, they should not be entitled to those allowances.

Mark Pritchard (The Wrekin) (Con): Will the Leader of the House find time for a debate on laser weapons? Is he aware that they can act not only as a useful offensive weapon but as a defensive measure against incoming missiles?

Mr. Hoon: Yes, I am aware of that.

Mr. Graham Stuart (Beverley and Holderness) (Con) rose—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman came in very late. If hon. Members want to ask a question following a statement, including the business statement, they must come in to hear the statement. If he comes in early next week, I will call him early on.

Afghanistan

The Secretary of State for Defence (John Reid): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a statement about the deployment of our armed forces to Afghanistan.

Just over four years ago, on 11 September 2001, we were given a brutal lesson in the consequences of leaving Afghanistan in the hands of the Taliban and the terrorists. Since then, we in this country have been at the forefront of the international effort, under the auspices of the United Nations, to defeat international terrorism, to free Afghanistan from the ruthless grip of the Taliban and to rid the country of the menace of the terrorists and the greed of the drug traffickers.

That will not be achieved by military means alone. Therefore, although today's statement deals with the military elements of the deployment, the British Government have undertaken an unprecedented degree of cross-governmental co-ordination to ensure that this is a fully integrated package addressing governance, security and political and social change. I am grateful for the involvement of my right hon. Friends the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, the Chief Secretary to the Treasury and the Secretary of State for International Development.

Last September, I visited Afghanistan. I saw for myself the real hope that the international community has brought to a new generation of Afghans: the hope that at last the Afghan people can rebuild their country, the hope that Afghanistan can take its rightful place as a country where men and women alike can live in peace and freedom, the hope for a better future.

We cannot risk losing those achievements. We cannot risk Afghanistan again becoming a sanctuary for terrorists. We have seen where that leads, be it in New York or in London. We cannot ignore the opportunity to bring security to a fragile but vital part of the world, and we cannot go on accepting Afghan opium being the source of 90 per cent. of the heroin that is applied to the veins of the young people of this country. For all those reasons, it is in our interests, as the United Kingdom and as a responsible member of the international community, to act.

In helping Afghanistan, we cannot look to resolve just one of those issues. Everything connects. Stability depends on a viable, legitimate economy. That depends on rooting out corruption and finding real alternatives to the harvesting of opium. That means helping Afghanistan to develop judicial systems, her infrastructure and the capability to govern herself effectively, which in turn brings stability and security.

That is where there is a clear role for the military: helping to create and to maintain a framework of security on which legitimate Afghan institutions can grow and thrive. NATO, through its leadership of the international security assistance force, itself under the auspices of the UN, has a major role to play in making that happen.

Thanks to NATO's leadership, ISAF has already expanded its activities to cover the north and west of Afghanistan, at the request of the democratically elected Afghan Government and with the authorisation of the United Nations. It now stands on the brink of expanding its operations into southern Afghanistan as part of a planned, pre-envisaged and phased expansion—stage 3. I believe NATO is now in a position to take those plans forward.

Our allies are playing their part in ISAF. In the north we shall hand over responsibilities to Germany, Finland, Sweden and Norway; in the west Italy and Spain lead ISAF, and Lithuania and the US also provide forces; and in the south the US, Canada and Romania already have troops stationed, Estonia has pledged forces, the Danish Parliament is examining a proposal to send forces—I spoke to its Minister this morning—and we are optimistic that the Dutch, whose Minister I also spoke to this morning, will also deploy forces. In addition, Australia and New Zealand may provide forces. This truly is and will be an international, multinational effort. On the ground and in the air, this is a truly multidimensional, international force. The US, for example, has offered to provide attack helicopters and support helicopters, and we know other countries are considering providing fast jets and transport aircraft.

We need that broad level of international support as the context in which to commit our British troops. We need the capabilities and the forces because ISAF expansion is no easy or small task in stage 3. Southern Afghanistan is undeniably a more demanding area in which to operate than either the north or the west. The Taliban remains active. The authority of the Afghan Government—and the reach of their security forces—is still weak. The influence of the drugs traffickers, by contrast, is strong.

ISAF must be prepared to meet these challenges. It means different forces and it may mean different tactics—not because we want to wage war: that is not our aim. Provincial reconstruction teams, building up Afghanistan's capacity, will remain at the core of ISAF's expansion into the south, just as it was in the north and west. But just as the threat is greater, so must be our ability and willingness to deter and defend ourselves against attack. The capabilities and experience of our armed services, to whom I again today pay tribute, make us well placed to help ISAF do both.

We have previously announced our decision to deploy the headquarters group of the Allied Rapid Reaction Corps to lead ISAF from May 2006 to February 2007. ISAF, via NATO, will be under a British commander, General Richards. It will be supported by elements of 1 Signal Brigade, including troops from 7 and 16 Signal Regiments and the Allied Rapid Reaction Corps Support Battalion. This alone means a commitment of over 1,000 troops towards the headquarters based in and around Kabul.

We are also preparing for a deployment to southern Afghanistan. Next month 39 Regiment, Royal Engineers will deploy to Helmand province to build an encampment for our main deployment. A company from 42 Commando Royal Marines will provide protection and three CH-47 Chinook support helicopters from 18(B) Squadron, Royal Air Force, will offer essential lift and mobility in Afghanistan terrain largely without roads. All told, between now and July we shall send some 850 additional personnel to help prepare for our main deployment. That main deployment will have at its heart a new British-led PRT at Lashkar Gar, the capital of

[John Reid]

Helmand province. As in the north, the PRT will be based on a triumvirate of the British military commander, and officials from the Foreign and Commonwealth Office and from the Department for International Development respectively. So we are working to ensure that we provide Afghanistan with a seamless package of democratic, political, developmental and military assistance in Helmand. All of that is necessary to ensure that international terrorism never again has a base in Afghanistan.

We are also working to make sure that our goals are Afghan goals, too. Assisting Afghan counter-narcotics initiatives is an obvious example. If we help them, we help ourselves at the same time. As I mentioned earlier, 90 per cent. of the heroin injected into the veins of young people in this country originates in Afghanistan. Helmand province is the largest single source of opium in Afghanistan. We can help to train Afghan counter-narcotics forces and support their operations, and we can provide intelligence. We can assist the Afghan Government in explaining their policies to the people. Above all, we can, along with the support of the Afghans, create the environment in which economic development and institutional reform—I again emphasise that both are essential to the elimination of the opium industry—can take place.

So the range of tasks for the provincial reconstruction team is large. It will form part of a larger, more than 3,300-strong British force providing the security framework. That force will itself come under a new Multinational Brigade (South), which will initially be under Canadian, alternating with British, command. Our contribution, the Helmand taskforce, will include elements of the headquarters of 16th Air Assault Brigade, and an airborne infantry battlegroup. Based initially around the 3rd Battalion the Parachute Regiment, it will incorporate a force consisting of eight Apache attack helicopters, provided by the 9th Regiment Army Air Corps. That will be the first time that we have deployed this impressive new capability on an operation. The 9th Regiment will also supply four Lynx light utility helicopters, while 27 Squadron Royal Air Force will provide a detachment of six Chinook support helicopters.

Other major units and capabilities include Scimitar and Spartan armoured vehicles from the Household Cavalry Regiment; a battery of 105 mm light guns from 7th Parachute Regiment Royal Horse Artillery; a battery of Desert Hawk unmanned aerial vehicles from 32 Regiment Royal Artillery; 13th Air Assault Regiment and 29 Regiment Royal Logistics Corps; 7th Battalion Royal Electrical and Mechanical Engineers; and 16 Close Support Medical Regiment. We shall also deploy four additional RAF C-130 Hercules transport aircraft. It is a substantial package—one that the chiefs of staff have agreed is necessary in order to maximise our chances and minimise our danger.

We aim for these deployments to be fully operational by July this year. The total number of our troops in Afghanistan—those already there, those at the new ISAF headquarters, the Helmand taskforce and the temporary surge engineering capability—will fluctuate over the next few months. It will peak, briefly, at some 5,700, before reducing to fewer than 4,700 as—according to current plans—the engineers building the encampments return home from Helmand in July, and our Harrier GR7 detachment withdraws in June. Our forces will then comprise those needed to command ISAF, some 300 troops engaged in support and training tasks in Kabul, and the Helmand taskforce. Predominantly, they will consist of regular troops. There will, however, be a small number of reservists, most of whom will be drawn from the Royal Rifle Volunteers or from the 4th Battalion Parachute Regiment.

I want to make a few things clear. The size and structure of the task force has been guided by a careful assessment of the likely tasks and threats that it will face. What matters is that we put the right forces in to do the job and to do it safely and well, and I make no apology if that requires more soldiers than some people initially envisaged.

Attack helicopters are certainly formidable, but they are also necessary. The roads in Helmand are very poor, and that means that support helicopters are essential. They in turn need attack helicopters to protect them and the forces that they deploy. Let me stress once more: we are deploying this potent force to protect and deter. The ISAF mission is unchanged. It is focused on reconstruction.

The resources for this deployment will be made available. This will be a three- year deployment, and it will cost around £1 billion over a five-year period. The resources will be made available, commencing in this financial year.

As I said earlier, we have a clear strategic interest in the renewal of Afghanistan. Obviously, that informed our decision. Equally, we have similar interests elsewhere, and an interest in maintaining effective and capable armed forces. We took careful account of those factors as well, including our other commitments. This deployment is manageable alongside those other, wider commitments, including Iraq. It does not require drawdown in Iraq. As we have said continually, that will be based on conditions in Iraq itself.

The House will be interested to hear about the command and control arrangements. To begin with, the multinational brigade as it arrives in Afghanistan in transitional format will come under the coalition. That is a necessary transitional measure, and is what happened when we established our first PRT in the northern city of Mazar-e Sharif in 2003. Of course, Canadian, Romanian and US forces are already serving in the south of the country. However, other allies, such as Denmark, Estonia and, I hope, the Netherlands need time to build up sufficient forces in southern Afghanistan to implement ISAF's expansion into the region, just as we do. I therefore anticipate that later this year, at the earliest opportunity after the transitional period, ISAF will take control of the forces in the south from the coalition. That will happen during our command of ISAF. The Kandahar headquarters of the Helmand taskforce will alternate between Canadian and British command, but will ultimately come under the command of the ISAF headquarters. In turn, the ISAF headquarters will be commanded by the British general in command of the allied rapid reaction force headquarters that is moving there.

All of this has but one aim—a secure, stable, prosperous and democratic Afghanistan, free from terrorism and terrorist domination. The House will be concerned about the risks and dangers of the deployment. Whatever the difficulties and dangers—and I do not hide them from the House or the country—those risks are nothing compared to the dangers to our country and our people of allowing Afghanistan to fall back into the hands of the Taliban and international terrorism.

We will not allow that, and the Afghan people will not allow that. They have already made great strides towards achieving a new future. They have a democratically elected President and Parliament, and democratically elected assemblies. Their legitimate economy is growing. Children—both boys and girls—are back at school, and refugees are returning home.

I am the first to accept that there is a long, long way to go. Extending ISAF into stage 3 in the south is a small but hugely significant step on the journey. This country has pledged to help the Afghan people as they continue on that journey. I am convinced that that is something that we should do to help, and that it is something that we will do.

Dr. Liam Fox (Woodspring) (Con): I am grateful to the Secretary of State for his necessarily long and detailed statement, and for making a copy available to the Opposition in advance. He was right at the outset to remind the House why we are in Afghanistan. We are there as part of the NATO response to the 9/11 attacks on the United States and as part of a wider coalition seeking to prevent Afghanistan from collapsing into a security vacuum that could so easily be filled by al-Qaeda and other terrorist groups. It is right to state in the House that we have a duty to stand with our allies—nations large and small that have joined the war on terror.

There are two unacceptable outcomes in Afghanistan—to fail to act or to act and fail. The slaughter in New York and London reminds us that our national security is best served by denying a breeding ground to those who are opposed to our way of life. So failure to act is not an option, but if we must act decisively, we must act effectively, since strategic failure would be a disaster. We need to know exactly what the mission is, what its objectives are and how success will be measured. Especially after Iraq, it is essential that the House asks detailed questions of the Government about the proposed deployment, and that the Government respond with clarity.

Let me begin with risk assessment. Our troops will be deployed to Helmand province, focusing on anti-narcotic and reconstruction activities. The Government have already described the situation as less benign than the norm, and the situation can worsen rapidly. Insurgents are mobile and may move to where ISAF troops are located. What assessment have the Government made of the current security status in the south of Afghanistan and in Helmand province specifically? How do the Government believe that the threat to our troops would change in the event of the appearance of either new insurgents or insurgents displaced from Iraq or other areas? Do the Government have any evidence that al-Qaeda is transferring operatives from other areas, notably Iraq, to Afghanistan, and what assessment have the Government made of the degree of interaction between insurgents and Iran, given that the Iranian border is only 150 miles away from Lashkar Gar, where the British troops will be stationed?

Let me ask about reconstruction. It would be wrong for the House to regard the reconstruction element as the easy road. Reconstruction will be a difficult task, as the tribal areas and the Afghan warlords do not share our view of how society should be constructed. Traditionally, successful Afghan Governments have been those with a light touch. What risk is there of our trying to apply a model of government suited to Kabul but unsuited to the southern provinces, and so creating resentment and hostility?

Let me ask a number of questions about the deployment. There is widespread support in the House for the strategic objectives—anti-narcotic, anti-insurgency and anti-terrorist—set out by the Government, but the Secretary of State will be well aware of widespread anxieties that the level of resources committed by ISAF may not be sufficient to achieve the stated objectives, and that we may consequently be drawn into an escalated conflict. How confident is the Secretary of State that the total complement of ISAF troops in Afghanistan is or will be sufficient to achieve the Government's objectives? How sure is he that all the necessary equipment will be available? Both the National Audit Office and the Defence Committee have identified a shortage of helicopter lift capacity. Has that been addressed? If so, how, and with what effect on other operations?

Then we come to the issues of command and control dealt with by the Secretary of State later in his statement. ISAF is a stabilisation force and as such is not geared for combat operations. Operation Enduring Freedom, however, is a counter-terrorism combat operation, and British troops will serve under both commands in Afghanistan and therefore operate under different rules of engagement. For example, under OEF, attacking insurgents can be shot at and pursued, but under ISAF rules of engagement, insurgents will not be pursued because that constitutes counter-terrorist activity. Even within ISAF, individual national contingents may operate their own specific rules of engagement different from ISAF's.

The Secretary of State said that we are deploying this potent force to protect and deter, but can he confirm that that does not include a counter-terrorism role? Does not that send dangerously mixed signals? Can he tell us what arrangements have been made for increased NATO-ISAF command integration with the US-led OEF? Is he satisfied with the clarity of the chain of command under which British troops will operate?

I said yesterday that we would want to know about the issue of prisoners. Can the Secretary of State tell us what powers of arrest and detention are available to British troops engaged in peacekeeping in Afghanistan, and how do they differ from those available to those acting under OEF command and those operating under ISAF command? What is the policy of NATO on the rendition of terror suspects detained by ISAF? What agreement, if any, has been reached between NATO and the Afghan Government relating to arrest and detention of suspects in Afghanistan? What assessment has he made of the effects of ISAF being integrated more closely in the longer term with OEF?

There are many other questions for the Government to answer on the tension between the anti-narcotic and anti-terrorist objectives, or training, or the overstretch effects on the British armed forces generally. For clarification, can the Secretary of State tell us if the £1 billion cost that he mentions will be met from reserves? Can he tell us how much money will be specifically earmarked to compensate the farmers he mentioned for decreased poppy production?

If the Secretary of State is unable to answer specific questions today, the House will expect clear answers before any deployment takes place. Every precaution must be taken to minimise the risk to our forces, whose courage and professionalism we salute today. The defence of our national security and the construction of a free and democratic Afghanistan are noble ideals. We cannot fail to act, but we cannot act and fail. It is in that respect that we will hold the Government to account, as is our duty.

John Reid: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his supportive posture, which is balanced by legitimate and critical questions. It is important that we examine those questions. I hope that I have examined most of them, but one of the benefits of a dialogue on the issue is if someone identifies questions that I should have asked, but have not. I do not regard that as a point scored, but a benefit, especially to the armed forces, because our questions should be searching. Therefore, if I have missed any of the hon. Gentleman's questions—I tried to scribble them down—I will write to him and, if he wishes, place the answers in the Library for other hon. Members to read.

The hon. Gentleman asked about whether the resources available are from the reserve, nd the answer to that is yes. He asked why there is a five-year plan when we are looking at three years, and the answer is because just as there is a build-up period, there is also a run-down period with preparations for people coming out. We have chosen an envelope that encompasses the envisaged three-year stay.

The hon. Gentleman asked an important question about resources for indirect build-up of infrastructure, including alternative livelihoods. That will be a long task. In the first instance, we will consider compensatory transitional payments and alternative livelihoods in the medium to longer term. I am grateful to the Department for International Development and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State who has spent so much time on this. A sum of the order of £20 million a year will be allocated to that specific area, some of it directly and much of it through Afghan Government projects. In addition, some $100 million is being spent a year and we have received assurances from the United States that that will continue for at least 18 months, so that is an additional amount. I am satisfied that the financial resources, which will complement our military intervention, are sufficient. However, how they are applied in terms of human beings working on the projects is, of course, dependent to some extent on the security situation, which is one of the reasons why we are there.

The hon. Gentleman asked how we handle prisoners at present and how they will be handled. At present, we hand prisoners over to the Afghanistan Government and we envisage that that will continue. We have done a considerable amount of work to examine the threats to the security situation that face us, which is why the task force is so configured, but, of course, we update it. We have taken account of developments in places such as Iraq, such as the changing nature of the improvised explosive devices that have been used there, so that we can reallocate resources. There has been small—some would say significant—cost growth precisely to allow for contingencies and to compensate for new threats that come in.

I confirm to the hon. Gentleman that the role is not counter-terrorist. However, I also confirm, as the House would want me to do, that if we are attacked while pursuing our reconstruction objectives and providing the framework for others so to do, including the Afghans, we will respond robustly. That is why we make a distinction between insurgency, or terrorist attacks on us, and a primarily counter-terrorist role. That role is a task for OEF.

The hon. Gentleman asked about the possible synergy between the ISAF role in stage 3 in the south and stage 4, which will attempt to bring together American forces and our armed forces. There are several ways of achieving that. One is to have a chain of command that results in a double-hatted commander under whom there are two single chains of command: one on anti-terrorism, which would be mainly led by the Americans, and the reconstruction one in which we are involved. Another alternative would be that as we successfully exclude the terrorists, compared with some years ago, American forces could transfer over to reconstruction and join ISAF in helping to rebuild the nation of Afghanistan. There are thus several options open to us, but we will keep clear lines of command.

The hon. Gentleman asked for clarity on numbers. I hope that we have given that clarity today. The total number of troops in Afghanistan through ISAF when stage 3 is completed will be about 18,500. The number of NATO troops in the south, including ours, will be 9,000. That is a hugely significant increase from the number of troops who are there are present.

I hope that I have covered most of the main points that the hon. Gentleman made—I have done so at some length I know, Madam Deputy Speaker—but as I said, I will check the record and if I have missed others, which are equally important, I will write to him.

Mr. Peter Kilfoyle (Liverpool, Walton) (Lab): The Secretary of State will be aware that our forces will face not only a resurgent Taliban, but a network of warlords throughout the whole of Afghanistan, many of whom are deeply involved in the pernicious heroin trade that exists in every province. He will also be aware that that trade has gone up by a factor of 20 in the past four years. That is why I am somewhat worried about the exact objectives when our troops are being deployed as a relatively small force—including the international component—in a country that has defied the US, the Russians and, historically, ourselves. How and when will he be able to measure whether the outcomes are successful? I do not expect anything specific, but on what criteria will he judge the success of our forces, who will be concentrated in one province of the huge country?

John Reid: I would make three points to my hon. Friend. He is quite right to point to the historical precedents, but as I said on Monday, there are two big differences between the Russian and previous British interventions, as well as those of other nations. First, we have been invited in by the Afghans themselves, including the country's democratically elected President and Government, which makes a big difference. Secondly, we are not there for imperialist reasons, unlike the situation during the several previous interventions, which the hon. Member for Louth and Horncastle (Sir Peter Tapsell) continually and correctly brings to our attention.

We are addressing not only one area because there is an incremental approach. Stage 1 was in the north and stage 2 is in the west. Stage 3 means that three quarters of Afghanistan will be covered. I fully accept that not every metre of it will be covered, but the more we go round the clock on the stages, the smaller the chances that we will end up just squeezing a balloon so that the air—the corruption and narcotics in this case—goes to another area.

I do not envisage that building a modern Afghanistan—which lacks a central corporate governance, in tradition and structure, unlike Iraq; which lacks a developed middle class, unlike Iraq; and which lacks the mineral resources of, say, Iraq—will be an easy or a short process. It will not be done during the three years in which we are there because there will be a continuing process for the Afghans themselves over many decades. I hope that we will be their friends and that we will support them over that period. I have no doubt that there will be other occasions when they will ask us for military assistance. We can make a significant difference in the south over three years by extending the writ of central Government, starting the development of alternative livelihoods and, at the end, having a force of the Afghan army and police in the order of 2,500 to 3,000 trained people, which would be similar to our numbers in Helmand. I think that my hon. Friend was asking whether there is an exit strategy for the deployment. Yes there is, and that is it.

Mr. Michael Moore (Berwickshire, Roxburgh and Selkirk) (LD): As I made clear yesterday, Liberal Democrats continue to back the international consensus of support on Afghanistan and agree with the aims set out by the Secretary of State in his comprehensive statement and the answers that he has given us thus far. Sadly, we cannot escape the fact that the country remains in a parlous state and that the new mission will be fraught with danger, especially in the south. We, like others, pay tribute to the bravery, professionalism and commitment of all the people who are to be deployed.

The Secretary of State has made it clear that the deployment will go ahead only if it satisfies three key criteria. The British contribution represents a huge deployment. As he said, it is bigger than we had been led to expect. Given our ongoing commitments in Iraq and elsewhere, how will we avoid serious overstretch in the armed forces? With the contributions from other NATO partners still not resolved, has he put a limit on the British forces that will be made available, or are we committed to plugging any gaps? As for economic and other assistance, is he saying that ahead of the London conference, commitments are in place to ensure that the country's next five-year development programme will be delivered?

John Reid: On the last point, I am sure that there will be commitments in place and I hope that further commitments will be made at the conference of which the hon. Gentleman speaks. The international community has a vested and enlightened self-interest in seeing Afghanistan prosper to such an extent that it is no longer a failed state that terrorists can use as a base for attacking the west.

The hon. Gentleman asked about plugging gaps over and beyond the troop numbers that I mentioned. No, we will not plug any gaps for others. I have spoken in the past 24 hours to Secretary Rumsfeld, the Secretary-General of NATO and my colleague the Dutch Defence Minister to tell them what we are planning and to say that we count on NATO. I am sure that NATO will provide all the means to fulfil the operational plans, including on numbers, but we will not fill the gaps for others.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned the state of Afghanistan itself. I have been sombre in my statement to the House, not because I think that we should lack resolution or will, but because it is right not to approach these matters with a gung-ho attitude, or any bravado. Such pessimism when studying the situation should not diminish our resolution when we decide to go in. We need 100 per cent. support for our troops and 100 per cent. will to carry this through. That will be there from the Government, and I am sure that it will be there among the vast majority of hon. Members.

Several hon. Members rose—

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): Order. I note that the Front-Bench spokesmen have taken about 40 minutes, and that many Back-Bench Members seek to be called. I ask that supplementary questions and the answers to them might be kept as short as possible because of the limited time that is available.

Mr. Chris Mullin (Sunderland, South) (Lab): As regards counter-narcotics, I know that there are no simple solutions. However, has my right hon. Friend examined the feasibility study prepared by the Senlis Council, a reputable think tank, on the possibility of growing opium under licence for the international medical market, as happens in one or two other countries, as an alternative to the search and destroy method that is favoured by our American allies?

John Reid: Yes, we have considered that possibility, but our conclusion is that it would be hugely difficult—it would be too difficult to police legitimate and illegitimate commerce in that area. We consider all such proposals, but that one has been examined and thus far rejected.

Mr. Iain Duncan Smith (Chingford and Woodford Green) (Con): The Secretary of State will recall that I asked a specific question yesterday. I feel that in part he has answered it and that in part he has not. I have a real concern that there is now a divide—and an artificial one—between the activities that we are about to undertake in Afghanistan. In part, our strategic view is the restitution of civil authority and so on in the province, but I think that the terms of our rules of engagement should be set around what the threat is rather than our strategic aims and objectives.

What concerns me distinctly is that the rules of engagement may lead us to be far too restrictive. On the ground, people will see our soldiers deployed as part of the programme of enduring freedom. If they are unable to act in line with that, they will be in deep danger. I say this as someone who has deployed and has often been concerned about the rules of engagement. I urge the Secretary of State to look again at this matter. Such confusion is deeply dangerous.

John Reid: It is because I know that that I listen to the right hon. Gentleman with such respect.

We are convinced—that is my military advisers, the chiefs of staff and so on—that our rules of engagement are sufficiently robust. They are not the same rules of engagement as those of everyone else in Afghanistan. We do not have the same caveats as everyone else in Afghanistan. I can understand the right hon. Gentleman's concern. As I have said, we think that the rules of engagement are sufficiently robust. Given the right hon. Gentleman's experience and his previous position as leader of the Conservative party, I would be more than happy if he wanted to visit the Ministry of Defence and to discuss the matter in detail with some of my military advisers, if he wants to reassure himself on this point. I repeat that we think that the rules are adequate and robust. If they prove not to be, we will strengthen them.

Mr. Dai Havard (Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney) (Lab): As my right hon. Friend will know, I visited Afghanistan last November with colleagues from the House. I had the privilege, under the armed forces parliamentary scheme, to visit 16th Air Assault Brigade and the various other elements of the battle group yesterday, and to see their planning and preparations for the deployment.

I also saw the Estonian troops and even the Dutch military, who are quite happy to engage in this deployment should their politicians allow them to do so.

I was told that the Air Assault Brigade were happy to test their new air manoeuvre capability. They felt that in this way they could dominate the ground sufficiently in order to carry out the task, but they wished that to be reviewed on a constant basis so that they would have adequate support in terms of helicopters in particular. In the event that the Dutch do not arrive, our personnel were also concerned to ensure that there was requisite combat air support in the form of fixed-wing aircraft and other assets.

John Reid: Yes, there will be. That is what we are insisting on. I am glad that my hon. Friend was at Operation Herrick yesterday. I will be there tomorrow. I am glad that he is able to convey to the House the morale and the resolution of our troops, which we would expect, and that of our allies.

Mr. Michael Ancram (Devizes) (Con): I thank the Secretary of State for his announcement today because it will relieve the concerns of many members of our armed forces and those of their families. That is an important point at this time.

Is it still the intention, as part of the ISAF deployment, that the Dutch troops will deploy to that part of Afghanistan between Kabul and Helmand, which I think is called the Oruzgan province, which is where many of the remnants of the Taliban reside? What would be the effect on our deployment, which the right hon. Gentleman has announced today, if the Dutch decided, either ministerially or through their Parliament, not to make that deployment, or if later, having made it, they decided to withdraw?

John Reid: The Oruzgan province is to the north. As I said, the Dutch Cabinet have unanimously decided that they wish to go ahead. The matter has to be discussed in their Parliament, although formal power does not actually lie there. However, there will be a discussion and a debate, in the way that we are having today. I believe that the Dutch will take a decision, but it is a sovereign decision for them. If they decide that they do not want to deploy there, we will have to find another way of doing that. I am confident that we will do so. We will not be plugging the gap, but the gap will be plugged.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North) (Lab): Recognising, as my right hon. Friend has said, that the choice at this moment is between the continuing military role of the international community or the return of the Taliban fanatics, will the United States, in particular, be extremely careful over their intelligence, bearing in mind that some two weeks ago there was a bombing raid, and all the evidence seems to suggest that the victims, including young children, were innocent? Hearts and minds are involved in this campaign, and that includes the way that prisoners are interrogated by the Afghan authorities. I hope that all that will be very much borne in mind.

John Reid: I am sure that it is by the United States. It is always a dreadfully difficult task to balance the fight against a dreadful enemy who is unconstrained by any morality, any conventional norms of international standards and any Geneva convention. They will demean people, degrade them and show them publicly, and they are increasingly behaving in that manner. At the same time, we are fighting to a set of standards under scrutiny by the media, under international legalities, under human rights and other standards. It is always difficult to get the balance right. I would merely say that we and our allies, the United States and others, try to get the balance right continuously. I know that it is always on our mind, but we try to ensure that it does not unduly constrain our troops. In the long run, the maintenance of such standards strategically is a source of legitimacy and strength to us, and that is why we take such care.

Sir Malcolm Rifkind (Kensington and Chelsea) (Con): The invasion of Afghanistan, unlike the invasion of Iraq, was necessary and right, and the Government deserve our full support. Will the Secretary of State recognise that the distinction between NATO's reconstruction efforts and the counter-insurgency efforts that are led by the United States, which was always difficult to reconcile and always seemed artificial and implausible, is now infinitely more difficult to sustain if NATO troops are to be deployed to the south of Afghanistan? As the right hon. Gentleman has recognised, they may have to deal with insurgency attacks upon them. Will he therefore give slightly greater urgency than his initial remarks implied to working with our allies to try to ensure as quickly as possible some form of unified command?

John Reid: Obviously, I do not accept the premise of the right hon. and learned Gentleman's remarks, but I think that beyond that premise and his comments about Iraq he makes an important point. I do not think that it is impossible to distinguish between a mission that is led by a counter-terrorist objective and one that is led by rebuilding and re-capacity provincial reconstruction team-style objectives.

Of course, it is impossible to distinguish absolutely between the two objectives, especially if terrorists are attacking and there are insurgency attacks. I reassure the House that if terrorists and insurgents attack us, we will defend ourselves. They would be attacked back. There is no question about that. That is not a matter of caveats. We are not going there to be the armed wing of Oxfam or anything of that nature. If we are attacked, the British forces will defend themselves. On the other hand, their primary task or main task is not to seek and destroy terrorists—the United States are leading that mission. I think that as they successfully exclude terrorists and the reconstruction task force, ISAF—NATO—moves round the clock of Afghanistan, there will be a closer synergy. How that is done is a matter for discussion. However, I will discuss the matter continuously, as I have been doing, with our allies. Some are more reluctant than others to see that achieved.

Dr. Roberta Blackman-Woods (City of Durham) (Lab): I welcome my right hon. Friend's statement, especially ahead of the London conference on Afghanistan next week. Does he agree that in developing its peace-building strategy, the United Nations has emphasised the need for the task of maintaining security to go hand in hand with development and reconstruction? Will my right hon. Friend therefore assure the House that the troops that are sent to Afghanistan will not only maintain security, important though that is in the difficult terrain of south Afghanistan, but assist in reconstruction, and will he join me in reminding the House that it is important that we see though our commitment to Afghanistan and to the new democratically elected Government, as they seek to carry out the difficult task of building the country's infrastructure, services and employment base?

John Reid: Absolutely. As I said earlier, military means, though a necessary condition for success, are not a sufficient condition. We will provide the security framework within which the reconstruction of Afghanistan can take place. That is why, if we are countering narcotics and withdrawing some of the income, it is so important that there should be alternative livelihoods. People do not willingly starve to death in a state of grace. There must be something more at the end of it to allow them to maintain their families, so we must complement the intervention of the Afghan military with alternative means of livelihood.

Bob Russell (Colchester) (LD): As the Secretary of State knows, 3,000 troops from 16th Air Assault Brigade are taking part in Exercise Herrick Eagle, although less than two weeks ago the Minister of State for the armed forces stated that "it does not mean that these units . . . will be committed to Southern Afghanistan in 2006."

The announcement from the Secretary of State today confirms that that will happen. When will the deployment commence? How long will the 3rd Battalion the Parachute Regiment and elements of the headquarters of 16th Air Assault Brigade be based in Afghanistan? Does that not yet again illustrate the overstretch? When will the right hon. Gentleman address that principal problem?

John Reid: First, if the hon. Gentleman will allow me to say so, that was a classic case of a series of non sequiturs, each of which was intrinsically mistaken, and which, compounded together, were one big mistake. Because people start contingent preparations, it does not mean that it is inevitable that a decision will be taken to deploy them. The decision to deploy 16th Air Assault Brigade was not taken when we started the contingency preparations. It was taken this morning. Matters could have been otherwise, even as late as the past week or two. Secondly, there is no contradiction between our other commitments and those in Afghanistan. It is challenging, but there is not overstretch to the extent that the hon. Gentleman suggests. Thirdly, I dare say that the morale among the troops, with whom the hon. Gentleman continually tells me he mixes, is superbly higher every time I or anyone else meets them than his morale often is on these matters.

Bob Russell: Oh, for God's sake.

John Reid: I can only relate to the hon. Gentleman my experience of these matters.

Bob Russell: Disgraceful.

John Reid: The hon. Gentleman is entitled to his view. When I meet those soldiers on exercise, they are prepared to meet the challenge. It is to their eternal credit that their morale and resolution is superior to that of most commentators in the United Kingdom.

Mr. David Hamilton (Midlothian) (Lab): As one who supported the involvement of British troops in Afghanistan and continues to do so, may I ask two quick questions? First, on our power to arrest suspected terrorists and hand them over to the authorities, does that also apply to suspected terrorists who are not of Afghan descent? What do we do after they are arrested? That is an important question that arises every so often. Secondly, the United States of America spends millions, if not billions, of pounds on reconstruction and development in the south and on discussions with the warlords. Will that money continue to be made available once the British troops go in?

John Reid: On the second matter, with reference to about $100 million, I am informed that the United States will continue to make that available, at least for the foreseeable future—18 months or so. On the first matter, which involves important but complicated questions about prisoners, at present we hand such prisoners over to the Afghan authorities, but there is an existing memorandum of understanding. We would take account of that in the light of the circumstances that we discover through our preliminary operations team that has been sent out to Afghanistan, and we will develop our plans and procedures accordingly with the Afghan Government. Perhaps I can write to my hon. Friend about that.

Mr. Mark Lancaster (North-East Milton Keynes) (Con): To what extent have the harmony guidelines been sacrificed to fulfil the deployment?

John Reid: The harmony guidelines are, from memory, around 21.1. They should be around 24. I cannot give the hon. Gentleman the specific change because of the deployment, but if I may write to him, I will tell him exactly what effect it has had. At around 21.1, the harmony guidelines are not satisfactory. They should be around 24.

Jim Cousins (Newcastle upon Tyne, Central) (Lab): Can my right hon. Friend assure me that given a situation in which there are two different commands, one devoted to reconstruction and the other to security, there will be no security or counter-terrorist operations in northern Pakistan without the knowledge and approval of British forces and British commanders devoted to the task of reconstruction? Can my right hon. Friend also assure the House that if there is a deterioration in the security situation in Afghanistan or Iraq in the period leading up to July, he will reconsider these matters and come back to the House?

John Reid: I do not think I can give my hon. Friend the assurances that he seeks, if I understood his request correctly. Of course, where we are operating in close proximity, even though there are two different operations, there are enough overlapping relationships and intelligence to ensure that we work towards one common objective, but I cannot give my hon. Friend a specific assurance. However, I can assure him that we keep these matters under constant review, not least because of the potential requirement to try and achieve closer synergy between the two operations or a transfer of personnel between the two operations as we proceed.

Mr. James Gray (North Wiltshire) (Con): Would the Secretary of State mind if I asked a detailed question of key concern to my constituency? In his statement before Christmas on the loss of the Hercules, the largest single loss of life in Iraq, he stated that the only thing that he could find that was wrong was that the Hercules did not have foam retardant systems in the wings. Will he give the House an assurance this afternoon that the four Hercules aircraft to be deployed in Afghanistan will have full air defensive suites of all kinds supplied to them, as I am sure they will? Also, I know that he is in discussions with Marshalls of Cambridge about the fitting of foam retardant to the wings. Will those discussions have achieved some kind of outcome by the time of the deployment?

John Reid: Other than to say that we will have full defensive suites, it is not our policy to go into detail about the protective measures. I invite the hon. Gentleman to come and discuss that matter with me outside the Chamber.

Mr. Michael Clapham (Barnsley, West and Penistone) (Lab): My right hon. Friend's statement indicates clearly that the main task for the deployment will be the implementation of the Afghan Government's anti-narcotics strategy. I noted that he referred to a medium to long-term strategy. Does he agree that we are not considering crop spraying, and that the emphasis will be on bringing new economic opportunities to the farmers who previously grew poppies, which will be a long-term project? Does he believe he has the resources for that long-term commitment?

John Reid: First, the effort will be Afghan-led. That was implicit in my hon. Friend's remarks. Secondly, there will be a heavy emphasis on the proverbial carrot—on attracting farmers away from poppy production. Thirdly, I do not rule crop spraying in or out, although it is not on our agenda, but the stick is present too, in terms of risk, not for the farmers, but for the mafia bosses who run the trade. The intention is to render the trade riskier than it currently is, while offering an alternative to the farmers. No one in the House would be particularly concerned about greedy, corrupt, nasty mafia warlords who are making a great deal of money from pumping that poison into the veins of their own people and our people, but we all have 100 per cent. sympathy and empathy with the farmers, so we must get that balance right, as my hon. Friend suggests.

Angus Robertson (Moray) (SNP): May I repeat the support of the Scottish National party and Plaid Cymru for what has always been an expressly sanctioned United Nations mission in Afghanistan? In reiterating our concerns about overstretch, may I highlight the problem of transport for service personnel, which, yesterday, the Secretary of State gave a commitment to consider? Will he tell us today what plans have been put in place to deal with the overstretch of transport flights identified by the Chief of the Air Staff?

John Reid: I mentioned in my statement the deployment of support helicopters and, indeed, of four Hercules aeroplanes in theatre. That deployment, along with the other assets that I mentioned, is assessed as appropriate and sufficient, subject always to the findings of the preliminary operations team, which we are sending out in order to gain further information and intelligence about the situation on the ground. As that develops—if there is any change in the configuration—I will speak to the hon. Gentleman. [Interruption.] The hon. Gentleman indicates from a sedentary position that he also referred to the transporting home of soldiers from theatre. It is always a concern to us, given the challenges that we face and the harmony guidelines of which we were speaking earlier, to ensure that when the roulement tour is finished, soldiers get home properly and quickly—subject, always, to conditions on the ground. The Chief of the Air Staff is trying to ensure that that is the case.

I welcome the hon. Gentleman's support for the United Nations auspices under which we operate in Afghanistan. He will not need reminding of the fact that we are now operating under United Nations guidelines—the second resolution—in Iraq as well, and I take his comments as an indication of support there, too.

Chris Bryant (Rhondda) (Lab): Like my hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Havard), I visited 16th Air Assault Brigade yesterday, and all of us were impressed not only by the unique training simulator for Apache, but by the morale of Brigadier Butler and all his troops. The Secretary of State referred to the fact that this is the first deployment of Apache for British troops and it is being used very differently from the tradition over the past 10 years. Will he keep under review the way in which that air assault works, because there might be things that we can learn for deployment in other countries?

John Reid: Yes. We always have pretty critical studies post-op and sometimes during operations. We will certainly do that. I thank my hon. Friend and every other hon. Member who has given support for their kind comments about the troops on exercise yesterday.

Hugh Robertson (Faversham and Mid-Kent) (Con): Fifteen years ago today I was deployed on active service as adjutant in my regiment; indeed, that regiment is one of those that the Secretary of State listed in this deployment. Then—as now—we deployed with the threat of a regimental reorganisation hanging over us, and I have to say to the Secretary of State that it was immensely destabilising. Will he give the House a guarantee that no serviceman or woman on that operation will be deployed with a similar threat hanging over them, and better still, will he agree to suspend the reorganisation until this period of operations is completed?

John Reid: The hon. Gentleman knows that that assurance cannot be given by anybody, because we are in the middle of the reorganisation. After six months, there will be roulement on many of these posts, so I cannot indefinitely extend such an assurance to the end of the period.

All I would say about the reorganisation of the armed forces, particularly the Army, is that I fully understand the sentiment and morale elements associated with cap badges, regiments and so on, but I am fully convinced that the Chief of the General Staff and the chiefs of staff have embarked on a reorganisation under the supervision of the Minister for the armed forces in order to make our armed forces more capable than ever before. That means that they protect to a greater extent those who serve in the Army and increases their chance of victory. That, in sentiment and substance, is why we have done it. Despite the attachments to pre-existing organisational formats, which I fully understand, that is a move for the better.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): Like others here today, I had the opportunity to visit Afghanistan and 16th Air Assault Brigade as part of the armed forces parliamentary scheme and I concur with the remarks about readiness. Does my right hon. Friend accept that this is a very difficult mission and that we need an exit strategy in the short run as well as in the long run, particularly for troops who will be assigned to duty? It would be good to know that the House will be kept regularly informed of how the troops will be brought home, as well as about how other troops will replace them.

I have raised with my right hon. Friend before the relationship with the Pakistani authorities. I was led to believe from last summer that the Pakistani authorities would mount their own campaign to deal with the insurgents on their own territories, but since then we have had the problems with the earthquake. Will he say something about that, because it is particularly apposite given such a porous border?

John Reid: My hon. Friend makes a good point. It is absolutely essential that our colleagues in this struggle—particularly nations which border Afghanistan—make the maximum possible effort to ensure that terrorists cannot use their country as a base from which to attack our forces or others in Afghanistan. Even in times of great difficulty President Musharraf of Pakistan has been making such strenuous efforts. The entire House was happy to see us contributing something towards dealing with the terrible events following the earthquake. We sent helicopters and commandos not only because of the humanitarian plight, although that was sufficient, but because of the knowledge that, despite all those problems on his plate, President Musharraf had maintained troop levels at the border in order to counter terrorists. That was an indication of his resolve, and I trust that that will continue on the part of everyone in Afghanistan.

Dr. Vincent Cable (Twickenham) (LD): Will the Secretary of State confirm whether the £1 billion to which he referred is an additional Treasury commitment or whether it comes from reprioritising MOD or Department for International Development spending?

John Reid: It comes from the reserve. When we have embarked on unexpected deployments—and over a period of years until 9/11, Afghanistan was unexpected—the Chancellor has been prepared, sometimes under very difficult circumstances, and in addition to the money spent on maintaining the defence posture, to support Her Majesty's armed forces in the tasks that this House asks them to carry out. If everyone supports the armed forces as the Chancellor has done in resources—and I am sure will continue to do—we will be better off. I am glad to respond in such emollient form. Perhaps I was unduly unemollient to the hon. Member for Colchester (Bob Russell); if I was, I apologise.

Mr. Keith Simpson (Mid-Norfolk) (Con): The Secretary of State quite rightly outlined the fact that this would be a coalition operation. I do not think that any Members are necessarily blaming the British Government, but many of us are concerned about his talking in his statement about the Danish Parliament examining the proposal, and about being optimistic that the Dutch, Australia and New Zealand may also provide forces. At such a late stage, the fact that those Governments are still looking at that proposal is very worrying. He made the point that British forces will not plug any gap. If, to speak pessimistically, any of those Governments fail to provide those forces, who will plug the gap?

John Reid: The commensurate and roughly equivalent force levels will be engendered through a NATO force generation process. We have spoken to the Supreme Allied Commander, and we are committed to doing this. I believe that all those nations will, at the end of the day, be part of this, but one waits on the others to make the deployment announcement. The Canadians have already done that, and they will be about 2,500 strong in Kandahar. The British have, in a sense, led on this and made our position known by saying, "We will not wait any longer, because of events on the ground. The Afghan people, the new governor in the area and our troops expect us to make a decision on this; let's make it." I hope that that will be a catalyst for these decisions.

Mr. Nigel Dodds (Belfast, North) (DUP): I thank the right hon. Gentleman for his very full statement. May I assure him, the Government and, more importantly, our troops and service personnel, of our full support as they seek to prevent the return of the terrorist-supporting regime in Kabul? On the issue of counter-narcotics initiatives, will the Secretary of State tell us how he is going to measure progress in that area over the next three to five years?

John Reid: We have a series of measures, which has been one of the benefits of having several months more than we envisaged in which to consider this matter. There are fairly detailed plans of how we might judge the progress, including a list of criteria by which such judgments may be made. An example is the acreage of poppy cultivation, but there are several others. These will make it possible, although not with perfect scientific accuracy, to make a judgment after several years, certainly about the trend and not only the relative but probably the absolute success.

Tony Baldry (Banbury) (Con): The Secretary of State says that the reconstruction and provision of alternative livelihoods will be Afghan-led. Is he aware, however, that, on a number of occasions, President Karzai has prevailed on farmers in Afghanistan, including in Helmand, to destroy their crops, only for the promised compensation from the international community not to be paid in time for the farmers to plant an alternative crop the next year? If this plan is going to work, two things must happen. The international community must deliver on its promises, and we must build up the capacity of the Afghan Government and President Karzai to deliver. If that does not work, it would not be fair on colleagues in the Department for International Development to come back and say that DFID had failed. We must give that capacity to the Government of Afghanistan. That has not happened in the past; if this is going to work, it must happen now.

John Reid: I agree with every word the hon. Gentleman has said, and I know that these matters are high among the priorities of our excellent ambassador and embassy in Kabul.

Sir Peter Tapsell (Louth and Horncastle) (Con): Notwithstanding the points that I made to the Secretary of State at Defence questions earlier in the week, I supported the original intervention in Afghanistan to clean out the al-Qaeda training camps in the Tora Bora mountains. I would remind the House, however, that Ministers assured us at the time that it was a temporary intervention and that we had no intention of occupying the country. The situation in Afghanistan, and in the middle east as a whole, is now very different. Now, al-Qaeda is able to train all over Iraq, which was formerly closed to it, as well as over large areas of the Islamic world. The Secretary of State says that we have been invited into Afghanistan by a democratic Government, but the sad truth is that President Karzai's writ runs only in the immediate environs of Kabul. Most of the country is governed by the so-called warlords that the Secretary of State has described. In Afghanistan, we face terrain that is vastly more difficult than that of Iraq or Vietnam, and a people who are far more war-like than the Iraqis or the Vietnamese. I have known Afghanistan well over a long span of years, and, in my judgment, we are asking the British Army to go into a country in pursuit of unobtainable objectives.

John Reid: The hon. Gentleman has made many points. Obviously, I do not accept his equivalence of the rag-tag international terrorists and former fascists in Iraq with the national liberation struggle of the Vietnamese people. I do not put the two in the same category. Furthermore, we do not intend to be in Afghanistan as an imperialist power. I would have thought that a man of such wide reading as the hon. Gentleman would see the differences, as well as the similarities, between the Afghan interventions. I do not think that he really believes that we have any long-term colonial ambitions in Afghanistan.

I would not say that the writ of the democratically elected President ran no further than the borders of Kabul. For instance, he has just moved the Governor in Helmand and put in a new one, Engineer Daud, who is pursuing with some robustness the policies that we all want to see being pursued. That is one reason why we should not leave the governance there without the necessary military support. Those are among the reasons why I have made my statement today. It is true that the central governance of Afghanistan, which was a pre-feudal society, does not run to every area of the country. That is one of the points of our being there. We want to help the democratically elected Government to extend such governmental control.

Several hon. Members rose—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order.

Orders of the Day

Criminal Defence Service Bill [Lords] (Programme) (No. 2)

Motion made, and Question proposed, pursuant to Standing Order No. 83A(8) (Programme motions),

That the Order of 13th December 2005 (Criminal Defence Service Bill [Lords] (Programme)) be varied as follows:

1. Paragraphs 4 and 5 of the Order shall be omitted.

2. Proceedings on consideration shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion two hours after the commencement of proceedings on the motion for this Order.

3. Proceedings on Third Reading shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion three hours after the commencement of proceedings on the motion for this Order.—[Bridget Prentice.]

1.36 pm

Mr. Jonathan Djanogly (Huntingdon) (Con): The short length of the Committee stage, and the expediency of dealing with this business by hon. Members on both sides of the Committee, might lead the Government, or their Whips, to assume that this programming might not be objectionable. I am concerned, however, not least because of the expediency of the Bill's earlier stages. Why do the Government now feel it necessary to place this straitjacket on our debate? To table this motion seems unnecessarily dismissive of the positive attitude that hon. Members have shown throughout the course of the Bill. It signifies a bullying attitude that was not present in Committee and that sets the wrong tone for our debate this afternoon.

1.37 pm

Keith Vaz (Leicester, East) (Lab): I, too, am surprised by the need for the Government to table a programme motion on this Bill. Judging from the reports of the Committee stage, everything was extremely amicable, and the Minister herself said earlier this week during Constitutional Affairs questions that the Opposition had been pretty supportive of the Government's proposals. If we are to have a programme motion, presumably the Opposition will support it, because there are so few amendments to be discussed on Report that we could go on to have a Third Reading debate that would last longer than the Report stage and possibly even the Committee stage.

1.38 pm

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst) (Con): I am really disappointed in my constituency neighbour, the Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs, the hon. Member for Lewisham, East (Bridget Prentice). I should have thought that she would know better than to treat the House in this contemptuous way. We have become used to Ministers assuming that these so-called programme motions—or guillotines, as we used to call them—will be quietly nodded through and that they need give no explanation to the House as to why they have been tabled. I shall have to have a word with the Minister about this afterwards, because our neighbourliness could come under severe strain.

The motion reveals all about the philosophy behind programme motions. Let us look back at the original programme motion of 13 December, which is referred to in the motion that we are now considering. I will assume, in a generous spirit—which, of course, is typical of me—that the Government had envisaged that this debate would take place on a Thursday, so I shall cast my remarks in terms of Thursday business, although I could range more widely than that. I could, but probably will not—I say "probably"—pursue an analysis of how Monday's, Tuesday's and Wednesday's business might have been affected as well. For the sake of brevity, however, I will limit myself to Thursday's business.

The original motion assumed that Report stage would end one hour before the moment of interruption, which implied that on a Thursday, Report stage would last until 5 pm and the Third Reading debate would last from then until 6 pm. Question Time would run from 10.30 am until 11.30 am, and let us assume for the sake of argument that business questions would run from then until 12.15 pm or thereabouts. According to my calculation, that would have allowed some four and three quarter hours for the Report stage.

At the time when the programme is originally envisaged, we have no means of knowing what will transpire in Committee. The hon. Member for Leicester, East (Keith Vaz) has said that the Committee stage was amicable, and that the Opposition seemed to be giving the Government their full support, something that happens all too frequently nowadays. Let us assume that this is one of those ghastly non-controversial consensual measures to which we all sign up without too much debate—but the Government did not necessarily know that at the time. The problem with these programme motions is that when they are drawn up, the Government have no regard to what might happen in Committee or, indeed, on Report. So the Government allowed four and three quarter hours for the Report stage, still not knowing what might transpire.

It might be said that that would have been bad enough. Who knows how many amendments might have been tabled on Report by Members who had not served on the Standing Committee, and for whom the Report stage provides an opportunity to contribute? The Government, however, swept all that aside. They said, "We, the Government, will generously allow you, the House of Commons, a whole four and three quarter hours in which to deliberate on Report." Several hundred Members, potentially—there are several hundred Members who are not in the Government—would have had four and three quarter hours in which to consider all the changes that they might wish to make on Report.

That was then. This is now. Now, the Minister has the gall to present us with the motion that is before us, and to say, "Never mind all that. It has all changed now. We are going to make an even more draconian assumption: that the House will require even less time in which to discuss the Bill"—and, as I shall make clear in a moment, it is a substantial Bill.

We began our debate on this programme motion at 1.36 pm. The Government are now saying that we have a total of three hours in which to consider all the remaining stages of the Bill. Potentially, one hour of that time will be taken up by this part of our deliberations—45 minutes for the debate on the programme motion plus a Division at the end. I now give warning that unless the Minister can persuade me more than she has so far that the motion has any merit at all, I shall seek to divide the House on it, because it is a disgrace.

Keith Vaz: It is always fascinating to hear the right hon. Gentleman speak about these issues because he is such an expert on them, but may I urge him not to prolong the debate too much? As he says, there are a good many important issues for us to discuss. In view of what he has said about her, the Minister may withdraw the programme motion and allow us a longer debate on Report. Only two amendments have been selected, and we might then be able to discuss them even more fully. If the right hon. Gentleman speaks for too long, however, we shall not have a chance to debate those substantive issues.

Mr. Forth: Having seen the Minister's face during the hon. Gentleman's remarks, I can only say, "In your dreams". I can predict that the Minister will have no intention of withdrawing the motion.

The hon. Gentleman—this is very uncharacteristic of him—seeks somehow to blame me for the fact that the House may not have sufficient time in which to consider this important motion. It is the Government's motion, however, that gives us but three hours in total to consider the Bill. If I, or indeed my hon. Friends, wish to examine the motion in rather more detail, that is surely our right. We are being given only 45 minutes in which to do it.

Let me continue my analysis. If we assume that the first hour will be taken up by the debate on the programme motion and the Division which I hope will follow—it will, if it is anything to do with me—and the last hour is taken up by the Third Reading debate, we are left with but one hour in which to consider the two amendments, or more accurately the new clause and amendment.

These are not trivial matters. The hon. Member for Leicester, East, who is an eminent legal expert, and the other eminent lawyers who are with me on the Conservative Benches, will doubtless want to bring their analyses to bear, but they will have hardly any opportunity in which to do so. The proposer of an amendment or new clause usually wants to explain it properly to the House. Others will undoubtedly wish to contribute, especially those with legal knowledge and expertise, and we shall wish to hear from them. I cannot imagine that that can happen satisfactorily in the time that we have been allowed.

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich) (Lab): I am listening carefully to the right hon. Gentleman. I happen to agree with him about the programme, but will he tell me why Conservative Front Benchers do not oppose every programme motion on every Bill? That would at least draw attention to the issue.

Mr. Forth: I wish they would, but my party's Front Benchers are in consensual mode at present. They seem to think that we will attract more support from the electorate if we oppose the Government as little as possible rather than as much as possible. This is the new mood of the Conservative party.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): Order. Notwithstanding any new mood in the Conservative party, perhaps we could now address the motion, which is somewhat restrictive.

Mr. Forth: I shall be delighted to do so, Madam Deputy Speaker. You always challenge me in this regard, do you not? You think that saying that the motion is restrictive will somehow constrain my remarks. I think you will find that it does not work quite like that, Madam Deputy Speaker.

I was about to probe further in my analysis. In the one hour that I have identified between the programme motion and Division and the Third Reading debate, we have two matters of substance to consider: a new clause that is of some importance and an amendment, which is similarly important. Let us say, arbitrarily, that we allot half an hour to each. That means that the Government are seriously suggesting that in a mere half hour we as the House of Commons, with an obligation to our voters to scrutinise legislation, are expected at one and the same time to listen to the proposer of the new clause or the amendment, to hear Back-Bench contributions from the eminent lawyers here gathered on both sides of the House, and to hear the ministerial response. In one half hour—30 minutes—we as the House of Commons are expected to do justice to our responsibility to scrutinise legislation properly.

Mr. Mark Francois (Rayleigh) (Con): I apologise for delaying my right hon. Friend's probing, and I intervene as one who is not a lawyer, eminent or otherwise.

I suspect that the Government's response will be that part of their rationale was today's statement on Afghanistan. They felt that they must constrain the House's time in some way. Even if we allow what I believe may be the Government's justification, however, and given that both Front Benchers and Back Benchers have described the Bill as a relatively non-controversial measure, should this not have been one of those cases in which the business is allowed to find its own level?

Mr. Forth: Of course I agree with my hon. Friend's last point, but how can he possibly have known that the Bill was non-controversial? The fact that my hon. Friend the Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Djanogly) has a cosy arrangement with the Government according to which it is allegedly non-controversial does not mean, as far as the rest of us are concerned—we may not have participated in Committee, but we may have come along with fresh ideas, or we may have been approached by constituents or interest groups—that a measure that may have looked bland and uncontroversial at first will remain the same throughout its passage. I object to the assumption that measures can be deemed uncontroversial by those who know better than my hon. Friend the Member for Rayleigh (Mr. Francois) and me, and that we must then row in behind that regardless.

Mr. Francois: I thank my right hon. Friend for his courtesy. I would never accuse him of being non-controversial in any context: it would be more than my life is worth. I believe, however, that the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Keith Vaz), who I think served on the Standing Committee and knows the detail of the Bill, seemed also to suggest that it was not the most controversial legislation that had ever been presented to the House. That being the case, I offer again my argument that the Government might have been wiser in this instance to allow the business to find its own level in the traditional way.

Mr. Forth: That may be my hon. Friend's view, but I see in the Chamber more than one Member from Leicestershire. Indeed, the hon. Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) is well known for his dedication to the parliamentary process and his power of analysis. He is looking very thoughtful, and he may well have thoughts on the Bill other than those of the hon. Member for Leicester, East, eminent lawyer though he is, who was not on the Committee and who may or may not have views yet to be revealed. My hon. Friend the Member for Rayleigh has shown us that, in every respect, the programme motion is a disgrace and an outrage to the parliamentary process. That is the long and short of it.

Following on from what the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) said, I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Huntingdon takes the message back to our Front-Bench colleagues that we should not allow these programme motions to slip through uncontested, because again and again they illustrate a number of interrelated facts. The first is that the Government now assume that they, not the House, must control all aspects of the parliamentary process. They are saying to us, effectively, "When we introduce our legislation, we will decide how much time the House of Commons will have to consider it." That is what is so unacceptable.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): The right hon. Gentleman's remarks in relation to me were probably over-generous. Will he not acknowledge that there have been in this consensual period a good number of Bills without a programme motion? After looking at Division lists from before and during that period, I know that he was present, so presumably—at least for a brief period—he was infected by this warm, fluffy desire to get on with things.

Mr. Forth: Rarely am I accused of being warm and fluffy—I will treasure the moment—but the honest answer is that, from time to time, I find it difficult to persuade even one colleague to help me in dividing the House. If the hon. Gentleman is prepared to join me in changing Standing Orders so that one Member can divide the House, he will have a lot more fun. However, I accept his criticism, and perhaps I have not been as diligent as I should. I shall try to do better and see whether I can, following his advice, divide the House more often.

There is an implication in what the hon. Member for Leicester, East said, which is that, somehow, the Bill might not be that important, and certainly is not that controversial, so it does not require so much time for consideration. Let us look at the gist of the Bill. The explanatory notes, which usefully provide a summary, say that it > "changes the arrangements for the grant of public funding for representation in criminal proceedings in England and Wales."

I can think of few things that could be more important in terms of our criminal law and representation of our citizenry within it.

Mark Pritchard (The Wrekin) (Con): Does my right hon. Friend think that this is a programme motion to help the Minister on a difficult Thursday for the Government or is it part of a worrying trend of having contempt for the House?

Mr. Forth: It is a very well established trend, if I may say so to my hon. Friend, and one that has developed over the last eight years or so. In the good old days, the Government would not have dreamed of doing anything like this. The tradition was observed that the Opposition by and large could control the pace of proceedings in the House and in Committee, rightly in my view, and only in the extreme would the Government introduce a guillotine or timetable motion to bring business to a proper close. That is the way it should have been. Now, the Government routinely and arbitrarily decide how much time will be allocated to business, leaving us simply to try to fit in as best we can.

James Brokenshire (Hornchurch) (Con): My right hon. Friend makes an interesting point. Will he acknowledge that certain important clarifications were made during consideration of the Bill in another place in terms of the appeal rights in respect of decisions of the commission in determining whether access to justice had been properly granted? Guillotining a Bill in such a way obviously reduces the amount of discussion, and perhaps the progress that we might make on other issues of such import.

Mr. Forth: Indeed, my hon. Friend is correct. He, of course, is one of the experts to whom I referred earlier, and I look forward to his contribution, although it will necessarily be brief because of the overly restrictive programme motion.

New clause 1, which stands in the name of several of my hon. Friends—all of whom are here present, I am happy to note—says:

> "Notwithstanding powers conferred on the Legal Services Commission by section 1, the Court shall retain the power to grant a representation order upon oral application".

Those are momentous matters, yet we now know, having arrived here on this day in these circumstances—the shape taken by today's business, such as business questions and the important statement, which rightly was allowed to run for some time a short while ago—that we have been left with this insultingly brief period in which to consider them.

Mark Pritchard: My right hon. Friend has mentioned a trend. In view of such programme motions being introduced in the House, does he think there is a link between that trend and controversial changes in public expenditure?

Mr. Forth: Programme motions, as they have developed over recent years, have begun to have more and more adverse impact on our effectiveness as a legislature that is there properly to scrutinise—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. May I remind the right hon. Gentleman that we are discussing not programme motions in general, but this specific programme motion?

Mr. Forth: Of course that is true, Madam Deputy Speaker, and I must not allow myself to be seduced by my enthusiastic hon. Friends into straying more widely than the motion itself allows. I shall try to resist that in future.

I want briefly to discuss amendment No. 1, which stands in the name of the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath), who is, as ever, in his place. If one considers the explanatory notes as they relate to clause 2(2), one can see the potential importance of that proposal. I do not seek to judge its substance, but I want simply to put in context the time that might properly be required to consider it. The explanatory notes say that paragraph 3B

"provides that power to grant a right to representation can only be exercised where an individual's financial resources are such that the body considering the application is satisfied that he is eligible."

The amendment would make an important change to that.

Again, with regard to the substance in these matters, I am looking forward enormously to the Minister's explanation of why she believes, having arrived where we are today in these circumstances, that we can do justice to the gravity and substance of the new clause and the amendment in the time left to us.

James Brokenshire: My right hon. Friend is making some interesting points about the proposals to be considered on Report, but clearly it is for the House to determine how it wants the debate to proceed. Under the original programme motion, more limited debate on the amendments would have allowed extended debate on Third Reading. In terms of the overall impression of the Bill and certain issues that may arise, such extended debate on Third Reading might be constructive.

Mr. Forth: Indeed, but that takes us back to the attempt made earlier by the hon. Member for Leicester, East somehow to blame me for the fact that we might find ourselves rather constrained in terms of the time available on Third Reading.

Keith Vaz rose—

Mr. Forth: The hon. Gentleman is going to have another go. I give way again.

Keith Vaz: The right hon. Gentleman has only himself to blame. I understand from Members who sat on the Committee that four sittings were allocated for scrutiny of the Bill, but that consideration lasted only about half an hour. There was the opportunity to scrutinise the Bill at that stage, and we have further opportunities now, but he is letting the Government get away with not debating the substance of the Bill. Will he put his great eloquence on hold and call his Division?

Mr. Forth: It is not my fault if the Committee did not do its job; I was not on the Committee. I did not frame this disgraceful motion; the Government did. I did not put on a statement earlier, knowing that this important business was to follow; the Government did. For the hon. Gentleman to seek somehow to blame me for the fact that we find ourselves in this invidious parliamentary position will not do.

Mark Pritchard: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Keith Vaz) is a little confused? Earlier he suggested that he was surprised that the Government had tabled the motion. For him to point the finger over here is unfriendly at best. Perhaps he should have words with the Minister.

Mr. Forth: I look forward to the hon. Gentleman seeking to catch your eye, Madam Deputy Speaker, to indicate whether he believes that the programme motion is remotely justifiable.

I do not want to delay the House for too long because I want to leave time for the Minister—after my hon. Friends have spoken—to justify this outrageous, disgraceful and unacceptable programme motion, which I hope that the House will throw out.

2.1 pm

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): The right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) is right in two respects. First, the programme motion replaces a previous one, which was determined at Second Reading. It cannot be right to determine the length of Report at Second Reading when no one—not the Whips, the Minister or the Opposition—can know the interests that Back-Bench Members may have in the Bill.

Secondly, I suspect that the right hon. Gentleman is right that had the programme motion not been moved today, proceedings on the Bill would have been completed well within the time allotted by the motion. We have now spent a substantial part of that time discussing a programme motion that I believe to be entirely otiose. Even at this point, the Minister may wish to withdraw it so that we can get on with the important substance of debate.

2.2 pm

Mark Pritchard (The Wrekin) (Con): Hon. Members will be pleased to hear that I will keep my comments short. There are long-standing principles with regard to guillotining debate in this House. As the Committee on the Bill was amicable, I am surprised that the Government have moved this unhelpful and unfortunate motion. There was cross-party consensus in Committee and on the Floor of the House today, with the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Keith Vaz) foremost among those indicating surprise that the motion was tabled.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) rightly and eloquently pointed out that this is an important Bill containing important elements of public expenditure. Therefore, it is incumbent on all hon. Members to come along on behalf of their constituents, whose taxes will be taken as a result of changes in the Bill, and to be accountable. We need to hear the Minister respond at length to the debate and we need an opportunity to look at the details fully and frankly.

Too many programme motions are being tabled and there is too much curbing of debate. We often hear that this House is no longer taken seriously and, regrettably, I often think that the Government are setting a bad example to new Members like myself. At a later point, I would like to compliment the Government for noting this debate, reading Hansard and changing their mind on tabling so many programme motions. This place is the better for rigorous debate and it is better served by robust debate. That is what this Chamber is for.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. Could the hon. Gentleman relate his remarks to this motion?

Mark Pritchard: I was about to do so in my concluding remarks, Madam Deputy Speaker. It is unfortunate that the Government have taken this course of action. I hope that they will have a rethink and allow all hon. Members who wish to speak to do so.

2.5 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs (Bridget Prentice): My friend and neighbour the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) is one of the great debaters and is always charming. He is someone with whom I like to think that I get on extremely well and I am always loth to disagree with him. However, I must do so today. I hope that that will not harm our deep and long friendship.

I am aware that the right hon. Gentleman has a loathing of programme motions and he has a right to take that point of view. However, I must tell him that the debate in Committee was comprehensive, if not lengthy, and that the programme motion was agreed with both Opposition Front Benches.

James Duddridge (Rochford and Southend, East) (Con): Will the Minister give way on that point?

Bridget Prentice: I will not. I understand why the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst takes the view that he does, but the consensual politics about which he spoke has clearly broken down somewhere along the line. The motion was agreed by the usual channels and for that reason I would like to proceed with the rest of the debate.

Criminal Defence Service Bill [Lords]

[Relevant documents: The Fifth Report from the Constitutional Affairs Committee, Session 2003–04, on the Draft Criminal Defence Service Bill, HC 746, and the Government's response thereto, Cm 6410.]

As amended in the Standing Committee, considered.

New Clause 1

POWER OF COURT TO GRANT A REPRESENTATION ORDER

'(1) Notwithstanding powers conferred on the Legal Services Commission by section 1, the Court shall retain the power to grant a representation order upon oral application to the Court under circumstances in which it would not be practicable to refer the matter to the Commission.

(2) Paragraph 3B of Schedule 3 to the Access to Justice Act 1999 (c. 22) (financial eligibility) applies to the power in subsection (1) as if it were a power under that Schedule.'.—[Mr. Burrowes.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

2.19 pm

Mr. David Burrowes (Enfield, Southgate) (Con): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

I am grateful for the opportunity to present the new clause, having heard the earlier debate on the programme motion in which my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) put properly in context what are important measures in the Bill. The new clause is of great importance in terms both of principle and practice. It is its importance in terms of practice that I wish to concentrate on in the next few minutes.

The context is important. The Government announced their intentions in respect of improving the criminal justice system and legal aid by titling their documentation, "Delivering a fairer deal: swifter and more effective criminal justice". I am sure all hon. Members would sign up to such a laudable aim. Indeed, the new clause seeks to achieve in practice a swifter, more effective criminal justice system. At this stage I must declare an interest as a criminal solicitor of 11 years, a criminal advocate and consultant at a local firm in Enfield.

When one tries to put the legislation that is passed with great intentions by the House into practice in court, there is often a gap. It is that gap that I seek to plug today with the assistance of the House. I seek to avoid the vacuum that we can sometimes fall into when debating criminal legal aid and to look at the reality of the situation.

The new clause properly reflects the need for means-testing and the financial requirements that are the essence of the Bill. It recognises the concerns of the Government in relation to consistency in granting representation orders. It also properly seeks to deal with concerns that have been raised by practitioners local to me and by a chief clerk of a local magistrates court about issues that have arisen as a result of the Bill: primarily, the fact that it would effectively prevent an oral application from being made to the court. An important principle has been put forward by the Government in the Bill: to confer powers on the Legal Services Commission that are presently before the court. While the Government would no doubt say that those powers are being devolved back to court staff and that, for all intents and purposes, in practice, the court staff who grant legal aid on administrative applications now will do the same after the Bill becomes law, there is still the prospect of that being removed from court staff. Even if it is devolved to court staff, as is proposed, within regulations, there is a fundamental gap in terms of preventing an oral application from being made to the court.

It is important to look at the practical context. On the nature of the court process, a magistrates court hearing is not always as we would imagine. There is often a full court list as a result of perhaps operations that have taken place in the locality involving a number of members of the public being arrested for particular practices. It may involve a number of people who have been arrested and need interpretation skills. It may involve a number of people who are in the cells and who need other assistance. They may often be vulnerable. They may be mentally ill and need other assistance. They may require assistance and legal advice from an early stage.

A magistrates court may have occasional court sittings on a Saturday or at holiday times. Those often involve just one magistrate and one court clerk dealing with what can be a very busy list. They have to deal with what we are discussing today, which is a fundamental change in relation to the process of criminal legal aid.

We also have to be aware of the context in relation to the applicant. The applicant is not the straightforward applicant one can describe. The applicant could be illiterate, have learning difficulties, be unable to read or write. There are occasions when the applicant is mute and one has to deal with that situation. In all those circumstances, the option is available to the court to allow the matter to come before the court by way of an oral application, rather than through the administrative route of filling out a legal aid application. That option would not be available if we do not accept the new clause.

I want to look at the example of someone who is mentally ill. It is the case that, increasingly, sadly, many people come before the courts who suffer from mental illness. The provision for them is often patchy and inappropriate. Often, a mentally ill person comes before the court without having any legal representation, despite the fact that under the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 there is the right to have an appropriate adult to direct them to the need for legal advice. For one reason or another, they come before the court having been charged with an offence, they are before the magistrates and they need legal representation. The magistrates can see it clearly; indeed they can probably see on the basis of the charge that it is in the interests of justice that they receive legal aid.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): Having sat on the bench for a good number of years, I recognise some of the circumstances to which the hon. Gentleman refers, but can the new clause be used in cases, for example, of fraud, where the person being charged is not in the category concerned? Although prosecuting fraud can never be justified in purely financial terms, there has been at least one significant case that involved fraudulent legal aid claims by a firm of solicitors, which cost the legal aid fund £10 million. That same fund, when that firm was prosecuted, incurred costs of £34 million in defence costs and £10 million in administration—£44 million in total. Would that be covered by the weakening that he describes in respect of new clause 1?

Mr. Burrowes: The purpose of the new clause is perhaps not so much to deal with that circumstance. No doubt any first application in relation to someone who is charged with fraud would involve filling out the financial eligibility form, which would be complicated and require the administrative route that is followed in the Bill. The point of the new clause is to deal with those exceptional circumstances that I described: primarily, those applicants who have great difficulty following through with a written application, who have come before the court without any legal representation and whose need is great. That is particularly the case with those who are vulnerable or mentally ill, where there is a great urgency to deal with the matter as quickly, as expeditiously and as fairly as possible.

David Taylor: The new clause does not make clear the circumstances in which it would not be practicable to refer the matter to the commission. Would the intention be to include that in a schedule to the Bill if the new clause were accepted?

Mr. Burrowes: A statutory framework of regulations will seek to go into detail in relation, for example, to people who originally fail the means test but who, it is recognised, suffer hardship and are unable to afford legal representation. That framework is, I understand, to be published after the Bill becomes law. It would no doubt also involve definitions in relation to practicability.

The issue is that the Bill would without exception confer all the powers upon the Legal Services Commission that at present are devolved to court staff. The new clause seeks to give flexibility in the exceptional circumstances that I described. The term "when it is not practicable" can be judged properly; it is used in other legislation. The clerk can advise the magistrates on whether that is the situation. Plainly, if it is practical for the normal route to be followed—the administrative route of devolved powers to court staff—that can be followed. No doubt the advice can be taken from the clerk. However, there are the exceptional circumstances that I have sought to outline. As is the case presently, some of those who come before the bench will need a decision to be made on the basis of an oral application. The new clause seeks to be constructive. It would give effect to what is in place now and give the option. Perhaps it will be used rarely, although I hear from local magistrates that oral applications increasingly need to be made to deal with the position of the applicant.

2.30 pm

The need is perhaps greater now than before the Bill was mooted. Now there will be a financial requirement upon the applicant. If the client is mentally ill or mute, as one of my cases was, and comes before the court without legal representation, the magistrates will realise that there is a need for representation and to determine the issue of legal aid expeditiously. The applicant then needs a solicitor to go through the process of applying for legal aid.

Without the new clause, the solicitor would need to consider the general criminal contract, whether the client was defined as a patient under that contract and whether an application could be made on behalf of the client. The solicitor would also have to have sufficient knowledge of the client's financial circumstances because now there will be a requirement to complete the financial side of the application. The burden is more onerous properly to complete an application for legal aid. Without the new clause, that will happen by the administrative route of going through the process of completing a form. Indeed, if it was refused, there could be an appeal process, which could be lengthy, delay the process and not be in the interests of either justice or the applicant.

In that exceptional circumstance the new clause would allow the matter to be dealt with there and then within the court building and hearing. It would allow the application to be made to the magistrates who can plainly see that it is in the interests of justice for legal aid to be granted. They can determine also the issue of financial eligibility in court orally to allow the matter to move on expeditiously.

James Brokenshire (Hornchurch) (Con): My hon. Friend makes some interesting points based on his experience in the criminal sector. Does he agree that if there is the delay that he is talking about, in terms of properly assessing whether legal aid should be given if we follow the current procedure rather than the oral hearing procedure which he is outlining in his new clause, that could be a burden in terms of not giving proper access to justice and seeing that justice is expeditious, and could increase the potential administration and costs if there are continuing delays in ensuring that a particular case or hearing is dealt with appropriately?

Mr. Burrowes: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that intervention. I agree that the new clause would seek to prevent the potential for increased delays and costs. The new clause seeks to meet the intentions of consultations on criminal legal aid. I seek to plug a gap which will be in the legislation without the new clause.

Why not include the new clause as part of the armoury available to deal properly and expeditiously with legal aid, and allow the justice system to move on without delay? Is the issue primarily about wanting to speed up justice and to make it fairer, or is the Government's prevailing concern to confer all powers on the Legal Services Commission, not the courts, in order to gain control over the budget; rather than the prime motivation being, as it is in the new clause, to deliver effective criminal justice?

I urge the House to support the new clause which not only plugs the gap in the one example that I have given, but also provides a safety net for the system so that we can properly achieve the goals that we all have.

Keith Vaz (Leicester, East) (Lab): I wish to speak only briefly on the new clause. It is sad that we have lost the eloquent skills of the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) who argued so strongly earlier for more time to scrutinise the legislation. As soon as the motion was passed, he disappeared from the Chamber.

I pay tribute to the hon. Member for Enfield, Southgate (Mr. Burrowes) for the way in which he moved the new clause. I have sympathy with it, but cannot support it because it does not deal with the fundamental problem of transferring the granting of legal aid from the courts to the Legal Services Commission.

The Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs, my hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, East (Bridget Prentice), is doing a splendid job at the Department. I have no problems with her being able to deal with, supervise and monitor the work of the Legal Services Commission, but she is creating a framework which will make it difficult in future for people to challenge decisions made by that commission.

I was pleased when an amendment was passed in the other place to allow for the right of appeal on such cases. It gives people who apply for legal aid the opportunity to have that decision scrutinised by a body other than the Legal Services Commission. The most worrying aspect of some steps that the Government have taken on legal services and the court system is their wish to abolish rights of appeal and place decisions with the very organisations or individuals who are commissioned to make the original decisions. That is wrong.

I thought that the new clause would give us the opportunity to restore that right of appeal, but it deals with applications in the first instance. It deals with those circumstances where for some reason an application cannot be referred to the Legal Services Commission. Therefore, it concedes the point that the first decision should be made by the Legal Services Commission. That worries me because there should be scrutiny and an opportunity for individuals to have their cases assessed by those other than the decision makers. In addition, it puts a great deal of trust and faith in the operation of the Legal Services Commission.

It is clear from all the information that I have from individuals and practitioners who have had to deal with the Legal Services Commission that they are dealing with a highly bureaucratic organisation which seems to compound the delays that already exist in our legal system. Of course in reply the Minister could announce some radical shake-up of the way in which the commission operates to satisfy me and others that her faith in the organisation is justified, but neither that nor the new clause deals with the fundamental principle that others should review the decision.

My hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) made an important point. We need to know before the passage of the Bill the circumstances in which the new clause will operate. Where are those exceptions which would take us out of the procedures set down by the Government in the proposed statute and allow an oral application? The hon. Gentleman said that perhaps they could be included in draft regulations or by some other method by which Ministers can supplement legislation. That is a real problem. We need to know that information. Otherwise, people will have a choice and, given the choice, most would choose to make their application to the courts rather than to the Legal Services Commission.

The purpose of the Bill is not just to make the system more efficient, which hopefully it will; it is to save money because of the large increase in the legal aid budget over the last 20 years. I think that it now stands at £1.1 billion. The Bill seeks to save about £35 million. It would not be difficult to devise a scheme—we cannot do so now that we have reached Report stage—that will enable people who feel that they have not been treated fairly and have additional information to put before the bodies to go to another body to put their views forward. The new clause would not allow us to do that. It moves us in the right direction, but it is not quite the strengthening amendment that I wanted to see.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): I listened with great care to the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Keith Vaz) and I have a great deal of sympathy with his views. We debated in Committee amendments from another place proposed by my noble Friend Lord Goodhart. Here, I must take care not to pre-empt the debate on the next amendment, which forms its own separate group. I hope that we can reach a satisfactory conclusion on the question of the financial eligibility test. The Minister rejected the amendments from another place because she did not want to allow appeals on the strict matter of financial eligibility. However, on the wider, interest-of-justice test, the capacity does exist for someone to apply to the court, and thereby to short-circuit the legal services review system.

The point made by the hon. Member for Enfield, Southgate (Mr. Burrowes) is a slightly different one. It concerns, in effect, having an appeal of last resort: a court's having the residual power to do that which is sensible and in the interests of justice within the confines of a court, rather than entering into a bureaucratic procedure. Indeed, the same point was made by the hon. Member for Leicester, East. The hon. Member for Enfield, Southgate is building on the amendment tabled by the hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Djanogly) in Committee. We had a short debate on it in Committee and, as I recall, we divided on it and I gave my support to the hon. Gentleman. The Minister had a couple of problems with that amendment, but today's new clause addresses them. She was concerned about consistency, which subsection (2) of the new clause addresses. She was also worried about the provision's scope; however, subsection (1) of the new clause would introduce an element of conditionality.

We are not talking about a great matter of principle, but simply about expediency. The question is, when matters have arisen during a hearing that make it clear to the court that the person in question should be granted representation, how do we deal with that situation without the need to enter into a bureaucratic process involving the Legal Services Commission? Such a process is not in the interests of the court hearing, the expedition of the case or of all the other people involved in the case, let alone the person receiving aid under the court's direction. Under such exceptional circumstances—clearly, they are indeed exceptional—restoring the residual power through the new clause would be of value to the court system. Such restoration should commend itself to the Minister as being entirely consistent with her approach to the legal aid system, and with achieving the result that we all want to achieve: a better, faster, more efficient and more effective court system.

James Brokenshire: I shall take just a brief moment of the House's time to speak in support of the new clause tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Enfield, Southgate (Mr. Burrowes). In essence, this is a matter of justice and of ensuring that those members of our society who are vulnerable and less advantaged are not put at risk by the Bill's overall framework. My hon. Friend's comments about people with mental health problems and the obstacles that might ultimately prevent them from receiving legal aid that they are properly entitled to were particularly germane; indeed, that is a very important issue. I should at this stage declare an interest, in that I am a solicitor. However, I am not a criminal solicitor, so the Bill falls outside my area of practice; even so, it to some extent touches on issues of legality with which I am familiar.

2.45 pm

The comments of the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Keith Vaz) about bureaucracy and the Legal Services Commission were also relevant. The Bill attempts to streamline the system and to save the cost to the public purse. But we must also ensure effective access to justice, and if the new clause is not accepted, there could be further delays, leading to further costs. In essence, the question is: what is the sensible approach in such circumstances? We need a safety net that allows applications to the court in exceptional circumstances, as my hon. Friend the Member for Enfield, Southgate made clear. Indeed, his new clause uses the phrase,

"under circumstances in which it would not be practicable to refer the matter to the Commission."

So the new clause makes clear the circumstances in which it would provide a safety net and protection.

The new clause might well need to be supplemented by some form of framework along the lines described by my hon. Friend, but there is much merit in it. It would aid access to justice for all in circumstances where bureaucracy, form-filling and over-regulation might otherwise prevent such access. It has my support and I commend it to the Minister. I look forward to hearing what she has to say about the key issues raised by my hon. Friend: ensuring effective access to justice in a timely manner, and ensuring that people who would otherwise be entitled to legal support from the state are not overlooked.

Mr. Jonathan Djanogly (Huntingdon) (Con): My hon. Friend the Member for Enfield, Southgate (Mr. Burrowes) is a gentleman with no little experience of the practice of criminal law, and I, too, should at this stage declare my interest as a practising solicitor. This is a practical, administrative Bill, and it is important that the views of people such as my hon. Friend be aired and listened to—hopefully—by the Government. He has made an important contribution to this debate.

The hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) suggested that we divided on a similar amendment in Committee, but I think that he will now acknowledge that we did not.

Mr. Heath indicated assent.

Mr. Djanogly: We did not do so because I was not happy with the Government's position at that stage, and I wanted to ensure that we revisited this issue on Report. I am very pleased that my hon. Friend has dealt with it so comprehensively and well. Of course, I did indeed propose a similar amendment in Committee, and I still believe that the Bill should incorporate such an amendment in the interest of justice. It is important that, in exceptional circumstances where a defendant is incapable of making a written application, and where the situation is sufficiently urgent, there should be a residual platform enabling an oral application to be made in court. The Government rebutted that point of practicality in Committee, on the basis that granting courts such a power could lead to its being abused by applicants. As has been pointed out, such a power would apply in circumstances that courts would recognise as being exceptional, so such abuse would be obvious to any court. As has also been mentioned, the new clause deals with the problem by referring to issues such as practicability.

The proposed procedure deals with real-life scenarios. It would expedite the court procedure, and it could prevent unnecessary delays in the facilitation of the access to justice that the Bill is trying to entrench.

The support of practitioners in that regard should not be ignored. If my hon. Friend wishes to press the new clause to a Division, I assure him that he will have his colleagues' support.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs (Bridget Prentice): This Bill has two key objectives—to transfer the power to grant representation from the court to the Legal Services Commission, and to introduce a compulsory means test element that must be satisfied before any grant of legal aid can be made. The transfer of grant from the court to the LSC is designed to help achieve greater consistency in the grant of representation, as well as ensuring, as my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Keith Vaz) noted, that the LSC achieves greater control over criminal legal aid expenditure.

By giving the courts—in other words the bench or the Crown Court judge—a residual power to grant representation, this new clause would threaten to undermine these objectives. It is for that reason that I shall ask the House to resist it, and I shall set out my reasons in some detail.

The new clause would almost certainly generate the potential for more inconsistency, as each bench would be using its own discretion to reach decisions. Such inconsistency might therefore create an inherent unfairness in the system and undermine one of the key precepts of this Bill.

Let me make it clear that the Bill will mean that the bench will have the power, ultimately, to determine whether the interests of justice have been satisfied. But it will not have the power to grant legal aid: that power will remain with the LSC, which will be able to make the grant only if the means test and the interests of justice test have both been satisfied. It is important for the House to understand that both limbs must be satisfied before legal aid is granted.

We do not accept that there should be an exception to the two-limbed test. The interests of justice test determines whether it is desirable that a defendant be represented, and the means test determines who should pay for that representation—the state or the defendant. It is only when financial eligibility has been determined that the question of the interests of justice arises.

Mr. Heath: Does the Minister agree that new clause 1(2) deals with precisely that point? It would require the financial eligibility test to be met for the interest of justice test to be agreed by the court.

Bridget Prentice: My point is that the new clause does not add to the Bill, which is perfectly capable of dealing with the problems that the hon. Member for Enfield, Southgate identified forcefully and correctly.

New clause 1 proposes that there should be a procedure allowing the bench to grant representation, following an oral application. That procedure is said to be subject to paragraph 3B of schedule 3 to the Access to Justice Act 1999, which reintroduces the means test. That seems rather odd, when the court-based staff would be available to conduct that test.

I am conscious of the argument put forward by the hon. Gentleman, who stressed that practitioners need to be able to apply in court for a grant of representation. He said that that need might arise when dealing with an urgent matter, and that that would work in favour of the court by helping to avoid unnecessary delays in the administrative process.

I emphasise again that the Government are confident that the means test will be sufficiently straightforward for the court-based teams to be able to conduct it swiftly and accurately. Under our system, an electronic database in each court will allow instant access to means information.

The hon. Gentleman was also concerned about first hearings involving defendants who are ill, illiterate or who have mental health problems. The hon. Member for Hornchurch (James Brokenshire) made the same point. However, the early-cover scheme will enable defendants to be represented at the first hearing without legal aid being granted. Solicitors will then be able to help their clients to complete the application form.

Mr. Djanogly: The Minister referred to a new electronic system. Will she give us an idea of what that is, and when it will be introduced?

Bridget Prentice: I am no electronics whizz, so I cannot go into much detail. However, work on the programme is already in hand, and I can assure the House that it will be ready in time, if the Bill is passed and implemented. Moreover, plans have been made to train court staff to ensure that they are familiar and comfortable with the new system.

The hon. Member for Hornchurch also said that a matter might arise suddenly before a court and that a person might need to be represented quickly. That might indeed happen, but a determination about who pays would still have to be made. If a late application became a route to free legal aid, I would be concerned that the practice might not remain exceptional for very long.

Where there is a fundamental change on the issue of the interests of justice in relation to a defendant, we anticipate that it will be a relatively speedy process to obtain and process the necessary information on the means test. I do not agree with the hon. Member for Huntingdon that the matter would be dealt with more speedily by a bench or a Crown Court judge. In effect, a bench or a Crown Court judge will have to call an adjournment while determining whether a defendant should be legally represented, and for solicitors and counsel to be appointed and properly instructed. The system proposed in the Bill will take advantage of that inevitable and natural pause to seek the information pertinent to the means test. I see no reason why the need to refer back to the court-based grant teams should cause any significant additional delay in the process.

The hon. Member for Enfield, Southgate also suggested that the new clause would further safeguard compliance with the European convention on human rights. I disagree: article 6(3) of the convention says that a person with insufficient means to pay for legal assistance should be given it free when the interests of justice so require. The Bill complies with that, and we will ensure that the regulations under the Bill do so too.

The House should be aware that article 6(3) also gives the accused a right to defend himself in person.

Mr. Djanogly: With respect to the Minister, I remind her that I did not mention human rights in my remarks—although I shall when I speak to amendment No. 1.

Bridget Prentice: The hon. Gentleman mentioned human rights in our debate on this matter in Committee. The fact that he did not mention them again today perhaps shows that my response then was more than adequate.

As I was saying, article 6(3) of the ECHR also gives the accused the right to defend himself—even in circumstances where other people might think that he would be better off with legal representation.

There are therefore three possibilities: the state pays for legal representation if the defendant cannot afford it; the person defends himself, or he pays for his legal representation. The first two alternatives are a person's rights: the Bill does not change that position, and the new clause would do nothing to safeguard it.

The House will be aware that the bench will also be allowed to hear appeals against a decision to refuse to grant a defendant a representation order on the grounds that the interests of justice have not been satisfied. Although the bench may substitute its own decision on the interests of justice, as before, the responsibility for granting representation will continue to reside with the grant teams, as they must be satisfied that the defendant is also financially eligible.

I emphasise that the Government are not seeking to deny the right to representation in circumstances in which the interests of justice test are met. However, let me repeat that by reintroducing a means test, the

[Bridget Prentice]

Government are legitimately seeking to determine whether the burden of defence costs should be met by the state or the individual.

We believe that in designing the new system we have struck the right balance in defining the role to be played by the court in that process. Any proposal to arm the bench or a crown court judge with a residual power to grant representation runs counter to the consensus that has been built up in negotiations with our key stakeholders. I therefore call on hon. Members to reject the amendment.

3 pm

Mr. Burrowes: The Minister suggests that the new clause should be rejected because allowing oral applications will perpetuate inconsistency in the grant of legal aid. I suggest that that is away from reality. Almost all applications are by way of a written process already. It is only in exceptional cases such as when a mentally ill client is before the court—I will not repeat the examples—that one wants to have the option that remains in the new clause of allowing an oral application. It is hard to rationalise and find statistics to support the suggestion that oral applications that take place at present in exceptional circumstances create inconsistency in the grant of legal aid. The rationale for refusing, I suggest, is not valid.

The Minister also suggested that ultimately the courts have the discretion to determine the interests of justice test. However, we cannot rest assured with that when the supplement to the framework document contains the threat that if the Legal Services Commission considers on monitoring that there is an inconsistency across the country, as the conclusion says on page 13, the Government > "could choose to have the award of grant, including determination of the interests of justice test, administered solely and directly by the LSC, without the involvement of court staff."

—without the involvement of the computer programme to which the Minister referred to allow proper processing of applications for legal aid. The heart of the concern among practitioners and other members of profession is that the essence of the Bill is a measure to remove all powers from those closest at hand to make the proper decisions. Particularly in exceptional cases, magistrates are in the best position in the court to hear an oral application. On that basis, I invite the House to vote.

Question put, That the clause be read a Second time:—

Clause 2

RIGHTS TO REPRESENTATION: FINANCIAL ELIGIBILITY

Mr. Heath: I beg to move amendment No. 1, in page 3, line 21, at end insert--

'(5) The provision which may be made under sub-paragraph (4)(c) includes provision prescribing circumstances in which the person or body reviewing a decision may refer a question to the High Court for its decision.

(6) Section 16 of the Supreme Court Act 1981 (c. 54) (appeals from the High Court) shall not apply to decisions of the High Court on a reference under regulations under this paragraph.'.

Two improvements were made to the Bill in the other place. One was to extend the appeal in the interests of justice and the second was to introduce the capacity for an appeal on the grounds of financial eligibility. It is the latter to which we now turn. I still prefer the proposals made by Lord Goodhart in the other place and I regret that the Government were not able to accept them. However, in Committee I told the Minister that I was prepared to consider ways in which we could accomplish at least part of our objective by another route that was more acceptable to her and the Department. She was kind enough to suggest that we could have further discussions on that matter, and I pay tribute to her advisers who met with me to consider possible alternatives.

The amendment is a compromise based on those discussions, and that is how Parliament should work. A Minister has a position and Opposition Members have a contrary position, and if it is possible to reach an accommodation—sometimes it is not possible—we should seek to do so, especially if it improves the legislation.

[Mr. Heath]

The objections that the Minister raised in Committee were threefold. First, she was concerned that we should not have appeals based simply on the arithmetic of the Legal Services Commission. If financial eligibility is simply a question of adding up the sums and coming to a conclusion, it would be wrong for judicial arbitration to be used to decide whether the sums were done properly. That was, as the Minister put it, an administrative matter and an administrative review was the right way forward.

The second concern was that a right of appeal against the financial eligibility conclusions of the commission might lead to vexatious appeals and, therefore, not only a slowing down of the system, but additional costs, without any gain for the outcome as far as the appellant was concerned. There was an additional and more subtle point that if an appeal against a decision of the Legal Services Commission was made to a magistrates court, the court would hear it on the basis of the advice of the clerk to the justices who had made the original decision. That seemed to be a rather circular process that would not get us much further.

It is my strong view that there are occasions when the determination of a person's financial eligibility can be open to doubt when it is judged against the specific criteria laid down by the Legal Services Commission. The system involves a bureaucratic exercise and when dealing with any set of regulations, as we know, there will be exceptions when people do not fit neatly into arrangements. For example, a person might have a nominal income that could not be used because there was a challenge in law regarding the person's right to that income, or because it was being paid into a bank account in a country to which the person had no access, so the funds could not possibly be used to support the representation. It was my concern all the way through to ensure that in such exceptional circumstances, there could not be simply an iteration of the bureaucratic system of the Legal Services Commission to produce a negative outcome when the interests of the person applying for legal aid would clearly be served by a successful outcome, although that could not be achieved by administrative review.

The Minister said from the start that everything is open to judicial review, which is of course right. It could be argued that judicial review might satisfy the article 6 test, although I am not entirely convinced. However, the problem is that judicial review is expensive and slow. A person in such a position would be in a catch-22 situation of not having the funds to mount a defence case, but needing to find funds to undertake judicial review to unlock funds for that defence case. That would be impossible, so it would be an unsatisfactory position.

The amendment satisfies my basic requirements and I hope that it satisfies those of the Minister, too. We are suggesting that when a question of financial eligibility that falls outside the strict criteria arises—when a doubt arises in law, or because of other circumstances, about whether the financial criteria should apply—there should be a duty on the Legal Services Commission to refer the matter to the High Court for adjudication. Under such circumstances, the High Court could determine the funds that should be properly considered under the criteria of the Legal Services Commission and make an award of representation.

The importance of the process is purely that it is a means for appeal, albeit one that is filtered by the Legal Services Commission. There would be a route for circumventing bureaucracy in the exceptional circumstances that I have predicted. The advantage for applicants would be that they would still have the capacity to obtain judicial review on the decision of the Legal Services Commission. If the commission unreasonably decided not to refer a case to the High Court, that decision could be subject to judicial review.

Amendment No. 1 addresses the exceptional circumstances that were in the mind of my noble Friend Lord Goodhart, although the situation is not as satisfactory as it would have been if his amendment had been acceptable to the Government. I again pay tribute to the Minister and her officials for listening carefully to the points that I have made to allow us to come up with an amendment that should represent an agreed solution. I commend the amendment to the House and hope that it will satisfy those in another place who take an interest in such matters.

Keith Vaz: I will speak only briefly to welcome the amendment. I think that it is the sensible way forward. I, too, would have preferred a provision to allow the right of appeal. I understand that there will be exceptional circumstances. I very much hope that the Government will accept this sensible amendment.

Mr. Djanogly: It is at this stage that we see the real implications of the programme motion. I want the Minister to have time to reply, so I shall be brief.

As for the amendment, I have a certain feeling of déjà vu. It has been the determination of the Government to eliminate the appeal process, which was astutely introduced by my noble friends and Liberal peers in the other place. Once again, I feel obliged, as was the case with the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath), to reiterate our belief in the importance of an appeal process forming part of the Bill, and in turn upholding the principle of access to justice. However, in the light of the amendment, it seems that we have a compromise. I welcome that to the extent that a right of appeal is not completely removed from the Bill, as would have been the case otherwise. For that, I am grateful.

I must reiterate the importance of an appeal process rather than simply having a judicial review process that the Government seemed to want to stick by. Our noble friends and Opposition peers in the other place felt it appropriate to allow for an appeal process in relation to the eligibility test reintroduced by the Government. We welcomed that because we believed that it was important that the courts should be able to hear appeals on the interest of justice test as well as on the eligibility test, and that the courts should be able to consider these matters afresh.

We therefore found the Government's decision to overturn the amendment moved in the other place to be irrational and potentially damaging to the Bill, but in essence we give our support. I note that Members from all parties, including the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Keith Vaz), have come to roughly the same position.

Their noble Lords ultimately understood the complicated nature of an eligibility test that cannot be accurate on every occasion. The Government stated in their supplement to the framework document that there will be regulations for the consideration of cases in which exceptional circumstances require funding for those who do not meet the eligibility criteria, but not by appeal. Page 12 of the supplement states that the test is whether the cases require a fine judgment that warrants the intervention of the courts. Surely exceptional cases meet that test.

The Government seem to resist the Lords contribution on the foundation that it is a waste of court time to have to deal with administrative matters. That they are administrative is quite clear. However, the Government should consider the circumstances recognised by their lordships in the other place whereby a defendant's financial, legal and social means fall not within the realms of administration but within the remit of the administration of justice.

The Government have conceded that there are exceptional circumstances where the eligibility test does not simply apply to factual issues, but say that these can be dealt with simply by judicial review. To our mind, that is misguided. The process of judicial review is too cumbersome suitably to address the rights of those whose plight has been worsened by non-financial issues under the merits test. Judicial review demands a new and separate process that can only prove more costly than referring back to a judge or court that has already dealt with the matter.

Hon. Members may now appreciate that the potential compromise that the amendment presents is not one that we would see as the perfect answer to an issue on which we have argued strongly throughout the passage of the Bill. At the same time, we can accept an amendment that provides a platform for referring the question to a court. With the amendment, we accept that nothing will be lost by the defendant and that in the correct circumstances the correct decision will be reached.

3.30 pm

Bridget Prentice: I am grateful to the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) and to those Members who served in Committee, who realise how important it is that I manage to get the hon. Gentleman's constituency correctly pronounced for once. I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for what he has expressed about officials. I will ensure that they are all aware of his gratitude and positive remarks.

It has always been our firm view that an administrative review was the most appropriate mechanism in the situations under discussion. However, we are sensitive to the concerns raised by the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome and others in Committee and on Report. I accept that there may be a very limited number of cases which are not just about number-crunching, but which may raise points of interpretation of the regulations. That is likely to happen at the beginning of the scheme particularly, and we can then set a precedent for what the scheme is intended to achieve.

Having listened carefully to the arguments presented by the hon. Gentleman and others, we are willing to consider his amendment. The proposal has advantages over both consideration by a magistrates court and reliance solely on judicial review. The amendment does not undermine the broad principle that a challenge to the means test where the applicant alleges an administrative error or miscalculation would be most appropriately provided through the administrative review mechanism. However, I acknowledge that in the rare cases where it is anticipated that a difficult issue such as a point of law may arise, the amendment represents a practical and measured response to the concerns expressed.

The amendment marks a coincidence of desire, so to speak. It offers the sensible balance that we have been aiming for, and I am pleased to urge the House to accept it.

Mr. Heath: I hugely welcome the Minister's remarks. An outbreak of consensus seems to have spread to all Benches. That is a remarkable occurrence at the end of Report, and in this case it has the merits of improving the Bill and makes the Legal Services Commission work better at administering legal aid than it would otherwise have done. I am grateful to the Minister, her officials and hon. Members in all parts of the Chamber who have supported my amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

Order for Third Reading read.

3.32 pm

Bridget Prentice: I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

The Bill marks a significant stride forward in ensuring that the criminal legal aid system becomes fairer and more effective. It will achieve this by re-introducing an updated and revised means test, as well as transferring responsibility for the grant of criminal legal aid representation from the courts to the Legal Services Commission. The Bill reflects our firm view that those who can afford to pay for their criminal defence costs, not least wealthy Premiership footballers or lottery winners, should be asked to do so.

By targeting resources on those who most need them, we will be able to deliver a sustainable legal aid system that continues to serve the needs of this and future generations. In short, the Bill will help provide for a criminal legal aid scheme that ensures access to justice for all, while giving better value for money to the taxpayer. I am sure all hon. Members will be pleased that their constituents can welcome the Bill knowing that those who earn vast sums of money or gain vast sums by other means will no longer be eligible for legal aid.

I have been encouraged that the key principles that underpin the Bill have broadly met with unanimity from both Houses. I am delighted that on the one issue where debate has been most intense—the policy on reviews in respect of the new means test—we have been able to reach a consensus and a practical solution. I hope that the House of Lords will take the same view. The fact that we have been able to work closely with the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) demonstrates the constructive spirit in which the House has debated the important issues raised by the Bill. I pay tribute to him and others, including the hon. Member for Huntingdon

[Bridget Prentice]

(Mr. Djanogly), for their contributions today, in Committee and on Second Reading, which have got the Bill to this stage.

I also take the opportunity to thank all hon. Members who served on the Committee and my hon. Friends in the Whips Office, particularly my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, West (Kevin Brennan), for ensuring that we have had an informative, albeit concise, debate.

May I express through you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, my apologies to my hon. Friend the Member for Hyndburn (Mr. Pope), who was one of the Chairmen of the Committee, but who, unfortunately, owing to the precise and concise way in which we dealt with matters, was unable to chair part of our proceedings. I thank, too, everyone on both sides of the House who has participated today and throughout our proceedings for ensuring that we pass a Bill that will stand us in good stead for the future.

Finally, I thank the officials in my Department for the excellent work that they have done, not just on my behalf but on behalf of everyone in the House in ensuring that we have a Criminal Defence Service Bill which will last long into the future. I commend the Bill to the House.

3.36 pm

Mr. Djanogly: I join the Minister in thanking all those Members on both sides of the House who have been involved with the Bill. I thank the Minister and her officials generally for being constructive and prepared to consult, and I thank the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) for his important contribution to the Bill's progress. I pay tribute to my hon. Friends the Members for Rugby and Kenilworth (Jeremy Wright) and for Enfield, Southgate (Mr. Burrowes), who provided me with valuable assistance in Committee and today, and to my hon. Friend the Member for Upminster (Angela Watkinson), who has worked hard on the Bill. I also pay tribute to those in the other place who so ably assisted in allowing this worthwhile Bill to come this far.

The Bill has been a work in progress, and a significant part of that was achieved by their lordships. We remain supportive of the principle that those who can afford to pay for their defence should do so as a necessary prerequisite to a fair, effective justice system that gives taxpayers value for their money.

The Bill was subject to a number of amendments in Committee and on Report, some of which were non-contentious Government amendments, but many others were tabled in an attempt to forge an effective piece of legislation, which is essential in stabilising the current failing legal aid system. Much good work has been achieved. For example, significant progress has been made on producing a thorough and comprehensive set of regulations that set out the detailed calculations necessary to assess whether individuals will be entitled to relief.

Issues raised in debates in both Houses that have been addressed in the supplement and by amendments to the Bill include: that the interests of justice test should be a judicial rather than an administrative decision; that it should be possible for an applicant to be granted legal aid when the interests of justice clearly require it, even if the applicant has failed the means test; that some contribution should be made, by those who qualify for representation and are capable of making it, to costs in the magistrates court; and that responsibility for legal aid matters be restored to the Lord Chancellor's Office. We have supported or proposed those changes.

Throughout the passage of the Bill, one issue, appeals, has persisted despite what has been achieved. Under the scheme originally envisaged, the court could consider an appeal as if it were merely hearing a judicial review rather than making the decision itself. Following strong arguments against that on Second Reading and in Committee in the House of Lords, the Government updated the supplementary framework document published in October 2005, which sets out the details of the regulations that the Secretary of State proposes to make under the Bill. That now makes it clear that the court will be able to hear appeals in the interests of justice, with its own decision replacing that of the Legal Services Commission. That would, however, have applied only to appeals on the misapplication of the interests of justice test. Therefore, under the leadership of our noble Friend Lord Kingsland and Liberal peer Lord Goodhart, an amendment to extend appeals to the eligibility test as well as the interests of justice test was passed on Report.

The amendment tabled by Lord Goodhart and Lord Kingsland appeared to remove the thorn in the side of the Bill, for which we were grateful at the time. However, it was a shame that, in Committee in this House, amendment No. 1 overturned that amendment. We strongly opposed that, and the eligibility test became the remaining issue. It is unsatisfactory that those who are unable to afford to go to court because they have been denied legal aid can seek redress only through an expensive and cumbersome review. In Committee, I tabled an amendment to give the courts a residual power to grant a representation order upon oral application to the court. We thought that that would prevent unnecessary delay in court proceedings in exceptional circumstances. That move would have been all the more important in the context of the Government's amendment that I have just described. We have revisited these issues today. As my hon. Friends have argued in Committee, it is cheaper, faster and better to put such matters into an appeal before the court, rather than through judicial review.

In other respects, the Bill is a good measure, and I hope that the Minister will not allow failure to act on the outstanding issues to overshadow the wider achievements. The Conservative Opposition feel that access to justice is a serious matter that requires full and detailed consideration. Through the determined efforts of our noble Friends in another place, such detailed consideration has been possible. The Conservative party has long been in favour of many of the measures in the Bill, including means-testing for those who can afford it. The Government abolished that means test in 2001. Now, somewhat bizarrely, five years later they are bringing it back.

James Duddridge (Rochford and Southend, East) (Con): What assessment has my hon. Friend made of the additional cost involved in that change? My impression is that the Government simply got it wrong and that, while I welcome the Bill, it seems to be backtracking. What assessment has my hon. Friend made of the amount of money that has been wasted?

Mr. Djanogly: My hon. Friend asks a good question. Perhaps the Minister will be able to tell the House the answer.

We support the Bill in principle, but there are various questions that the Government need to address. While we largely welcome the Bill, especially the introduction of means-testing, it represents only a very small step towards the reform of the legal aid system. Yes, the growth in spending on the criminal defence service has to be checked, but we also need a focused and sustainable plan of action to address these serious issues.

The Department for Constitutional Affairs press briefing on the Bill stated—rather grandly, I thought—that the Bill would "ensure that the cost of criminal legal aid does not continue to threaten to erode the civil legal aid scheme, which is recognised as a vital first line of defence against social exclusion".

I am afraid that, on its own, the Bill does no such thing. Much as we agree with the basic premise of the Bill, it does nothing to tackle the other main factors driving the increase in criminal legal aid costs, in particular the very high cost criminal cases and the way in which the Crown Prosecution Service manages prosecutions, especially complex ones. It certainly has nothing to do with helping civil legal aid, as the Department's press release suggests.

As the Department for Constitutional Affairs itself acknowledged in its recent White Paper, more than 50 per cent. of Crown Court legal aid is now consumed by just 1 per cent. of the cases involved. My noble Friend Lord Kingsland said in another place in relation to means-testing:

"I hazard that however much money it will save, it will save nothing like the amount of money that high cost cases cost the criminal legal aid system."—[Official Report, House of Lords 13 June 2005; Vol. 672, c. 1083.]

The Government will no doubt argue that all these matters are being examined by Lord Carter's review of legal aid—in fact, the Minister has done so already—and that we should await the outcome of that review. If so, we should like to know when that review is to be published. Why is it not available now, when it is so clearly needed in the context of this debate?

It is self-evident that we need a far greater emphasis on reducing expenditure in high cost cases, and that we need to pursue initiatives aimed at achieving better value for money across the criminal justice system, such as more effective trial management. Irrespective of Carter's review, the Government should be seeking urgently to make progress. What we need are imaginative solutions if we are to achieve a sustainable legal aid system and an application of basic management skills to criminal case management.

We attempted to deal with the issue of a Crown court scheme on Second Reading and in Committee. The Government had made a fairly convincing response to our earlier request for the contemporaneous introduction of the Crown court scheme, and we are prepared to accept the concept of a phased roll-out of a similar regime in the Crown court on the basis that it is expeditious. We should, however, like to know from the Government when that is likely to happen. We should also like a review of the Bill's effects before the means-testing scheme is implemented in the Crown court. Will the Minister please confirm that that will happen, and explain how it is likely to happen? We recognise the benefits of a so-called phased roll-out, but that can only be effective if there is a full and expeditious appraisal of the consequences of the changes proposed in the Bill.

As we discussed these points during the Bill's earlier stages, I shall not discuss them now in great detail. However, if we are to have split magistrates and Crown court systems and starting dates, we—along with our noble Friends in the other place—have concerns about the perverse incentive that may result if the Crown court scheme is implemented at a later date. Defendants may opt for the Crown court route in cases that are triable in either way in order to ensure a more favourable position in regard to legal aid. That is another reason why the Government should be expeditious in applying the scheme to the Crown court.

The aim of the Bill was to address the funding crisis that beset the Government who abolished means-testing. Now they have recognised the error of their ways, it is important also to recognise the drain of high cost cases—particularly in the Crown court—that could hinder the merits, in practice, of what we ultimately support in the Bill.

The problem is not that the Government are spending too little; the problem is that cases need to be managed more efficiently, and there needs to be clarity about what legal aid is spent on. The Crown Prosecution Service, and judges themselves, need to manage cases more efficiently. Dealing with the management issues at an early stage will help to prevent even bigger problems from spiralling later. Yet the Government seem unable to get to grips with the difficulties. This must be seen as a significant failure on the part of the Department for Constitutional Affairs, and it must know that the reintroduction of means-testing in itself will not solve the problem or make significant savings in relative terms. A review before implementation in the Crown court will, we believe, be intrinsic to the fulfilment of what the Minister said on Second Reading was the aim of the Bill:

"a legal aid system that balances fairness with administrative simplicity and that is based on affordability yet is sensitive to an applicant's individual circumstances."—[Official Report, 13 December 2005; Vol. 440, c. 1238.]

All in all, the Government must recognise that the Bill is not a panacea for all the problems to which the legal aid system has been exposed. Although we welcome it in principle, it is only a small step towards desperately needed reform of a legal aid system that the Government have allowed to fall into disrepair, and much more remains to be done. The Department for Constitutional Affairs must know that the Bill in itself will not solve the problems.

The Government must recognise, particularly when producing the regulations that will follow the Bill but also when introducing the scheme into the Crown court, that what is needed is not simply restriction of the number of people being helped by the legal aid system as the Bill proposes, but what was proposed in the Government's own report "A fairer deal for legal aid": a system that is "fair and effective, providing access to justice for all who need it."

I remain to be convinced that the Government have responded to their own message.

If, despite our general support for the Bill, the Minister thinks that we or the legal profession will accept the Bill as the answer to the legal aid crisis, she will need to think again.

3.49 pm

Keith Vaz: In response to the amendment tabled by the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) in the last debate, the Minister referred to a coincidence of desire. Until the hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Djanogly) got to the last part of his speech, I felt like a gooseberry watching not consideration in Committee being reported back to the House, but a love-in, so generous was the praise between those on the Front Benches and so amicable the discussions and various deliberations in Committee and in the House since consideration of the Bill began.

I pay tribute to the Minister and her colleagues at the Department for Constitutional Affairs on the modernising agenda that they have adopted since my noble Friend Lord Falconer became Lord Chancellor. There must be something of a whirlwind in the Department. I remember my time there as a Minister six years ago, when it was not so much sleepy, but at least not as dynamic as it is now. Legislation rushes out the door at breakneck speed and Ministers appear before the House practically every week to tell us about new legislation that is to be passed.

The Bill is important, primarily because we want to save money on the very large legal aid budget. The hon. Member for Huntingdon will not remember the debates held in the House when I was first elected, when the legal aid budget was, even under the last Conservative Government, spiralling out of control. The current legal aid budget is £1.1 billion, which makes the DCA one of the biggest-spending Departments.

The savings that the Bill envisages are quite small—only £35 million out of £1.1 billion—but £35 million is a lot of money. It is better than a poke in the eye, and any legislation that saves money for the taxpayer so that it can be spent wisely is to be welcomed. Therefore, I welcome the Government's approach of targeting legal aid so that it is spent on those who need it. The Minister gave the examples of the lottery winner and the football player, but there are a lot of people in between them and the very poor who must not be left out.

My main concern, in accepting what the Government have done and supporting the Minister in the good work that she does at the Department, is that too much trust and faith are being put in the Legal Services Commission. Once the decision-making process is taken away from the judges and the courts, removing that degree of independence and putting it in the hands of bureaucrats, some of whom are ex-civil servants—not that we have anything against them; I shall use the term "officials", if I may call them that—our ability as Parliament and that of people who apply for legal aid to feel that they have had their case justly treated are also removed.

The Minister accepted the amendment tabled by the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome, and I welcome the spirit in which she did that, but I ask her to spend her time and efforts in supervising and monitoring what the Legal Services Commission does. It is dispensing a huge amount of public money, so both ministerial eyes need to be firmly on those who govern the commission. The Minister should be willing to respond to the concerns of Members of the House, the public and the professions when they point out that things are going wrong.

My hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, North (Julie Morgan), who unfortunately has had to leave the House, has raised with the Minister, as I am doing again today, her concern and mine about the proposals to stop the specialist support services in England and Wales, which are, instead, to be provided by the Legal Services Commission. My hon. Friend tells me that they will be stopped in July. I see that the Chairman of the Constitutional Affairs Committee, the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith), and other members of the Committee are here today. We discussed this very matter yesterday.

The concern held by my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, North and by me is that these services are being stopped when the Government should be ensuring that we target our money so that services that work—providing assistance and advice to voluntary organisations on issues such as debt, housing and welfare benefits—should continue. I ask the Minister to look into that point at the same time as she is asking us to put our faith in her judgment and that of the Lord Chancellor in transferring yet again so many powers to the Legal Services Commission.

The hon. Member for Huntingdon is right; in a sense, the Government are the victims of their own success. Having taken power in 1997 and having told the public that they would catch criminals faster, that is what they have been doing. But that puts pressure on the court system, which goes back to an earlier point concerning the relationship between the DCA and the Home Office. The DCA is an equal partner with the Home Office. The Home Office is not in charge and the Home Secretary does not tell the Lord Chancellor what to do; I am quite sure that the Lord Chancellor is robust in his dealings with the Home Office. But our great success in catching criminals and reducing the number of crimes committed has resulted in an increase in the legal aid budget.

I see my hon. Friend the Member for Rhondda (Chris Bryant) looking at me. Clearly he will soon be gesticulating to tell me to bring my speech to a close and, as I am quite afraid of him, I will do so. I have enormous respect for my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary, who has done good work on immigration appeals. I ask her to listen to the professions and not to fight with them.

I have read the Law Society brief on this and it has no problems with what the Government are doing, apart from the effect on the right of appeal. I ask my hon. Friend to work with the professions and with those who help those going through the legal system. I am sure that the good will generated for most of this afternoon will be generated again by similar legislation that I am sure my hon. Friend will propose in the years to come.

3.56 pm

Mr. Heath: I must say to the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Keith Vaz) that it is paranoia of the highest order to be afraid of the hon. Member for Rhondda (Chris Bryant). However, I agree with some of what the hon. Member for Leicester, East said.

There are few months of the year in which I bemoan the dearth of legislation coming from the DCA and the Home Office. Indeed, sometimes it feels as though one does nothing else but read new legislation. However, the hon. Gentleman is right about the relationship between the two, although I would argue that we should have a ministry of justice to take on all criminal justice responsibilities. If we create 800 new offences, people will be tried for them and that costs money, which is where the increase in legal aid comes from.

I believe legal aid to be one of the great glories of this country. The fact that we are prepared to institute a pillar of our welfare state to provide for people who need representation before our courts is something to be rejoiced and not slighted; it is a necessary part of a civilised society.

I pay tribute to the Under-Secretary, who has finally discovered how to pronounce my constituency, to the point that she corrects others. That is a wonderful advance in a short time. She and other Committee members have done a fine job. We debated the Bill and, we hope, improved it, but we did not take an unnecessary amount of time to do so. The fact that we have managed to complete consideration does not suggest a lack of care or scrutiny. It is a simple fact that this is a brief Bill with few complicated proposals that, therefore, does not require long consideration. But we have pointed out what is lacking in it.

It would be easy, were it not for the constraints of the rules of the House on Third Reading, to launch into a much wider debate on the future of legal aid, as it is a serious issue that needs debating. This debate, however, deals with a narrow point. It would also be extremely valuable to pick up on the point made by the hon. Member for Leicester, East and his hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, North (Julie Morgan), and I hope that the Minister can enlighten us as to the loss of specialist officers in the Legal Services Commission.

This measure deals with eligibility for criminal defence legal aid. Two issues arose in Committee, the other place having dealt with the major issue of the capacity to appeal in the interests of justice. One was the issue of the residual power, which was raised by the new clause. I still maintain that that would have been an improvement to the Bill, that it would have created a better, more appropriate way of dealing with exceptional cases, and that it would have saved a little money in the process. The Minister has not, however, accepted that.

The other issue was that of appeal. I have said that I believe that the amendment from the other place was wider and better in its scope, but I repeat that I am grateful to the Minister for listening to my points and arranging for me to meet her officials to discuss whether a compromise was possible, and for accepting the amendment to the Bill today. I say with a degree of confidence that I think that it will satisfy those in another place who will consider the matter later.

The Minister must not be allowed to get away with the fact that the Government marched us up this hill only a few years ago and are now marching us down again. Consistency is not the Government's strongest point in their approach to this issue. That said, I welcome what has been put in place today to curb what, to the layman, and to an interested observer, are abuses of the system. I welcome the fact that the Government have not reintroduced a crude threshold for means tests but have taken a more sensitive and sensible view about the taper that should be applied, which I commend.

I return to a basic point: nobody wants to see a lot of money spent on legal aid until they need that support to defend themselves in court. It not just millionaires, or those without means, that we are dealing with. It is those in the middle who are most affected when, in extreme circumstances, they find themselves before the court and unable to receive the support that they need to present their case properly. Those people must be clearly in our minds when addressing the Bill. The Bill goes a long way to deal with some of those issues. The wider issues of legal aid in the criminal and civil courts will wait another day, but the Minister can be assured that we have extremely strong opinions on those.

4.3 pm

Mr. Burrowes: I support the Bill, particularly in relation to the restoration of the means test and the fact that the Government have learned from their mistakes. In terms of the detail, I welcome the fact that the application of the means test will be much more straightforward and less bureaucratic. I remember the days of the old means applications, when a paper trail among a pile of wage slips or statements was necessary, but I understand that the regulations will introduce a much more straightforward procedure.

I have some fundamental reservations, however, which revolve around the conferring of powers on the Legal Services Commission. In that regard, I support the comments of the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Keith Vaz). On grounds of principle and practice, we are concerned that the courts' remit will be taken from them. We sought in Committee to retain the residual power. We sought through new clause 1 to retain it as an exceptional power. Both those attempts failed.

Can the Minister give us assurances in relation to the practical application of the conferring of powers to the Legal Services Commission? I draw her attention to page 13 of the supplement to the framework document. It states:

"If ... the Interests of Justice test is not applied consistently across the country ... the LSC would issue guidance to court staff about the application of the test."

Then the threat, which raises those fundamental concerns, comes into play. The document suggests that there are two options:

"Ultimately, the Government could amend schedule 3 to the Access to Justice Act 1999 to clarify the working of the Interests of Justice test. Alternatively"— this is the nuclear option—

"it could choose to have the award of grant, including determination of the Interests of Justice test, administered solely and directly by the LSC, without the involvement of court staff."

That option was a matter of concern on principle, but now that we have moved beyond that, it is a concern in practice.

[Mr. Burrowes]

The Minister has justified the Bill on the basis that court staff will be involved in the application of the new regulations. That makes sense because they are on the ground. They know the best way of maintaining the system in terms of granting legal aid and assessing financial eligibility. They are closest to the decision making. They will be able, practically and quickly, to make the decision. Therefore, I ask her to give an assurance that the final option of devolving the practical powers so as not to involve court staff will not be proceeded with and that, at the very least, if the guidance does not work in the Government's eyes, they will seek to bring the matter back before the House to amend schedule 3 to the Access to Justice Act 1999 to deal with the working of the interests of justice test, and will not go straight to the final option, take all the practical powers away from court staff and give them to the LSC. At that point, the concerns of the hon. Member for Leicester, East, practitioners, court staff and others would come into play: decision making would be far removed from where it should take place, which is in the court building. Will the Minister directly respond to that?

This is not the place to do it, but I point out that it is estimated that there will be a saving of £35 million through the application of the scheme. Can that be properly taken into account when Lord Carter's review is published and when consideration is given to how to deal with lower courts' work? It has been accepted by the Department that lower court costs are under control already. We now face the prospect of £35 million savings. Can we properly take account of that and allow that to form part of the judgment before proceeding to, from the practitioners' point of view, another nuclear option: competitive price tendering, which raises concern that the work and service of many local practitioners for the community, not least black, minority and ethnic firms, will be threatened?

Primarily, I seek assurances on the practical implementation of the system in terms of transferring powers from court staff and conferring them on others.

4.8 pm

James Brokenshire (Hornchurch) (Con): I broadly welcome the introduction of the Bill, particularly in the context of the cost issues affecting legal aid. Since 1997, the legal aid bill has grown from £1.5 billion to around £2.36 billion for the current year. That emphasises the need to tackle that issue urgently, particularly when one considers the different balance between civil legal aid and criminal legal aid. The funding to civil legal aid has gone down by about 1 per cent. during that time, showing that it is the criminal side of legal aid that has seen growth in expenditure.

It is interesting that, when the Government introduced their previous proposals, which effectively scrapped means-testing, in the "Modernising Justice" White Paper, they described means-testing as complex and costly, highlighting issues where lack of documentation led to delays and the further costs associated with that. They talked about it being an unjustifiable waste of money. It is interesting to see how the debate about and, perhaps, the recognition of the need for some form of means-testing has come back. For this to work and to make the potential savings of £35 million that my hon. Friend the Member for Enfield, Southgate (Mr. Burrowes) talked about, it will require good administration, not the bureaucracy that some hon. Members fear may exist in the Legal Services Commission. That needs to be monitored carefully if we are to get the hoped-for cutbacks in the increase in spend through means-testing. For that to happen, we must not get bogged down in a mire of bureaucracy and administration.

Keith Vaz: The problem remains that good legal aid practitioners are leaving legal aid work because the rates are so low. It is not that they wish to make a huge profit from it; it is the fact that they cannot afford to continue in that work. That means that those who are not particularly good may remain to do the work because they can afford those rates.

James Brokenshire: The hon. Gentleman makes a valid point, which I was coming to, about access to justice and the quality of justice, support, advice and guidance that is received by the beneficiaries of legal aid. There is still a much wider debate to be had on the future of legal aid and legal services, which falls outside the scope of today's debate. Clearly, we need to ensure that legal support is there where it is needed and that where it is needed, it is robust and of sufficient quality to ensure that those individuals are properly represented. I agree with the hon. Gentleman, who also sits with me on the Constitutional Affairs Committee. I suspect that we in that Committee will continue to monitor this in the months and years ahead.

We need to monitor the impact of these provisions. I understand that they will be introduced in magistrates courts first and the Crown court thereafter. Obviously, the Minister will closely monitor the impact of that, particularly where offences can be tried in either court, and whether people elect to go down the Crown court route because of the flexibility that might remain there following the introduction of these provisions.

There have been interesting comments about the reasons for the growth in the budget. The hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) highlighted the fact that we have seen an increasing number of offences on the statute book. Clearly, changes to sentencing guidelines have had some impact, in terms of the greater risk of imprisonment, giving rise to demands and needs for access to justice and fair justice, ensuring that people are properly represented. We must not forget the argument about the inequality of arms. We cannot have people feeling intimidated or threatened by the power of the state seeking to impose criminal penalties, and the fact that they cannot be adequately represented or defend themselves.

I remain struck by the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Enfield, Southgate when he moved his new clause in an attempt to ensure that the less advantaged and perhaps people with mental health problems are not disadvantaged by the Bill. I urge the Minister to monitor this closely to ensure that people from less advantaged backgrounds, people who are illiterate or people with a disability are not prevented from gaining access to justice. I am sure that that is not the intent of the Department for Constitutional Affairs.

I ask the Minister to keep this under review and ensure that the fairness that is the hallmark of our justice system remains.

I am pleased that there has been some movement—particularly in another place—on the clarification of appeal rights; such clarification has been an important part of this legislation's development. We must make it clear that there is a separate means of ensuring that, where necessary, the Legal Services Commission's decisions are scrutinised in court. We will need to monitor the system's operation and performance in order to establish how many of the LSC's decisions are successfully appealed. If many are, that would tend to suggest that there are problems with the system's administration, and with the way in which decisions are being determined.

Last July, the Constitutional Affairs Committee's report on the Bill stated:

> "Legal aid plays a vital role in ensuring that those who cannot afford their own defence costs can still obtain legal representation. It also protects against unfair trials and 'inequality of arms' between the defendant and the prosecution and makes it easier to protect defendants' rights."

They must be the underlying principles driving the changes being implemented today. I welcome the Bill, but I hope that it will continue to be scrutinised as it completes its legislative passage, that the aims and objectives effectively summarised by the Constitutional Affairs Committee are put into practice, and that we have a strong and robust system that continues to deliver high-quality, effective and cost-effective justice.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed, with an amendment.

Public Accounts

4.16 pm

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough) (Con): I beg to move,

> That this House takes note of the 17th and the 20th to the 52nd Reports of the Committee of Public Accounts of Session 2003–04, the 1st to the 30th Reports of the Committee of Public Accounts of Session 2004–05, and the 1st to the 3rd, the 5th, 6th, 10th and 11th Reports and the First Special Report of the Committee of Public Accounts of Session 2005–06, and of the Treasury Minutes and the Northern Ireland Department of Finance and Personnel Memoranda on these Reports, Cm 6271, 6282, 6302, 6303, 6304, 6332, 6355, 6416, 6441, 6458, 6468, 6496, 6577, 6578, 6579, 6609, 6667, 6668, 6682, 6689, 6712 and 6724.

I am pleased to welcome Members to the Public Accounts Committee debate. It is the first of its kind since June 2004, and in the lengthy intervening period the profile of public sector efficiency, which has been at the heart of the Committee's work ever since its creation 140 years ago, has been raised, certainly in part, by the Gershon review. Given this context, we have a lot of highly topical issues to cover today.

The Committee is proud of its work since our last debate. We have published no fewer than 76 reports on issues at the very top of the policy agenda, including 21 in this Session so far. Our high profile and hard-hitting output has included a report on UK military operations in Iraq. That report recognised the commitment, bravery and professionalism of our armed forces, but noted shortcomings in the channelling of supplies to front-line forces.

We also considered the uncertain future of renewable energy, advising the Government to subsidise the development of new technologies and to engage fully in the nuclear power debate. We further concluded that the operation of tax credits has been an absolute nightmare for a significant minority of claimants, who cannot understand how much they are due, or why, in so many cases, such large overpayments have been made.

We also highlighted a simply unacceptable postcode lottery in the prescription of anti-cancer drugs, waiting times for scans and chemotherapy treatments. We found that people who live in a northern city are almost twice as likely to die of cancer as those who live in an affluent area in the south. The cancer of those who happen to live in a deprived area is likely to be much more advanced by the time that it is diagnosed, and they are less likely to survive. We urged the Government to address that issue as a matter of urgency.

Many of the Committee's recommendations have been implemented in the past 18 months, thereby translating them into practical service improvements for the taxpayer. Some 276 of the Committee's recommendations—93 per cent., which is way above the percentage achieved by any other Committee—were accepted by the Government in 2004–05. I pay tribute to the Treasury for accepting 93 per cent. of our recommendations; its doing so is entirely in line with the cross-party nature of our work.

Mr. Ian Davidson (Glasgow, South-West) (Lab/Co-op): The hon. Gentleman said that 93 per cent. of the Committee's recommendations had been accepted. For purposes of comparison, what was its record under previous Chairmen? Has he achieved a higher or lower proportion, and does he set himself a target?

Mr. Leigh: I am sure that my very distinguished predecessor as PAC Chairman achieved just as high a rate. He has moved on to even better things, and I do not want to criticise him in any way, but the Committee has gone from strength to strength over the past four or five years. That has nothing to do with me—I have just happened to be Chairman in that time—but it does have to do with the structure of the Committee, the National Audit Office and many other factors. Things have gone pretty well.

I shall offer only three or four examples of our successes, although I could go on and on. However, I regret that the Committee is also the Public Accounts Committee for Northern Ireland while Stormont is suspended.

The Committee does not pull its punches, and our recommendations are hard hitting. We are consensual, but that does not mean that we go for the lowest common denominator. On the Jobskills programme in Northern Ireland, we said:

"Our overall impression is that Jobskills is one of the worst-run programmes that this Committee has examined in recent years. We noted a quite astonishing catalogue of failures and control weaknesses, all of which pointed to a disturbing level of complacency within the Department."

That programme has since been axed.

The Committee's report on light rail projects stressed the need for rigorous financial viability tests prior to approval. As a result, the Department for Transport shelved plans for three new light rail developments because it realised that it could not guarantee against price escalation. Last year, the Committee highlighted the fact that the Inland Revenue had adopted many of the recommendations proposed by the PAC six years previously. As a result, it had become 66 per cent. more efficient in its administration of inheritance tax.

The Committee also reported recently on Energywatch and Postwatch, which we described as "feeble". We suggested that those bodies could reduce costs by re-examining their regional structures and sharing administrative functions. In response, Postwatch centralised its complaint handling function in Belfast, and Energywatch, with the support of Postwatch, set up a consumer action network to find ways to achieve better joint working.

It is a testament to the Committee's work that our recommendations on the private finance initiative and on public-private partnerships have saved the taxpayer no less than £750 million, according to the NAO. If the Committee's members were paid on a commission basis, we would not need to remain Members of this House for very long.

Complementing the impacts that I have described is the increasing scale of media coverage enjoyed by the Committee, which is greater than that received by other Committees. That degree of attention to our work can only aid us in pressing for value for money.

Mr. Sadiq Khan (Tooting) (Lab): Is the hon. Gentleman concerned that the media sometimes highlight our criticism of the Government, and pay less attention to the occasions when we praise Departments on their efficiency?

Mr. Leigh: That is the media's besetting sin, but we try to structure our reports and press releases so as to strike a balance. We try to pay tribute to the Government when things go right, but it is the nature of the media that they engage in negativity and prefer criticism to congratulation. However, in its reports, the Committee tries hard to congratulate the Government—the customer—when they have done well. We do our best in that regard.

It is a tribute to the Committee that we do not get involved in policy. We deal in the nuts and bolts of things. We are not policy wonks, as we engage in what people care about. That is why we get considerable coverage. For instance, the entire front page of today's edition of The Independent is devoted to one of our reports, and the same happened with The Guardian earlier this week. It is proof of my consensual nature that I have actually started to read those newspapers.

Credit for the Committee's achievements should go, in part, to hon. Members who have departed the House since the last PAC debate. We are sad that they have left, although I see the hon. Member for Dagenham (Jon Cruddas) in his seat. However, I am confident that the new members will help carry forward the momentum generated by their predecessors. I welcome to the Committee my hon. Friend the Member for Tunbridge Wells (Greg Clark) and the hon. Members for Burnley (Kitty Ussher), for Bishop Auckland (Helen Goodman), for Bristol, West (Stephen Williams), for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Carmichael), for Portsmouth, North (Sarah McCarthy-Fry) and for Tooting (Mr. Khan). I also welcome to the Committee the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell), who, ironically given the relative youth of some of the members of the Committee, is the newest member of the Committee, and a valuable member too. He has already turned up pretty well every time and, in his usual robust style, has given permanent secretaries a real grilling. We welcome him.

Irrespective of how long hon. Members have been in the House, I am sure that each and every member of the Committee will continue to add something uniquely valuable to our work. Members of the Committee both past and present will understand the hard work and commitment that membership demands. We meet twice as often as any other Committee. So I know that I will not be alone in expressing my thanks and deep gratitude to Mr. Nick Wright, our Clerk, and others who support the Committee, especially the National Audit Office. It is no secret that without the NAO we would not be able to do anything.

We must also remember all those who have served on or worked for the Public Accounts Committee in the past decade. The Committee has issued more than 400 reports and questioned hundreds of senior officials. Witnesses have provided the Committee with vital insights into the challenges that they face in their ongoing battle to improve public services.

I want to outline this afternoon the key findings emanating from the Committee's reports over the past 10 years—findings that are present in the Committee's work since my last address and which lie at the heart of current policy discourse on achieving value for money in the delivery of public services.

Indeed, as the parties come closer and closer together on policy—[HON. MEMBERS: "Ah."] I make no comment on that, of course. The debate on how policy is implemented is even more important. That is why the role of the PAC is ever more central.

If one lesson stands out from the work of the PAC over the years, it is that Government Departments in any Government are masters of spending public money, but often far less proficient at ensuring that it translates into better public services. It is in keeping with the non-partisan nature of today's debate and of the Committee to say that the problem has plagued Governments of all persuasions over the years. The Committee recognises the difficulties involved and that often the processes are much more complex and much larger than those in the private sector, especially with IT projects. However, some progress has been made. The Committee has commended the Government's efforts to develop more effective services for older people. Our report on emergency hospital care identified a large and sustained reduction in the length of time that patients spent in accident and emergency.

Welcome as such improvements are, for many years the Committee has also pressed Governments to devote greater attention to public sector efficiency as, all too often, they have failed to learn the wider lessons of the Committee's recommendations. While supporting the good intentions expressed by Gershon, the Committee would like to see practical evidence of real-life efficiency savings being realised. Departments are responsible for delivering those savings, and the Government's programme of departmental capability reviews designed to assess Whitehall's ability to implement policy effectively is significant. The Committee has noted many times that policies are too often cursed by weak management and implementation approaches. We welcome the recent development, but we would like more information on how the programme will be taken forward and rolled out.

Despite those welcome initiatives, however, more must be done to achieve value for money in public services. I shall devote the rest of my speech to outlining the Committee's seven recommendations for getting more out of our public services. Hon. Members can study those recommendations in greater depth by referring to the Committee's 17th report of the current Session, entitled "Achieving value for money in the delivery of public services."

The first recommendation is that those responsible should properly prepare and plan project implementation. Successful implementation rests on careful planning that takes into account a programme's risks and business requirements. Now, all that can be just anorak talk, but let us look into some practical examples. The Committee concluded in its report on asylum decisions that the Home Office failed to put in place sufficient staff and structure to cope with a significant rise in asylum applications in 1999 and 2000. In its report on road congestion, the Committee criticised the Highways Agency for installing cheaper, less sophisticated technology in the south-east in order to close a technology gap between the regions on the basis that it would be upgraded at a later date. Had the agency not reversed that decision, it would have cost £64 million more than progressively installing more sophisticated technology from the outset. To avoid such fiascos in future, Departments need to draw up realistic timetables and leave plenty of time for planning and detailed specification. The Committee would also like to see greater use of pilots to test schemes before their large scale implementation.

Secondly, Departments must strengthen project management. Time after time, the Committee has come across poorly managed Government projects. One of the most alarming examples of poor project management was the Government's purchase of eight Chinook Mark 3 helicopters that could not be used because the Department failed to specify the avionics system when it drew up the contract. No doubt the Chinooks have been consigned to some remote aircraft hangar, but it is something of an understatement to say that they are doing very little to promote our national security.

Like defence procurement, IT procurement is all too often synonymous with delay, overspends, poor performance and even abandonment. Encouragingly, our report assessing the impact of the Office of Government Commerce's initiatives on the delivery of major IT-enabled projects recognised the potential for gateway reviews to secure significant improvements in IT procurement. We also called for gateway reviews to be published, and recommended that the Comptroller and Auditor General be notified where IT projects get "double reds" within that process. I am encouraged by the OGC's agreement to our latter recommendation, but disappointed that it has rejected the former.

The Committee continues to recognise the need to strengthen project management capabilities. Departments need more realistic business cases and time scales, and risk must be understood and better managed. Large, complex projects should be broken into smaller, more manageable components, and reliable contingency plans should be put in place.

Our third proposal concerns the need to reduce complexity and bureaucracy. Too often, public services are unnecessarily complex and bureaucratic. For example, the difference in error rates in passport application forms that are checked by the Post Office for a fee and those submitted directly by customers—1 per cent. and 15 per cent. respectively—shows that people have difficulties with that particular form. The Committee has pointed out that Departments have an obligation to make sure that their forms are straightforward and easy to complete. Looking across Government, the Committee has called for the simplification and streamlining of complex processes that increase costs. For example, the structure of the social fund is so complicated that mistakes are made in almost half of the applications for certain benefits.

The fourth recommendation is the need to improve public service productivity. Delivering quality public services rests on their efficiency and productivity. Our report into sickness absence in prisons confirmed that unusually high levels of sick leave were detrimental to the overall efficiency and productivity of the Prison Service. As well as costing the taxpayer around £80 million in 2002–03, sickness absence increases stress and lowers the morale of other staff. In that particular case, I am pleased to note that the Minister recently reported that in nine of the 10 prisons with the highest levels of sickness absence as identified in our report, sick leave has been reduced by 36 per cent. since 2002–03, which is an example of a report making a difference.

Much still remains to be done to improve public service productivity. The introduction of resource-based accounting and budgeting is certainly a step in the right direction, because it helps Departments to use their resources more productively and deliver their services more efficiently. Welcome though these developments may be, Departments still have some way to go in improving public service productivity. They need to match resources better to work load to meet the public's demand for services, and they should tackle bottlenecks in service delivery chains.

Fifthly, we believe that Departments need to be more commercially astute. Such measures have already been introduced in Britain's biggest and best companies. Indeed, the Committee thinks that Government Departments can learn a lot from boardrooms throughout the country. When one considers that central civil service Departments alone spent more than £15 billion a year on goods and services, it is vital that they demonstrate that they are commercially astute. All too often we find that Departments are lacking in that area. The Committee reported that fewer than a quarter of procurement staff in Departments had Chartered Institute of Purchasing and Supply qualifications. Of the 20 Departments, agencies and non-departmental public bodies that spent the most on procurement in 2002–03, only three had commercial directors. Their role explicitly covered all corporate engagement with the private sector and the wider business world, as well as procurement strategy.

I am pleased to note that the situation has since improved, but Departments must do more to strengthen their commercial expertise if they are to maximise their assets for public benefit. Across the Government as a whole, the Committee wants Departments to take greater advantage of their buying power to secure better deals, to award contracts on the basis of value for money instead of lowest price and to make greater use of partnership arrangements with suppliers.

Sixthly, there is a need to tackle fraud. Fraud has been a long-term concern of the Committee. In addition to producing a report on benefit fraud, it found during its investigation on VAT that a staggering £11 billion of VAT that is meant for the public purse is going into the pockets of fraudsters, cheats and those making genuine errors. We urged Customs to introduce tougher penalties for evasion and the under-declaring of VAT. We called for it to take full advantage of its merger with the Inland Revenue to improve data matching as a means of identifying traders in the shadow economy.

We also highlighted the problems among European member states on agreeing what actually constitutes fraud. In our report entitled "Financial management of the European Union", we recommended that the UK presidency of the European Union should be used to support the Commission in its action to improve accountability in the European Union through the development of a road map towards a positive statement of assurance. We also called on the Government to press for the simplification of the rules and regulations governing the common agricultural policy and structural funds to reduce the scope for fraud and error. Now that the UK presidency has come to an end, can the Minister detail the extent to which the Government have implemented those recommendations? Will he give assurances that the UK will continue to press for those vital reforms during the Austrian and French presidencies and beyond?

Seventhly, I urge the Government to implement policies better and in a more timely way. It is important that they have clearly thought-through implementation plans and reliable information on which to base decisions about new policies. For example, the Committee's progress report on hospital-acquired infection highlighted the worrying dearth of information about the extent and cost of such infections. For example, the regularly cited figure of 5,000 deaths each year due to hospital-acquired infections is unreliable and dates from the 1980s. Good policies and successful implementation rest on the availability of reliable and up-to-date information. It is imperative that Departments understand the scope of problems before they set about addressing them.

As I have outlined, the Committee makes a valuable contribution towards the development of more efficient and effective Government policies. In the coming months, we shall face numerous opportunities to add to our work. We shall continue to deal with the access issues raised by Lord Sharman's report of 2002 on the audit and accountability of central Government. The Committee is delighted that Lord Sharman's recommendation that the Comptroller and Auditor General be given audit access to non-departmental public bodies that are companies and their subsidiaries has been taken forward in the Company Law Reform Bill. The Committee would like to thank the Treasury and the Department of Trade and Industry for their support on this matter and looks forward to the smooth passage of the Bill in the near future. However, we just hope that similar progress can now be made on gaining full access to the BBC's accounts. The Committee has valued the experiment that has allowed the Comptroller and Auditor General, under special arrangements, to have limited access to the BBC. However, as I have said in the past there should be no limit on the freedom of choice of the Comptroller and Auditor General if the licence fee payer is to be assured of value for money. The expected renewal of the BBC charter, which is scheduled for later this year, provides the perfect opportunity to address the matter.

The Committee's formal agenda includes hearings on the National Audit Office's major defence projects report for 2005, and reports on supporting elite athletes, faster access to better stroke care, the closure of MG Rover, corporation tax, and improving poorly performing schools, to name but a few.

In conclusion, the distinguished Committee of which I am proud to be Chairman continues to serve the nation well, analysing important and topical issues and recommending practical improvements to our public services. I commend its work to the House.

4.40 pm

Mr. Iain Duncan Smith (Chingford and Woodford Green) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I do not usually raise points of order, and this has nothing to do with the debate. It has struck me in the past 24 hours, particularly in the past two hours, that developments of remarkable significance are taking place in the Gaza strip and Israel, with Hamas claiming to be the majority party after the recent election.

We have had statements from most countries concerned, including the United States. We know what Israel's attitude is—it refuses to deal with Hamas until certain conditions are met. We know that large sums of money may be withdrawn from the Palestinians as a result of the election, and there are pending possibilities even of military action in the area. What we do not have is any sense of the Government's position with regard to that remarkable election result.

I have just heard that within the past hour the Prime Minister made some form of statement to the media, yet no member of the Government sees fit to come to the House. As we are not sitting tomorrow, have the Government indicated to you when they are likely to treat the House with courtesy and give us some indication of what their attitude is and what their responsibilities will be as a result of the election?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): I am not aware of any request from the Government to make a statement on the matter. Equally, the Chair is unaware of the contents of anything that is being said by the Prime Minister or any other senior Minister on the subject. The Minister on the Government Front Bench will have heard what the right hon. Gentleman said. The situation could be remedied within the earliest possible period and the right hon. Gentleman could seek to encourage that by putting in a request for an urgent question. Mr. Speaker has always indicated that Members impatient for information can try that route, even though he does not guarantee that he will be able to grant it. The House will also have heard what the right hon. Gentleman said, and we must await developments at the earliest possible moment.

4.42 pm

Jon Cruddas (Dagenham) (Lab): I want to say a few words about my experience as a member of the Public Accounts Committee, although I feel a little like an impostor this evening, as I ceased to be a member of the Committee just before the last election because of issues that were developing locally in my constituency relating to community cohesion and demography. In one sense, the reason that I came off the Committee is one of the reasons that I am interested in the debate about the workings of the PAC and am keen to participate in its work in the future.

I am particularly interested in the relative efficiency of state activity through investment in the reform of public services, alongside a more dynamic analysis of demography and resource allocation with reference to spatial economic development and population movements, especially in urban communities. That is the context for my remarks. I was a member of the Committee at the time that it prepared some of the reports to be discussed today, and some of the comments that I made then related to the question of how the state could keep up with and make sense of rapid movements of populations, especially in urban communities in cities such as London, and especially in poorer parts of the city, such as the east side of London, which I represent.

First, on the working of the Committee, I, too, want to put on record the extraordinary servicing of the Committee supplied by Nick Wright and his team. They do an admirable job and are a credit to the public service. I pay tribute to the work of the National Audit Office, the rigour of its analysis and contribution to public debate, and the amount of money that it saves taxpayers. The PAC is a unique space to consider the relative efficiency of state activity, in that it allows for discussion of a pan-governmental strategy and with accounting officers and key civil servants. We are not just awash with the contributions of politicians.

The issues that the PAC covers are centre stage politically. The unanimity reached on the Committee's work, despite the fundamental fault lines between the departure points from which the different parties consider the activities of the state, has always interested me. I sense that the Conservative party, for example, sees state intervention as essentially destructive to the efficiency of economic interrelationships, whereas the Labour party deems the relative properties of state activity from a more benign departure point. It is interesting to see how those are reconciled in the Committee's work, which is a comment on the abilities of the Chairman.

On investment and reform, I want to address the issue of demographic movements in urban communities. A number of the debates in and reports of the PAC inherently assume that there are static populations and therefore static issues of resource allocation, but there might be a case for trying to build in a more dynamic analysis of the sheer scale of population movement below the radar. I shall give a couple of examples.

I recently asked a number of parliamentary questions about the population of the borough of Barking and Dagenham, of which I am one of the representatives. The Office for National Statistics replied that the population stands at 164,600 and that that has fallen since 2001, when it was 165,700. Anyone who lives in the community that I represent is aware that there has been massive migration into the borough. However, that is not caught in the headline assumptions for public policy purposes of the baseline quantitative allocation of resources to any public service.

The Government have accepted that there is a minimum of 570,000 unauthorised migrants in the country, not including dependants, and the NAO has said that there are 280,000 failed asylum seekers in the system. From informal discussions with Ministers it seems that the assumption is that the majority of those people are in London, and they do not live in Kensington and Chelsea. There is a magnetic pull towards poorer communities and areas with lower cost housing. The cost of housing in Barking and Dagenham is the lowest across the city.

Alongside those unauthorised migrants, the massive house price inflation over the past four or five years has created a magnetic pull to the area for families who aspire to their first step on the property ladder. The third element is that, as a result of the consequential effects of the right to buy, the private housing market has become much more vibrant. That has meant lower rents, which other local authorities have used as a reason to transfer a lot of their priority-housing families.

[Jon Cruddas]

Cumulatively, therefore, there has been a massive transfer of people into the borough. That is off the radar of the headcount for public policy making. I do not see how a dynamic analysis can be pulled together in order to interpret the relative efficiency of state activity—arguably in communities that are most in need of a dynamic form of state intervention. We have an extraordinary legacy of poverty and under-investment in poor quality public services. In trying to reconcile that legacy with the dynamics at work in global cities such as London, we return to the question of how to gauge the relative properties of state activity.

The massive movement of people into the borough has not just happened over the past two or three years. Dagenham also sits centre stage in the so-called Thames Gateway, the population of which is set to rise by 700,000 or 800,000 over the next 10 or 15 years.

The headcount in my borough, for public purposes, is about 165,000, and the assumption is that it will grow by 35,000 to 40,000 over the next 10 years. We can therefore assume a 33 per cent. increase in the number of people in the borough, even on the basis of the statistics that we currently use for public policy making. The data supplied by the Mayor of London from the Greater London Authority's data management and analysis group—"Statistics of schools in London"—demonstrate that, over the past three years, there has been an increase of more than 10 per cent. in the school roll in the borough. This is despite the fact that, for public policy purposes, the communities are deemed to be quantitatively static, in that they remain at 165,000. If we assume an increase in the population proportionate to the increase in the school roll, we can assume that the population figures could be at least 10 per cent. higher than 165,000.

The tabulations showing the breakdown according to ethnic background in the borough's schools show an extraordinary demographic shift in the qualitative makeup or heterogeneity of the community. Over the past two years, the proportion of white British kids in the schools has dropped by more than 9 per cent., and, year on year, there has been a 4.5 to 5 per cent. increase in the number of children from black African communities in the primary and secondary schools. We can therefore begin to piece together the extraordinary transformation that is occurring in the size of the borough and, within that, the massive change in the demography of the racial makeup of the borough, neither of which is being caught by the analysis supplied by the Office for National Statistics for the purposes of public policy making in relation to the population of the borough.

I shall tell the House why this is important. The reason that I left the working of the Public Accounts Committee was because we were having a massive outburst of far-right activity in our community. Over the past year and a half, we have had five local council elections, at each of which the British National party has polled an average of 35 per cent. of the vote.

Mr. John Hayes (South Holland and The Deepings) (Con): The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right about migration being a key factor in housing demand, and consequently a factor in driving forward house price inflation. Does he agree that, since this Government came to power, public sector house building has roughly halved from its mid-1990s level? In addition, does he agree that a way of satisfying that additional housing demand would be to create a more fluid housing market in which more people owned their own home—as many people in public sector housing want to—which would create space for people currently in temporary accommodation who cannot get on to the public sector housing ladder?

Jon Cruddas: The purpose of my rather protracted walk through these statistics is to come to the issue of public service allocation, and public policy issues such as housing. We have seen a tripling of the number of people on the housing allocation and transfer lists as the population has expanded, which puts huge pressures on public services and deserves an adequate public policy response. The far-right activity to which I referred is one of the barometers of the pressures that are building up, and housing is one of the critical issues in that regard, as are health inequalities. Every issue relating to public policy investment needs an adequate public response, in order to make sense of the dynamic and extraordinary movements of population 10 miles down the road.

That is why I want to come back to the workings of the Public Accounts Committee. The Chairman has talked about seven issues relating to the relative merits of public sector activity. I would like the Committee to add another. I would like it to develop an adequate analysis of the relative ability of the state to deal with the demography at work in our urban communities that is creating such pressure points in urban areas of Britain. My urban community is extraordinary, because of the sheer scale of the population movement into it and the qualitative changes within it. As I said earlier, the epiphenomenon of the far right is materially grounded in such dynamics.

I want to return to some of the issues of public policy-making that lie behind that. I know that my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary is interested in the subject. Indeed, next week he will visit my constituency to examine some of those issues. There is a collision between a long-term legacy of poorly performing public services and poverty, and the extraordinary change that has created the scene on which the far right is operating. Some of its activities are grounded in issues of distribution that are geared by that extraordinary movement of people.

The situation puts enormous pressures on the state, both nationally and locally. The Government have an incremental strategy to refinance public services; the question is, can they tread water, let alone tackle a moving target in the form of growing populations that are not captured in the headline head count on which public policy is based? All the change has occurred since the last census, and the population figures on which public policy is based assume that the population is falling. None of that includes unauthorised migrant workers. According to some estimates, this city has a population of 7.4 million and could contain 100,000 extra people somewhere, over and above the formal head count.

I realise that all that raises huge issues of public policy, but I ask the Chairman and the Committee to bear it in mind when considering their future programme.

Kitty Ussher (Burnley) (Lab): I believe that my constituency contains more BNP councillors than any other constituency in the country. We certainly need to consider the way in which Government policy responds to extreme and fast changes in demography, but the population is increasing not just in urban areas but in all areas where there is a sudden shift in the economy. My constituency is simply a town, not a city, and house prices have collapsed in recent years, although they are now improving to some extent. We should take account of the critical nature of change in the economy, rather than the direction in which it moves.

Jon Cruddas: I do not want to be too definitive in identifying the turning points that create such phenomena. I merely wish to draw attention to certain issues that need to be considered in different ways in different parts of the country. East London has a rapidly growing population. Public policy-makers cannot keep track of it, let alone get ahead of it. That is before account is taken of illegal migrants who are invisible for public policy-making purposes. Then there is real-terms house price inflation, and on top of that the long-term legacies of poverty, underinvestment and poor-quality public services. A rich seam is created on which, given our social formation, the far right is manifestly able to work. That takes different forms in different parts of the country, but we should be acutely aware of the way in which demography can contract or expand, and the effect on social cohesion in any part of the communities that we represent.

My borough has long-term problems of health inequality. I believe that, apart from Easington, it has the worst health-equality profile in terms of investment per head. Two years ago, the Government said that they would overcome some of the health inequalities and move us closer to the formula for investment. The resulting increase will kick in this April. Arguably, since the Government decided to invest so that we could move to where we should have been in 2001, the population has moved even further from the baseline for such decisions. In real terms, therefore, the health inequalities are worsening despite the Government's attempts to resolve them. I use that as an illustrative example of the tensions that this creates in terms of policy making.

Housing is the other acute issue in terms of public sector provision, not least in a community that was built on the principle of socialised housing—council estates.

Mr. Hayes: I am reluctant to interrupt the hon. Gentleman's fascinating account of his local experiences a second time, but I am sure he agrees that, given the fallen nature of man, the best that any Government can do is mitigate the inevitable sorrows of human existence. The point that I was really making to him is that that is partly about what government does and does not do. By encouraging greater housing ownership, we could reduce the demand on public policy and on the Government to supply housing. That would enable social sector housing to pick up some of the slack, which, unfortunately, ends with people being housed in unacceptable temporary accommodation. The fluidity in the housing market that I have described is beneficial in that it reduces pressure on the Government and allows them perhaps to accommodate those who find themselves in difficult circumstances.

Jon Cruddas: It seems to me that that argument always rests on the assumption that there are sufficient economic activity and wage rates in a community to sustain people so that they can purchase any extra supply of private housing. In my community, which is the lowest wage-cost economy in Greater London, and given the house price inflation of the last four or five years, the private housing market is disappearing in front of people's eyes in terms of their capacity to get into it. That means that all roads lead back to public housing investment, which is part of the discussion that I will have with my colleague the Financial Secretary next week.

I shall conclude, as I think I have made the point. I enjoyed working on the Committee and hope to sit on it again in future. It should begin to consider how it might add in a dynamic analysis of demography, especially in our urban communities, alongside this rigorous analysis of the relative efficiency of public sector activity in the economy.

5.2 pm

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): It is a great pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Dagenham (Jon Cruddas), who is right to point to the potential effects of failure of public policy in creating division in a community. I am glad he had the opportunity to make that speech.

I applaud the work of the Public Accounts Committee, and indeed of the National Audit Office. It does an inestimably important job. I have never had the privilege to serve on the Committee, but before I became a Member of the House I was an audit commissioner, working in a similar area. The co-ordination between the Audit Commission and the National Audit Office is hugely important in itself. One thing that I hope we can establish is that there are no gaps between the two bodies, which are responsible for checking the use of public funds.

I also pay tribute to how the Committee works. It clearly works with a degree of unanimity despite, as the hon. Member for Dagenham said, different starting points, although I suspect that those, to an extent, have been coalescing recently, with the possible exception of that of the Chairman, the hon. Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh), whom I consider a real Conservative. The danger for real Conservatives is that they find themselves ghettoised, like socialists on the other side of the Chamber, and unable to have their position recognised by those on their Front Bench.

The Chairman was also right to point out that the publicity attendant on the work of the Committee is hugely important. It gains an awful lot of publicity, for good reason, but that in itself is a spur to better performance. Indeed, the fact that the Committee exists is a spur to better performance. The fact that civil servants and Ministers know that they are accountable to such a body is important: even if they do not have a report written about them, they know that they might have to face a difficult interrogation.

Mr. Leigh: On the key aspects, this is the only publicity—we are not supposed to mention this—directed at civil servants. None of our reports ever criticise the Labour Government or Labour Ministers. We never get involved in politics. It is important that civil servants know that this public spotlight is on them. That, as the hon. Gentleman says, is a spur to better performance.

Mr. Heath: That is right, and the Committee should not be used for party political purposes. Every Member wants to see good, well performing public services. Irrespective of whether one agrees with the policies pursued by Ministers, the administration of public services must be as efficient and effective as possible. If it is not, there is a waste of public money that could be used for better purposes. That is the crucial importance of the Committee.

The Committee Chairman referred to seven different categories of importance; I have three. I recognise that a lot of the work of the Government is good and is recognised as such by the Committee and the NAO. A lot of programmes are properly administered. However, there is certainly a need to examine where there is mismanagement, as was reflected in the comments of the Chairman, when there is the misguided application of policy, which is different from mismanagement, and when there is fraud.

Mismanagement can cover a great deal but the particular point that stuck in my mind after reading the reports concerned procurement, which is a huge expenditure on the part of Departments. Procurement is a specialised activity and I know, from my experience as leader of a county council, that the capacity for making mistakes in large scale procurement projects in the public sector is enormous. At times, the public sector does not have some of the tools that are available to the private sector to do its work.

We have more than enough examples of major errors in procurement, particularly in IT. That lesson still needs to be learned by the public sector and one has only to look at the Home Office to see a catalogue of disasters. That makes all the more important the amendment passed in another place recently that suggested that the NAO should break with tradition and pre-empt the passage of a Bill in order to look at the IT consequences of the identity card scheme.

One area in which I am particularly interested is the tax credits system, which was referred to in the reports. Clearly there has been a breakdown of the tax credit IT systems, largely as a result of rushed procurement in the first instance, with Ministers demanding a system before it was ready. There were serious consequences for the Exchequer as a result.

Defence is another area of concern. I was staggered by the findings of the Committee, which show that there is an overspend on the 20 large-scale defence projects of £5.9 billion, which, when coupled with the cumulative delay of 206 months revealed by the Committee, is a serious problem; not just in terms of value for money or the finances of the country, but in terms of the finances of the Department. That money should be spent on protecting our troops in theatres of war. That can and should be improved. I know that there has been progress as a result of smart procurement, but it is still not good enough.

On the misguided application of policy, it concerns me that when we have significant divestment of Government assets, we get best value for them. The most immediate worry is in the MOD with QinetiQ. No one should be sanguine about the fact that if this company sells its shares at the top of the price range, it will give its chairman £26 million in profit, its chief executive £22 million and, if that were not bad enough—at least those people were working within the company—an American finance company, Carlyle, which chooses to direct its finances through Guernsey for tax purposes, will receive £623 million. Does that not suggest that, somewhere along the line, a national asset was sold at too cheap a price? I believe that it was, and that the Committee should examine that.

Another aspect of misguided application of policy is in the area of health. Investment in the health service is unprecedented, which is very good news that we all welcome. The outcome, however, is that hospitals are still closing their wards to operations until the new financial year. Something is going seriously wrong when that is the case. The sooner that we get to the bottom of that, in terms of the application of policy, the better.

My last point is on the broad area of fraud. Fraud is simply a form of theft. When it is fraud against public bodies or the Government, however, it is our money, corporately, that is being stolen. I want to return to the tax credit system. Clearly, there has been organised fraud against the tax credit system, through identity theft from within, it seems, the Treasury. We know that officials knew about it a year ago. We know that the Paymaster General was told about it six months ago. Yet nothing was done until recently to address the issue. I hope that the Committee will take up that issue, because millions and millions of pounds have been lost from the Exchequer through this fraud. We must know why appropriate action was not taken earlier.

The Committee has addressed benefit fraud, and it is right to do so. VAT fraud stands at £11 billion, and we need to know from the Government what they are doing to address that.

Mr. Richard Bacon (South Norfolk) (Con): On tax credits, we are familiar with the fact that the accounts of the European Union and the Department for Work and Pensions are qualified. But is it not a scandal, although less well known, that because of the problems with tax credits, the trust accounts of the Inland Revenue have been qualified by the Comptroller and Auditor General?

Mr. Heath: I think that it is. Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs, as it now is, should be beyond reproach in this area. Because such fraud has been allowed to develop and devour public funds, however, that department has a serious problem. I want to be assured not only that the Committee is aware of that and examining it, but that the Government recognise that they have a serious problem, which needs to be addressed as a matter of urgency.

The intervention of the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Bacon) brings me to my last point, which is on the Committee's opportune report on fraud in the European Union. How long have we talked about the potential for fraud within the European Union? How long has the European Commission simply sat on its hands rather than take the appropriate actions? We have the European fraud office, l'Office Européen de Lutte Anti-Fraude—OLAF—but there is no direct link between OLAF and national audit offices of the member states. There is no common methodology, or even, as has been mentioned, a common definition of what comprises fraud rather than irregularities. We need to get this right, and I echo the call for clarity from the Government as to exactly what they achieved during the UK presidency. If they did not achieve the necessary breakthrough in dealing effectively with fraud, I hope that they will pursue the issue as a member state through the next presidency and the presidency after that, and for as long as it takes to get to the point at which European Union accounts are no longer qualified because it is impossible to account for fraud.

The issues that the Committee takes up on our behalf are enormously important for the country. We should not run away with the idea that all Government functions are in chaos and that mismanagement is the rule of the day. Where that does occur, however, it is important that we identify it, and even more importantly, that we address it, deal with it and improve in future.

5.14 pm

Helen Goodman (Bishop Auckland) (Lab): I am sure that it will not surprise hon. Members to hear that I was rather a swot at school. I always remember listening to the radio and hearing about the all-powerful Public Accounts Committee, so I am particularly glad to take part in the debate. I want to offer some thoughts on the way in which the PAC works and on how we may improve what we do.

I pay tribute to the great support that we have received from our Clerks, Nick Wright, Emma Sawyer and the other people in the office, and to Sir John Bourn and all the civil servants at the NAO.

The evidence for all the reports on the list for the debate was taken before the general election. Some of them have been approved since the election but all the real work was done before the election. Obviously, that raises the question of how timely the work of the Committee is and what we could do to improve the timeliness of the work of the NAO and the Committee itself.

Mr. Khan: Does my hon. Friend agree that, by the time the report of the PAC is eventually published, those who prepared the first NAO report and those who gave evidence have forgotten what the original grievances were?

Helen Goodman: I am sure that there is a lot in what my hon. Friend says, although since I have not yet been in that situation, I would not like to be too firm on the matter. However, I agree that there is that risk. When new Members arrived on the Committee, there seemed to be uncertainty about what we were approving. I raise the matter because it would be good if the Committee could do the work more speedily. Of course, we need to maintain the standards of the NAO reports and not put it under ridiculous pressure, but slightly shorter and quicker reports would improve its work.

Kitty Ussher: I agree with what my hon. Friend says and it mirrors my experience as a new Member. Does she agree that, when there is a big delay between the initial NAO report and the publication of our deliberations, often as much as six or nine months later, or even longer, in many cases, the problem that the NAO identified has already been fixed?

Helen Goodman: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for making that point. With regard to specific issues, what she says is true, but one of the most noticeable things is that there are recurrent themes in the reports. I want to refer to some of those, which the Committee has to look at repeatedly. That suggests that some work is intrinsically difficult for Government to do and we need to concentrate on improving Government's capability to do those things.

First, Members have talked about the big IT programmes. The 25th report on congestion and the 27th report on IT projects dealt with those. The continuing and probably necessary reliance of all Governments, whatever their complexion, on large IT projects is a triumph of hope over experience.

Secondly, another recurrent problem is the tendency for large capital projects to overrun, hence the difficulty in controlling their costs. A third problem, which comes out in the report on tax credits, the benefit system and asylum, is the great difficulty in running systems that of necessity are large and bureaucratic, because they deal with large case loads, and in personalising them to individuals. It is especially difficult to run such systems because, by definition, they are run by the state. They are not areas where choice and competition are possible, or even imaginable. The question is how to improve the efficiency of such systems. Another issue, which arises continually in the papers before us and in evidence from officials is the problematic interface between the public and private sectors, such as the shortages of key skills in the public sector and the question of salary relativities. Again that comes through in lots of areas.

That said, there are many virtues in the way in which the Committee works. A key virtue is the specificity of the reports. It means that we avoid the rather generalised management discussion about outcomes, outputs and targets and look at what is happening in a particular case to particular people. I know that officials sometimes feel that we are rather harsh on them and that we use our constituency cases to back up a criticism. I suggest to officials who might read the record of this debate that senior officials get an over-rosy picture of how well systems are operating. When they visit local offices they are shown exactly what is going best, what is new and what is innovative. Somewhere between us lies what is really going on in the public services.

There is the issue of the way the Committee works. Is it too confrontational? Does that reduce the quality of the information that we retrieve? Currently it is fashionable to decry Punch and Judy politics and to look for something more consensual. There is also the question of whether the arrival of more female members on the Committee will feminise the working and make it more consensual.

Kitty Ussher: Did my hon. Friend notice the comments of the newest member of the PAC in this week's The House Magazine when he said after his very first meeting that he feared he was far too nice for the Public Accounts Committee?

Helen Goodman: I had not noticed that. While I started off by believing that a consensual approach was appropriate, after only a few months I can already see that unless the Committee is tough on people giving evidence, there is vast scope for evasion. As a comfort to witnesses who may have to face the PAC, during the Christmas recess I had a recurring nightmare that I was being grilled by the PAC. I would wake at 3 am to the even more terrifying realisation that I was the one who was meant to be doing the grilling.

That of course is related to the question of who takes responsibility for decisions when things go wrong. Colleagues who are long-standing members of the Committee have expressed frustration that it sometimes seems as if in Whitehall no one ever takes final responsibility. A mess is made and people are moved on. Being capable of giving an elegant defence is more important for the careers of officials than the reality of whether they are good at delivering. There is something that we need to address for that reason, and that is the advent of boards and non-executive directors in Whitehall, and their impact on accountability.

Traditionally, Ministers are responsible for policy, and accounting officers, the permanent secretary of the Department, for the way the money is spent. A few weeks ago we attended a seminar in the Treasury. It was explained to us that Ministers retained responsibility for, for example, the content of the Budget, but that the boards would share responsibility for the way in which Departments are run. In a policy Department such as the Treasury or Foreign Office, that distinction makes sense, but in other Departments, such as the Department for Work and Pensions or Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs, where half the issue is the way in which individual civil servants are treating members of the public, that is not a realistic distinction. We need to look at this area, possibly in conjunction with the Public Administration Committee. Clearly there are overlaps between their responsibilities and ours for examining these structures.

Finally, I want to say something about propriety, by which I mean, is public money being spent on the purpose for which it was voted? So few people will be listening to this debate that I shall risk a diplomatic incident by calling this the "Why we are not Italian" problem. There is a story—I am not sure whether it is apocryphal—concerning two cities in Italy. Two motorways connect them because different people in the Italian ministry of transport were on the take from different parts of the Mafia. We in this country do not traditionally suffer from such problems, and the 18th report on financial management is clearly relevant in this regard.

However, maintaining high standards of propriety is very important to the state of our democracy. We must avoid corruption. Decisions must be transparent and those in public office must be accountable to the people who elect them for the decisions that are finally taken, and not to some other group. Of course, maintaining high standards is also important economically: it promotes efficient markets, rational choices and value for money. I fear that, once lost, the culture of the proper use of public money would be very hard to restore. We only have that culture because of the great work of our predecessors, particularly in the 19th century. We need to renew our focus on this issue.

There is a proliferation of complex financing schemes such as private finance initiatives, public-private partnerships and local improvement finance trusts. I am not saying that such schemes are not useful in themselves in leveraging in more capital and new skills, but the risks associated with people moving rapidly between the public and private sectors—between being the customer, and being the person granting the contract—are clear. We would be foolish to close our eyes to this issue, as even the briefest look at the back of "Private Eye" every fortnight will tell us. I hope that we can address it in the forthcoming Session.

5.27 pm

Mr. Richard Bacon (South Norfolk) (Con): It is a great pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Bishop Auckland (Helen Goodman), who provided the House with a penetrating analysis of the Committee's work, and of some of the issues and problems with which it has to deal. I agree with a great deal of what she said. She certainly does not sound like a new member of the Committee, but of course, she was a Treasury official for a while. We also know—I am not sure that she knows that we know—that she was the original teenage scribbler. She has now been promoted from scribbling to offering penetrating analysis, and we welcome her and the other new members of the Committee to their positions.

Helen Goodman: I should point out that I was not a scribbler; I was the original teenage kid.

Mr. Bacon: The hon. Lady was a deputy scribbler, perhaps.

Like the hon. Lady, I want to pay tribute to Nick Wright, Chris Randall, Emma Sawyer and Ronnie Jefferson, who run the Committee's office; to the press office of the National Audit Office, which is headed by Barry Lester, with able support from Mark Strathdene and others; and to the office of Sir John Bourn himself. I should point out by way of correction that members of the NAO are not civil servants and that in fact, the Comptroller and Auditor General is an Officer of the House of Commons. That is of incalculable importance. Even if it is a constitutional nicety, it says something very important about the way in which the system is structured.

I want to focus on private finance initiatives, particularly those relating to hospitals. The Committee has examined a wide range of PFI projects and a wide range of hospitals. We have looked at the Darent Valley hospital and the Dartford and Gravesham hospital. We visited the UCL hospitals and recently examined the Norfolk and Norwich hospital, which is in my own area. The issues associated with hospital procurement illustrate some important themes that merit further scrutiny and discussion not only by the Committee, but by the Treasury.

We are all familiar with the standard PFI model as it has developed. It started out as a design, build, finance and operate model, whereby the Government said to operators, "Go off and do it, and tell us when you've done it." There have been many successes; indeed, not even critics of PFI would deny that an increasing number of buildings have been delivered on time and on budget, with substantially reduced, if not completely eliminated, cost overruns.

The NAO's figures show that, in 2001, 76 per cent. of projects were delivered on time and 79 per cent. to budget. That compares with 30 per cent. on time and 27 per cent. to budget for conventional procurement. More recent Treasury figures tell an even better story, with 88 per cent. of projects delivered on time and 79 per cent. to budget.

We all know examples of conventional procurements that have gone horribly wrong—the Jubilee line extension, the British Library, the Scottish Parliament building, and even Portcullis house. In the latter case, all kinds of problems were encountered. The wrong kind of bronze was used on the roof, and the windows cost £23 million more than they were supposed to. The president of the Royal Institute of British Architects told me recently that it would have been cheaper to clad the exterior of Portcullis house with 7-series BMWs. That shows the scale of the problems that conventional procurement can encounter, and that PFI has offered a successful alternative in many cases.

There is no doubt that PFI has led to significant improvements, or that it is here to stay. The question is whether we are getting the best possible value from the way that PFI procurement is conducted. There is growing evidence that we are not, a conclusion that is especially well illustrated by PFI hospital procurement.

Many of the problems have to do with design, and they could be avoided with more thought and a better assessment of requirements in the early phase of procurement. For example, the Cumberland infirmary in Carlisle was a 45-year contract costing £65 million. The contract called for a 474-bed hospital, but the new infirmary has a capacity of 444 beds. Floor capacity in the old sites that it replaced amounted to 57,000 sq ft, but the new site has only 42,000 sq ft. The infirmary has been criticised for having cheap components that need refitting at short intervals. The maintenance costs are 50 per cent. over projections, there is poor drainage and plumbing, and limited signage. Patients exiting cardiology have to go through five sets of swing doors, even though most of them are in wheelchairs.

The new 450-bed district general hospital in Durham was built on the Dryburn site to rationalise services provided previously at Shotley Bridge and the old Dryburn hospital. There, the pathology lab flooded three times in the first 18 months, twice with raw sewage. There is poor ventilation and air filtration and the fixtures and fittings are of poor quality. Some of the lightweight storage cupboards are unable to take the weight of routine equipment.

The opening of the hospital in Bishop Aukland, in the constituency of the hon. Member for Bishop Auckland, was delayed by two months for modifications. The generator and the core electrical systems had to be redesigned immediately after the hospital opened.

The Norfolk and Norwich university hospital is on the border of my constituency. Most of my constituents go there for medical treatment, and many work there. The negative pressure rooms were not properly operational for two years. A nurse lifted ceiling tiles in third-floor ward areas and found air ducting lying in unconnected lengths. The job simply had not been finished. I am pleased to say that the hospital has since spent some money on modifying those rooms and they are fully operational, but other problems remain. For example, there is no ventilation in the kitchens: 30° C working conditions are common, and a temperature of 44° C has been recorded. In addition, delivery loading bays are inefficient, and there are numerous reports of health and safety problems due to layout and the poor materials used in construction.

When it is published, the separate PAC report on refinancing will reveal some startling facts about the financial engineering used, not to increase the number of beds or to build a new wing, but solely to accelerate the rate of financial return, from 18 per cent. to over 60 per cent.

The new Hereford hospital has 354 beds. The boiler house opened with no water treatment plant. There were materials defects, doors were too heavy for the opening restraints. Engineering workshops designed for five staff regularly have 13 people working in them, and three lifts had to be refitted within the first 12 months.

I turn now to Worcestershire, a county for which I have a particular affection, as I had my appendix taken out in a hospital there some years ago. In the Worcestershire acute hospitals NHS trust's modern, 452-bed facility, the back office conditions are too cramped. Corridors are too narrow to pass two beds side by side. There is also an inefficient and unused one-way system.

It is worth saying that these are not just snagging issues that occur with any new building. They are design problems. It is not normal to refit three lifts in the first 12 months. One does not redesign the generator and the core electrical systems immediately after opening a new hospital and call it snagging. Corridors that are too narrow to pass two beds side by side are not a snagging problem. A pathology lab that floods three times in 18 months, including with raw sewage, is not a snagging problem. They are fundamental signs of poor specification and design. The current PFI procurement process makes such design more likely, not less.

As well as inadequate quality, we are also seeing spiralling costs. The average cost of bidding for a PFI hospital has risen from £7.5 million two years ago—itself an extraordinary figure—to more than £11.5 million now. RIBA believes that a conservative estimate of the cost of abortive bids is about £500 million per annum across the sector. As part of the company's operational profitability, that inevitably gets rolled into the cost of the losing consortium's next bid. Even the winning consortium is likely to have factored in the cost of its previous unsuccessful bids.

[Mr. Bacon]

The process is simply making the whole industry more expensive. It is also excluding many capable medium-sized contractors. In effect, it is a Government-sponsored oligopoly. It is wasteful. Parallel teams work up designs that require a considerable amount of professional time and skill at a time when, as the hon. Member for Bishop Auckland said, there is an acute skills shortage. It is worse than that, because the most expert clients are the ones who can recruit the best designers, who then compete with each other while the other bids have less experienced designers, leading to lower overall quality of design.

Once a consortium has won, another key question arises that, in some ways, is even worse in terms of its consequences, namely, who, then, is the client? The client is not who one would think it would be. It is not the hospital trust; the designer's client is the consortium. So there will be pressures. A marked degradation has been seen on many occasions in the design quality after financial close.

Helen Goodman: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that part of the issue is not the overall cost but the point at which we are spending money on big projects? We are not spending it early enough. We are not investing early enough in skills within the public sector. Hence, we find ourselves spending more later on.

Mr. Bacon: We find ourselves spending more later on in spades, and wastefully. In the recent exercise with St. Mary's, Paddington, the bidding round failed, cost £50 million and produced nothing of worth. They are having to go back and do it all again. We recently heard about the problems with Bart's, with potentially £100 million of fees lost.

The hon. Lady anticipates a point that I intended to make later by drawing an analogy with the way in which defence procurement works. As we have said in some of our reports, the assessment phase should receive a greater proportion of the resource that goes into the project. Designers are having to respond to pressures from the leaders of consortiums, who are usually a combination of the building contractors and the banks, to build to the lowest cost or to facilitate the easiest building method. That may be sensible or it may be in the best interests not of the client but of the consortium that has to deliver it. The client is interested in the best possible hospital within the available budget for patients.

The problems are so widespread that the Treasury cannot say that it is not a problem and neither can anyone else. It is a significant problem. The question is what do we do about it? RIBA, along with others, has evolved what it thinks may be part of the answer. It has called it smart procurement, which leads directly to the point that the hon. Member for Bishop Auckland was making. In smart acquisition, part of the emphasis is on spending more of the resource earlier.

In our third report of the 2005–06 Session, HC410, we said in terms:

"The amount of work undertaken in the assessment phase is still not sufficient to enable sensible investment decisions to be taken. The Department's own Smart Acquisition guideline suggests that up to 15 per cent. of the cost of a project should be spent in the assessment phase."

That is for defence procurement. I do not want to promulgate a particular percentage, but it is clear that the point is analogous to what is going on in PFI hospitals.

Essentially, it is about getting the design team much nearer to the client. I have talked to the institute and it does not appear to be a case of architects or other professionals talking up their own book, which might be expected from any professional body. That is not what the institute means. It means getting civil engineers, quantity surveyors and others to work closely with the relevant hospital trust at a much earlier stage to eliminate problems by having a much closer understanding much earlier of what is required. That effectively allows the client to drive the process more strongly, with greater information and control, and power over the outcome.

In that context, it is interesting to consider the situation in Northern Ireland. As the Chairman said earlier, we have had many reasons to look at Northern Ireland, including the Navan centre, the sheep annual premium scheme and the recent Jobskills project. Many of the projects we have looked at have been a disgrace, but the Department for Health, Social Services and Public Safety, especially the Health Estates Agency under the management of John Cole, is blazing a trail. Because of the slightly different context in Northern Ireland, it has gone further down the path and I urge the Financial Secretary and other Ministers to examine what has been done there and whether the rest of the UK could learn some lessons about how PFI can be conducted.

The issue is not only about designers: it is about the whole built environment sector coming together to produce better outcomes for taxpayers. The initiative that the institute has evolved is now at an advanced stage and preliminary discussions have already taken place with the Treasury. The institute has talked to public sector clients, building contractors, civil engineers, quantity surveyors, building surveyors, facilities managers, insurers and banks, and is looking to produce a final cross-industry position paper. My plea to the Financial Secretary is that the Treasury should engage with the process seriously. These are welcome moves by the industry to produce a better, more mature and more efficient PFI market. I urge the Financial Secretary to meet the main players who, in my view, are seeking genuinely to eliminate problems and produce better results to turn PFI into something that delivers even more value for taxpayers who are, after all, paying for it.

Sarah McCarthy-Fry (Portsmouth, North) (Lab): Like other hon. Members, I wish to pay tribute to the Committee administration. Nick Wright and his colleagues have been extraordinarily helpful to new members like me. Nothing is too much trouble for them, even if some of our questions at the beginning must have been very irksome to them. The hon. Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh) has proved to be a most assiduous Chair, taking care to make new members feel welcome, and I thank him for that.

The NAO have also provided an excellent service. I particularly welcomed the morning that new members spent with the NAO, which certainly gave me a greater understanding of the auditing process and how the team operates, and also admiration for the sheer volume of reports they produce. The briefing papers produced by the NAO are a valuable resource for hard-pressed MPs and serve as guidance on the best way to probe with our questions.

As a new member, I approached my first meeting of the PAC with some trepidation, as I knew its fearsome reputation. I have to say I was not disappointed. The style of questioning proved to be as uncompromising as I had been told, but now I have a few sessions under my belt I can see why that should be so. Although I hope that I have never been rude or discourteous, I have sometimes been frustrated if I feel that the witnesses are evading the issues, or, more often, spinning out their answers because we are time limited. The object of the evidence sessions after all, is not for witnesses to escape unscathed, but to be called to account for how they are delivering value for money for my constituents and the constituents of every other Member in this House.

Mr. Leigh: I just wanted to put on the record that since I have been running the Committee, we have tried to stop personal abuse of senior civil servants, which was a feature of the Committee before. I know that these debates are noted in Whitehall, so I wanted to say that while it is important to be robust, we are more polite than we were even five or 10 years ago.

Sarah McCarthy-Fry: I was not there 15 years ago, so I do not know what it was like then. Recently in The House Magazine, my hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) likened the Committee, after his first meeting, to

"Paxperson on speed, playing 'happy slapping'."

I certainly do not recognise that description.

I am delighted to have been appointed to the Public Accounts Committee because it gives me the opportunity to examine a wide variety of subjects—far more than if I served on a Select Committee that hones in on just one matter. I have learned since becoming a Member of the House that my constituents expect me to be an expert on absolutely everything and the Committee is an excellent training ground for that.

I was taught during my accountancy training that value for money is the three E's: economy, because one does not pay £5 for something when it can be bought for £3; efficiency, which is when one gets the absolute best use from resources without wasting any of them; and effectiveness, which is delivery on all policy goals. The Public Accounts Committee drives at how value for money is achieved.

Before I entered the House, I worked in the manufacturing industry in the private sector. Our objective was to deliver shareholder value in a competitive environment. The tools that we used over many years to deliver that were effective risk management and project management, which were raised by the hon. Member for Gainsborough—yet another example of cross-party consensus. If we get those two things right, we will have gone a long way towards ensuring that British taxpayers get the maximum bang for their buck and that high-quality public services are delivered to all who need them.

We are short of time for the debate, so I shall focus on just two Committee reports. The 15th report of the 2004–05 Session, which has been mentioned already, was called "Managing risks to improve public services". Risk management has quite rightly risen high up the agenda of the delivery of public services because it enables resources to be prioritised to deliver the best outcomes to the majority of people. Risk management will never completely eradicate unpleasant surprises, but when it is used effectively, it can minimise them. It enables Government Departments to plan proactively, rather than just reacting.

Government Departments now share delivery with a huge range of partners outside the traditional Government machinery, such as local authorities, charities, voluntary organisations and the private sector. The Government do not have direct control over how those organisations operate, so good risk management is essential if the partnerships are going to work effectively for the public. Many of those partner organisations work under service level agreements. It is vital that proper risk assessment is done at the start of the process so that all possible contingencies have been considered when the agreements are drawn up.

The report showed that at the time at which it was written, there was some way to go before risk management would become embedded in the culture. In June 2004, only 10 per cent. of Departments considered that the process was fully embedded, although three quarters stated that it had been implemented in key areas. I was especially worried that the report showed that just 45 per cent. of Departments in the NAO survey said that they identified and assessed risks in policy making. That seems to be pretty fundamental because if they do not identify whether there is sufficient capability and expertise to implement a policy and measure that against a range of possible outcomes, they are not giving themselves a fair crack of the whip. They are then operating crisis management, not properly planned management.

If risk management is not embedded in the culture, there is a risk that innovation will be stifled. We all realise that we have to examine new and innovative ways of delivering public services, especially if we want to target those services at hard-to-reach groups. However, we can do that only if we are aware of the risks involved in developing new ways of delivery and have robust processes to manage those risks. I would like us to tap into the undoubted talent of our Government employees to come up with innovative ideas, but before they will do that, they will need to feel that the Government have a positive attitude towards managed risk taking. I thus welcome the Treasury response that competence in risk management should be recognised in the context of the professional skills for Government programme. I am also encouraged by the agreement of the Treasury to the PAC conclusion that it has a key role of promoting continuous improvement in risk management and embedding risk management into spending reviews. I cannot emphasise enough the importance of embedding risk assessment and risk management at a sufficiently early stage—that point has already been raised—and I would hope that that is understood.

[Sarah McCarthy-Fry]

Moving on to project management, the third report of the 2005–06 session has already been mentioned—the Ministry of Defence major projects report. Having been involved in two major complex projects in my former business life, I know only too well the importance of effective project management. Risk management is linked to that. How well one has planned for contingencies is usually an indicator of how effective one's project management is, particularly on complex projects with many dependencies.

Breaking the project down into manageable units with clearly defined tasks and clearly defined ownership for those tasks before the project starts is vital. Setting realistic time scales for tasks and getting the balance right between realistic time scales and adequate contingency is also vital. The project leader must be accountable and must have sufficient authority and leadership to keep on top of the project, motivate the team, avoid a blame culture, encourage innovation and keep the project on track.

In project management, as in risk management, work put in at the early stages pays huge dividends. I echo the point made by the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Bacon), who has left the Chamber. The PAC's conclusion in the major projects report was that the amount of work undertaken in the assessment phase was still not sufficient to enable sensible investment decisions to be taken, particularly where the guidance stated that up to 15 per cent. should be spent on assessment, particularly of complex projects. The onus should be on those approving investment in large complex projects to ensure that sufficient time and resource has been spent on the planning phase.

I note the Treasury response that the effectiveness of the assessment phase cannot be judged by the amount of time spent in that phase. Of course the amount spent may not have been spent wisely, but it is an indicator, and one that should carry a great deal of weight. As a former financial controller myself, I can only congratulate the PAC on its recommendation that financial controllers should always be part of the main project team. In my experience, the presence of the person controlling the purse strings is a very effective deterrent to allowing the costs to overrun as the first resort, rather than as the last resort, after every other alternative has been explored.

The Treasury has acknowledged that there is a shortfall in project management skills and key leadership competences, and has proposed a review of the leadership development scheme to counter this. However, speed is of the essence, given the large sums of money being spent. The proposed completion of the review in April 2006, following which there will be an ongoing programme of improvements, is too slow. It means that we have already missed the boat on a number of projects.

There is a further report on major Ministry of Defence projects to the PAC next week and I await with interest our interrogation of witnesses to see whether they think improvements have been made in risk management and project management, the two key factors that I and other hon. Members have identified in delivering value for money, not just in the MOD, but across all aspects of Government.

5.52 pm

Greg Clark (Tunbridge Wells) (Con): Thank you very much, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am grateful to have caught your eye. Like the hon. Member for Portsmouth, North (Sarah McCarthy-Fry), I am thrilled to be a member of the Public Accounts Committee. It is the best possible training to see not only how parliamentary Committees work, but how Whitehall works, and I am grateful to have that opportunity.

Like previous speakers, I pay tribute to the work of the Committee secretariat, to the National Audit Office and to the chairmanship of my hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh). Like the hon. Member for Portsmouth, North, I found that attending my first sitting of the PAC rather took my breath away, with the ferocity of the questioning, but we have got into our stride and started to give as good as we get.

It is important that we question witnesses robustly. One of the things that I have noticed during the hearings that we have had so far is that increasingly, there are organisations that are neither directly accountable to the electorate nor subject to the rigours of the marketplace, so it falls to us as the Public Accounts Committee to be almost the only possible scrutineers of their performance. That is not a happy situation. A class of organisations is developing that are neither part of the accountable public sector, nor subject to market disciplines. They are part of a kind of para-state that it is particularly difficult to interrogate. I refer to three examples.

The first example causes me frustration because it was the subject of one of our hearings and has been covered in the reports before us: Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs. In a hearing on the complexity of benefits and tax credits, we considered a recent change in policy—the increase in the earnings disregard for tax credits from £2,500 to £25,000. Clearly, such a step change has a cost attached to it, and it strikes me that part of our core remit in assessing the value for money of Government policy is to find out what those costs are.

The transcript of the evidence reads like an episode of "Yes, Minister". It took about 19 questions to solicit from the officials responsible whether any estimate had been made of the cost of the change. It turned out that there was an estimate. Of course there was; any increase in a disregard from £2,500 to £25,000 is clearly a major policy decision and Revenue and Customs had assessed it. An undertaking was given that not necessarily a robust estimate but the one that was made in assessing the policy would be disclosed to the Committee. I waited for that disclosure to be made, and I waited and I waited, and I continue to wait.

I tried the route of parliamentary questions. I tabled a question before Christmas for answer on 20 December, but no answer came from the Treasury. There was neither a Christmas card nor any form of greeting from the Chancellor. I asked for the estimate that had been made when the policy was being assessed, but the answer that was finally given on 10 January was entirely unsatisfactory and diversionary:

> "Precise estimates of the change in entitlement resulting from the higher disregard . . . will not be known until 2006–07 awards have been finalised in early 2008."—[Official Report, 10 January 2006; Vol. 441, c. 556W.]

The PAC gives us our one and only opportunity to ask questions of officials who are not directly accountable in any other forum, so it is particularly important. It is therefore disappointing that such an important Committee does not have quite the set of teeth that we need. Parliament's role of scrutinising the Government is very important and should be treated with respect. To exclude from scrutiny by the Committee and therefore the House such a major area of Government spending is not in accordance with the principles on which the PAC was established all those years ago.

The second area is the national health service. In this arena of para-state organisations, where accountability is difficult to exercise, we have different parts of the NHS going by different names. We have primary care trusts, strategic health authorities and trusts, but they are all part of the NHS. We should have one NHS and that should be accountable. Indeed, it is important to getting value for money that it is accountable. By way of illustration, in my constituency operations and out-patient appointments are no longer being allocated or offered to those who need them, but the identity of who can be held responsible for that is obscure.

Helen Goodman: The hon. Gentleman's point is interesting but issues concerning the hospital in his constituency prove the exact opposite. It is because hospitals are accountable and because there are limits on the amount of money that they can spend that such management action has been taken—albeit with the unfortunate consequences to which he refers.

Greg Clark: Let me describe those consequences. As the hon. Lady knows, we are a value-for-money Committee: we scrutinise the value for money of public expenditure. What is going on in my hospital trust is illustrative of a national problem and of exactly the kind of problem that our Committee is here to interrogate. The problem is that the primary care trusts are running out of money. The financial year end is on 31 March and the PCTs are telling the hospital trusts that they will not finance any more out-patient or in-patient procedures in this financial year.

Let me explain the consequences of that in value-for-money terms. Hospital consultants and surgeons continue to be employed by the trust and to have their salaries paid. The operating theatres remain open and available, but they are not used. Patients are waiting to be treated, yet consultants and surgeons are being told to go off and play golf, read the newspaper or twiddle their thumbs, on full pay, because they are not allowed to trigger a charge—which is, after all, just a mark on an electronic ledger—this side of 31 March.

None of us would doubt that the patients need to be treated. People need to have their hip operations, for example, and they will have to be carried out at some point. However, because of this arbitrary deadline, capacity that is available now is not being used, but it will have to be used in the next financial year, and shared with the patients who come on to the lists in that year. Who knows, perhaps that will give rise to overtime payments or to capacity constraints. This is clearly not offering value for money.

I have spoken to the executives in these organisations, and I feel for them. It is very difficult to know what to advise them to do. The trust is merely following the inevitable consequence of the PCT's decision not to fund any further procedures. The PCTs are under apparently irrevocable instructions not to make funds available if there has been more activity during the year. Whoever is responsible, the consequence is a loss of value for money.

There are solutions available, however. One possibility is that, if a PCT and a hospital trust have had their allocation of activity for one year, any further activity could be charged at marginal cost, rather than the full tariff. After all, the only costs that would be incurred in carrying out these operations would be the cost of lighting the operating theatre and of any consumables used during the operation. That is one example, but who would take responsibility for making such a decision? Not the Secretary of State. She would say that these matters are now devolved to the PCTs and the hospital trusts. Yet the PCTs and the trusts have no locus to be able to take decisions that would remedy the problem. So we have a situation that, in economic and value-for-money terms, is completely mad.

This is an example of the lack of accountability that is fundamental to the system, and our Committee has an important role in scrutinising such issues. I just wish that the powers of the Committee extended perhaps not to the ability to interrogate Ministers, but to the ability to cause Ministers to take responsibility for some of the consequences of their policy actions.

My final observation is on the Office of Fair Trading. This is a body that is only very indirectly accountable to Parliament, but it nevertheless exists to enact the will of Parliament as expressed in, among other things, the Competition Act 1998.

Mr. Leigh: I thank my hon. Friend for giving way. I just want to put it on the record, in regard to the point made about tax disregards, that the Comptroller and Auditor General has full access powers and I have asked him to go in and get the relevant information himself if it is not forthcoming. He can go into the Treasury and get it.

Greg Clark: This is a useful power, but there is a disappointing aspect. We know that the information is available; it merely needs to be disclosed to us, and the idea that it may not be is worrying. Perhaps the Financial Secretary will tell us that he can remedy the problem.

The Office of Fair Trading was equipped with vigorous powers to promote competition, which are crucial to the economy, but its performance seems quite lax. Powers such as the power to compel evidence and the power to fine miscreants up to 10 per cent. of their turnover are not being used, and seem not to be used at the discretion of the officials responsible. Ministers are not responsible for the decisions, and it is difficult for anyone other than the PAC to exercise any leverage on whether the OFT is implementing the will of Parliament, which it was set up to do.

Our Committee has a crucial role, and as more organisations that are not directly accountable either to customers or to Parliament are established, its role will become even more important; but we should not kid ourselves that our present powers are more effective than they are. We have power to expose poor practice, and to commend good practice where we find it. I hope that, if we take the suggested route, a new culture will develop. I hope that, as our findings and the recommendations of the National Audit Office present a unique opportunity for scrutiny, they will be taken particularly seriously. That is important to the efficiency and performance of the public sector.

6.6 pm

Kitty Ussher (Burnley) (Lab): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Tunbridge Wells (Greg Clark). He has a consistently rigorous and persistent line of questioning in our Committee, which has proved extremely effective.

My hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth, North (Sarah McCarthy-Fry) spoke of the need to control risk. Some might say that I flatter the hon. Member for Tunbridge Wells simply because he represents my parents-in-law in the beautiful village of Goudhurst. I am not sure what form the risk to me might take if I got on the wrong side of him, but I am sure that it would be substantial. Nevertheless, I assure him that my flattery is sincere. It is a pleasure to serve alongside him.

Many Members, notably the hon. Members for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) and for South Norfolk (Mr. Bacon), discussed smart procurement and the need for Government to procure effectively. I assure them that help is at hand in the form of my ten-minute Bill. I hope that I may use this opportunity to advertise it, Mr. Deputy Speaker. It seeks to enshrine in law the requirement for Departments to procure 2.5 per cent. of their research budgets from smaller companies, thereby harnessing the best scientific brains to find new and innovative solutions to public procurement and policy questions. I am sure that that is what we in the PAC aspire to do.

Mr. Bacon: I am fascinated to learn that the hon. Lady is to present a ten-minute Bill. Might she find time during her 10 minutes to discuss the Clinger-Cohen Acts in the United States, which compel Government agencies there to publish in a statutory framework the gateways during the procurement of IT projects? Such a requirement would be very welcome in this country.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I do not think that on this occasion we should expose what might be the substance of the speech of the hon. Member for Burnley (Kitty Ussher) when her Bill is presented. I think that we should stick to the agenda before us.

Kitty Ussher: I will, of course, follow your advice, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and not ruin the suspense for—I am sure—many Members. I shall be making my speech the week after next.

Let me add my tribute to Sir John Bourn and all the staff at the National Audit Office, to the rigorous nature of their reports and to the support that they give our Committee, which is such an important part of our democratic structure. I also pay tribute to our Clerk, Nick, and his team, who have been so patient in explaining the Committee's procedures to new members like me. The same applies very much to the Chair, the hon. Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh), and to the senior Labour Committee members—as well as the Conservative members—who have courteously taken the trouble to advise me on the way in which the Committee works and how to get the most out of it.

It is initially daunting to find oneself on a Committee that considers two new subjects each and every week—a far cry from the more traditional Select Committees, which shadow Departments and have the leisure of deciding on their own subjects and investigating them forensically and in depth over weeks or months. For us, the hard work and the forensic work are done by the National Audit Office. We are the mechanism through which it airs its work. Through it, we are able to hold Departments to account.

As a cross-party representative grouping of unwhipped Back Benchers, we are, I guess, the voice of the people, taking the evidence presented through the forensic skills of the NAO and asking the questions on behalf of ordinary British taxpayers, namely, are we getting value for money from the taxes we pay and, to use the phrase used by my hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth, North, are we getting enough bang for our buck?

On the whole, I have been fairly impressed by the answers that we get. The Chairman of the Committee referred to our December report, which considered the cumulative conclusions to be drawn from the last 10 years of our Committee's work. He rightly explained the number of recommendations that we have been making, but the first paragraph of that report makes it crystal clear that Governments over the years have acted on most of our recommendations and in doing so have, in many cases, secured financial savings, improved the standard of public services and tackled the risks to successful delivery.

Most striking is the effect of the Gershon review, which in 2004 made recommendations that would deliver £20 billion of savings through better organisation and smarter procurement, and would release more resources for front-line public services. I know from my experience in a previous life as one of those dreaded special advisers the fear that would run through Departments at the thought of being hauled in front of the Public Accounts Committee. Accounting officers really feel the potential pressure of that, which is a good thing because it means that they will perform their duty more effectively.

I want to pick out an example in relation to a report that falls within the scope of the motion. It is extremely important and perhaps merits further work, and it follows the line of comment of my hon. Friend the Member for Dagenham (Jon Cruddas) in that it considers the spatial effect of Government policy. It is the 51st report, 2003–04 Session, which considers success in the regions, the impact of the Government's regional policy and, specifically, the operation of the regional development agencies, as well as the contribution that they could make to the success of Government policy throughout the country.

In 2004, when I was not a member, the Committee concluded:

> "Current RDA targets concentrate too much on short-term contributions to Whitehall objectives and too little on longer-term regional economic impact."

That was true at that time. There was a tendency for all Departments, when wondering how to implement their policies, to instruct the RDAs—certainly in the English regions—to implement an aspect of Government policy, with the result that the RDAs had myriad targets and no real mechanism to prioritise them. Our conclusions were accepted by the Government, which is one reason for them seeking to align RDA strategies more closely with their economic policies and plans, as well as the relevant public service agreement targets.

The Committee also recommended that the Department of Trade and Industry should measure the impact of the RDAs on regional economic performance—the growth and prosperity in each region—by means of improved data. The Government accepted that recommendation and, as a result, their statistical service will, in each region, publish regional data by March 2007. Those will be completely delivered by 2009, which sounds a long way off, but unless we understand exactly what is happening in each region we will not be able to get the policies right to deliver in that area. Adding up the effect in every region means considering the transformation of the entirety of England.

If our aim as a Government is to extend opportunity across the country, regardless of which town we happen to call home, understanding the levers that have an effect on each part of the economy is crucial. As powers and budgets are devolved to the RDAs, their ability to impact on regional and sub-regional economies is increased, but without the ability to monitor the effect there will be a danger of public money being misused. That is what we are trying to avoid.

The Government have a high-level PSA target to reduce the disparity of growth rates between regions, a stretching target and one that the Committee should revisit. I thank the NAO for agreeing to do some analytical work leading, I hope, to a report later this year on the effectiveness of the Government's policies in this area.

Our Committee can make a large contribution to the economic theme. Recently the Treasury has made progress in extending our understanding, as a nation, of the levers of economic growth. It is not to make a party political point to say that now that unemployment is low, to raise GDP we need to focus on productivity—the amount of wealth produced for each person in work. It is a dry economic word and one cannot just affect it by waving a wand. The effect of the Treasury's work has been to make us realise what we do need to wave to get the growth that we all want. We need to ensure competitive markets, raise skill levels, increase investment and so on. There are officially five drivers of productivity.

If that is our high-level objective, the next question is whether taxpayers' money spent in this area has the desired results. It is a difficult question, but we need to focus on it. It is difficult because it is notoriously hard to make a link between the micro and the macro; how can one create a link between the amount of taxpayers' money spent on these various economic levels and the actual eventual outcome in terms of macroeconomic indicators, productivity and ultimately GDP?

Without an attempt to quantify the links, there is a danger that millions, or billions, of pounds of taxpayers' money can be spent without having the effect on the economy that all of us want. I hope that other members of the Committee agree that we need to return to this question and that there are questions that we need to continue to ask, be it on competition, agencies—we had such an opportunity recently—the DFES and its work in raising productivity through the skills agenda, or the DTI, and specifically business links, and its policies to raise entrepreneurship.

To sum up, it is a pleasure to be on the Committee. I thank all those who have helped me to climb my learning curve in an attempt to serve on the Committee to greater effect. I hope that, through our work, we shall be able to play a part in not only securing greater value for money, but raising the level of growth in our country.

Mrs. Maria Miller (Basingstoke) (Con): Before I contribute to this important debate, I wish to bring to the attention of the House that a long-standing member of the Public Accounts Committee, my hon. Friend the Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Bacon), has an important engagement on Saturday: to marry his fiancée Victoria. I would like to wish him every happiness.

The role of the PAC in holding the Government to account and recommending improvements to public services is truly unique and the ability of the Committee to put a spotlight on critical and topical issues is vital in the parliamentary process. We have heard a good deal about that today, but I wish to take it a bit further.

In many ways, I urge the Government to view the PAC as their own in-house management consultancy, something for which many outside organisations pay vast sums of money. Perhaps the Government already view the Committee in that way, which is why, as with management consultancies, many of the points that the Committee makes are not listened to as carefully as they should be.

My hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh) has said that over 90 per cent. of the recommendations made by the Committee are accepted. I would like to look at some of those that need to be put into action. My hon. Friend has said that the Committee does not take issue with the Government as to whether increases in expenditure are right; rather its remit is concerned with ensuring that massive increases in public expenditure actually count and are translated into a clear improvement in front-line services. We have heard as much today.

A number of the reports produced by the PAC undertake that task, and none more so than the report on early years and child care published in June 2004. In that report, the PAC considered in detail the Government's child care policies and strategy at that time. Government expenditure on child care is set to increase by 24 per cent. in the next three years, as the Secretary of State reminded us only too recently in the debate on the Childcare Bill. Over the past eight years, Government expenditure on child care has been £17 billion. The report highlighted that the Government need to tackle the problem of the long-term viability of the expansion of child care provision that they have funded. Significant increases in investment are planned into the future, and the Committee rightly concluded that it is vital to ensure that that money is spent effectively.

[Mrs. Maria Miller]

Provision of child care plays an important part in both the social and economic future of our country. Affordable and flexible child care is one of the most important concerns for many families. It is only right that the Government should consider how more families can use good-value, good-quality child care. Two thirds of women who have children are in work, and half of all women who have children under the age of five are in work. The trend is for more mothers to be in work. We need robust policies on that, and it is of paramount importance to ensure that our child care strategy is viable in the long term.

The evidence taken by the PAC in its report highlighted that for every two new child care places opened in the past four years, one child care place has closed. In particular, closures of child minding places have increased significantly. When only 10 per cent. of the work force works from 9 to 5, however, child minding can often be the only source of child care that meets parents' needs. The Equal Opportunities Commission gave evidence to the PAC that highlighted stark uncertainties in the future for many of the new child care organisations operating in many parts of the country. It cited that 25 per cent. of all out-of-school clubs are making a loss, spiralling to two out of every three in more disadvantaged areas. That is not sustainable in the long term. That causes me concern, and from reading the report, it clearly concerns the PAC, too. The Committee also reviewed the National Audit Office report on child care, which shows that half the organisations that I have been talking about have made no plans to identify new funding streams for when their time-limited funding streams come to an end. That must be a cause of real concern.

While the Government have agreed with the PAC's findings and conclusion that more needs to be done to help to ensure the long-term viability of our child care, they have not done as much as they might to take those critical findings into account in practice. The Committee took important and informative evidence from the Sure Start unit and the Department for Education and Skills, which clearly stated that to be viable in the long term, child care organisations needed to operate at 80 per cent. occupancy rates—80 per cent. of all places filled with children. That would give them an opportunity to break even, and provide a sustainable future for our child care providers. I know from visiting child care providers in my constituency that that is a fair figure. In each year since the Committee's report was issued, however, the average occupancy rates for child care providers have fallen. That makes it increasingly difficult for providers to break even and to continue to offer those critical services in our communities.

Reports commissioned by Laing and Buisson show clearly that in January 2004 average occupancy rates in nurseries in the UK were 85 per cent. In January 2005, that had slipped to 83 per cent., and most recently, the same organisation found that in October 2005 the average occupancy rate in our nurseries had slipped below the magic figure of 80 per cent. to 76 per cent. As I have said, that level is cited by Sure Start as being below that which creates financial viability for those organisations.

It is to be welcomed that child care in the UK has expanded. When I had to go into the marketplace after having my first child, I had enormous problems in accessing affordable child care. That problem continues to concern me and many of my constituents. However, we must look at the reality of the situation. The sector remains in a very difficult position. There is much uncertainty. Why are more of the new places not being taken up? Is it that they are not the places that people want? Is it the high cost? The cost of child care provision in this country remains among the highest in Europe. Much of the Government's strategy does not take into account the importance of informal, family-based child care, which makes up a large percentage of existing child care provision in the UK. Perhaps more needs to be done to examine that and to unpick why we are in a position that causes concern.

One thing that working families need is certainty about their child care support. I am sure that many hon. Members will know from first hand experience that that is vital. Whatever system is put forward, it has to have at its heart the ability to sustain provision in the long term. I endorse that conclusion in the PAC report. It is not desirable for parents or families to be uncertain about the future provision of child care. Whether it is a child minder, nursery or after-school club, parents need to be able to plan their lives and those of their children in the knowledge that it is good-quality child care provision.

My hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh) observed that the PAC's work is to ensure that massive increases in public expenditure actually count. In the child care sector, it is clear from the Committee's review of the facts, which was apolitical, as the Committee stressed, that the Government need to do more to review the action that is being taken. There are exciting plans under the Childcare Bill for children centres in every community. It is an enormous investment. There is a strong argument for some caution because quite large and fundamental concerns remain about the long-term viability of the Government's approach. When the market is still struggling to accommodate the Government's approach to funding, it is time for caution. Working better with existing child care providers has to be at the heart of our child care strategy. We need every pound invested to work hard to provide long-term solutions that count and give parents the certainty that I have talked about. The evidence in the PAC report suggests that a sizeable proportion of the provision is hanging on by its fingernails.

The Government need not just to listen and to accept the Committee's reports, as we heard earlier, but to do something about those findings and about the concerns that have been raised. The Childcare Bill is proceeding through the parliamentary process. Many of the points that I have made today were raised by other hon. Friends in debates. It is an important issue. A key element of the Bill is the new duty on local authorities to take steps to provide sufficient child care provision. That is an expansion of their responsibility in the sector at a particularly difficult time. Can we continue to allow one child care place to be lost for every two created? Existing providers must be able to plan for the future and the long-term financial success of their organisations. The continuing fall in occupancy rates perhaps hints that we have not got to the root of the problem of child care provision in terms of cost and the role of other family arrangements.

Some of those shortcomings could be helped by local government playing more of a role in determining child care. I acknowledge that. After all, it is much better placed to understand its communities. However, to reiterate the PAC's point about sustainability of provision, how sustainable is the role of local government in child care, given the fact that the Government will not provide any additional funding for that new and pivotal duty?

I applaud the work of the PAC in holding the Government to account and applaud the PAC's objective of ensuring that public expenditure counts. However, I call on the Government to do more than just accept the Committee's work and to take this opportunity to use the expertise of this group of people to improve all our services for the good of our community.

6.30 pm

Mrs. Theresa Villiers (Chipping Barnet) (Con): I am delighted that my first speech at the Dispatch Box concerns the hugely valuable work of the Public Accounts Committee. For well over 100 years it has been keeping a watchful eye on the activities of the Government and the way in which they spend the money of British citizens.

In the period of the Committee's work that we are considering today, it has continued its long tradition of producing hard-hitting reports, which I believe have had a significant impact on the work of the Government and the way in which they carry forward their policies. There can be few more important tasks for a parliamentarian than to scrutinise the spending of taxpayers' money. I pay tribute to all the members of the Committee and its Chairman, my hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh), for carrying out their watchdog role in such an effective and dedicated manner. I should also like to join others in paying tribute to the staff of the Committee and to Sir John Bourn and his staff at the National Audit Office for their detailed, dispassionate and tireless work in this area.

My hon. Friend made, as one would expect, a wide-ranging speech on the work of the Committee over the past 18 months, the themes of which I will return to in my speech. The hon. Member for Dagenham (Jon Cruddas) talked in depth about population growth issues in his constituency and statistical analysis of demography, and its impact on social cohesion and infrastructure provision in his area. The hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) chose three themes: mismanagement, referring to IT disasters, which cropped up several times during the debate, misguided application of policy, in particular the Qinetiq project, and fraud and the crisis in the tax credit system. The hon. Member for Bishop Auckland (Helen Goodman) spoke of improving the methods of the PAC and expressed concerns about some of the IT programmes that the Committee had looked at, describing them with accuracy as often a triumph of hope over experience. My hon. Friend the Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Bacon) gave us an in depth account of what can go wrong with private finance initiatives and hospital provision. The hon. Member for Portsmouth, North (Sarah McCarthy-Fry) informed us that applying accountancy skills and effective project management could have a tremendous benefit if applied more widely in public procurement matters. My hon. Friend the Member for Tunbridge Wells (Greg Clark) emphasised the importance of robust bodies not accountable to the public or the marketplace, and spoke in rather frightening terms of a para-state which is difficult to interrogate properly. The hon. Member for Burnley (Kitty Ussher) referred to smart procurement and paid generous tributes to her colleagues on the Committee. I agree with her that in many ways the PAC is the voice of the people in keeping track of their money. Finally, my hon. Friend the Member for Basingstoke (Mrs. Miller) spoke with great insight into and information about child care problems and the PAC report on early years.

Given the Committee's vast output and the late hour I cannot hope to cover all the reports. Instead I shall focus on a few of the more striking conclusions. Also I shall look to the lessons for the future. I should like to take this opportunity to point out how it would be useful to those embarking on preparations for the London Olympics to read some of the reports that we are discussing. That would help them avoid many of the mistakes that have characterised Olympic projects in the past. My constituents in Chipping Barnet are among the council tax payers expected to pick up the bill for the 2012 games. It is my fervent hope that the Government and the various organisations preparing for the Olympics follow the wise advice of the PAC in effective planning and project management. Let us hope that in a few years' time we are not standing here discussing a coruscating PAC critique of overspend on the 2012 games.

As we have heard this afternoon, much of the work of the PAC focuses on achieving value for money in the public services. As the Chairman pointed out, there can be few issues more central to modern political discourse than this one. The sums at stake are huge. The Comptroller and Auditor General has calculated that a mere 1 per cent. efficiency improvement in the spending allocated to Departments over three years could release £14.5 billion to redeploy on front-line services. I find it difficult to believe that the Government's Gershon review or the Opposition's James report would have been initiated without the trailblazing work of the PAC; nor might we have seen the creation of the Government's departmental capability reviews without the PAC's bringing pressure to bear on achieving value for money for the taxpayer.

Although some of the issues addressed by the PAC are complex in the extreme, much of its advice is a matter of simple good housekeeping and sensible project management. Time and again, it has emphasised the importance of carrying out an effective and thorough planning process—a theme mentioned already today—including an in-depth assessment of potential risks and problems; of ensuring that all timetables are realistic; of breaking down complex projects into smaller, more manageable components; of putting in place reliable back-up plans to maintain services in the event of problems; of retaining a strong management grip on all projects at all times; and above all, of acting commercially when procuring services from the private sector, and applying hard-headed commercial common sense to contract negotiations. I am sure that Members in all parts of the House will regretfully agree that the reports that we are discussing today demonstrate that the PAC's message has yet to percolate widely throughout Whitehall. Good practice in one Department too often fails to spread across to others. Examples still abound of projects on which taxpayers' money is wasted because of poor planning, and of lessons from past failures not being learned.

The PAC's report on Operation Telic identified worrying mismanagement that exposed troops in Iraq to increased risk as a result of inadequate supply of important equipment. We heard this afternoon about the notorious case of the Ministry of Defence's purchasing eight Chinook HC3 helicopters for some £250 million, only to find that they were unusable. The report described this as "one of the worst examples of equipment acquisition that the Committee has seen".

In its report on asylum decisions, the National Audit Office estimated that up to £500 million could have been saved if the Home Office had been able to put in place sufficient staff and infrastructure to meet the significant rise in asylum applications in 1999 and 2000. Sadly, we are all too well aware that a recurring theme in the PAC's deliberations is IT projects that go horribly wrong. In the most recent of many reports on this issue, the PAC expressed concern that the systems set up by the Government to prevent procurement disasters, such as the gateway review process, are too often overridden. A case study in how such projects can go wrong is set out in the PAC's damning report on the Criminal Records Bureau, and in its report on the transfer of GCHQ computers. The cost of that transfer was initially estimated at some £41 million; it eventually rose to nearer £450 million.

Mr. Bacon: I had a conversation with the former Minister—I shall not embarrass him by naming him—who was responsible for the decision to go ahead with the Criminal Records Bureau project. He told me that he sat in a room with 12 people, read the relevant information, said, "This isn't going to work, is it?", and twelve voices replied, "Yes, Minister." Does that example not indicate the lack of independent advice available to Ministers on these complex projects?

Mrs. Villiers: I agree, and my hon. Friend makes the point very well. It is particularly important that Government Departments heed the PAC's advice to act commercially and ensure that they look at a wide range of providers. One problem with IT procurement is that only a very few firms are competing for large Government contracts.

Another theme returned to time and again by the PAC, and which was referred to by its Chairman today, is the disadvantage arising from complexity in the provision of public services. As well as being more expensive to run, the more complex the process is, the more likely it is that mistakes will be made. The PAC has estimated that rectifying errors costs the Department for Work and Pensions £1 billion every year. But looking at the financial cost of rectifying errors is to understate the human cost in terms of frustration and upset. All Members see that frustration daily in our constituency postbags.

A recent and disturbing example of the problem was explored by the Committee's report on tax credits. It states that the complexity of the tax credits system is one of the major causes of the problems that we have witnessed over the past few months. Complexity means that customers and officials find it hard to understand the system, which increases the number of mistakes that they make. It also makes it more difficult to rectify the mistakes once they are made, and increases the opportunity for fraud—a point made by the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath).

Recent developments have shown just how serious the problem is, with the Government forced to shut down their on-line applications systems because of large-scale identity fraud involving the names of thousands of workers at the Department for Work and Pensions and Network Rail.

The Committee also noted that the way that the system was structured contributed to significant problems even where no mistakes were made. The system of provisional awards routinely overpays customers—a major factor in the crisis that means that many of the very poorest families are suddenly subject to demands to repay large sums of money. As a result, MPs and citizens advice bureaux have been inundated with distressing complaints from people forced to take desperate measures to repay the money that they owe. That very disturbing example provides a graphic illustration of how the work of the PAC goes beyond dry matters of Government spending and statistics and touches on real lives and hardship.

Further examples of how complexity can hinder the efficient provision of public services were highlighted in the Committee's report on regional policy. For example, it found that, in the Thames Gateway area, a multiplicity of different organisations were responsible for regeneration. The Committee wisely advised that the Government should have a presumption against establishing new institutions and new tiers of bureaucracy unless it was clear that policy objectives could not be achieved through existing bodies.

The Committee also noted the severe difficulties faced by organisations in the regions that have to grapple with many different funding streams—in the south-east, there are no fewer than 40 such streams. Much of that complexity results from the complexity of EU schemes, which brings me to another PAC report on the EU budget.

The House is well aware that, for the past decade, the EU's own auditors have refused to sign off on their accounts—a shocking fact when compared with the exemplary standards of scrutiny demonstrated in the UK by the NAO and PAC. However, one of the biggest roadblocks to cleaning up the EU's accounts is the complexity of its agricultural support and regional aid programmes, which gives rise to high levels of fraud, error and maladministration. Only when the EU heeds the advice of the PAC and many other bodies and radically streamlines and simplifies its regional aid and agriculture programmes will there be any real hope that, one day, we will be able to ensure that every euro of the EU budget is properly accounted for.

Another telling example of where complexity and bureaucracy get in the way of the efficient delivery of public services is revealed by the Committee's work on transport. When it looked at rail services, it established that the process for introducing new trains involved no fewer than 60 key stages. From my own constituency work, I know how difficult it can sometimes be to get things done on our rail network. It took many years of campaigning to get one of my local stations renovated. On the day that it was formally reopened, a cast of thousands from all the multiple different organisations that had to be involved in the project was in attendance.

I hope that Government, Opposition and all those working in the rail industry can strive to put in place some of the Committee's recommendations for streamlining and simplifying how we run this crucial part of our transport infrastructure. I am sure that we would all agree that an efficient public transport network is vital for our international competitiveness and for the quality of life of our constituents.

The Committee also had invaluable advice in relation to the public-private partnership for the London Underground. It expressed concern at the complexity of the structures put in place to operate the tube, and of the process by which PPP contracts were concluded. The deal took five years to conclude and transaction and consultancy costs soared to a staggering £455 million. The resulting contracts are opaque and difficult to understand. Many of my constituents complain to me almost daily of the dire performance of the Northern line, but the complexity of the PPP structures makes it very difficult to hold those responsible for the tube to account. Whether one asks the Government, the Mayor or Tube Lines, somehow the fact that my constituents cannot get to work in the morning is always somebody else's fault and somebody else's problem.

One of the striking aspects of the work of the PAC is the wide range of areas that it looks at. It is not just the computer overspend disasters; it looks at a whole range of areas. It has done some extremely valuable work on health, of which today's publication of a report on cancer is merely the most recent example. The Committee can claim much credit for pushing the issue of hospital-acquired infection right to the top of the political agenda. It is one of a number of areas in which the Committee's work has stretched over many years and several reports. Back in 2000, the Committee expressed its concern that the NHS had little grip on the problem or the measures needed to tackle it. Worryingly, returning to the subject four years later, the Committee commented that the response to its earlier report had been patchy and that there was still a distinct lack of urgency on several key issues, such as ward cleanliness. Let us hope that the recent political attention devoted to this issue will mean that the PAC's next report on this matter will have better news for NHS patients.

Lastly, I should like to look briefly at the Committee's valuable work on the Government's programmes on HIV/AIDS. In its thoughtful and considered report on this issue, the Committee recommended that greater priority should be given to tackling the social and economic aspect of the epidemic. The report details the devastating impact the disease is having on the work force of many developing countries, impairing their ability to cope with the epidemic and to run public services or a functioning economy.

Yet between 1997 and 2003, only 1 per cent. of DFID's country-level spending was focused on this issue. Perhaps more seriously, the Committee noted that the priority given by the Government to their HIV/AIDS projects was not reflected in the spending of the multilateral agencies funded by DFID. In particular, the Committee discovered that, at the time of reporting, only £19 million of the £1 billion contributed by DFID to the European Commission was spent on programmes related to HIV/AIDS.

In recent months, tackling the epidemic has rightly shot up the international political agenda. I hope, therefore, that there is now a much greater awareness of the importance of this issue among the multilateral organisations with which DFID works. However, it is frustrating to read the evidence given to the Committee from senior officials and experts in the area who freely admit that aid is spent more wisely and effectively if it is spent directly by the UK Government rather than via an international intermediary such as the European Commission. In the light of the conclusions of the report and the urgent need to tackle the AIDS epidemic, there seems to me to be a very strong case to ask DFID to reconsider the level of funding that it deploys via the EU and switch far more of its resources to programmes that it administers directly or via NGOs. I am sure that the Financial Secretary will agree that the priority here must be saving lives rather than EU sensitivities.

I imagine that HIV/AIDS is a subject that has never been raised before in a debate on the Public Accounts Committee, but I make no apology for doing so. I have chosen this topic to end on for two reasons. First, the significant amount of money now being devoted to such programmes must be effectively scrutinised. We must all be well aware of the difficulties of ensuring that aid for developing countries is effectively and wisely spent. Secondly, I highlight this issue because of the pressing need to tackle an epidemic that has seen 65 million infected and 20 million dead from the disease in the last two decades. I am pleased that the PAC found time in its busy schedule to address this humanitarian crisis. I pay tribute to the Committee's work on this issue and on all the other high-quality reports that we have had the honour to consider this afternoon, and it is with great pleasure that I commend them all to the House.

6.50 pm

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (John Healey): We have had a very good debate this afternoon, led by the hon. Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh), but with a further nine excellent contributions. It is my privilege to respond on behalf of the Government.

The Public Accounts Committee makes a special contribution to our system of parliamentary scrutiny of the Executive. The Government, especially the Treasury, share several common interests with the Committee and the National Audit Office. We have a responsibility to ensure that taxpayers' money is used economically, efficiently and effectively, and we want to see the delivery of public services to a high standard, with both the public and private sector working well together and applying the best practices and standards of management and skills.

We see, from the prolific series of reports that the PAC produces and from the contributions to the debate this afternoon, that the PAC does not pull its punches.

[John Healey]

But however critical, the Committee mostly operates without being politically partisan. That remains one of its traditional strengths as Parliament's leading inquisitor and champion in challenging the Executive. It is rightly tough on Departments and agencies. Accounting officers sensibly take any appearance before the PAC more seriously than almost any other aspect of their responsibilities.

For those reasons, I pay tribute to the work of the PAC members and, in particular, to the hon. Member for Gainsborough who is starting his sixth year as its Chairman. I wish also formally to recognise and pay tribute to the work of the Comptroller and Auditor General and his staff at the National Audit Office in supporting the Committee. I also wish to add a word of appreciation for Brian Glicksman, for his hard work and his dedication to the Committee. He retired recently after being the Treasury Officer of Accounts for six years and he told me recently that he has appeared before the Committee almost 150 times.

I wish also to welcome the hon. Member for Chipping Barnet (Mrs. Villiers), who delivered her first speech at the Dispatch Box this afternoon. It was very accomplished and a good contribution to the debate. We look forward to many more appearances, as I am sure she does herself. Based on some of the reports before us, she urged us to look forward not only to the challenges of trying to tackle the problem of HIV/AIDS, but to the Olympics. However, she raised some words of caution on that score. I may say that in my experience, there is an unprecedented effort going into putting in place arrangements for good project management in preparation for the Olympics. I am sure that the PAC will follow those developments closely, as will the hon. Lady as shadow Chief Secretary. We in the Treasury will certainly follow closely the work of the various bodies responsible for preparing for and delivering the Olympics.

The hon. Member for Gainsborough drew attention to the Committee's 17th report. I have to say that this is something of a tour de force, encapsulating as it does a decade's worth of the Committee's experience and conclusions. It helpfully draws those together in seven coherent themes which he set out for us this afternoon. Each one contains some potent pieces of advice for the Government. Although in each case the Government are already taking action, the Committee shows us that there is considerable scope to improve in the future. We are studying the report carefully and we will respond point by point within the customary two months. The hon. Gentleman has been able, in a timely way, to use the debate to lay stress on the particular observations to which the Committee wants us to pay close attention.

The hon. Gentleman raised several other important issues. As he acknowledged, we are taking the opportunity afforded by the Company Law Reform Bill to enable the Comptroller and Auditor General to become eligible to audit non-departmental public bodies that are companies, as well as their subsidiary companies. By doing that, we are fulfilling a major commitment that we made in response to Lord Sharman's report on audit and accountability in central Government. I was pleased that the hon. Gentleman described himself as delighted by the move. The Treasury and the Department of Trade and Industry was helped in no small way by the close co-operation of the National Audit Office as the policy and detailed proposals were developed into the firm plans that are now in the Bill. I hope that the Bill will receive a smooth passage through both Houses.

The hon. Gentleman pressed arguments that he has made before on making the BBC subject to the audit arrangements of the Comptroller and Auditor General. The Government are evaluating the existing arrangements for the audit of the BBC. As the hon. Gentleman knows, the NAO already has a role. It seems appropriate to do that evaluation as part of the charter review and we are thus considering whether any further changes are warranted.

The hon. Gentleman asked what had happened regarding the financial management of the European Union following the publication of the Committee's 18th report. He would have heard Ministers say that a key priority of the UK presidency was to ensure that progress was made on the European Commission's initiative of a road map towards what it called an integrated internal control framework—the hon. Member for Chipping Barnet might already be familiar with that. The UK co-chaired a panel of experts from all member states that met in Brussels on 21 and 22 September to examine the matters that were raised by the Commission's proposed road map. The outcome of those deliberations provided the basis of the draft conclusions for the meeting of Economic and Finance Ministers on 8 November. The recommendations of the PAC report played an important role in drafting the conclusions that were agreed at that meeting. The hon. Member for Gainsborough asked for an assurance that Ministers will continue to press for progress. From this point on, UK officials will be working closely with colleagues from not only Austria, but Finland, to ensure that the action points from the plan are taken forward under those countries' presidencies.

Although the Liberal Democrats' Front-Bench spokesmen are increasingly thin on the ground these days, the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) has showed rather more staying power than many of his colleagues. He had already done sterling work from the Front Bench for the Liberals on the Criminal Defence Service Bill earlier today, but he stayed on to speak in this debate, although I must say that he seemed to be speaking for the Liberals from both the Front and Back Benches. I appreciated the fact that he realised that a lot of the work of Government is good, although he sketched out his three specific worries about mismanagement, the misguided application of policy and fraud.

In a reflective contribution, my hon. Friend the Member for Dagenham (Jon Cruddas) set out several of his worries about trends in population movement and make-up. He also told us clearly the serious social consequences that they can sometimes have. In preparation for the comprehensive spending review, the Treasury is undertaking an analysis of the demographic changes that the country faces in the long term. I will find out whether some of the general points that he made, rather than, perhaps, his specific ones about local authority grant distribution, can be incorporated into that work.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bishop Auckland (Helen Goodman) made an extremely reflective contribution to the debate and several of her points will be pertinent to the way in which the Public Accounts Committee approaches its work in the future. She expressed an enthusiasm for more timely reports. We share that appetite, so we are glad that the Comptroller and Auditor General has recently undertaken to try to publish some shorter reports that can be more quickly prepared, such as the recent report on MG Rover on which I believe that the Committee will hold a hearing next month.

I welcomed the contribution of the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Bacon). It was something of a milestone, as it was his last speech in the House as a single man. We on the Labour Benches wish him and his fiancée Victoria very well for their wedding this weekend. He spoke about the progress that has been made through PFI procurement and recognised the substantial improvement that there has been, with projects delivered on time and within budget, but he also exposed flaws that the Committee has found in specific PFI projects.

The hon. Gentleman urged me to look closely at the work being led by the Royal Institute of British Architects. I am aware of that work. A meeting of officials in the Treasury is shortly to be held with that group to examine the analysis and conclusions that it has been preparing. I welcome RIBA's contribution to the debate on the design of PFI. We will consider very carefully whether and, if so, how, its proposals can be integrated into the Government's overall procurement policy.

Undertaking enough design up front during the procurement is already in line with the Treasury's policy. We want to ensure that we have a well enough informed public sector client to manage projects properly, and we need to make sure that they have done enough preparation before launching a procurement. Design is an important part of that, but there will clearly be a trade-off, which must be examined, to ensure that the risk transfer is not jeopardised by undertaking too much of the design before involving the PFI contractor.

My hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth, North (Sarah McCarthy-Fry) spelled out clearly and convincingly the lessons on good management to be drawn from the private sector, which it is essential that the public sector learn. Her own business expertise before becoming a Member of the House will clearly be a great asset to the Committee. She stressed the importance of good risk management to effective procurement. I am pleased to say that the National Audit Office has complemented the Government's efforts to force home the message that risk management should be embedded in departmental planning, just as she urged, by collaborating with us in the Treasury to publish a guide which we call "Good Practice in Tackling External Fraud".

The hon. Member for Tunbridge Wells (Greg Clark) demonstrated from the Conservative Benches the fresh talent that is being brought to the PAC, although the points that he raised about the cost of changes in the tax credit system relate to the recent hearing, on which the PAC has not yet published its report. He has the answers now, and no doubt he and his colleagues will make a judgment on those and the report will reflect that.

The hon. Gentleman also touched on the problems of the NHS trust in his constituency, and on NHS trust finances more generally. I remind him that three quarters of local NHS organisations are balancing the books or in surplus. I remind him also that the Secretary of State for Health recently announced what she calls decisive action to turn round the minority of NHS organisations that have significantly overspent their budgets. It remains the case that the Government will have trebled investment in the NHS by 2008, and that throughout the country, including in the hon. Gentleman's area, we can see that that investment means extra doctors and nurses, improved quality of treatment and shorter waiting lists for that treatment.

Mr. Heath: I do not dispute what the Minister has just said, but he must realise that there are a number of hospital trusts dotted around the country that have gone through the process of getting their management in order and are trailing, as it were, in surplus, but are nevertheless saddled with insurmountable debts from previous management failures, which are proving an impossible burden for them and causing detriment to the patients in their area through no fault of the present management.

Mike Penning (Hemel Hempstead) (Con): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): Order. First, that was not a point of order. Secondly, it is necessary to allow the Minister to respond to one intervention before he takes another.

John Healey: The task is not impossible, because the vast majority of our NHS organisations are succeeding. What my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced was ways of making sure that the proper support is available for those that are struggling.

Mike Penning rose—

Greg Clark rose—

John Healey: I am reluctant to give way to the hon. Member for Hemel Hempstead (Mike Penning). He has been in the Chamber off and on during the afternoon, but he has not contributed to the debate, so if he does not mind, I shall give way to the hon. Member for Tunbridge Wells, who is a member of the PAC and made a contribution earlier. Then I shall conclude my remarks, as I am anxious to let the Chairman of the PAC have the final word, as is traditional.

Greg Clark: I am grateful to the Minister for giving way. He is right that more money is being spent on the NHS, and I whole-heartedly welcome that, but my point was about value for money. It does not make sense from the point of view of value for money not to perform operations when people are ready, willing and able to conduct them but to have to defer them to a date after 31 March when they might have to work overtime to do so. It is not about the volume of money; it is about the systems that are resulting in a lack of value for money.

John Healey: The hon. Gentleman and his colleagues on the Public Accounts Committee may want to look at the question of financial management and control and value for money in that context. If they do so, I look forward to the conclusions that they draw.

I noted the mention made again by my hon. Friend the Member for Burnley (Kitty Ussher) of her ten-minute Bill. I hope that the hon. Member for South Norfolk is a sponsor, because he is clearly in favour of her proposals. She stressed the attention that the PAC can give to economic policy, especially in the regions, and I certainly welcome that interest.

I hope that the hon. Member for Basingstoke (Mrs. Miller) sees the fact that 93 per cent. of the PAC's recent recommendations have been adopted and put into practice by the Government as confirmation, which she encouraged, of how seriously we take the Committee's work, although we do not quite see the Committee as somehow our in-house management consultancy, as she suggested. She talked about the importance of child care to both the social and economic future of this country. I welcome her strong, albeit reasonably questioning, support for the policies that we are pursuing. She is right to say that we want every pound invested in child care to work hard.

In closing, I want to touch on two vital general areas for the Government in which the PAC also has an active interest: first, the efficiency programme following the Gershon review, which the hon. Member for Gainsborough mentioned, as did my hon. Friend the Member for Burnley; and, secondly, the comprehensive spending review.

The Government are committed to improving public sector efficiency following both the Gershon and the Lyons reviews. Departments own their efficiency plans, however, and it is their responsibility to report on their own progress. They do that in the autumn performance reports and the annual departmental reports. The Chancellor also provided an update on the aggregate progress, both at the Budget last year and in the pre-Budget report, and the Treasury reports on overall progress on efficiency as part of reporting on our spending review 2004 target 9. The efficiency programme is delivering results, as the Chancellor showed in his recent update: £4.7 billion on efficiency gains released back to the front line. In addition to the monetary figure, a total head-count reduction of 31,000 was confirmed and the relocation of a total of 6,300 staff was completed.

Those aggregate gains are based on departmental returns that are reported against a very robust measurement framework on a quarterly basis. Every pound reported can be traced to individual delivery programmes. Those returns are scrutinised and checked for consistency quarter on quarter. However, we will not consider them final until they have been subject to a full verification, which is of course carried out after the end of each financial year.

The comprehensive spending review sets an important context in which we can consider and incorporate recommendations received from the PAC. A decade on from the first CSR, the 2007 comprehensive spending review will represent a long-term and fundamental review of Government expenditure, and it will cover departmental allocations for three years, beginning in 2008–09. Since 1997, the Government have shown that we can deliver for Britain a strong economy and sound public finances at the same time as sustained and sustainable growth in investment in public services. But what we need now is an assessment of the long-term challenges facing our country and our public services, focusing on the major global and domestic long-term trends to which public spending and public services need to respond over the next decade. That assessment must also focus on the conclusions of the long-term reviews that are already under way into the future of transport, skills, pensions and local services.

Britain faces a rapid increase in the old-age dependency ratio. We also face an intensification of cross-border economic competition, an acceleration in the pace of innovation and technology, continued global uncertainty and threats, as well as increasing pressure on our natural resources and global climate. These challenges will have fundamental and far-reaching implications for our public services and they will require innovative policy responses, co-ordination of activity across Departments, and sustained investment in key areas.

The comprehensive spending review will be tough and challenging. It will take a zero-base approach to assessing the effectiveness of Departments' existing spending in delivering the outputs to which they are committed. The review will also look at how the public expenditure framework can best embed and extend ongoing efficiency improvements and support the long-term investments needed to meet these challenges. The CSR therefore offers an important opportunity for the Government to take stock of what we have achieved and to prepare for the challenges ahead—one to which I am sure the PAC will make an important contribution.

Perhaps I can end where the PAC's 17th report began. It stated:

> "One of the key strengths of the Committee of Public Accounts is its ability to examine the way in which public money is used to deliver these services right across Government."

We in the Government and in the House, as well as the public at large and the civil service, owe a debt of gratitude to the Committee for its work. The report went on to say:

> "Governments have acted on most of our recommendations and in doing so, in many cases, have secured financial savings, improved the standards of public services and tackled the risks to successful delivery."

With the PAC's advice, we will continue to do just that.

7.12 pm

Mr. Leigh: With your permission, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I shall say a few words to sum up. May I thank everyone who has contributed to the debate? First, I thank the hon. Member for Dagenham (Jon Cruddas), who is valued former member of the Committee. I will raise with the Comptroller and Auditor General the matter of our producing a report on how demographic factors can influence public policy. The hon. Gentleman made his point extremely well.

I also thank the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) for speaking so eloquently in our debate. He suggested that the National Audit Office should be involved in the debate on identity cards. There is a slight problem there, because the NAO is very keen to stay out of current political issues. However, I agree that that issue is one that we need to keep careful tabs on.

I am very grateful to the hon. Member for Bishop Auckland (Helen Goodman) for her contribution. She is a highly valued new member of the Committee, and she uses her Treasury experience to good effect. She made a very good point about the problem relating to our reports being produced so long after the event. I sometimes feel that we are kicking a corpse that has been dead for a long time, as happened several times in relation to the dome. I have raised this issue again with the Comptroller and Auditor General and he has promised me that we can try to produce much shorter reports that hon. Members can actually read. If they were about 20 pages long and written in narrative form, they would be easily understood. That would enable us to drive the oversight process forward much more quickly.

I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Bacon) for his contribution today and for being a sterling member of the Committee throughout my chairmanship. With the right hon. Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams), we alone on the Committee have said that, if someone becomes an Opposition spokesman, they must leave the Committee. We have maintained the purity of the Committee in that regard. My hon. Friend the Member for South Norfolk has chosen to stay on the Committee and not to become an Opposition spokesman, as his abilities merit. I am grateful to him for that.

I thank the hon. Member for Portsmouth, North (Sarah McCarthy-Fry) for her contribution and for the valuable experience in risk management and project management that she has brought to the Committee. I am also grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Tunbridge Wells (Greg Clark) for his powerful remarks about our work in controlling the para-state, as he put it, and those parts of the state that are not as accountable as they should be.

I am grateful for what the hon. Member for Burnley (Kitty Ussher) said about smart procurement. I say this to my hon. Friend the Member for Basingstoke (Mrs. Miller): it is true that we view ourselves, in our capacity as allies of the Treasury, as low-paid management consultants—paid much less than those employed by the Financial Secretary—but we do our best.

My hon. Friend the Member for Chipping Barnet (Mrs. Villiers) experienced her first outing on the Front Bench. Yesterday we had before us a permanent secretary with another 14 years to serve. I have no doubt that my hon. Friend will serve for at least 14 years with great distinction, in and out of Government. She spoke of delivering a 1 per cent. efficiency improvement—£14 billion of gains. That is a lot of money to play with.

Of course I also thank the Financial Secretary for what he said. I am very proud of our work. In an era of rapid increases in public expenditure we do not question what is being done, but I believe that we can make a difference. This is one part of Parliament that is doing a superb job.

I thank all who have contributed to this excellent debate.

Resolved,

That this House takes note of the 17th and the 20th to the 52nd Reports of the Committee of Public Accounts of Session 2003–04, the 1st to the 30th Reports of the Committee of Public Accounts of Session 2004–05, and the 1st to the 3rd, the 5th, 6th, 10th and 11th Reports and the First Special Report of the Committee of Public Accounts of Session 2005–06, and of the Treasury Minutes and the Northern Ireland Department of Finance and Personnel Memoranda on these Reports, Cm 6271, 6282, 6302, 6303, 6304, 6332, 6355, 6416, 6441, 6458, 6468, 6496, 6577, 6578, 6579, 6609, 6667, 6668, 6682, 6689, 6712 and 6724.

7.15 pm

Mike Penning (Hemel Hempstead) (Con): On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. I seek your advice and help for school children in my constituency. I think that there is cross-party support for our encouraging as many young people as possible to visit the Palace, but several schools in my constituency have told me that they will not organise visits any more because they are deterred by the cost of parking and difficulties caused by the anti-terrorism measures that have been adopted outside.

I contacted the office of the Mayor of London, which told me that the matter was not negotiable; the Palace would have to deal with it. I wonder whether you could use your good offices to help students and other children in my constituency to come to the Palace more, and to address the parking issue.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): It is obviously important for all young people, particularly students, to visit the House of Commons to see how we work, but that is not a matter directly for the Chair. It is, of course, a matter for the House authorities. The hon. Gentleman has put his comments firmly on record; no doubt the House authorities will think about them, and will decide what to do.

PETITION

Luton Airport

7.17 pm

Mr. Peter Lilley (Hitchin and Harpenden) (Con): I wish to present a petition opposing the massive expansion of Luton airport with two runways and two terminals, disgorging 30 million cars on to the roads of Hertfordshire. The petition has been signed by 7,710 local residents. There have also been 1,770 text messages and more than 1,000 letters, 250 of which arrived in today's post.

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons urge the Government to ensure that Luton airport remains a medium haul, medium sized airport and to refuse permission for plans to make it second only in capacity to Heathrow.

And the Petitioners remain, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Counterfeit Medicines

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Coaker.]

7.17 pm

Mr. Charles Walker (Broxbourne) (Con): The counterfeiting of drugs is a global problem. The World Health Organisation estimates that between 8 and 10 per cent. of the global medicine supply chain is counterfeit. That represents up to £20 billion worth of medicines.

In developing countries, up to 60 per cent. of public and private health expenses are used to buy medicines. The WHO estimates that 25 per cent. of those medicines are fake, and in some countries the figure could be as high as 40 per cent. In the world's poorest and most vulnerable communities, people are dying needlessly of AIDS and malaria. Counterfeiting hot spots include Mexico, Pakistan, India, China and Russia.

Counterfeits are dangerous for a variety of reasons. They may be contaminated, they may contain too much or too little of the active ingredient, or they may contain none at all. Counterfeits are totally different from generics. Generics must have the same bio-equivalence as the original patented drug; counterfeits are fakes, and often lethal fakes.

In China in 2003, nearly 1,000 drug-counterfeiting factories were closed and millions of fake drugs were seized. It is estimated that 100,000 Chinese people died that year as a result of taking counterfeit medicines.

In Africa, half of malaria medicines are thought to be fakes. In the west, drugs are normally finished and packaged to a higher standard. For that reason, it is almost impossible for patients and many professionals to see the difference between real and counterfeit medicines. In wealthier countries, the most frequently counterfeited medicines tend to be new, expensive lifestyle drugs. For example, it is estimated that half the Viagra sold over the internet is worthless.

The profits from pharmaceutical counterfeiting are huge and the risks lower than those involved in trafficking narcotics. Counterfeiting is linked to all forms of organised crime such as money laundering, drug trafficking, terrorism and other illegal activities. Distribution channels mirror those of the illegal drugs trade, and in many developing countries drugs often disappear into a black hole. Corruption is rife. Retroviral drugs sent to Africa at reduced prices are often intercepted by corrupt officials or gangs and sold back to Europe to be replaced by worthless copies in Africa.

As borders become more porous, the global trade is expanding. Counterfeiting is no longer a cottage industry; it is big business. Criminal gangs are so professional that they will buy the same manufacturing and packaging equipment as drug companies, allowing them to produce up to 50,000 tablets an hour.

Pharmaceutical products are attractive to criminal gangs because they are easily transportable and command a high price per unit. Profits from fake pharmaceuticals can be larger than those from narcotics such as heroin and cocaine. The added bonus for traffickers is that the trade carries a lower risk than that in narcotics because law enforcement agencies are perhaps not as aware of the problem.

The problem of illegal medicines needs to be handled carefully. Fortunately, in the UK, counterfeits remain extremely rare when sourcing is done through recognised pharmacies. The UK supply chain remains one of the most difficult to penetrate, with 600 million prescriptions written annually. However, in July last year, counterfeit Lipitor, a powerful cholesterol-busting drug, was discovered. The counterfeit was made to look like a UK pack and was traced by the Medicines and Healthcare products Regulatory Agency to two separate licensed UK wholesalers. Of course, the manufacturer of the genuine drug issued a total recall. Of those packs returned by pharmacists, however, more than 50 per cent. were found to be fake after being analysed.

Fifteen months earlier, in April 2004, detectives raided a warehouse near Wembley stadium and found a factory producing thousands of fake prescription medicines every day. Enough mixture was seized to make more than 20,000 tablets an hour—Viagra, steroids, tranquilisers and antidepressants. They were expertly packaged and labelled, and some active ingredients were present, but not the right ones.

When dealing with counterfeits, criminals are taking the long-term view. Fake drugs are offered at just below market price so as not attract attention and the continuing growth in counterfeiting comes when there is increasing concern about the integrity of the UK wholesale supply chain.

UK wholesalers are licensed by the MHRA, but gaining a licence is relatively easy. Those applying for licences are rarely asked to produce a passport, birth certificate or driving licence and it is even unclear whether a Criminal Records Bureau check is routinely undertaken. Against that background, the number of wholesale licences issued has risen tenfold in the past 12 years, providing additional entry points for counterfeits. Once a licence is granted, wholesalers can trade almost without restriction.

The growth in the number of wholesalers mirrors the growth in parallel trading. In recent years, a new market has emerged that has understandably seen the national health service and other purchasers exploit price differentials in medicines across the European Union. Each year, 140 million medicines are parallel traded across the EU of which perhaps 70 per cent. are destined for the UK. Parallel trade accounts for up to 20 per cent. of all prescription medicines sold in this country.

Medicines are sourced at the cheapest unit price across the EU, but, to comply with the language and packaging requirements of national markets, drugs are often repackaged and the seals broken. The growth in parallel trading means that, often, pharmaceutical products pass through the hands of multiple distributors, creating a highly fractured supply chain that can be accessed by determined counterfeiters.

A Bermuda triangle has been formed by parallel trade, counterfeits and online pharmacies. It is the growth of unregulated internet pharmacy that provides the best opportunity for counterfeit and illegally re-packaged medicines to enter the supply chain. The internet is like a sweetshop, except one can buy painkillers, tranquilisers and even methadone; indeed, one can buy methadone from hundreds of sites. Most online pharmacies are unregulated and will dispatch dangerous medicines without prescription. Many people, including patient groups, pharmacists and doctors, believe that online pharmacies represent a significant danger to those ordering prescriptions over the web.

There are now more than 2,300 sites selling drugs direct to the consumer. The five most advertised drugs are Viagra; Phentermine, a weight loss drug; Xenical, a weight loss drug; Propecia, a hair loss drug that would be lethal to women; and Adipex, a weight loss drug. Those sites are domiciled around the world but in almost all cases they are unlicensed to sell or prescribe prescription medicines.

Over the past six years, across the Atlantic, US drug enforcement agents have made 180 internet drug arrests but they know that they are just scratching the surface. Internet pharmacy sites are inexpensive to create and hard to shut down; up to 80 per cent. of drugs sold online are counterfeit.

The nature of this internet trade is frightening. A UK charity, the Depression Alliance, was able to buy prescription medicines for depression over the internet with a discount on bulk purchases; no consultation, no diagnosis, no prescription and no pharmacist. The Depression Alliance bought enough of a tricyclic antidepressant to kill eight people. Even after entering into online consultation that revealed that the potential buyer suffered from a pre-existing diabetic condition, self-harmed and repeatedly tried to commit suicide, the drug was still dispatched.

As I have said, this country still has a robust regulatory system. However, I am concerned that it may not be keeping pace with the emergence of a distribution channel that is tailor-made for sending counterfeit drugs to the UK. Of course, the last thing that we want is to create unnecessary panic. However, we need to accept that counterfeiting is a growing global problem fuelled by organised crime, unrestricted parallel trading and the growth of internet dispensing.

In the UK, internet pharmacies pose a growing threat to public health. They are largely unregulated; in the best case, these illegal pharmacies are dispensing sugar and, in the worst case, poison. I hope that as a result of this short debate the Government will take a good look at our regulatory system to see what measures can be taken to safeguard the public from this new and emerging threat.

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Jane Kennedy): I congratulate the hon. Member for Broxbourne (Mr. Walker) on securing this important debate, and on his informed and balanced assessment of the threats posed by counterfeit medicines. Compliments from Ministers to Opposition Members rarely enhance their careers, but they are merited in this case. I shall seek to reassure him and the House that I and the Government take a great interest in the issue.

I can assure the hon. Gentleman that the Government take the issue of counterfeit medicines extremely seriously. Counterfeit medicines are often unknown and can enter the market in many ways. Although not a new problem, the international nature of the pharmaceutical industry and of markets means that the manufacture and distribution of counterfeit medicines can present new opportunities to criminals who are growing in enterprise and sophistication. Indeed, trade in counterfeit medicines is now a global problem; the World Health Organisation estimates that up to 10 per cent of medicines worldwide may be counterfeit. As the hon. Gentleman suggested, an even higher proportion of medicines in poorer countries are thought to be counterfeit. This has obvious, and serious, consequences for public health and costs the pharmaceutical industry many billions of pounds annually.

The manufacture and distribution of counterfeit medicines is a real problem for countries where the regulatory framework is weakest, and the EU systems do provide substantial protection. Nevertheless, there is some evidence of counterfeit products being provided direct to UK customers in the UK by mail order, via the internet or on a personal basis. I certainly share the hon. Gentleman's and the public's concern about the availability of potentially counterfeit and unregulated medicines through these routes. They cannot be guaranteed for safety—as the hon. Gentleman described—quality or efficacy. While the UK's legitimate supply of medicines through pharmacies, hospitals and retailers is tightly controlled and internationally acknowledged as difficult to penetrate, I recognise that no supply chain can ever be completely secure. Proper regulation and robust inspection, surveillance and enforcement are constantly required to preserve the integrity of the market and to protect public health.

The Medicines and Healthcare products Regulatory Agency, to which the hon. Gentleman has rightly drawn attention, regulates the use of medicines in the UK. The MHRA is responsible for ensuring compliance within a comprehensive EU regulatory framework that imposes strict controls on the licensing, manufacture, sale, supply and advertising of medicines. That includes the licensing and inspection of all UK manufacturers, wholesale dealers and importers of medicines. The agency also inspects manufacturers in non-EU countries exporting to the UK. Controls on sale, supply and advertising of medicines direct to the public apply without distinction across all types of retail outlets—traditional and electronic.

The MHRA has developed an anti-counterfeiting strategy that builds on that regulatory framework and aims to minimise further the risk of counterfeit medicines reaching UK consumers and patients either on a personal basis or through the legitimate supply chain. For example, the agency will continue its enforcement role to ensure that counterfeiters are prosecuted and counterfeit products withdrawn from the market. It will extend its medicines surveillance scheme to sample and test medicines across the whole supply chain. It continues to develop its inspection functions to ensure that all its inspectors are trained in up-to-date counterfeit inspection methods and techniques. It will maintain a close working relationship with industry to ensure that regulators and manufacturers continue to work effectively together to combat the counterfeiters. It has developed an education programme targeted at all key stakeholders to raise awareness of counterfeit medicines and of what to do if such medicines are discovered or suspected. It will, of course, constantly keep the legislation and its operation under review.

[Jane Kennedy]

The hon. Gentleman raised concerns about the integrity of the UK wholesale supply chain and the procedures for gaining wholesale dealer licences. His concerns echo recent media interest in the issue. Let me put it in context. There are currently 1,600 wholesale dealers' licences, and a comprehensive system is in place to control those. Once granted a licence, wholesale dealers are subject to repeated inspections, both planned and unannounced. Nevertheless, the MHRA has examined its procedures and will introduce further safeguards to check the bona fides of named individuals on wholesalers' licenses.

The hon. Gentleman also referred to parallel importation as a possible source for counterfeit medicines, which has been drawn to my attention on several occasions. Currently, there is little evidence in the UK that the repackaging processes of parallel trade have been the route for introducing counterfeit medicines into the legitimate supply chain, but I have asked the MHRA to continue to monitor the situation and to take appropriate action if there is evidence that that is the case. If there is such evidence, I would be more than happy to see it.

Sale of medicines direct to the public presents a different challenge, especially given the global nature of the internet. It is certainly true that some websites offering medicines belong to unscrupulous vendors, some of which the hon. Gentleman described. Many of those vendors sell unlicensed and prescription-only medicines and some sell counterfeit drugs that are potentially harmful. That is particularly true of so-called lifestyle drugs, such as those to which he drew attention—medicines aimed at male impotence, slimming products or hair loss products. We are keen to ensure that the public make informed choices about their health, and they need to be aware that products purchased in that way cannot be guaranteed for safety, quality or efficacy.

I should say at this point that the bona fide internet pharmacies must be operated from pharmacy premises that are registered through the Royal Pharmaceutical Society of Great Britain. Consumers are always advised to consult the RPSGB online register before purchasing medicine via the internet. The MHRA will not hesitate in taking appropriate enforcement action over illegal supply over the internet. It is currently investigating 103 cases involving internet sales and has prosecuted 12 cases since 2000.

Mr. Walker: Does the Minister feel that there will be a role for Customs to be alert to the threat of medicines being imported into the UK once the order is made?

Jane Kennedy: My experience of such organised crime—there is no question but that, as the hon. Gentleman rightly points out, it is organised crime—is that the more co-ordination and sharing of information there is between law enforcement agencies and, in this case, the MHRA, the more effective the outcome will be. I take his point on board and will look to ensure that co-ordination is as good as it can be, including with Customs where necessary.

Given the uncontrolled nature of the internet, and the fact that many sites will be based abroad, as the hon. Gentleman described, a key aim is to ensure that the public understand the risks of buying medicines from such sites and are warned against them. The MHRA has an active campaign to educate the public on issues associated with the purchase of medicines on the internet. That includes regular information and advice, targeted to specific sectors of the population or in respect of specific products, and delivered through its website and the media to ensure that consumers can make fully informed decisions about their health.

As I said earlier, counterfeit medicine is a global issue and is of global concern. It is under active discussion in a range of international forums, particularly within the EU, the Council of Europe and the World Health Organisation. The MHRA takes an active part in all those discussions and, particularly during the recent UK presidency, has been leading the debate on an EU strategy to combat counterfeit medicines. It will continue to do that.

On a practical level, the MHRA liaises regularly with other regulatory and enforcement agencies at home and abroad to conduct joint investigations, to exchange expertise and experience and to share knowledge and intelligence. That will also continue. For example, the hon. Gentleman may be interested to hear that the MHRA is leading a Europe-wide Tamiflu counterfeit surveillance project, and he may be aware that the MHRA recently carried out a large seizure of suspect Tamiflu in London, confiscating some 6,800 packets of the medicine representing a retail value in excess of £1 million.

The MHRA is also co-ordinating a training programme to deliver training for European partners through the EU medicines enforcement officers network and the Council of Europe. We hope to extend such accredited training through the Permanent Forum on International Pharmaceutical Crime, which includes drug regulatory authorities from the EU, the United States, Australia, South Africa and Singapore.

It is clear that the problem of counterfeit medicines is of growing concern. If it grows unchecked and is not combated effectively, it may become an increasing threat to public health. We cannot afford to let that happen and I have asked the MHRA to continue to treat that as a priority and to keep me regularly informed on progress in its work in this area.

I am particularly pleased to have had the opportunity to report to the House in my response to the debate. I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for allowing me to consider what he was going to say, so that I could respond as fully as possible. I hope that the House will be reassured that we take what he said seriously and are working hard to ensure that we combat that threat.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty-one minutes to Eight o'clock.

Westminster Hall

Tuesday 10 January 2006

[MRS. JOAN HUMBLE in the Chair]

NHS Dentistry

Motion made and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Watson.]

Mrs. Joan Humble: I call Philip Hollobone to commence our first Westminster Hall debate in Room 10.

9.30 am

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): Thank you, Mrs. Humble, and a happy new year to you and other hon. Members. I thank Mr. Speaker for granting us permission to hold this important debate on NHS dentistry, the Minister for attending and those hon. Members who intend to contribute. I thank also Dr. Alisdair McKendrick, a local dentist in Kettering and the Northamptonshire representative of the British Dental Association, with whom I have had many discussions during recent months. I wish also to thank all the dentists in my constituency of Kettering who provide an extremely professional and enthusiastic service to many thousands of local residents.

There is a major crisis in NHS dentistry not only in Kettering, but throughout the country. That is a particular shame because in 2000, just over five years ago, the Prime Minister promised that everyone would have access to an NHS dentist within two years. I regret to say that that was all talk. Throughout the country, particularly in Kettering, fewer people are registered with an NHS dentist than was the case seven years ago. According to Government figures published in response to a parliamentary question that I tabled, since 2002, almost 7,000 local residents in the Kettering constituency have been thrown off the list of NHS dentists. Fewer people are registered with an NHS dentist in the constituency than at any time since the Government came to power.

Indeed, throughout the county of Northamptonshire, only 47 per cent. of local residents are registered with an NHS dentist.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hollobone: I will, after I have read out a letter from a constituent—one of the victims who has been thrown off the NHS list. Last September, Katherine Clay from Channing street, Kettering, wrote:

"Dear Mr Hollobone . . . I am writing to make you aware of the appalling situation where it is impossible to get an NHS Dentist.

I have been registered with my dentist for a while as an NHS patient and have kept up my regular appointments. This week I received a letter saying that I was now being removed from their list and if I still wanted to receive NHS treatment I would have to find another dentist."

Mrs. Clay goes on to say:

"As far as I was aware Britain has a National Health Service—that is a free, or subsidised medical service. Increasingly this is no longer the case. People are being forced into paying for medical insurance out of the fear of not being able to get treatment when they need it, or the frustration of having to wait for long periods of time, often in pain, for routine or vital operations.

I am a single person on a reasonable income but with having to pay a mortgage etc I find that I would be in a difficult position had I to pay a monthly premium for dental treatment that I would perhaps never need (and pay on top when I did actually visit the dentist)."

Sadly, Katherine Clay's experiences are all too typical in the Kettering constituency.

David Taylor: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way. That was indeed a long extract from the letter of a constituent. In North-West Leicestershire and the county of Leicestershire, about half the people are not registered with NHS dentists, but Labour Members are fed up to the back teeth with being held responsible for all of what has happened in relation to NHS dentistry. In 1992, less than 10 per cent. of dentists' income came from private patients, but now more than 50 per cent. does, so the hon. Gentleman's party bears some responsibility. Yes, we are almost in our 10th year of government, but it takes time to train dentists and his party closed a number of courses.

Mr. Hollobone: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for that intervention. I do not know whether he heard my introductory remarks, but I quoted his own Prime Minister as pledging to the people of this nation that everyone would have access to an NHS dentist within two years. Three years on from the pledge, that is patently not the case.

Tony Baldry (Banbury) (Con): The previous intervention demonstrates the complacency of Labour Members, who are trying to shuffle the blame on to something that happened 10 years ago.

My hon. Friend said that nearly half the people in Northamptonshire have access to NHS dentists, but in Oxfordshire the situation is considerably worse. Only a third of NHS dentists—43 out of 121—are accepting new children on to the lists. Worse than that, many other dentists are accepting children who are entitled to free NHS dental care only if their parents join their list but pay to go privately. That is monstrous. Large numbers of our constituents can get NHS dental care for their children only if they themselves are obliged to pay a monthly private subscription. NHS dentistry, under this Government, is dead.

Mr. Hollobone: I am most grateful for that intervention, which is similar to the point that Dr. Alisdair McKendrick was making on BBC Radio Northampton this morning. Adults not being able to find an NHS dentist is distressing enough, but it is particularly distressing when children do not have access to the free dental care that all of us would want them to receive. Of course, most dental decay is preventable and especially so in young children. Sadly, under the current regime, thousands of children are not getting the dental service that they deserve.

The organisation Which?, which has done a lot of survey work on dentistry, published a survey in January 2005 that questioned 2,000 adults across Great

[Mr. Hollobone]

Britain. The findings are extremely interesting: nine out of 10 people believe that the Government should ensure NHS dental treatment for everyone whenever they need it; 55 per cent. of people who tried to register with an NHS dentist in the last two years said that they had found that difficult; two thirds of people think it is harder now to register with an NHS dentist for regular care and check-ups than five years ago; only 15 per cent. of people think that the Government are taking enough action to improve NHS dentistry provision; only 13 per cent. believe that the Government are giving enough funding to NHS dentistry; and 58 per cent. agree that dental care costs too much even when provided by the NHS.

David Taylor: The Chamber would benefit from a more complete quote from the Which? survey, which at least reported with approval that some action was being taken to improve access to dentistry: the recruitment of more dentists from overseas, expanding the number of training places for dentists and providing dental access centres. The report was not entirely doom and gloom, even a year ago, was it?

Mr. Hollobone: No, it is not all doom and gloom, but it is pretty gloomy out there. I would suggest that the hon. Gentleman might like to spend rather more time talking to thousands of his constituents who are suffering from a lack of access to NHS dental care. He and his colleagues ought to take the issue far more seriously than the interventions heretofore suggest.

There are two fundamental problems with NHS dentistry. The first is an appalling lack of Government investment. To be fair, that is not entirely down to this Government, as the trend has gone on for far too long, although it is accelerating under the current regime. According to the National Audit Office, since 1990–91, overall spending on the NHS has gone up by 75 per cent., but overall spending on NHS dentistry has gone up by just 9 per cent. I am afraid that we are beginning to see the result of that lack of investment, which is being accelerated under this Government.

The other problem is that the contracts offered by the Department of Health to dentists for working as NHS employees are not attractive enough to retain them. This is a question not just of remuneration, but of the work load with which dentists have to struggle and the amount of quality time they can offer their patients.

One of the big myths is that dentists' main motivation for staying in the private sector is that they can earn more. That is certainly not the motivation for dentists in Kettering who leave the NHS. They are leaving because the new contracts offered to them do not reward them for the work, and the quality of work, that they want to offer their patients. I am afraid that as a result, despite the pledges, an important part of the health service is being privatised. There is no getting away from that.

The Government need to consider different ways to encourage the establishment of new dental practices. A gentleman from my constituency has approached me with a very innovative scheme to set up a new dental practice in Kettering, but because he is not a dentist he is finding it very difficult to get the appropriate funding and permission.

Philip Davies (Shipley) (Con): I am incredibly grateful to my hon. Friend, who is being generous in giving way. He is summing up the problems of NHS dentistry in an articulate and expert manner.

The point that my hon. Friend has just made is perfectly good. In Shipley, I have the same problem. Mr. Bostock, a local man, wants to set up an NHS dental practice and import dentists from other countries to run it, yet is unable to do so because he is not a dentist. He does not want to put his equipment into people's mouths—he is happy to employ experts to do that—but he is prevented from setting up the practice because he is not a dentist. Surely that anomaly should be addressed immediately. I have written to the Government about the issue, which provides a perfect example of what could be done quickly to help resolve the crisis in NHS dentistry.

Mr. Hollobone: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's intervention and distressed to learn that his constituent in Shipley is suffering from the same problems as my constituent in Kettering. I urge the Government and the Minister to give us some hope that the regulations on establishing new dental practices will be changed forthwith.

John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): I can tell my hon. Friend that his concern about the prospects of retaining skilled dentists in the national health service will resonate with large numbers of professionals in constituencies urban and rural across the country.

I am a relatively near neighbour of my hon. Friend, and in my constituency a prominent and respected dentist, Lynda Raybould, is anxious that the combination of the rigidities of the new contract, the work load envisaged and the remuneration promised will cumulatively cause her to have to reconsider her position as an NHS dentist unless the Government, at the 59th minute after the eleventh hour, are humble and wise enough to think again.

Mr. Hollobone: I am most grateful for that illuminating intervention, although I am sorry to learn of the experiences of my hon. Friend's constituent. He will realise that, under this Government, that situation, sadly, is all too typical for many of our local hard-working dentists, who want to work for the NHS, but find that the contracts offered by the Government are simply not attractive enough.

In highlighting the problem of the lack of NHS dentists in Kettering, I urge the Minister to look favourably on proposals for a new dental school in the Leicestershire-Northamptonshire area and on the bid made by the university of Leicester and the local strategic health authority, which are keen to set up a new facility for training dentists in the local area. I believe that a decision on that is due this month. One never knows; perhaps the Minister will give us some good news today.

Mr. Russell Brown (Dumfries and Galloway) (Lab): I apologise for arriving late, Mrs. Humble. The hon. Gentleman makes a plea for another dental school to be opened. Is he saying that a mistake was made under the Conservative Government when dental schools across the country were closed?

Mr. Hollobone: I am simply trying to hold the Government to account for the pledge that they made five years ago to ensure that everyone has access to an NHS dentist—a pledge that remains unfulfilled three years on from the target date.

A new dental school in the Leicestershire and Northamptonshire area would go a long way to relieving the local NHS dental crisis. Under the proposals, up to 80 students a year would go to the new dental school. Four oral health academies would be established, two of which would be in Northamptonshire, and each one would treat up to 10,000 patients. In view of the crisis in dentistry in Northamptonshire, I hope that the Government will look favourably on that bid.

I stress that unless urgent measures are taken to support new dental schools and new NHS dental practices in Northamptonshire, the problem will get far worse. That is because, under the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister's housing expansion scheme for Kettering and Northamptonshire, there will be a growth in local population of between 30 and 50 per cent. by 2031. I do not claim to be an expert in mathematics, but if the population numbers go up by between 30 and 50 per cent., we will need at least 30 to 50 per cent. more dentists. Under the proposed contract arrangements, that simply will not happen in Kettering or Northamptonshire.

Finally, I make a plea to Health Ministers to visit Kettering to talk to local dentists' patients, dentists and the primary care trust about the dental crisis there. I invited the Minister of State, Department of Health, the hon. Member for Doncaster, Central (Ms Winterton), to Kettering, and she wrote back:

"Unfortunately, because of my diary commitments, I will not be able to accept your invitation to visit Kettering to discuss these issues further."

That was at the end of September. I have since learned that she will indeed come to Kettering on another matter on 7 March. I very much hope that she can spare us an hour of her valuable time to talk about the extent of this real problem in Kettering. My hon. Friend the Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Bone) and I also wrote to her asking to talk to her about dentists and other health service issues in Kettering and Wellingborough. A meeting was set up for 15 December, but was cancelled with three days' notice.

People in Kettering want the Government to take their concerns about the NHS seriously. Today's debate is an opportunity for the Government to show that they are listening to what local people have to say. I look forward to the Minister providing reassurance that he understands the scale of the problem in Kettering, and I hope that he will give concrete answers that provide the solutions that local people want.

9.49 am

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): I am delighted to be here at the start of the new year, and happy new year to you, Mrs. Humble. I am not sure whether this Chamber will change the nature of these debates, but I fear that we have started with a slightly more adversarial issue.

I should tell the hon. Member for Kettering (Mr. Hollobone) that I share many of his worries. We Labour Members are not complacent about the issue. I wrote to a dentist in my constituency yesterday, and this is probably the most difficult issue that I face there. I am largely an optimist, and always try to look at the best side of things, but in my eight years as MP for Stroud, the most difficult meeting that I have had was with my dentists in the town of Stroud. However, that does not necessarily reflect the situation in the whole constituency. In that meeting, I was completely disabused of what I went into the meeting thinking would come out of it—that is, reaffirmation of a belief in NHS dentistry. Most of those dentists had gone private, some entirely so, and they made things clear to me.

I welcome the Under-Secretary of State for Health, my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Byrne), and I will be gentle with him because this matter is not part of his brief. I have already raised it with the Minister of State, Department of Health, my hon. Friend the Member for Doncaster, Central (Ms Winterton). Those dentists made it clear that they did not really see any future in NHS dentistry, certainly not NHS dentistry as I take it to be. The meeting took place two years ago, at the start of the negotiations on the new contract, and the dentists saw the negotiations as setting a benchmark in relation to which they would improve their conditions. I got depressed as a result of that meeting. It is always a delight to see the hon. Member for Mole Valley (Sir Paul Beresford), and no doubt he will give us his view as a practitioner.

I will give an overview of my area. I live in a constituency that could be parodied as including this country's Berlin wall, in that it is divided. In the south of my constituency, most dentists are NHS. They believe in NHS dentistry and want to stay in the NHS. Those in the north, who are mainly based in and around the town of Stroud, have gone private. I do not know how we can bring them back. I have to hope that the new contract will assist with that, but there are difficult times ahead.

One of my dentists, Mr. Richard Gwyer, wrote to me and raised an issue, which I will raise in a series of questions to my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary, concerning the three new bands and what my constituent sees as a tax, although I do not see it that way. He thinks that there is an inflation of charges—a dramatic inflation of some charges. There has been a conflation of the different charges in this system, which I do not think anyone, including dentists, can understand because there are so many. Charges for some operations that dentists undertake will go up and some will go down, but some increases will be dramatic.

The other thing that utterly depressed me was the way that some dentists used the threat of deregistering children as an inducement to the parents to stay with them and to sign up to their particular private plan, whether it be Denplan or something else. I do not think that that approach is acceptable. One of the depressing things about the issue is that it involves people who were trained and paid for by the NHS, because in those days there were no tuition fees. Such people have an obligation to the NHS.

One thing that I would lay down—this has not yet been formally proposed—is that anyone who goes through dental school as a UK citizen should have an obligation, whether in the form of a contract or not, to do a number of years for the NHS come what may. That should be laid down to recoup some of the substantial investment that is made in training dentists. I hope that the Government take the issue forward.

Sir Paul Beresford (Mole Valley) (Con): If the hon. Gentleman wants a brain drain and an exodus of dentists, following his suggestion is the way to do it.

Mr. Drew: We always have the threat of people going, but perhaps the hon. Gentleman is a good example of people who come here from different parts of the world. The reality is that something must be given back, at least in the early days of the training. For that, I would commute fees and give substantial help during the training period, so there would be some inducement. There is an obligation on people who work within the state to pay something back to it.

As one who takes a keen interest in this matter, I am somewhat confused as to where the contractual negotiations have got to. I have some sympathy with Health Ministers, inasmuch as I do not know where the British Dental Association has got to. Having welcomed the proposals initially, it has become increasingly critical of them. There do not seem to be any face-to-face negotiations at the moment, although those are vital. I agree with the hon. Member for Kettering that this crisis cannot be resolved only by inducement or by Government heavy-handedness.

We went along the inducement line with regard to GP contracts. Anyone who knows anything about the financial problems faced by primary care trusts knows that a lot of them have to do with how we have bought out GPs—lock, stock and barrel—who are doing incredibly well out of the new contractual arrangements. I put my hands up and say that perhaps it had to be that way, because the same threat of people leaving the NHS would have been advanced if we had not been very generous, but we have been more than very generous. My friends who are GPs are telling me, somewhat guardedly, that they have done well out of those arrangements. We must be careful not to make some of the same mistakes.

Mr. Graham Stuart (Beverley and Holderness) (Con): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the GP contract has been a failure because of the massive cost? The contract has been overly generous and helps explain how the Government have managed to increase NHS expenditure enormously, yet deliver no more for it. Does he not think that that has also happened with GPs?

Mr. Drew: Expenditure on GPs is relatively small, compared with the overall NHS budget, but I have some sympathy with what the hon. Gentleman says. Learning from history and hindsight, the changes could have been made differently.

The problem is that GPs look at people such as dentists: the hon. Gentleman is right—this is not just about money, it is about the quality of life—but those two things go together. If people get more money, they can to some extent determine their quality of life and quality of working patterns much more easily. I am afraid that GPs have considered dentists and there was, among some, a view that there was life outside the NHS.

I shall return to my questions, although I do not want to speak for long because other hon. Members want to contribute to this important debate. It would be helpful if the Department ran a briefing session on charges with MPs—or at least made it clear what the three bands consist of—and justified the enormous operation inflation, where that has happened. Dentists raised with me the additional costs of dentures, which seem to have led to a dramatic increase. Likewise, it would be helpful if the Department gave some proof of which charges have decreased, given that the overall sum involved seems to have been reduced.

There is also the issue of those who have taken part in personal dental services contracts. There does not seem to have been a seamless move from the old contract to the new. We are changing the nature of the contract in respect of units of dental activity, but if we are to gain anything from the dental service contracts, we need to recognise those loyal servants of the NHS in dentistry, who have worked hard.

I name, among others, Steve Clarke, who runs a big practice in Dursley in my constituency and who has made clear his commitment not just to stay in the NHS, but to train new NHS dentists. He wants to build his practice and see NHS dentistry flourish there. The question is, how is someone who has been on a professional dental service contract, worked through with the PCT, to do that? I also need to mention Chris Morton, the operative in the PCT with whom I have had a lot of dealings. I am thankful to the Minister of State, because we got an additional dentist into the practice through the work of Chris Morton, but I am not sure how PDS translates into the new contract.

There is also the issue of list sizes, which relates to one of the sticking points in getting some help for my dentist, David Rees. There was a problem with how the Department defines list sizes. With the best will in the world, particularly if someone joins a new practice from abroad, the idea that a dentist can immediately step up to some of these numbers is not necessarily a good one. I know that there is a notion that dentists can have a list of about 2,000, but the Department was somewhat unrealistic in considering how quickly a dentist, particularly one from abroad, could take on the numbers necessary to make the figures balance.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary will take up those issues, although, as I said, this is not his brief. The issue is crucial, however, and I hope that all sides will work together. I hope that the BDA comes back to the negotiating table and, in a sense, becomes more representative of dentists. I am having a go not at the BDA, but at what has happened to dentistry. Dentistry has moved away from being represented by a collective body because many dentists have chosen to go along the private route. I want them back in the NHS.

Dentistry is part of the NHS. Dentists have always had some private aspects to their work—even people who work almost exclusively for the NHS have done some private work—but, in the main, dentistry should be an NHS provision and it should be carried out by NHS providers.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mrs. Joan Humble (in the Chair): Order. Several Members wish to be called. We have about half an hour before I want to call the Front-Bench spokespersons. May I make a plea to Members to keep contributions short? That will enable me to call as many Members as wish to speak.

10.2 am

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): Thank you, Mrs. Humble. It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew), who made some important points. I am thinking particularly of his questions, especially those relating to charges, which I will touch on later. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Kettering (Mr. Hollobone) on securing the debate. As usual, his diligence and hard work shone through in his comments. Yet again, he is campaigning on an issue that is vital to his constituency.

As a fellow Northamptonshire Member of Parliament, I recognise and agree with the points that my hon. Friend made. NHS dentistry has reached crisis point. That is never more apparent than in my constituency. If my constituents want an NHS dentist, they have to travel outside the county, to Bedfordshire. In effect, dentistry in Wellingborough has been privatised.

Rushden is one of the major towns in my constituency, and 20 years ago there were eight dentists serving the town and surrounding villages. Now there is only one NHS dentist. In that particular dental surgery, there used to be four practising NHS dentists, with more than 10,000 NHS patients. Now there is only one, and his practice is full to capacity with 4,000 NHS patients. He is not taking on any new NHS patients. How can that be called progress? Yesterday, I did a survey of dental practices in my constituency. Of the 11 contacted, how many do Members think are taking on new NHS patients? None.

What is to blame for the privatisation of dentistry? In my constituency, and countrywide, it is not the dentists themselves. Dentists who have practised under the NHS find themselves drowned in bureaucracy and red tape. One dentist I spoke to told me that he felt more like an administrator than a practising dentist. Is that any wonder when we look at the long-winded, bureaucratic contract that NHS dentists have to sign up to and abide by? NHS dentists are frustrated that they are forced to use outdated equipment and techniques on NHS patients. I repeat that, in Wellingborough, dentistry has effectively been privatised. That has happened for a reason. The Government are unable to trust people. They are unable to trust trained professionals, who are hindered in carrying out the jobs that they know so well by being drowned in bureaucracy and central control.

The Government's need to micro-manage and control everything has led to that crisis in NHS dentistry. Their control and state planning have more in common with Stalin's Russia than a democratic, free-enterprise country in the 21st century. [Laughter.] Labour Members may laugh, but it is true.

From April 2006, the Government shall give primary care trusts a ring-fenced dentistry budget that represents the intended minimum investment in primary dental care services. That minimum investment will be subject to Government conditions on how the money can be spent; it will not be left to the professionals to decide. The Government show all the worst aspects of state planning. They give to dentistry the least amount that they think they can get away with, and then decide that they must know every single detail about how the money will be spent. The Government's need to know everything, without trusting the professionals, has led to the privatisation of dentistry in Wellingborough.

Susan Kramer (Richmond Park) (LD): Is the hon. Gentleman aware that in my constituency, providers of highly specialised dental services, particularly orthodontic services, face exactly the problem that he describes? Budget pressures will squeeze them out of providing the range of services that people have historically expected. The providers' issues were neglected during the recent discussions with the Government on NHS dental provision.

Mr. Bone: I appreciate that intervention; it represents exactly what I have found in my constituency.

I am concerned that the people who are hit worst by the change are those on low incomes. Hard-working families who have paid their taxes and national insurance find that they are unable to receive NHS dental treatment. They have to find the money for private treatment or go without.

Many dentists require families to take out dental insurance, and an average family has to pay about £60 a month. The money has to come out of taxed income. For better-off families, that is an irritation and yet another stealth tax, but for those on low incomes, of whom there are many in my constituency, an additional £60 out of taxed income is a colossal cost and it causes real hardship. I am afraid that this is just another example of new Labour's agenda: its stealth taxes hit the poorest and most vulnerable in the community the hardest, which is a disgrace. It probably would not have happened under old Labour, and it certainly would not have happened under the Conservatives.

The situation is about to get much, much worse, not only for those who are unable to get an NHS dentist, but for existing NHS patients, as the hon. Member for Stroud mentioned. From April, NHS patients who pay £6.20 for a filling will have to pay £42.40 for the same filling. The cost, which comes from my local dentist, is seven times more expensive than at present, or, if one likes, a 684 per cent. increase. I hope the Minister tells me that my dentist has got it wrong, but somehow I doubt it. That is even more expensive than having the filling done privately. If that is not privatisation on a huge scale, I do not know what is.

I have another example. The cost of a partial denture will go up from £49 to £189—a 382 per cent. increase. That is unacceptable and it defies belief, yet the situation is set to get much worse. For many people, going to a dentist will become a luxury, not a necessity. The vulnerable, disadvantaged and those on low incomes will suffer the most under the new system. Owing to the Government's obsessive need to micro-manage NHS dentistry, the service is practically non-existent in my constituency.

I have come to the conclusion that the only way to rectify the situation is to have a Conservative Government. The Conservatives ran NHS dentistry for many years while in government, and my constituents never had a problem finding an NHS dentist. This Government have destroyed NHS dentistry in Wellingborough, which has hit vulnerable families the most. They should be ashamed of themselves. They should admit their mistakes, scrap the new dental contract and go back to providing proper NHS dentistry for the people of Wellingborough and the people of this country.

10.10 am

Paul Rowen (Rochdale) (LD): I thank the hon. Member for Kettering (Mr. Hollobone) for raising this issue. It is important and, as several other hon. Members have said, NHS dentistry is certainly in crisis. While NHS issues have come and gone under this Government, the problems of dentistry have got worse. I fear that despite the new contracts—I hope the Minister will give us some assurance on those—things will not get any better.

The issue of expenditure has been raised. NHS dentistry accounts for only 3 per cent. of the NHS bill and its cost has risen a lot less in real terms than that of other areas of the health service. Unless the Government are prepared to offer commitment to and investment in NHS dentistry, there will continue to be a drift away from the NHS to privatisation. That is shown clearly in my constituency, where 58 per cent. of the population were registered with an NHS dentist in 1997. In March last year, the figure had fallen to 38 per cent. During the last-but-one Health questions, I asked whether the Minister of State, Department of Health, the hon. Member for Doncaster, Central (Ms Winterton), considered that progress. She admitted that it was not good progress. I wrote to her requesting a meeting, but have yet to receive an answer.

The situation is getting worse. This year, not in Rochdale, but in Langley in the constituency of Heywood and Middleton, and in the Radcliffe area of the Bury, North constituency, my constituents queued from 4 am to get on a registered list. That is not acceptable; it is completely deplorable. The body blow came over Christmas when the Balderstone practice, the last remaining NHS-only dentist in Rochdale, announced that it will withdraw completely from NHS dentistry from 1 April—the same day that the Government's newfangled contract starts. Every one of those four dentists' patients received a letter over Christmas informing them that they must look elsewhere.

I shall quote from one of the dentists at that practice because, as the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) pointed out, whatever the Government have said—they keep going on about what the new contract will do—the message is not getting to dentists, and more and more of them are voting with their feet.

Susan Kramer: To reinforce my hon. Friend's point, in my constituency of Richmond Park, one of the longest-standing and largest NHS practices, the Garden dental centre in Kew, announced in November that it would go private and no longer do NHS work. We have worked with local constituents to find an alternative NHS dentist, but we have yet to record a single success in finding them an opportunity to register with a new NHS dentist. This is a withdrawal of services, not even a shift from one dentist to another.

Paul Rowen: I agree—not one dentist in my constituency has opened its list for NHS patients. The dentist at the Balderstone surgery, John Booth, who has been a dentist for 14 years, said that "it has got to the point where we are having to see up to 50 patients each a day. We're just herding them through."

I accept that that happened under the old contract, but, importantly, this is what he says about the new contract:

"The new contract does focus on prevention which means spending more time with patients but more talking means less work".

The subtext to that is less money, for which nobody will vote.

The Minister says that for two years the amount of money that dentists get will remain the same, but that will not solve the problem, nor will it bring more dentists into the system. My local PCT told me that another eight dentists are needed in my constituency, but we are not getting them. Unless the Government can do something to bring dentists into the system, things will go from bad to worse.

I would like the Minister to consider three issues, and I am surprised that new Labour is not considering the first. It seems that there can be privatisation everywhere else in the NHS. My mother, a 73-year-old pensioner, no longer has a dentist, and many people do not see a dentist regularly. Why cannot the Government, on a short-term basis, buy in the services of some private dentists to cope with the problem?

The amount of money under the new contracts was announced before Christmas, and, as the regulations have been prayed against, we shall be discussing the figures. I am concerned about whether the money allocated will be historical and whether it will do something to address areas such as Rochdale and Wigan, which the Minister has admitted are black spots for dental provision. Will more money be allocated to those areas to ensure that local PCTs can provide more dentists?

In July last year, the Greater Manchester strategic health authority stopped allowing new personal dental services contracts, which meant that three dentists in my constituency who wanted to open a practice were not able to do so. I want assurances from the Minister that there will be not just this contract, but long-term investment in dentistry and, as the hon. Member for Stroud said, real commitment to NHS dentistry. If the Government will not provide that, they may as well admit to doing what the Conservatives would do anyway and privatise things. [Interruption.] I am sorry, but the Conservatives' record is not one that I can condone.

If the Government believe in NHS dentistry, there must be commitment. Yes, we had a promise from the Prime Minister in September 1999, but it is yet to be delivered. In my book, two years—from 1999 to now—represents an awfully long time on the new Labour clock.

10.17 am

Mr. Russell Brown (Dumfries and Galloway) (Lab): I apologise again to colleagues for arriving late. I shall be brief. I thank the hon. Member for Kettering (Mr. Hollobone) for securing this debate. We all look back to the good old days of dentistry, but dentistry has moved on. I have heard the hon. Member for Mole Valley (Sir Paul Beresford) refer to that. Cosmetic dentistry is only one additional aspect of dentistry, which has gone way beyond the drill-and-fill and extractions of the past.

As colleagues are aware, dentistry, like all other NHS matters, is devolved in Scotland, and as far as I am concerned this issue rests with the Scottish Parliament, but it is just as well to share with hon. Members exactly what is happening north of the border. I take no consolation from the fact that my area is the second worst in this respect in the whole of Scotland. Only Aberdeenshire fares worse than Dumfries and Galloway.

It is right to say that not all dentists are the same. People's hearts lie in different areas, and some people still work hard within the NHS. I have never been one who has advocated that the NHS system that we have all grown to love over many years is in any shape or form right for today. In each of the last three weeks before the general election, a dental practice in my constituency went private, and I had to ask whether something political was going on. The Scottish Parliament's Minister with responsibility for dentistry was to visit a dental practice on the Tuesday. On the Saturday morning, the patients of that dental practice received a letter stating that a new, exciting and innovative service was being introduced for them.

Many people whose dental practices have gone private have received such a letter. This was a long letter containing complaints about everything that was wrong. There were complaints about Governments—not just this Government—and at the end of the letter the patients were informed that if they wanted to sign up to the new service that the practice would be running, they should bring their bank details with them.

This is all about the laws of economics—about supply and demand. Some people have seized upon that. I have been condemned in my local press by certain individuals for calling dentists greedy, but I stand by those comments as some dentists have become too greedy. If we were to ask some retired dentists about what is going on across the country, they would shudder. They would never have carried out their business—we must keep it in mind that these are private businesses—in such a manner. People are being turned on to the street and asked to queue.

Mr. Graham Stuart: Is it not typical of this Government that, having made unequivocal promises to the British people on NHS dentistry, they turn around and try to blame independent contractors—dentists? To call dentists greedy is nothing short of a disgrace. They are dedicated professionals, and it is up to the Government to meet their promises by providing a framework that encourages those professionals to do what they all train to do. They are all committed to helping the people of this country.

Mr. Brown: I am not sure whether I was right to take that intervention, but I will back up my claim about greed to the hon. Gentleman. It is only of late—and with some reluctance, I think—that the British Dental Association has condemned the practice of some dentists of turning people out on to the street and asking them to queue for hours to sign up.

I appreciate that this is not part of the Minister's brief, but I am not convinced that the new NHS dental contract will provide solutions to the problems that we face. Dumfries and Galloway health board has turned to an organisation called Integrated Dental Holdings to provide NHS dentists for the area I represent, albeit those dentists will come from overseas. The board turned to IDH because it has operated in Shropshire for the past seven or eight years. In seeking information on IDH, I turned to two of the four Conservative Members whose constituencies are served by Shropshire county primary care trust. They told me that they had a problem in 1997, and the hon. Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson) said that he got a significant haranguing in the run-up to the general election of that year. IDH came along and provided a service that meets the needs of the people of the area, and I hope that it will provide answers to some problems that my area faces.

The hon. Member for Rochdale (Paul Rowen) asked why the Government do not buy into what is happening. Dumfries and Galloway health board approached some dental practices that have gone private, and it would take a king's ransom to get any of them to do any NHS work. The cost would be exorbitant in the extreme—almost a waste of money in trying to get them back on board.

I use the word "greed" because this matter boils down to the fact that different dental practices in different parts of the country operate different payment systems. I have spoken to colleagues in the House. Some said, "You [illegible]am with a private dental practice, and I pay for my treatment when I receive it." Others are signed up to a dental plan, which they pay for monthly. They do not have to pay for treatment when they receive it. However, I have to tell you, Mrs. Humble, that in my area the vast majority of dentists ask people to make a monthly payment of between £12 and £22, and they are then asked to pay for their dental treatment on top.

I ask the Minister to consider a simple calculation: if a dental practice asks people to pay £12 a month and takes on 1,000 patients, that equates to more than £140,000 a year. Even if the best part of a third of that is offset, that dentist will receive £100,000 per annum on top of what he earns. That is why I have made my point.

I am not convinced that any NHS dental contract will bring those people back into the fold. Regrettably, the answer comes back to the law of supply and demand. Flooding areas with dentists—albeit, I suspect, most will come from overseas—is the only way in which dentists will suffer pain. I discovered from Shropshire primary care trust that private dentists were not happy when IDH arrived on the scene. I suspect, and to some degree hope, that the same will happen when IDH arrives in my area.

10.26 am

Mr. Nick Hurd (Ruislip-Northwood) (Con): I respect your desire for brevity, Mrs. Humble.

Last Friday, all three Members of Parliament who represent the London borough of Hillingdon met members of the local dental community and the message could not have been clearer: in the words of the chairman of the local dental committee, the contract as it stands is a disaster. Many of the themes will be all too familiar to the Minister, and I am sure that they will be elaborated on in Front-Bench exchanges.

I would like to focus on three issues that particularly concern local dentists. The first is chronic underfunding of dentistry; the second, to pick up the comments made by the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew), is the ability of the local primary care trust to handle new responsibilities; and the third, to pick up the comments made by the hon. Member for Richmond Park (Susan Kramer), is the future of orthodontics.

On funding, a 46-year-old dentist made the point that his fee for fitting a crown on a posterior tooth was higher when he qualified than it is now. The point was also made that there is no London weighting in the contract. I would be grateful if the Minister explained whether consideration was given to London weighting and the reason for the apparent dismissal of that option.

Another major concern over funding is the loss of the ability to charge for failed appointments. I have read the Minister's response on that and have not been convinced. If payment is to continue on the basis of payment for units of dental activity and if dentists do not have the opportunity to deliver a UDA because a patient does not turn up, dentists lose UDA points and income through no fault of their own.

I note the Minister's willingness to review the situation in the event of what is described as a sudden and dramatic change in the pattern of appointments and cancellations. It would be helpful to have some clearer parameters of what constitutes sudden and dramatic change.

The second area of major concern in Hillingdon lies in the PCT's ability to manage the change. That concern is reinforced by the PCT's announcement in August that no new orthodontic referrals to Hillingdon hospital would be paid for. The background of that decision—if that is what it is—is the severe financial difficulties of the PCT. It is not alone in that and is wrestling with a £31 million deficit. Cuts are the order of the day, and orthodontic referrals come first because they are deemed to be low priority and are lumped together with treatments such as homeopathy.

There was no consultation on the announcement, nor any apparent effort to understand the true nature of such referrals. Around 250 people are involved and we are not talking about cosmetic orthodontics. They are referred to Victor Crow because he does work that no one else in Hillingdon can do. I have seen pictures of the burdens that his patients must carry around and they are horrific, involving terrible facial deformities, clefts and so on. The message to those patients from Hillingdon PCT and the system it fronts seems to be to put up or pay up. That could be an irreversible decision if Hillingdon hospital responds to the drop in funding by closing a department that is recognised as doing unique and excellent work in the area. When it has gone, it is unlikely that we will get it back.

What is the saving to justify that loss of service? An estimated net £40,000 a year. That is false economics in the context of a £31 million deficit. This is not a local, parochial point. Hillingdon MPs have received representations from outside Hillingdon expressing concern that this is setting an alarming precedent for cash-strapped PCTs throughout the system, thereby doing irreversible damage to the future of orthodontics in this country. I urge the Minister to make inquiries about that initiative to ensure that any decision is fully informed, supported by cost-benefit analysis and taken with due regard to statutory procedure.

The wider point is that the initiative by Hillingdon PCT reinforces concerns about the ability of the PCT to handle new dental responses in just three or four months from now. If it can make such a mess over the £80,000 for which it is responsible today, what will it do with £10 million and what will happen to that money once the three-year ring fence is over? Just three or four months away from implementing new contracts, the leadership of the PCT is distracted by financial problems and has a short-term outlook, governed by uncertainty as to its own future. It appears not to have taken steps to access the expert advice needed to help it to shoulder that responsibility.

For my constituents who rely on NHS dentistry, the implication is bleak. The problem here is that the discontent is not the voice of Government employees. Dentists are independent agents over whom Government have few levers in a market with so much private provision. In truth, they will continue to migrate from the NHS. National statistics bear that out—dentists are leaving the NHS in roughly the same numbers as the Government are recruiting them. We are running very hard to stand still, but for me the local evidence is building.

The chairman of the Hillingdon local dental committee recently took a straw poll of 10 surgeons in my constituency who provide NHS care for patients. Seven of the 10 stated that, as of 1 April, they would be withdrawing from the NHS, leaving just three surgeries to cope with all the pressure from the PCT. How long before those three are also forced to go private? I expect the voice of my constituents to be raised then, asking exactly what the Government meant in saying that they were "firmly committed to making high quality NHS dentistry available to all who want it by September 2001".

In commenting on the reform, Dr. Lester Ellman, chairman of the BDA general dental practice committee, said:

"This is the Government's last chance to get this right: there will be no second chance for NHS dentistry."

Based on the evidence that I see in Hillingdon, the Government are getting it wrong.

10.32 am

Julia Goldsworthy (Falmouth and Camborne) (LD): I shall try to keep my remarks as brief as possible. I, too, congratulate the hon. Member for Kettering (Mr. Hollobone) on securing the debate.

The vast majority of people here concede that NHS dentistry is in crisis and that the beginning of that story happened under the Conservatives, with the closure of two dental schools and the creation of the drill-and-fill treadmill. Yet, after eight years under a Labour Government, while there is some acceptance of a crisis—there have been plenty of strategy documents and reviews—there has been no significant or even discernible change in the percentage of the population registered with an NHS dentist, nor any change in emphasis toward more preventive dental health care.

We have heard about the Prime Minister's 1999 promise—anyone wanting to see an NHS dentist would be able to do so within two years, simply by calling NHS Direct. I tried to do that recently, to see whether the claim stood up in 2005. The information I was given was inaccurate; only one dentist was available to accept new NHS patients on his list. When I called to see whether I could make an appointment, I was told that the wait would be several months at least, or, possibly, as long as a piece of string. The practice did not really know. Even if I had emergency requirements, I would have to be triaged on the phone to see whether they really constituted an emergency.

The latest answers to parliamentary questions show that only 36 per cent. of practices are taking on any new patients. Despite celebrating the success of recruiting an extra 1,000 new dentists in the last year, the feedback I have had from those on the ground has been different. Cornwall has taken many overseas dentists to try to fill an acute shortage down there, but more than one practice has contacted me to say that it will have to lose them in the future.

Again, parliamentary questions show that 10,000 dentists have left the NHS since Labour came to government. That takes no account of the number of dentists who have scaled back their NHS work. I have spoken to a dentist in my constituency who was on the NHS books. He has two NHS patients—his wife and his daughter. The Government do not measure dentists by full-time equivalents, so we have no real idea how dentists who do NHS work split their time between that and private work.

We know that the shortfall could exceed 6,500 dentists by 2021, so even with the 1,000 extra dentists we are not, as the hon. Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Hurd) said, even running to stand still.

An extra dentistry school would have some impact, but only over a long period, given the time it takes to train dentists, and only if the Government could employ the necessary academic staff and convince graduates to take on NHS work. As we have heard from many hon. Members, there is massive unmet demand. If that is combined with the projected fall in the number of dentists, we can see that the problem will only get worse. Clearly, dramatic change is needed if there is to be any serious attempt to meet this unmet demand. Training more dentists is not enough. Existing dentists must be attracted back to the NHS, although it is not clear that the new contracts will do that.

The new personal dental services contract will dramatically change how dentistry is structured. It will mean a shift towards units of dental activity, rather than a per item fee, but every dentist to whom I have spoken is concerned that it will result in a replacement treadmill. It will mean a move away from drill and fill, but it certainly will not be an end to treadmill dentistry.

The other concern voiced about the scheme is that, within units of dental activity, insufficient allocation is given to preventive work. Where is the shift towards preventive oral care that is talked about? Like other hon. Members who have contributed, I have spoken to a practice manager. The practice has 6,000 NHS patients on its books. The manager is desperately trying to negotiate a system under which the practice can keep all those people on its books as NHS patients, but it is facing up to the reality that not every single one of them will be able to seek treatment from that practice under the NHS.

All dentists in Cornwall have been surveyed, and 75 per cent. of those who responded plan to scale back their NHS work as a result of the new contract. If just a small proportion of those dentists go ahead with that threat, there will be a massive impact in an area where access to NHS dentistry is already very low. One dentist commented that the new contract is the best advert for Denplan he has ever seen.

The problem is that we do not know what impact the contractual changes will have, because the system is untested. Under the PDS pilot, some elements were tested, but huge aspects have not been piloted at all, including the patient charging structure. The problem is the impact that the charging structure could have not only on dentists' behaviour, but on patient behaviour.

Band 1, which is a check-up and preventive treatment, will effectively mean an increase in the price of a check-up. How will it encourage people to go for regular check-ups if it costs them more? Surely the incentive will be for them to store up their problems and wait until they need not one filling, but four or five, or until there is an emergency, when they can have those fillings for a much lower price. The higher band will undoubtedly save money for the people seeking the most expensive treatments, but as Lord Warner said:

"Around 42 per cent of patients fall into Band 2. We expect three-quarters of these patients to pay more than previously".—[Official Report, House of Lords, 15 December 2005; Vol. 676, c.1488.]

How will the Government ensure that patients understand the new pricing structure, which comes into force in April? The negations have only now been finalised, and the matter was debated in Parliament before Christmas. How will the Government ensure that patients seeking treatment from 1 April understand what is going on? Those are fundamental questions that are yet to be resolved.

To conclude—I am keeping my remarks as brief as possible—there are lots of unknowns as to what will be put in place in April. We do not know what impact the changes will have on patient and dentist behaviour. The chief concern is that they could result in a negative impact on the oral health of our nation. Regular, preventive work is most important; this is not just about toothache and cavities.

To give a brief example, a friend of a friend—a nightclub singer—found out, at a regular check-up with her dentist, that she had the early stages of mouth cancer. That routine check-up, and going to the dentist regularly, saved her life. Incidentally, if smoking in all workplaces were banned, that might help to prevent such cancer, but perhaps that is a matter for another debate.

People will go for regular check-ups only if they understand how the new system works, if they think it cost-effective and affordable, and if they can find a dentist who is still in the NHS system. At least Scotland, where check-ups are free, has gone some way towards trying to resolve some of the issues. I am concerned that, unfortunately, those issues look likely to remain unresolved in England and Wales.

10.40 am

Mr. Stephen O'Brien (Eddisbury) (Con): It is a pleasure to take part for the first time in a debate chaired by you, Mrs. Humble.

I add my voice to the tributes to my hon. Friend the Member for Kettering (Mr. Hollobone). He rightly said that he was not only speaking for his constituents, which he did very effectively, but that right across the country people are having the same experiences. He highlighted most cogently the real human anxiety and suffering, direct responsibility for which he rightly laid at the Government's door.

The level of attendance in the Chamber today is evidence of concerns that are obviously widespread, particularly across English constituencies. It was unusual to hear from a Scottish Member today, given that the Minister has no direct responsibility for the issue in Scotland, but that is one of the trials that we in this place have to deal with under the current dispensations.

The steps the Government have taken to recruit and train more dentists will count for nothing without a sensible approach to the new dental contract. The problems in NHS dentistry will not be solved by simply creating more dentists or by persuading dentists to take on a few more patients. Rather, as the Dental Practitioners Association has correctly identified,

"the problem in reality is to redress the imbalance between working in the NHS and privately, which is causing a mass shift of dentists out of the NHS."

Mr. Ben Wallace (Lancaster and Wyre) (Con): As a fellow north-west Member, does my hon. Friend agree with me that the £2 million given in July 2005 to Lancashire and Cumbria to try to increase dentistry provision was obviously wholly inadequate and that to spend that new money on distractions such as dental access centres rather than on building up practices is more a sign of the Government's panic than of a long-term strategic plan for improving access to NHS dentistry?

Mr. O'Brien: My hon. Friend makes an important and valuable contribution to the debate. If the fundamental issues are not addressed, no amount of patching up will address adequately patient and public health need. That point has not been over-emphasised during our discussion.

The ill-thought-out and untested regulations that we are discussing will only exacerbate the shift away from the NHS. The Government's record on NHS dentistry has been one of abject failure. I will not chide the Under-Secretary too often, not least because the Minister of State in his Department with real responsibility for this issue—the hon. Member for Doncaster, Central (Ms Winterton)—has chosen not to attend; he is here in her place and we welcome him. However, I remind him that on 28 September 1999 the Prime Minister, as has been mentioned, promised that everyone would have access to an NHS dentist within two years. I should say for the record that that promise expired in 2001. The Government's failure to address the issue since then is a damning indictment of a succession of Ministers who never took the initiative to make the Prime Minister's wish a reality.

The new contract should have been in operation for almost a year, but it has twice been delayed—first until October last year, and now until April this year. In December 2004, the British Dental Association walked out of negotiations in disgust. The Government's response was to publish the new contractual arrangements last year for information only; there was no consultation and no negotiation. The Under-Secretary may seek to chastise the previous Government for the 1990 general dental services contract, but he should remember that that was at least agreed by the profession, and that, after all, it was a generation ago. I hope that the Under-Secretary acknowledges that being in office for eight and a half years brings certain responsibilities for the present situation.

We are now faced with the miserable situation of dentists being unable to negotiate a contract because of departmental intransigence and with the prospect of dentists walking out in disgust at what they are being offered. Responses to the dental charges consultation—dentists were at least consulted on those proposals—were negative in the extreme: 56 per cent. of respondents felt that the proposed charging system was unfair and 41 per cent. thought them unworkable.

"Uncertainty surrounding the start date of the new contract—not to mention the contract's terms and conditions—has created a climate where dentists have been unable to plan for their practices in the long-term".

Those are not my words, but the words of the Dental Practitioners Association. The business uncertainty created by the Department of Health is worthy of the Treasury. Maybe the Under-Secretary is lining up for preferment under the Chancellor's leadership. How else will he defend the Government's treatment of our dental practitioners? We should remember that dentists are business men and women as well. It is appalling that the Government encouraged dentists to negotiate new PDS contracts as late as eight months before they are scrapped and without making dentists aware of their intentions. What little goodwill that dentists had towards the Government has surely now been squandered. After all, they have to live in the real world. Like the rest of us, they have bank managers, who will demand that they have a business model that looks sustainable.

The Government's penchant for constant meddling is reflected in the Department's "pile it on" attitude to PCTs. In the last three years PCTs have been given primary care medical services, out-of-hours services and community pharmacies. They will shortly be given responsibility for general ophthalmic services, whilst having to juggle the implementation of the choose-and-book system, practise-based commissioning and payment by results. At present, and in addition, virtually every single PCT in the country is set to be merged. Into this mix is thrown the commissioning of primary care dental services. PCTs are even now attempting to juggle responsibility for GP out-of-hours care and pharmacies alongside their other obligations. I wonder whether PCTs will be able to keep all these balls in the air at once. Before the Under-Secretary demands to know whether we would slow the pace of reform, I remind him that he put so much on to PCTs' plates by delaying the implementation of the contract not once, but twice.

It is not as though the Government have not been warned. The NAO previously cast doubt on the ability of PCTs to commission dental services, saying in its report of 25 November 2004:

"Primary Care Trusts . . . have little experience of high street dentistry."

They

"have limited capacity and . . . will need to develop new expertise in dentistry."

They

"will need to ensure that priority is given to delivering appropriate contracting arrangements, including providing sufficient expertise and resources."

As far as I can tell, Ministers have not heeded the warnings, as highlighted in the helpful and important contribution by my hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Hurd). Perhaps the Under-Secretary would explain how he expects PCTs to manage the commissioning of primary care dental services without any acceptance of the NAO's conclusions and without offering PCTs any idea of how the system might work in practice. The Government have no idea of how the system will work because they did not pilot it. The NAO explained that no other country in the world had attempted to structure primary care dental services in the way that the Government have proposed and perhaps—just perhaps—piloting would have been advisable, as we urged.

The basis of the new contract is the meta-currency of NHS dentistry, the unit of dental activity or UDA. Like the new charging system, which according to the BDA seems little more than a cynical revenue-generating exercise, UDAs will be awarded in bands. As with the charging system, that results in a number of anomalies. For example, a dentist will get the same number of UDAs for taking a tooth out—20 minutes of surgery time—as for saving the tooth by root filling it—one to one and a half hours of surgery time. I can see how dentists may want to offer preventive advice—the avowed aim of the new contract—in the former case, but I have difficulty seeing how any dentist would choose to offer it in the latter. That simply costs too much in terms of chair time.

UDAs do not have a fixed price attached to them. I had assumed, like my hon. Friend the Member for Westbury (Dr. Murrison), another member of the shadow health team, that UDAs would have a fixed national price attached to them. This would be consistent with operating a national tariff for other types of care. I was interested to learn that PCTs would have to determine the value of UDAs individually. Maybe setting a UDA price became too much of a headache for the Government.

I would be interested to learn the Under-Secretary's views on whether PCTs have the administrative capacity to negotiate their way around such a complex system. We should not forget that many of them are in deficit, with some, like Cheshire West PCT, having very big deficits. Surely this will eventually result in some sort of postcode—or PCT—lottery, with the Government again deliberately building in unfairness.

It is true that the Government's reforms seek to move away from the old so-called drill-and-fill culture engendered by having earnings fixed to the number of treatments provided, but the new system of UDAs will actually pave the way for a new drill-and-fill treadmill where dentists must chase a pre-agreed number of UDAs in a year. When the Minister of State was challenged last month, she said that it was inconceivable that a dentist would be able to achieve his or her number of UDAs in, say, nine months and then shut up shop for three months, because that would indicate serious flaws in the ability of PCTs to commission dental services. That is exactly the scenario that we and the National Audit Office have been trying to warn the Government about. It is surely conceivable, even possible, given that PCTs are novices at commissioning dentistry, that dentists may overperform against their contracts and shut up shop, or underperform. If either happens, where is the flexibility in the contract? Can dentists renegotiate their contract if they are likely to underperform? There is a tolerance figure of only 4 per cent. Admittedly, that has been doubled from the original 2 per cent., but it is still very narrow. Dentists are likely to overcompensate rather than risk a breach notice. Surely the Minister can see that, if dentists are not able to receive adequate payment for providing more treatment, that will hasten their exit from NHS dentistry. That would be a continuing disaster for the important matter of public health and public oral health in particular.

The new regulations are unpopular, untested and unsound. They will solve neither the problem of falling NHS dental provision nor that of the drill-and-fill treadmill. Dentists and dental organisations have scorned them and the NAO has deep concerns about them. The Department appears to be seeking to wash its hands of the problem, shifting the responsibility and blame on to PCTs, which do not have the expertise, the resources or the time to deal with dentistry.

As we heard, five years ago the Prime Minister said:

"everyone within the next two years will be able once again to see an NHS dentist".

I fear that the new contract will make NHS dentists an even rarer breed. Given the explicit warnings to the Government—not least in this excellent debate—whatever the Under-Secretary now says, he and the Government cannot disclaim full responsibility for the consequences of their actions.

10.51 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Liam Byrne): We have served on Bill Committees together in this room, Mrs. Humble, and it is a pleasure to serve under your chairmanship today.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Kettering (Mr. Hollobone) on securing the debate. He has taken an interest in dentistry since his arrival in the House. There must be no complacency in this debate. It is vital that we recognise the precise point from which we start. We have increased the number of dentists, but not by enough. Since 1998, the number of dentists practising in this country has increased by only 22 per cent.—from 16,000 to about 20,000—but, of course, some of those dentists will have gone private. A 22 per cent. increase is good news, but is it enough? No, it is not. We have increased the number of adult NHS dentistry registrations since 1997, after a calamitous fall between 1992 and 1997, but by only 200,000. That is not enough. We need to do a lot more, which is precisely why the Government have put in place a three-point programme of action, which I shall explain this morning.

The first point relates to investment. The Government have increased investment in NHS primary care dentistry by about 20 per cent. or £250 million. For 2006–07, we are investing a further £65 million, before taking account of the uplift for pay and prices. The hon. Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Bone), who voiced concern about his poorest constituents, must support that investment. I know that the hon. Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron) has thrown a great deal of Conservative policy up into the air and I hope that he will take the opportunity of that review to argue against the formula that says that the proceeds of economic activity over the next two or three years will be shared between tax cuts and public investment. Tax cuts will mean one thing for NHS dentistry: a programme of cuts.

Sir Paul Beresford: On that issue, the Minister we expected today—the Minister of State, Department of Health, the hon. Member for Doncaster, Central (Ms Winterton)—was quoted in the Daily Express on 6 January as saying:

"under the new contract, the average earnings for a dentist with a reasonable commitment to the NHS is £80,000, plus £60,000 on top of that to be put towards . . . practice expenses".

If possible, will the Under-Secretary explain where that money will come from, how it will be allocated, how practice expenses will be defined and so on? If he cannot do that, but is prepared to write to me, I will be happy with that.

Mr. Byrne: I shall be delighted to write to the hon. Gentleman, or for my hon. Friend the Minister to write to him, as I indicated before the debate.

A programme of new investment is not enough. We must also increase the number of dentists who work in the NHS. In 2004, we set ourselves a target of recruiting the equivalent of an extra 1,000 dentists. I am glad to say that we exceeded that by about 40 per cent. and recruited 1,450 dentists. In addition, we established 53 dental access centres. We are solving the long-term problems of our inheritance by not closing two dental schools and by proposing to open new dental schools. I shall, of course, pass on the remarks of the hon. Member for Kettering to my hon. Friend the Minister of State. It is nice to be able to do so.

What does the activity that I have described mean for the hon. Member for Kettering? In his primary care trust, Northampton Heartlands, there will be 20,000 extra NHS dentistry patients in the next year or two. Some 4,300 registrations have been made available already; set against the current number of NHS patients, that is an increase of 17 per cent. It is a significant increase and a clear indication that the programmes of reform we are implementing will make some difference. Those registrations will take the number of NHS patients to a level above that inherited in 1997, but we have to go further still.

The hon. Member for Rochdale (Paul Rowen) highlighted the following point. We could discuss whether 80 grand a year is sufficient take-home pay to keep a dentist fully employed in the NHS—it is more than most hon. Members take home, although many of us would argue that dentists do a greater service for their constituents—but the fact is that we have to change the relationship between the NHS and dentists. That is the third element of reform. One of the key problems, which the hon. Gentleman did not point out, is that under the old system when an NHS dentist quit the NHS, the money went back not to the local community but to the Department of Health. That has to change. I should have thought that hon. Members from all parties would welcome our attempts to put commissioning for NHS dentistry back in the hands of local professionals.

The hon. Member for Wellingborough calls the NHS Stalinesque, which was a nasty reminder of the remarks of the hon. Member for Woodspring (Dr. Fox) when he made his speeches in 1999 and 2000 advocating social insurance for the NHS. I hope that the Conservative party will absolutely rule that out during its forthcoming policy review. We have to make the changes so that NHS spending on dentistry can stay local. That is why the new contract is so important.

The new contract will bring a number of benefits to patients. New ways of working will reflect guidelines published by the National Institute for Health and Clinical Excellence, whereby patients are no longer automatically recalled for a six-monthly check-up and the new system of patient charges will be simpler and fairer.

Several hon. Members, including my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew), have talked about the complexity of the new bands. I think that having three bands is simpler than having 400 different units of charges. My hon. Friend asked for further briefing and I shall ask my hon. Friend the Minister of State how quickly that can be arranged because it will be valuable for all hon. Members.

Many hon. Members will have received representations from dentists in their constituencies about the new contracts—

Mr. Wallace: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Byrne: If the hon. Gentleman will forgive me, I have only two minutes left.

We must have the humility to listen, but some of the concerns that have been expressed are based on misunderstandings. Dentists will have the security of a guaranteed income, which will enable them to plan ahead. An NHS dentist's salary is about £80,000 a year. We have guaranteed that for the next three years, dentists' annual contracts will be worth at least the value of their NHS earnings, but with a 5 per cent. reduction in the courses of treatment they have to carry out. We are taking dentists off the drill-and-fill treadmill of the current system. Instead of being paid separate fees for individual items of treatment, they will carry out an agreed number of courses of treatment during a 12-month arrangement. The key elements of the contract were piloted in a number of sites and those lessons have been taken into account in the new contract.

The hon. Members for Shipley (Philip Davies) and for Kettering asked whether non-dentists would be able to establish dental practices. That will indeed be possible from April 2006. I hope that the hon. Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Hurd) was not attacking local professionals and managers in primary care trusts. I know that the hon. Member for Witney recently made great play of the need to celebrate local managers in the NHS. Weightings are built into UDAs based on case load, dental health and local population—

Mrs. Joan Humble (in the Chair): Order. We must begin the next debate.

Enforced Removal (Families with Young Children)

11 am

Mr. Chris Mullin (Sunderland, South) (Lab): First, and with all due respect to the Minister present, may I say that I regret the absence of the Minister of State? I know that government is seamless, but over the years I have noticed that some Departments are more seamless than others. Secondly, I commend the debate pack prepared by the Library. It is relevant to the debate and contains a lot of information that hon. Members with an interest in this subject might find useful.

I have taken an interest in asylum and immigration policy for some time, both during my four years as Chairman of the Home Affairs Committee and in my two years as entry clearance Minister, among other things, at the Foreign and Commonwealth Office. I wish to make it clear from the outset that I am generally supportive of the Government's tougher stand. It cannot be right to leave decisions about who enters the country to people traffickers and other criminal networks. I support the measures that have been taken over the years to speed up the process, to reduce the number of fraudulent claims and, when practically possible, to remove those whose claims have failed. I welcome the fact that in the past few years, thanks to the efforts of the Prime Minister and successive Home Secretaries, we have begun to get to grips with what once seemed an intractable problem.

I have said that to demonstrate that I am not a soft touch on asylum policy. However, I believe in combining a robust approach towards asylum with basic human decency, especially when young children are involved; that is the point of the debate. For some years I have been worried about the fact that we are removing, to countries where they could face destitution, families with young children who, because of past failures in the processing system, have lived here for many years. I am referring not to children from countries where, although living standards might be low, there is a degree of stability, but to children from places such as Congo, Angola or southern Sudan, large parts of which have seen their social fabric disintegrate entirely.

I am not talking about recent arrivals, either. I am talking about children who know no other life than ours—children who, in some cases, were born here and have grown up alongside our children, played with them and shared the same classrooms. Whatever the sins of their parents, those children are entirely innocent and have no inkling of the fate that awaits them. They disappear from class without even a chance to say goodbye to their teachers and friends, and in many cases they are never heard of again. Sometimes the children reappear because of a hiccup in the removal system, only to disappear again a few months later. Who knows what becomes of them? On rare occasions there is a letter or a phone call about what happened next. Sometimes the news is good; at other times it is not. Usually, however, there is only silence.

To those of us who are—or were—members of the Government, the children tend to be only numbers. In a previous incarnation, I attended meetings at No. 10 and the Home Office where there was talk of targets and tipping points. When it is sensible to do so, I have no problem with setting targets. Indeed, given the failures of the past, I am sure that it is necessary. However, we should not lose sight of the fact that we are dealing with human beings. Members of Parliament, especially those who represent areas such as mine, to which asylum seekers have been dispersed, have to look such people and their children in the eye, and to us they are not statistics.

I recall, as I expect we all can, some moving cases. Let us consider the little boy who was plucked from school in mid-term and who, in the hour that was left to him while his parents were hastily packing their meagre belongings and immigration officers were waiting to take them away, made out a will in which he wrote, "I leave my Pokémon cards to so and so, and my Lego to so and so." It was found on his bed a few days later when friends came to find out why he had disappeared.

I once successfully intervened on behalf of a young woman who was from southern Sudan originally, but who had come from a refugee camp in northern Kenya. She faced removal despite having been in the UK for some years and having given birth to a boy who was two years old by the time she was threatened with removal. As it correctly says on the Foreign Office website, the war in southern Sudan is over. However, anyone who has seen at first hand, as I have, the state of refugees returning to the south of Sudan, and the absence of facilities to cope with them, will know that to send there people who have tasted our lives here would be an act of great cruelty. I dread to think what would have become of that woman and her child had she been returned.

I am currently doing what I can to help a family who came from Angola in April 2001. The case prompted me to ask for this debate. The family have two boys. One is now aged eight, but he was three and a half when he came here. He is blind in one eye; according to his mother, that happened while she was being beaten with the buckle end of a belt by soldiers who were searching for his father. The boy was said by his teachers to be traumatised when first enrolled at a local school. The other son, who is now aged four, was born in the UK and knows no other life but ours.

After years of delay, the parents' claim for asylum has failed and they may now be returned to Angola at any time. They are well aware of the fate that awaits them there and are unlikely to be persuaded to return voluntarily. So far as I can see, the intention is just to drop them off at Luanda airport and wish them good luck. We are talking about people with few, if any, resources. The woman and the older boy were camped in a church when they were last in Angola, and the father was in hiding. What will become of them? Presumably they will join the millions of anonymous, displaced people in that tragic country.

I know that it says on the Foreign Office website that the civil war in Angola is over, but it lasted for 27 years and much of the country is in ruins. The Angolan Government are unwilling or unable to provide even the most basic services for their citizens. Where such services do exist, they are mainly provided by foreign NGOs or United Nations agencies. Only about half of Angolan children receive any form of education, and the country is ranked third in the world for infant mortality. Much of the population, including many people in the capital, is destitute or living on the edge of destitution. Violence and lawlessness are rampant, and justice is non-existent or arbitrary. The few functioning institutions are riddled with corruption.

Sending there young children who have tasted our life and who, as in the case of the younger boy, know of no other life than ours, is an act of unpardonable cruelty. Needless to say, I have put all this to my hon. Friend the Minister for Immigration, Citizenship and Nationality—and he is unmoved. In a letter dated 22 November he wrote:

> "It would frustrate the proper and necessary object of immigration control in the more advanced states if people could not, save in the most exceptional circumstances, be returned to the less developed countries of the world."

That is not, of course, what I am arguing, and I agree with what he says; I accept that just about all failed asylum seekers come from countries poorer than ours, and that it would be nonsense to argue that no one should be returned to such a country.

My point is a narrower one. First, I am talking about families with young children who have lived in the UK for years and who, in some cases, have been born here and know no other life. Secondly, I am talking about removals to a handful of the world's most dysfunctional countries, where living standards are not merely lower but catastrophically so, and where hunger and destitution awaits those children. As I have mentioned, child mortality in Angola is the third highest in the world.

Thirdly, I am arguing that if we must return families to such countries, we should take some interest in what happens to them after they have disembarked. That might involve putting some money in their pockets, employing an NGO to see them safely through the airport and back to where they came from, and perhaps a little help with reintegrating. I do not argue that that should happen in every case, but only when young children are involved, and are at risk.

The Minister of State rejects that idea too. He wrote:

> "We do not normally give returnees money, nor do we arrange for their reception in their country of nationality, or liaise with Non-Governmental Organisations as regards their future welfare."

My question is: why not?

Mr. Neil Gerrard (Walthamstow) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend recall that people who came to this country from Kosovo under the humapitarian evacuation programme were offered the opportunity to return to see what conditions were like? In many cases, that helped them decide that they could return.

Mr. Mullin: Yes, that was the case, and I am about to refer to one or two other exceptions. Perhaps they should form a model for what should be done in other cases. Is it really too much to ask that we should take some responsibility for the consequences of our actions, at least when young children are involved? It always strikes me as disingenuous that we go to enormous lengths to ensure that children are well treated in the distressing circumstances of immigration detention centres, yet do not take the slightest interest in what happens to them immediately afterwards.

In any case, it would be misleading to suggest that we never help returned asylum seekers. We do when it suits us. My hon. Friend the Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Gerrard) gave one example, and I am sure that the Minister will confirm that the first batch of failed asylum seekers returned to Afghanistan received help with reintegration—and rightly so. Those were all single males. The same was true of the first batch of failed asylum seekers returned to northern Iraq; again, they were all single males.

Let no one say that the Government have no powers: they do have powers. I draw the attention of the House to sections 58 and 59 of the Nationality, Immigration and Asylum Act 2002, which were inserted partly at my suggestion—at least, that is what the then Home Secretary told me in those far-off days when I had influence in the Home Office. Section 58 gives the Secretary of State power to provide assistance to those who leave voluntarily after they have exhausted their rights. Section 59 gives him power to provide funding to non-governmental organisations that assist with or ensure the return of migrants. In other words, there is no reason why the Home Office could not come to an arrangement with an NGO to help reintegrate families that are returned to countries such as Congo or Angola, whether or not they go back voluntarily. So far as I am aware, however, it has not done so, except in a handful of cases of failed asylum seekers—all single males—who were returned to Iraq and Afghanistan. Why is that?

Mr. Alistair Carmichael (Orkney and Shetland) (LD): May I tell the hon. Gentleman of an incident that was brought to my attention on Sunday afternoon by a constituent who is seeking asylum? She was offered a cash payment and financial assistance with flights if she returned to Burma, but she was worried about receiving such an offer, as she felt that she was in some way being bought off, and that she was coming under pressure. If such offers are to be made, they must be made with greater sensitivity than appears to be the case so far.

Mr. Mullin: I certainly think that such offers should be made sensitively, but I cannot agree with the hon. Gentleman if he is suggesting that we should not make it clear to people that help can be given with voluntary passage home. Quite a few people opt to take that route, and others would if they were aware of it. It is a sensible approach to allow people to make up their minds about whether to take advantage of such an offer.

I come back to my question. Given the existing powers, and given that we use them in some cases, why do we not use them in cases of the sort that I have outlined? What is stopping us? I entirely understand that Ministers are anxious to create an incentive for failed asylum seekers to return voluntarily, and there well may be a case for maintaining a differential between the assistance available to those who return voluntarily and those who are forcibly removed. However, I cannot accept that we should offer no help whatever to families who are forcibly removed to some of the world's most dysfunctional countries. My view is that in cases involving such countries, we should not remove children who have lived here for years and who are, for all practical purposes, British in all but name.

I draw the Minister's attention to the recent remarks of Professor Aynsley-Green, the Government-appointed Children's Commissioner for England, quoted in The Times on 5 January, who described what is happening as outrageous in a civilised society. I stress again that the Professor is Government-appointed. He continued, saying that many of the children regarded themselves as English and could not understand why they were being treated as criminals.

I put it to the Minister that where children are concerned, there is a case for tempering our new-found rigour towards asylum removals with a little basic humanity. Again, there is a precedent. In October 2003, my right hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Brightside (Mr. Blunkett), the then Home Secretary, announced an amnesty for families who had been in this country for three years or more and "had suffered from historical delays in the system."

The Angolan family to whom I referred earlier had the bad luck to fall six months short of that deadline. I do not argue that we should go as far as we did two years ago. I would be content for an amnesty on a case-by-case basis, applying only to long-staying families from the most dysfunctional countries—and if the word "amnesty" offends the Minister, he need not even call it that. Far from being a sign of weakness, it would be evidence of a common humanity that would enjoy support across the political system. I look forward to hearing what hon. Members who speak for the other main parties have to say on that point. As we all know, it is much easier to make progress on asylum if there is cross-party consensus. We should not get ourselves into a position where one party is seeking to outbid the other for the favour of the Daily Mail, the Daily Express or whatever.

Finally, for the avoidance of doubt, I repeat what I said at the outset. I am generally supportive of the Government's tough stand on asylum. Over the years I have supported, in and out of government, all measures to speed up the process and eliminate abuses. As a Foreign Office Minister, I was involved in discussions about returns at the highest level to countries that are the source of many of our failed asylum seekers. I do not resile from that for one minute. All that I seek today is a little basic compassion when we are contemplating the return of families with young children to a handful of the world's most dysfunctional countries. We should not be returning to destitution children who have lived here so long that they know no other life than ours. Surely that is not too much to ask.

Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North) (Lab): I welcome the debate, and congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin) on securing it. The House spends far too little time discussing the effects on families and the human cost of our refugee policy.

My hon. Friend spoke about Angola. I am chair of the all-party group on Angola, and last year I visited it with an Inter-Parliamentary Union delegation. What he says about the breakdown of civil society is correct. The problem is that, for whatever reasons, Angola has been through 30 years of the most appalling war, and there are an enormous number of orphan children. It is wrong to deport children back to that situation when there is no adequate follow-up, and no means by which the British embassy could find out what was happening to those children, even if it wanted to. My hon. Friend has drawn attention to that important point.

[Jeremy Corbyn]

I represent an inner-London constituency with a large number of asylum seekers—a place from which many people from all parts of the world have traditionally sought asylum over decades, stretching back for most of the last century. People have traditionally sought asylum from inner-London areas. Indeed, many later leaders of African countries have lived in that part of London.

My constituency asylum and immigration case load, like that of my hon. Friend the Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Gerrard) and a number of other Members, is enormous. One is faced with families who have sought asylum in this country and have been here for a considerable time. As my hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland, South correctly said, the children have grown up in this society and know nothing other than the multicultural society of inner London. For them suddenly to be told that they have got to go, and to be taken almost forcibly away and deported to a society that they have only heard about from their parents, is cruel in the extreme, heartless and damaging—and they are then often placed in enormous danger. What kind of message does it send to other children in their school about justice, and about the society in which they are growing up, if it appears that such arbitrary justice can take place?

Although people who flee from places of danger and seek a place of safety in our country using the Geneva convention do so primarily for their own security, we should also remember that they are enormous contributors to our country. Asylum seekers want to work if they can, and those of them who have gained the right to work tend to work extremely hard and make an enormous contribution. We should be positive about that, as well as just saying that they are—understandably—seeking a place of safety.

I could cite many quotes from many bodies, but I shall refer to one organisation in particular. The Medical Foundation for the Care of Victims of Torture is a long-standing organisation whose offices are in my constituency. It was set up to help victims of the Nazi system's brutality to the Jewish people in the 1930s and 1940s, and it has now developed into a highly respected and effective organisation that provides support, care and counselling for the victims of torture. I am very pleased that its new building and counselling centre are in my constituency; I am proud that it is located there, and of the work that it does.

That organisation has put a number of points to me. It says:

"It is the Medical Foundation's position that all decisions ultimately to remove must only take place after:—

full and anxious scrutiny of the asylum and human rights grounds to remain in the UK by a properly trained and competent decision-maker only after access to an in-country right of appeal to an independent appellate court with the benefit of competent legal representation."

It also says:

"Proper preparation and presentation of a family's case, whether initially as an asylum claim or against removal on human rights grounds, must in our view include an understanding of the experiences of the children of the family. Too often the dependant child's experience is ignored or overlooked."

Asylum applications are often dealt with entirely on the merits of the case for one or other—or possibly both—of the parents to remain in the country, but any understanding of the children's emotional needs, desires and wishes is completely forgotten. Some such children grow up in a frightened atmosphere. We in this House have a fairly secure existence; we know where we live and what we do, and where we will be next week and next year. All that many children of asylum-seeking families in this country hear their parents talking about is whether the Home Office will ever reply to their letter, whether they will be secure in this country, or whether their children will still be in school next month or next year. That has a debilitating effect on such children's lives; it is damaging to them.

Something should be done about the speed and competence with which the Home Office deals with issues. I hold enormous advice bureau sessions, and I have lost count of the number of people who come along and ask, "When is the Home Office ever going to reply to any letter that has been sent by anybody?" A joke goes around about the letter that states that there will be a reply within 13 weeks: is that within 13 weeks this year, next year or the year after that? Such uncertainty has a grave effect on people. I look forward to the Minister assuring me that things are improving in that respect.

The UK Government placed reservations on the UN convention on the rights of the child. I would be grateful if the Minister could say whether those reservations will be withdrawn. The British Government are, understandably, determined to improve human rights around the world, and it is not good for them to keep a reservation in place in respect of that convention.

My hon. Friend's debate is labelled as being about children, but I am not sure how one defines children. I suppose that the legal definition is people up to the age of 18. However, there is a serious problem to do with older children, such as young people in their late teens, or even in their early 20s—almost adult children who, when their families are removed, may be able to stay. That too has a debilitating effect on them. I have watched the effects of family break-up in the Somali community and in others, when parents have been removed and older children have been left behind. That situation must be analysed as well, because it represents a serious problem in several cases and in several places.

My hon. Friend mentioned the Children's Commissioner's statement, and it is important to quote from it. The commissioner calls on the Government "to make sure that asylum-seeking children and young people are treated as children by those involved at every stage of the asylum process".

The statement goes on to raise specific concerns about

"the fairness of the asylum determination process, particularly in respect of unaccompanied children", about detention, and about the way in which unannounced raids and other activities have taken place. I hope that when the Minister replies, he can provide us with some hope and reassurance about those matters.

There are many disturbing stories in the papers about the fast-tracking of asylum decisions. I have complained about the delays in responding to inquiries and dealing with ongoing cases. I do that because I want the system to be seen to be working fairly and efficiently. At present, I do not think that it is. However, to try to get round the problem by suddenly introducing a fast-track system might create more injustices and dangers.

Maeve Sherlock, the chief executive of the Refugee Council, expressed her concerns, saying:

"The casework system is good in principle, but justice and speed can pull in opposite directions. To work properly, the new asylum model will need well-trained staff, legal advice on the spot and a more open mindset. Asylum seekers need to know what's happening to them and why."

Again, I look forward to hearing what the Minister says about that, because it appears that as many as one third of all asylum seekers could face detention under the fast-track procedure. That will undoubtedly have a serious effect on children.

I presume that Barnardo's has sent many Members its report about the situation facing children. That report describes confusion and concern, and it is critical of how section 9 of the Asylum and Immigration (Treatment of Claimants) Act 2004 operates. If we want people to live decently in our society, children to achieve well in school and their parents to contribute, why on earth do we operate section 9, which is designed to leave numbers of people in destitution? It cannot be good for anybody.

There is a big campaign concerning the Sukula family, from the Democratic Republic of Congo, who live in Bolton. That is just one case in which a campaign is ongoing. Many other cases are ongoing at the same time on the same issue.

Dr. Brian Iddon (Bolton, South-East) (Lab): I apologise for being late, Mrs. Humble; I went to the wrong room. I am pleased that my hon. Friend mentioned the Sukula family, who came to Britain in early 2002 with four children and now have six children. Does he agree that in such cases it is difficult to return the family, as two of the children have not even known the Congo and the others, who came to Britain in early 2002, were probably too young to remember much about it? I hope that my hon. Friend agrees that it is unfair to return such families. Does he support my view that the Minister ought to consider extending the amnesty for families with children beyond its closing date, particularly for families who have been in this country for almost four years?

Jeremy Corbyn: I thank my hon. Friend for that intervention, and I agree with him. There is a campaign surrounding that case, and I support the family and the campaign, as I am sure he does. They are not the only family and theirs is not the only case; there are others who unfortunately do not have the benefit of campaigns to support them. It is heartless, cruel and unfair to remove from this country, children who have known nothing other than being born and brought up here. It is damaging to them—and, as I said earlier, to other children. The scheme in the north-west is a pilot, and I would be grateful if the Minister said something about its progress and whether it will end or be extended.

My final general point—I know that other hon. Members want to speak—concerns countries to which families with children are deported. After an assertive campaign the Government finally stopped all deportations to Zimbabwe, and I understand that that is the current situation. My constituency includes people from all parts of the world, and I am particularly concerned about two countries to which removals take place. The first is Congo and the second is Somalia.

The war in Congo has had less coverage than almost any other conflict anywhere in the world, yet 3 million people have died there in the past decade. That is a level of casualties on a par with the first world war. Congo has a transitional Government, but the war is clearly continuing, particularly in the east of the country. There is a collapse of civil society and of any supportive environment, and it is impossible to follow what happens to any individual family that returns to Congo. I hope that the Minister recognises that it cannot be fair, right or just to deport anyone to Congo until there is some measure of peace there. Taking a child out of a school in Britain and dropping them in Congo with no follow-up whatever cannot be right, fair or just.

Likewise, there is continuing grave instability in Mogadishu in south Somalia. I am not clear whether there are removals to Somalia and I would be grateful if the Minister could resolve that question one way or the other. I have objected when removals have been threatened against my constituents, but I am not clear whether there is a policy on that.

My last point is about following up what happens to those who are removed from this country. The Home Office has its own in-country assessment unit, the Foreign Office makes a diplomatic assessment of the situation in any one country, and Amnesty International, Human Rights Watch, the United Nations and a number of other organisations make their own assessments of what goes on in various countries. Except in Kosovo, to which my hon. Friends the Members for Sunderland, South and for Walthamstow referred, I am not aware of any adequate follow-up in any other country when removals take place.

If someone has sought safety or asylum in this country and the application fails, for whatever reason, or a human rights application fails, for whatever reason, and a family is deported, we have at least a moral responsibility to ensure that they are in some degree of safety when they return to their society. If children who are growing up and attending school in this country are suddenly removed to a place of great danger, they deserve at least to be monitored so that we can try to help them and perhaps review deportation policy in specific cases. The way in which children are treated in many parts of the world is appalling and terrible. We contribute to much of that if we take children away from a place of safety in this country to a place of danger, and then pretend that it has nothing to do with us after that. It has everything to do with us, and my hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland, South has done the House a service in securing this debate.

11.34 am

John Robertson (Glasgow, North-West) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin) on securing this debate. The only thing that I am sorry about is the low attendance. I prepared a short contribution because I thought that many colleagues, particularly from south of the border, would want to be involved. It is a sad indictment of our colleagues that they are not here to make contributions.

Mr. Mullin: With all due respect to the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, my hon. Friend the Member for Leigh (Andy Burnham), who is a fine fellow, what I am most concerned about is the disappointing absence of the Minister of State responsible for policy in this area. I am sure that when my hon. Friend returns to the Home Office he will convey to him the sentiments expressed here today, but I would have liked to do that in person.

John Robertson: I agree, but in defence of the Minister of State, I must tell my hon. Friend that he has been to Glasgow on several occasions. On one prolonged recent visit he took considerable time to talk to Members of Parliament and the people most affected by the removals. I will commend him for doing that, while chastising him for not being here today.

It is pleasing to see the hon. Members for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Carmichael) and for Dundee, East (Stewart Hosie) here today. It would be even more pleasing if those Members went back and asked their local councils to take on board the job that Glasgow city council took on in allowing asylum seekers to come to our friendly city, where I believe that they are looked after better than in any other city in the country. It would be more pleasing if the rest of Scotland, instead of getting on board the discussion on asylum, got on with trying to look after those people— giving them a home and welcoming them into society. That is my little plea for Glasgow and against the rest of Scotland.

A lot of press coverage north of the border, including the extracts in the excellent information pack that has been put together for today's debate, mentions Glasgow in particular. Yet some press statements that are emerging, by people who have been shouting the most against what has been happening to asylum seekers in the Glasgow area, are, unfortunately, from outside that area. Sad as it is, they have done very little to help alleviate the problem.

There are many points on which we can agree. We all agree that, as my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Jeremy Corbyn) said, we have a moral obligation to look after refugees—genuine refugees, that is. We need to adjust the asylum process to establish who is entitled, and everybody undergoing that process must be treated fairly and have access to a full range of services. Everyone who meets the asylum criteria must be welcomed fully into our society. My hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North did not actually say those words, but I am sure that is what he meant in saying that those people offer much to the multicultural development of the UK. They add many of their cultures to ours and will make the UK a better place in the long run. It is to be hoped that parties such as the British National party will then find no place in our society.

What should happen to people who have been through the process and failed in their application? Have they no right to be in the country? How should they be returned to their country of origin? Or, as some would say, should they be allowed to remain here no matter what the circumstances? Those are the questions that we must raise in this debate. They have already been raised in certain ways, and I hope to add to that debate in my short contribution.

It is clear that the asylum system needs to be examined and improved. None the less, many people who come to this country to seek asylum make applications that are utterly unfounded. They seek to use the system to remain here, and eventually to benefit from an amnesty. I am against the amnesties that have been called for. As a result of amnesties—which have caused me many problems as an MP trying to deal with asylum cases—many people suddenly come out of the woodwork, as it were, and try to stay here when they should never have been allowed to stay in the first place. They had disappeared into the country, when they should probably have been removed at the outset.

Jeremy Corbyn: I was not aware that there was an amnesty; I thought that 2,000 pre-existing family applications were to be reviewed, possibly with a more sympathetic approach than might be used in other cases. So far as I am aware, there is no general amnesty—although there may well be a case for one, and I might well support such a scheme.

John Robertson: I thank my hon. Friend; he has put that much better than I did, and he is absolutely correct. There was no general amnesty as such, but there was certainly a slackening of the rules to allow people who have been here a long time to stay.

I can understand the arguments of immigration officials. I have been to the immigration service in Glasgow with asylum seekers many times to talk to officials and try to alleviate the misunderstandings created—in some cases, maliciously—between people seeking asylum and the immigration service. Unfortunately, there are those in our society who seem to want to use the subject of asylum for their own political ends, and I find that totally abhorrent. Whenever I can, I denounce those parties. They know who they are; they are on the extreme right or extreme left of our society, and as far as I am concerned, they have no place in British politics. I hope that we shall weed them out. They do no service to people who genuinely seek asylum, and who ask their MPs to solve their problems and help them to remain in the country.

By the time the media take control, they have totally distorted the actualities of the case. By the time the case gets to the Home Office, the Home Office has been put in an intolerable position. Eventually the people concerned are removed, although in some cases I know that I could probably have saved them if they had got to me first, and had not got involved in a series of lies and stories given to them by certain people. That has to be investigated—but the Home Office and its officials, too, have to think seriously about the information that they give out.

I appreciate that many of the details that the Home Office receives are personal and should not be revealed to the general public, but if someone goes to the press and gives their whole life story, as they see it, in support of their case for remaining here, I feel that the Home Office should be entitled to give the story as it sees it, too. It is also important that it should give the hows and whens of the enforced removals. We want to know why people have been removed at a particular time, after having been four, five or six years in this country, as my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North has described.

I commend Drumchapel high school in my constituency. The students there have won many awards, and many of them are from asylum-seeking families. They have done work to promote and campaign not just for themselves and their families but for other children from such families, and they should be commended. It is pleasant to see children taking an interest in what happens in everyday life, rather than just worrying about whether they will get the new PlayStation or Xbox or whatever, which is all that some young people care about. It is a pleasure to see that they care about each other and their fellow pupils. Long may it continue, and long may the students keep giving me a hard time. They come to my office and ask me why this happens and why that happens.

We politicians need to look at ourselves, too. I have a quote from one of my colleagues from Glasgow who is a Member of the Scottish Parliament. In a statement about a family who were allegedly thrown out of their home in a so-called dawn raid, he said:

"Police should not wear body armour".

The report adds the comment:

"despite the fact that one officer in England has been killed carrying out such duties."

Norrie Flowers of the Scottish Police Federation said:

"They don't really understand the issue. We are asked to go along in these situations in order to assist immigration officers. The bottom line is that we don't know what we are walking into. It can go from being very quiet to a frantic affair within minutes and they therefore wear protecting clothing for that."

I totally agree with him.

That is the kind of information that the Home Office should give us. They must tell us what happened when they removed a family. I want to know if the removal was easy or hard, what kind of force was needed and why, how many people were there, and what time it was. That is simple information, which any Member of Parliament would want to know about something that had happened in their constituency. If I found that something had gone wrong, that would give me the opportunity to try to do something about it. I would be grateful if the Minister would take that on board, talk to his officials and try to get something done about it.

Talk of children being handcuffed is very distressing. However, I have been to the immigration service and heard some of the horror stories from its side, of parents hurling children at officers who are there to remove them. The question would then be: should we take the children from the parents in the first place? Are those responsible parents? Sometimes such questions are addressed, and it does happen that children are removed from asylum-seeking parents. Those children are now part of our society, because the parents were incapable, or did not want to look after them in the first place.

We need to be told about such things. There are people in our society who are living and working, have been part of the system and are happy to be here. We may not want to know who they are, but we certainly want to know the numbers of such cases. The story is not always bad news.

I would be grateful if the Minister, in describing the procedures, could put some more meat on the bones of the thought behind the removals—although of course, he may not know about that. Why, after four and a half years, do we suddenly come to the decision that a family must be removed today?

The hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland talked about a more responsible way of removing people. Surely there must be a more humane way. I do not think that there is a humane way of removing any family that has been here for such a long time, but there must be a better way. I understand why the early morning visits happen. They may not be dawn raids as such, but people certainly go early in the morning and, if they go back, I know that that is because they can be sure that the family is in situ in the house at the time. I understand that.

Part of the main problem is that—as many have said here today—children are the innocent bystanders. They just happen to be there, or happen to be born, yet they bear the brunt of the removals. We should show some kind of sympathy, but the parents have to take the responsibility. It is not the Government's fault that people are here illegally. They have been told, I am assured, on many occasions that they can have an assisted passage back to their country of origin or they can make their own way back. They are told almost from the moment that they arrive in the country that if they refuse to do so, at the end of the process they will be removed. It is unfair to say that those people—those parents—did not know that they would be removed. They did know.

Mr. Mullin: With all due respect to my hon. Friend, I did not say anything of the sort. I deliberately kept the focus of my remarks on removal of children who have been here a long time to a handful of the most dysfunctional countries. I readily recognise that if we get into wider territory we will open up all sorts of impossibilities. I do not want to go down that road. I want to keep the Minister and the Home Office firmly focused on why we are sending those young children back to Congo, Angola or Sudan, after they have lived here all their lives. That is my principal interest.

John Robertson: I was not having a go at my hon. Friend; I am talking in general. If we read the Library pack for today's debate, we find statements along those lines, and it is important to get those messages across.

I have been a Member of Parliament for more than five years, and I have dealt with hundreds of asylum cases in that time. I have noticed a change in the applications over that period, particularly in the past few years. Psychiatric reports seem to be used as a reason why people should remain in the country. More people suddenly seem to have psychiatric problems—although I have to say that that does not apply just to asylum seekers; these days it also applies to people seeking incapacity benefit.

[John Robertson]

Why has that suddenly happened? Is it just that we have better doctors and psychiatrists to examine the cases, and people are referred to them more? Or is it because the judicial system now sees such an approach as a good way of keeping people in the country, so people are schooled in how to talk to psychiatrists? I would be interested in examining the figures. Did we not have psychiatrists three or four years ago? Have they suddenly come on to the market in the past few years?

In every case that I see, somewhere along the line it is said that the person involved is ill, or is not fit to travel to another country. In some cases there are actual illnesses. In one of my cases a gentleman is, unfortunately, dying of cancer and it is pretty obvious that he could not be sent back; in another the person has just had a heart attack, and he could hardly go back. In every other case, however, the people have strong psychiatric problems, and for them to be removed and sent home would apparently do them and their family immeasurable harm. Does the Minister have the figures to hand, or could he obtain them and let hon. Members know them? I would be interested to know whether such problems had not been looked at before, or whether they are just an excuse that some families are using to remain.

Will the Minister also examine the judicial system, particularly in Scotland? My hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North made a good point about how long cases can take, so that people stay in the UK for years. We tell families whose kids have been in school for five years to take them out and go home. Has the Minister examined the judicial system in Scotland, where a judicial review takes 18 months? South of the border a judicial review takes about six weeks. Is it any wonder that people who may be trying to abuse the system would like to come to Scotland? If they obtain a judicial review, it will take 18 months not to finish that review but for them to be allowed to go for it. Then they can bring new evidence, and they suddenly find another reason why they should get another judicial review. Such an approach stretches out the process to many years.

Jeremy Corbyn: The point that I was trying to make was not so much about the judicial review—how quickly a review takes place is obviously a matter for the courts—but simply about the process of correspondence with the Home Office, which I find unbelievable. I was referring to the number of cases in which files are lost or misplaced, or the Home Office simply does not reply to correspondence from solicitors, law centres, MPs or anybody else.

John Robertson: My hon. Friend is correct. I come across the same problems sometimes, but not as often as cases that go to judicial review. The problem cases all seem to take for ever and a day.

Mr. Carmichael: I am interested in the hon. Gentleman's comments about judicial review. Does he think that the judicial review situation will be improved if the Government's Immigration, Asylum and Nationality Bill, which is currently in the other place and which interferes substantially with the appeal rights open to asylum seekers, is finally given Royal Assent in its current form?

John Robertson: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his intervention, which leads on to a point touched on by my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North about fast-tracking and the change in the system to make it quicker. We are talking about enforced removals, and in the case that has been mentioned we would expect things to be quicker. This is why we are getting the enforced removals now: we have caught up with the backlog. We are discussing the cases of people who were left to sit in the house all day, where the kids went to school and college, and got an education but could not do anything else in terms of work. In relation to enforcement, we are talking about people who have been here for a few years.

I understand what the hon. Gentleman is saying, but I shall not get involved in what has been discussed in the other place, because I know that his colleagues do their utmost to butcher whatever Bill is sent there. However, when we get the measure back, we shall put it back to how it should be. The most important thing is that in the end, we have legislation that is fair.

I shall finish now, Mrs. Humble, as I am on my last page—although I must admit that the speech that I wrote in advance bears no resemblance to what I have said. Some of what we read in the newspapers is lies, and some of it is a distortion of the truth; at best, it stretches the truth. The emotional blackmail that appears in the press is not helpful. It is certainly not helpful to those of us in this place who have to work with the Home Office to defend people. It is difficult to defend a case when it has been in the press and everybody has already made up their mind about what should be done.

We need to have a reasoned debate. I wish that more hon. Members were here today. I wish that my speech had taken less time—many other people here probably wish that, too—but it is important that we have a measured discussion. We must look after the children as best we can, but we must remember that ultimately, the parents are responsible for them. I shall finish on the following questions. Should we separate children from their parents? Should we remove the whole family or let them all stay?

Stewart Hosie (Dundee, East) (SNP): I am pleased that this debate was requested and granted. My worries about removals are similar to those of the hon. Member for Glasgow, North-West (John Robertson). The process is causing great consternation in Scotland. One of the questions posed continually during the recent tranche of high-profile removals involving children to which reference has been made was about enhanced disclosure through Disclosure Scotland for the immigration and police officers. Obviously, enhanced disclosure is required from Disclosure Scotland for anyone who works closely with children or vulnerable adults categorised in a certain way—and, in the case of asylum seekers with children, where there are the mental and psychiatric difficulties that have been described. I hope that the Minister can tell us whether the immigration and police officers in attendance were covered by enhanced disclosure from Disclosure Scotland.

Has the Minister been advised about the guidelines for the number of uniformed immigration and police officers required in such circumstances? I shall come to what Norrie Flowers of the Scottish Police Federation said about the use of body armour, but if the reports are to be believed, the number of immigration and police officers in attendance is in the high teens, which may seem excessive for a routine removal.

We can only imagine the trauma experienced by young children when woken in their own beds by a uniformed officer, not by their parents, and finding a large number of uniformed people in the bedroom. Will the Minister explain the rationale behind the removal of different family members in separate vehicles? Children see their fathers and perhaps older siblings being removed in separate vehicles. What about the use of handcuffs? I hope that he can contradict me, but the use of handcuffs for adult men and boys in their late teens appears to be routine; if he tells me that that is not the case, I shall be delighted.

It would also be useful if the Minister could explain the procedures for the use of handcuffs in such circumstances. Has the Department done any assessment of the overall impact on children involved in the process? If so, could it be made available? The hon. Member for Glasgow, North-West suggested that we needed more information from the Home Office about the procedures and protocols of the removal process—concerning the separate vehicles, the body armour, the handcuffs and so forth. That would be helpful for us all.

The processes that I have described have been well documented and well reported, although in some cases with a little hyperbole in certain quarters. I shall not repeat the more hysterical remarks that have been printed in the press. None the less, the process and the removals have upset a great many people. They have led the children's commissioner for Scotland, Kathleen Marshall, to suggest that the process terrorises children. I mention that because she is a sane, rational, intelligent professional woman doing a particular job. This is her role. I am not quoting some of the maddies on the ultra-left, but someone in a very specific position.

Dr. Marshall said:

"I've become increasingly distressed by the inhumane methods of removal of children and families from Scotland. What can happen is immigration officers and police, big groups of them, 11 to 14, go to a family's house at seven o'clock in the morning, sometimes earlier, and waken the children in their beds. The officers in bullet proof vests"—

I suspect she means stab vests, but never mind—

"waken the children, not the parents, they handcuff the parents in front of the children and then they remove them by van on long journeys down to these prisons, basically to other detention centres or to holding centres."

Those are genuine and legitimate concerns for the children's commissioner, and they led the Lib-Lab First Minister in Scotland, Jack McConnell, to seek an asylum protocol. The BBC reported that he had asked the Home Office to involve Scottish education and social services when it deports and removes the families from their homes. I would add that the children's commissioner should be involved in any discussions about the procedures and processes for the removal of families, particularly those with children.

The best description of the fear that the families face was by an Algerian lady, who in advance of the process said:

"We are scared all the time . . . every morning I get up between 5 and 6 o'clock and get . . . dressed . . . I don't want to be in my night clothes when they bring the door down. I want to be ready so that I don't get shocked and so my children don't get frightened . . . what happens to children of 7 and 3, they could not stand the shock of doors being brought down, seeing my husband being handcuffed, being separated from their mother."

To be that afraid for one's children, or to be a child oneself and consider the possibility of that happening—particularly if it has happened to one's school friends, as it has in certain parts of the country—must be quite horrendous.

I welcome this debate and am delighted to have had the opportunity to contribute to it. I agree with the hon. Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin). He said that he broadly supported the immigration and asylum system, but that the issue was about specific countries. Like him, I would support a case-by-case review of certain cases in certain circumstances. I hope that the Minister will take on board the genuine anxieties felt by many people awaiting removal and deportation. Their Members of Parliament have anxieties, and many other people feel concerns about the process. I hope that the Minister will be able to answer some of the questions that I have put to him.

12.4 pm

Mr. Alistair Carmichael (Orkney and Shetland) (LD): As others have done, I congratulate the hon. Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin) on securing this debate. He spoke not just with tremendous knowledge but with great compassion. He gave the example of his constituent's child writing a will and leaving his Pokémon cards. As a parent whose house is littered with those cards, I found that particularly poignant. The hon. Gentleman rightly presented a tightly focused argument in relation to highly dysfunctional countries such as Congo, Angola and southern Sudan—to which I would add Burma, and other Members could add other countries. I hope that the Minister will address his specific concerns.

The hon. Member for Glasgow, North-West (John Robertson) made an interesting contribution about the forced removal of children, particularly young children. He rightly put forward the concerns of immigration officers and police officers, and I do not argue with what he says about the difficulties facing those public servants in such situations. However, I cannot go along with his conclusion, because in creating policy that affects children, our primary consideration must always be the best interests of the child. That is the test that we apply for our own children, and I cannot countenance a different standard or approach being adopted for the children of others.

John Robertson: I understand what the hon. Gentleman is saying, but he obviously did not listen to my closing remarks about the children themselves. None the less, it is the parents who are the asylum seekers, and the children are the dependants of the parents. Under the system in this country, it is the parents who are investigated, not the children.

Mr. Carmichael: There is an old expression about visiting the sins of the fathers upon the children, and that is perhaps the situation here. However, I am not in as direct a conflict with the hon. Gentleman as he might have thought from my introductory remarks, because I think that the fault lies with the system. That system was graphically described by the hon. Member for Islington, North (Jeremy Corbyn). It seems not only to produce delays, but actively to encourage them, and there are often significant delays.

I remember an earlier Westminster Hall debate when the present Chief Secretary to the Treasury was the Minister of State responsible for asylum matters; it took place back in the good old days when Ministers of State used to attend such debates. He said that delay was the asylum seekers' best friend. In many ways he is right, because that can leave asylum applicants in a situation where they have an expanding family, with children who have never lived anywhere else, who feel themselves to be British in every respect, and who are well integrated with their local communities. Tackling that delay must be at the heart of addressing the problems that have been highlighted. We have so-called dawn raids, the enforced removal process and delays, and they are all products of a system that is dysfunctional and requires to be fundamentally examined.

The hon. Member for Sunderland, South made a telling point about the need for what might be loosely called "after care" for those who have been returned, especially to highly dysfunctional countries such as Congo. That is an exceptionally sound suggestion; we have substantial overseas business even in those very different dysfunctional countries, and there should be no reason why the Government should not be prepared to provide that. If they have confidence in their decision-making process that has returned a person in the first place, they should be prepared to back that up by offering some sort of after care and review to ensure—for quality control, if for no other reason—that the correct decision has been taken.

Several Members have spoken about their experiences as MPs, and I shall leave the Minister with a final matter that has caused me some difficulty. My hon. Friend the Member for Rochdale (Paul Rowen) brought to my attention a case that came up in his constituency in the course of the general election campaign. Neither he nor Lorna Fitzsimons, his predecessor, was allowed to make representations, because neither of them was a Member of Parliament at the time; during the period of Dissolution there is no such thing. Can the Minister tell me that that was a one-off aberration, and that that sort of nicety will not be used routinely by the Home Office and the immigration and nationality directorate to ensure that representations are not heard?

12.10 pm

Damian Green (Ashford) (Con): I echo the thoughts of other hon. Members on both sides of the Chamber, and congratulate the hon. Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin) on illuminating this part of the asylum debate. I part company from him on the subject of feeling in any way slighted by the presence of the Minister that the Home Office has sent to answer the debate. In starting the debate, the hon. Gentleman made the good point that in some areas progress can be made only on a cross-party basis. He will understand that I am in my early days as immigration spokesman for my party; but I can assure him, and the Chamber, that I see my role as helping to create a civilised and credible immigration and asylum policy for the Conservative party. That is what I will seek to work towards.

The debate has illuminated one corner of the tangled web that is the Government's asylum policy. To continue the metaphor, it is a corner where the web has holes through which innocent people—young children—can fall, and are falling. What has stood out in this debate, as well as in the research that I have done—as others have done, I commend the debate pack prepared by the Library—is the obvious emotive resonance of every case that comes up in this area. Every case is a hard case.

That is an observable fact from my constituency experience in east Kent, which for years has been at the sharp end of asylum cases involving people coming in to the country. A few years ago there was an overwhelming preponderance of hostility towards all kinds of asylum seekers, which over the years has been markedly tempered by the rise of cases of families who have become part of the community, and who have become liked and respected and, in particular, have put down roots with local schools. The temperature of the debate in that part of the world has significantly changed in recent years. The sort of problems that the hon. Gentleman illustrated with one family being deported to Angola apply to many families being deported to a number of countries.

The debate has been gratifyingly devoid of the emotional grandstanding that has clearly gone on in some cases in Scotland. We have heard contributions from Scottish colleagues on both sides of the Chamber. The Library debate pack makes it clear that the debate on some cases in Scotland has contributed a lot more heat than light.

It is possible coherently—although I think wrongly—to believe that no child should ever be removed. However, like the hon. Member for Sunderland, South, I do not agree with that belief—for good humane reasons. If that became the case in this country, it might, among other things, encourage the human trafficking of children and encourage families who had no right to seek asylum here to do so. The second-order effects of taking that kind of radical policy position would be counter-productive for children.

Jeremy Corbyn: Does the hon. Gentleman recognise that although we all deplore human trafficking, there are occasions when parents are so desperate for the safety of their children in a war-torn society that they are prepared to do anything to get them to a place of safety, including paying bribes and giving money to traffickers to get the children to this country?

Damian Green: I recognise that, but it does not obviate my point that a blanket position that no child would ever be deported might do more harm than good.

So far, I have been rather sympathetic to the Government's position and the problems facing Ministers in policy making. I am indeed sympathetic to those who have to take decisions in every individual case, but there are legitimate questions to be asked and criticisms to be made of the Government's current position. I echo the point made by the hon. Member for Sunderland, South concerning the organisation in the host countries for those who are sent back. Common humanity should dictate that some kind of decent reception is organised as a matter of course, and clearly that does not happen at present, not only in the particularly dangerous countries the hon. Gentleman mentioned, but in many other places.

I also echo a point made by Save the Children relating to the detention, rather than the removal, of children—although it applies even more strongly if a child is to be removed. Decent pastoral care of the child should be organised before the removal happens. From a child's point of view, it would be even more inhumane if such a thing were to happen out of the blue than it would if they had some knowledge and explanation beforehand. That does not happen often enough.

My third point concerns the length of time it takes the Home Office to respond to contact from families—a point that was also raised by the hon. Member for Islington, North (Jeremy Corbyn). I have seen no improvement in recent months and years, but I hope that the Minister can produce some figures to show that my anecdotal experience is wrong.

My fourth and most general point concerns the time for which families are in this country before their case is decided. For a young child, every month that passes is a significant amount of time, during which normality is established. For such children, three or four years living in one town in one country is literally half a lifetime. That is why it is legitimate to criticise the Government for the administrative failures that still bedevil the asylum system, which forced them to introduce the amnesty—if we can use that word—to reduce the numbers of those here illegally to manageable proportions.

In that context, I would like to ask the Minister some questions designed to inform us about the scale of the problem that remains. The hon. Member for Sunderland, South has at times suggested extending the amnesty time beyond the three-year period. I am not sure whether I agree with the idea of individual case-by-case extensions because we need certainty in this area for the families.

Mr. Mullin: Country by country, perhaps.

Damian Green: The hon. Gentleman specifically suggested doing that on the basis of countries.

Will the Minister tell us how many children are covered by the amnesty in its current form? How many extra children would be covered if it were extended by one or two years? I appreciate that he may not have the exact figures to hand, but they could be provided for him.

According to the Home Office press release of 22 November, the five nationalities accounting for the most removals are Serbia and Montenegro, Afghanistan, Iraq, Turkey and Pakistan. Are those also the countries to which most children are being removed? If not, to which countries are children most likely to be removed? With which of those countries does the Minister think that we have satisfactory reception arrangements when children are returned? That is particularly important for unaccompanied children, but it applies to children as part of a family as well.

The next question relates to those not covered by the amnesty. The Government's estimate of those living here illegally is a fairly elastic figure. The central figure is 430,000, but I understand that it could be 310,000 or 570,000. How many of those are children, according to the Government's best estimate? That is perhaps the most important number for all concerned with the issue, because without it we can have no real feel for the scale of the problem. We all agree that every individual forced removal of a child is a desperately hard case in which emotions will run very high, so it is vital that we develop policy on a factual basis.

The point at which the desire to run a properly managed asylum and immigration system runs directly into the natural instincts of common humanity and generosity of spirit is precisely the issue raised by this debate. I genuinely have sympathy for the Minister and his colleagues, who have to make the decisions, but the underlying problem will be solved only if the system works efficiently. It has not worked well enough in the past few years, and as long as it does not work, there will be more hard cases. Each hard case that involves the removal of children threatens to become an individual tragedy, so simply carrying on as before is not acceptable.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Andy Burnham): First, I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin) for securing this debate and for focusing our attention on the extremely important issue of the removal of children, particularly those born in this country, to some of the most challenged and economically difficult countries in the world. It was welcome that he rightly focused our attention on that point, and I shall seek to address it directly.

Many excellent points have been raised in the debate. We have covered a broad terrain in discussing this issue, which arouses strong feelings. I fear that I shall not be able to do justice to every point, but I shall seek to do so as much as possible. However, I assure hon. Members that their comments will be heard in the Home Office. My hon. Friend said that he was disappointed that the Minister for Immigration, Citizenship and Nationality is not here. The Minister of State is chairing the Ministerial Committee on Asylum and Migration—a Cabinet Committee—this morning; otherwise he certainly would have been here. I assure my hon. Friend that he is deeply engaged in the issues that have been raised this morning and has asked Ministers to consider them—and I will, of course, draw these proceedings to his attention.

I am grateful that my hon. Friend made his comments in the measured and considered way which is his hallmark. We are dealing with what I believe to be the most challenging and emotive area of public policy. For that reason the use of language, particularly by people such as ourselves—those in positions of responsibility and those who hold public positions and public office—is all important. That point was made well by my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, North-West (John Robertson). Too often, because of the emotive nature of the debate, hyperbolic language is used at both extremes, whether to demonise those who come to this country to seek asylum or, at the other end of the spectrum, in comments about the nature of enforcement operations and the staff who carry them out. Such language is wrong in both cases. What the debate needs—in this place, more than anywhere—is accuracy and temperate language that reflects the facts and deals with these most difficult issues in a considered manner. I am glad that we have been able to achieve that this morning.

I welcome the hon. Member for Ashford (Damian Green) to his new position as the Conservative spokesman on immigration. I was pleased that he said at the start of his remarks that he would follow a civilised and credible immigration policy—although that begs the question of why Conservative policy was not like that before he arrived. Perhaps we can all welcome his party back to a more civilised position on these matters, and I hope that that will remain the case in the months ahead. As my hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland, South said, we do justice to the people who seek asylum by conducting the debate in that manner.

Let me make it clear to my hon. Friend that Ministers—including the Minister of State—would prefer no enforced returns to any country, and particularly no enforced returns of children. We would prefer to persuade and encourage people with no basis of stay or leave to remain in the country to leave voluntarily. That would be better for all concerned. Clearly it would be better for the Home Office, but it would also allow people to leave with more dignity and at a time of their choosing. That is a preferable outcome for all concerned.

We must do more. Responding to the issues raised by the National Audit Office report on returns, we must do more to encourage people to return voluntarily. I draw to the attention of my hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland, South the fact that later this week my hon. Friend the Minister of State will put forward more proposals on precisely that subject. His statement will deal with helping reintegration in society and providing more assistance, and will address some of the concerns raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland, South.

The broader picture relates to international development concerns that go beyond the remit of the Home Office. As my hon. Friend knows, the asylum system does not deal with the economic hardship, conditions or development of some of the most deprived countries in the world. As my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Jeremy Corbyn) said, the system must follow the terms of the 1951 convention on refugees. We do not forget about nor draw a veil over those conditions. They are important, and that is why we must work closely with the Department for International Development on these issues.

Mr. Mullin: I am interested not so much in people who return voluntarily, to whom we do indeed offer some help, but in people who are sent back by enforced return to the dysfunctional countries that I mentioned, to whom we offer none.

Andy Burnham: I have taken that point in the course of the debate. As my hon. Friend probably knows from his experience in office, the numbers returning to those countries are by definition quite small, because of the dysfunctional nature of some states. We are talking about a small number of people.

Mr. Mullin: We are, indeed—which makes the situation much easier to deal with.

Andy Burnham: I have heard the points that my hon. Friend has made, and I shall reflect on them with my hon. Friend the Minister of State.

Jeremy Corbyn: Will the Minister give way?

Andy Burnham: I do not have much time, but I will give way once.

Jeremy Corbyn: I recognise that the Minister has time problems, and if he cannot answer all the points in his 10 minutes, perhaps he could write to us about them. In specific terms, I should be interested to hear his views on the Congo, Somalia and the British Government's attitude to the way in which the convention on the rights of the child is operated.

Andy Burnham: I shall seek to explain that in the short time that I have left, but first let me draw together a few points that people have made. My hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland, South talked about basic human decency. Of course, that is what we should all strive to achieve. No system is beyond improvement, and by visiting Scotland my hon. Friend the Minister for Immigration, Citizenship and Nationality is engaging in precisely that debate, to see how we can respond to the concerns that have been expressed and create a system in which we can all have confidence.

However, there is a choice. At the end of the day, if the system is based on a series of rules, at some point the rules must be enforced. If we accept that, the debate shifts to how we do that as humanely as possible, respecting the basic humanity of all citizens. I would argue that that is happening now. Much intemperate language is used about the operations of the immigration service. Some of its public servants are carrying out some of the most difficult responsibilities on our behalf. We do not have an open-door immigration system, and I have not heard that any party in this House favours such a system. If we accept that, it follows that we must support the people who in challenging circumstances implement the system on behalf of the citizens of this country.

Those public servants deserve our support. That is not to say that we should not consider the practicalities of what they are doing on the ground; of course we should. We are sensitive to the points that have been raised by the hon. Member for Dundee, East (Stewart Hosie); we certainly do not use handcuffs routinely, and we certainly do not use them on children. We assess the risks involved in each operation to try to ensure that the scale of the operation is proportionate to the risk presented. We balance all those issues and we seek to improve all the time, but I assure the hon. Gentleman that some of the scare stories are not backed up by the reality. I urge everyone to consider the reality.

My hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland, South asked for more precise information from the Home Office about the operations, how they were carried out and the numbers that were involved. That is a good suggestion, and I shall consider it. Every Member of this House should be given the information if they want particular facts about the way in which an enforcement operation was carried out, so that there can be a local debate on what actually happened, and we can debate such matters in an informed and considered way.

Seasonal Agricultural Workers Scheme

12.30 pm

Hugh Robertson (Faversham and Mid-Kent) (Con): I welcome you to the Chair, Mr. Gale, for this debate on the Kentish fruit industry, about which you no doubt know a great deal. I also welcome the Minister and thank him for taking the time to respond to this short debate.

By way of introduction, let me say that I represent what I believe is the only remaining constituency in Britain in which fruit farming is the predominant type of agriculture. The county of Kent owes its reputation as the garden of England to that industry. I made my maiden speech on the subject in July 2001, when the Minister and I entered the House together, and since then I have served as secretary of the all-party group on the fruit industry. I asked for this debate, in the tradition of Westminster Hall, on behalf of my constituents, but it deals with concerns affecting the entire fruit sector.

Why is the seasonal agricultural workers scheme so important? To put it bluntly, without labour there is no means of picking the fruit that we grow. Labour accounts for between 40 and 60 per cent. of a fruit farmer's cost base and almost all the labour comes through SAWS. It follows that if the scheme is restricted in any way, the UK fruit industry will collapse. That will have enormous consequences for the wider local economy because there are jobs all over Kent in transport and marketing related to the fruit industry and in tourism. It will have enormous consequences for the environment, both locally, where orchards will be grubbed up, and nationally and internationally as alternative produce is sourced from abroad. It will have considerable consequences for Government policy, as well. The Government have launched schemes such as the healthy eating initiative, the five-a-day scheme and the fruit for schools scheme. Finally, it will have consequences for SAWS students, who benefit enormously financially and from the knowledge and experience that they gain of living and working in Britain. Almost none of them abscond at the end of the scheme.

This debate takes place against a backdrop of a Home Office review and I believe that a decision is due at the end of January. My aim this morning is to convince the Minister of three key points, the first of which is that fruit farming needs to be encouraged. It is important for the local economy, it produces high-quality produce close to the marketplace that is vital to a healthier diet and so on, and it is good for the environment. It deserves our support. Secondly—this is crucial—SAWS is not an immigration or asylum issue and should not be confused with either. Finally, SAWS is a welcome success story. It is a well managed and trouble-free scheme, which brings enormous benefits to the United Kingdom and, critically, to the students who participate in it. It needs to be encouraged and improved in the years ahead.

SAWS was set up after world war two to encourage European workers to take up short-term employment in agriculture and horticulture. It has always been aimed primarily at students at agricultural colleges or who have experience of the agricultural sector. In 2004, 25,000 students from outside the EU visited the UK to work on our farms and to learn our language and about our culture. Sadly, that number was reduced to only 16,000 in 2005 and the future of the scheme is now being reviewed as the Home Office launches a five-year plan to simplify the immigration system. The concern felt by many of my fruit farmers is that some people in government believe that the recent enlargement of the EU will provide a sufficient pool of low-skilled labour to replace SAWS students. That is emphatically not the case for the following five reasons.

First, SAWS is a well established and successful scheme. The model of students visiting the UK and gaining work experience and understanding of Britain has worked well for more than 40 years. SAWS is well managed, all operators are licensed by the Home Office and all participating farms are carefully monitored. The Home Office administers the scheme without difficulty and there is a simple fee to cover the costs. The fact that all the participants are students means that they have to return to their own country to complete their studies at the end of their time here. A parliamentary written answer tabled recently revealed that less than 1 per cent. of SAWS students ever abscond, so the scheme does not present any threat to immigration and asylum policy.

Secondly, there is a proven need for exactly that type of temporary labour force. Quite apart from what I said about the need to encourage fruit farming, the Government recognise the importance of the scheme. In 2002, the Home Office White Paper on managed migration, "Secure Borders, Safe Haven: Integration with Diversity in Modern Britain", stated:

> "There is a clear need for short-term casual labour. Although this comprises only a small proportion of all employment in the UK, it is important in industries such as agriculture. We will look again at the operation of the long-standing Seasonal Agricultural Workers' Scheme (SAWS) to see how it might better meet the needs of the agricultural sector. We will build on its principles to meet the demand for short-term casual labour in other sectors of the United Kingdom economy."

A couple of years ago, the Curry report recommended that the number of places on the scheme be increased to 50,000—double the peak of 25,000 in 2004. The White Paper suggests a mechanism for any sector to prove the need for labour, entirely based on SAWS. SAWS is popular with farmers and workers alike. Demand from UK farmers for reliable, well motivated SAWS students continues unabated and applications from students wishing to participate in the scheme outstrip demand by a ratio of 2:1. In short, there is a proven need among UK farmers and the students for SAWS to continue in Government policy.

Thirdly, developments in the EU labour market will increase the pressure on UK farmers and reinforce the need for SAWS. France, Germany and Italy have imposed restrictions on workers from the accession countries that are due to be lifted by 2007; indeed, by 2011 all restrictions of any sort will be lifted. Given that by then the UK is likely to be less favoured than some other EU countries as a work destination, due to its climate, geographical isolation and the resulting higher travel costs, it is premature to conclude that workers from the A8 accession countries will fill the demand presented by SAWS. We need to retain SAWS until we are sure that our agricultural labour requirements can be met by other means. My view is that they never will be.

Fourthly, it is most unlikely that EU workers will fill the void. Workers from elsewhere inside the EU want permanent jobs rather than the seasonal ones available in agriculture, and they will quickly move on to better paid opportunities here or in their own countries as their economies improve. If the Minister doubts that, he should consider the present lack of UK students working on farms during the summer vacation compared with 20 years ago, when I was at university. Most UK students would greatly prefer to work in, for example, the hospitality industry, and workers from other EU countries replicate that pattern precisely. In short, workers from the other EU countries cannot fill the void that is currently filled by SAWS students.

Fifthly and finally, the cultural and educational elements of the SAWS scheme set it apart from immigration and asylum issues. It is a remarkable testament to the success of the scheme that the Polish Agriculture Minister, Mr. Kowalski, is a former SAWS student. The experience gained by students in production technology, food and retailing plays an important part in helping their own economies when they return home. Furthermore, while they are here they benefit the local economy in the UK, as many local shops and pubs know well. Some students even earn enough money while they are here to buy their own land and set themselves up when they return home. One student I met two summers ago on a farm in my constituency had been coming here for three years while doing his medical studies and reckoned that if he returned for a further two years he would be able to pay off the mortgage on his flat in Belgrade.

In conclusion, I hope that I have convinced the Minister of the three key points that I set out at the start of my speech. First, fruit farming deserves our support. It produces high-quality produce, which accords with Government policy on healthy eating; it produces it close to the marketplace and it is good for the environment, particularly in areas such as the garden of England. However, the sector is under extreme pressure: costs are rising for farmers, which is set against the downward pressure on prices exerted by the supermarkets, while the demand for land in the south-east is growing fast. The availability of a capable seasonal labour force is a key issue. Without it, many fruit farms will sadly fold. Secondly—the key point—SAWS is not an asylum and immigration issue. It is a means for students from non-EU countries to visit Britain for up to six months and then return home. It has nothing to do with the immigration and asylum issues that cause so much public and political concern. Thirdly and finally, SAWS is a success story. Less than 1 per cent. of SAWS students ever abscond; the majority return home enriched by their experience of Britain and considerably wealthier. Put simply, there are no losers.

It is apparent to me that SAWS has an obvious home in tier 4 of the new system proposed in the Home Office White Paper. Can the Minister reassure my constituents and the wider fruit sector that he understands the issue and is able to make the necessary recommendations and representations inside his Department?

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Andy Burnham): I congratulate the hon. Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent (Hugh Robertson) on securing the debate. He is right to say that the fruit sector is important to our economy. I believe that the whole country is indebted to his constituency for the vast amount of fine produce that emerges from it. I am unsure how many people on the SAWS scheme are involved in hop picking, but if they are I certainly pay tribute to the fruits of their labour.

The hon. Gentleman is also right to say that the industry depends upon seasonal labour and is under pressure. We all know from the debate we see in the media that pressure is being exerted on agricultural producers in this country by price competition among supermarkets. Although that has been good for consumers in that the prices they pay have come down, it has made the pressure on domestic agriculture more severe. While celebrating the lower prices, we must understand what that equation means. He is also right to say that we would like local produce to be used in schools in pursuit of the five-a-day initiative. We would all want to unite behind that; I am pleased that he made reference to it.

I listened carefully to the three key points that the hon. Gentleman outlined and the arguments that he used to substantiate them. I agree with two of the three and disagree with one, but that is not to say that there is an unbridgeable gulf between us. I hope that he will find some cause for comfort at the end of my remarks.

The hon. Gentleman's first point was that the industry deserves support. As I have said, I agree. There is a long tradition of fruit farming in his part of the world. We obviously listen to the industry's concerns, to ensure that it is supported and that the people who depend on it can continue to do so. Of course, the industry is operating in a changed market. I picked strawberries in my youth, between A-levels and university, and it is certainly not glamorous work. Such work is not on the increase among the domestic work force, so I understand that there are pressures on the industry. Since the economy has expanded in different ways, people have alternative ways to make money. We have to understand how the industry operates in a changed environment and we have to provide support.

I agree with the hon. Gentleman's third point, that SAWS has been well managed and is a success. In some senses it is a win, win scheme. SAWS has been successful and has provided great benefit to those who have taken part in it and to our domestic agricultural industry over a number of years. He is right about that.

I disagree with the hon. Gentleman's second point, however. He says that SAWS is not an asylum or immigration issue. True, it is not an asylum issue, but it is an immigration issue. That is why I am answering the debate today. I respect his point about the cultural exchange elements of the scheme; none the less, SAWS deals with people coming to this country to work. That makes it an immigration issue and we have to consider it as such within the broader context of the Government's immigration policy. I shall discuss how that context is changing and how SAWS is affected.

The hon. Gentleman made the reference himself, but let me emphasise that the debate takes place against the backdrop of the development of a points-based system for managed migration, the consultation on which finished last year. The Home Office has consulted extensively with industry on developing the new scheme. Our aim is to move away from myriad, complicated niche schemes for immigration towards a much clearer, transparent scheme, where the public can have clear information about who is allowed into this country and why. The points-based system is not about letting fewer people or more people in; it is about letting enough people in to help the economy of this country at any given time and, in so doing, allowing the public to see clearly the reasons why people have been allowed to enter. Central to the rationale for the points-based scheme is that it is not intended to run at the same time as the range of niche schemes, such as SAWS and the working holidaymakers scheme. The whole point is to move to a more transparent system. That is the basis of today's debate.

The Government's five-year strategy on asylum and immigration stated that existing, quota-based, low-skilled migration schemes would be phased out over time. As I have said before, the basis of the decision in relation to SAWS is not that we think the scheme is flawed—on the contrary, SAWS has been successful. What we question is whether it is still required, given that the expansion of the European Union has given growers access to a larger pool of workers who are free and, on the evidence, willing to meet seasonal labour needs in the agricultural sector.

In July 2005 the Government published a consultation document, "Selective Admission: Making Migration Work for Britain", which set out in more detail our proposals for a new system to regulate economic migration. Stakeholders in the agricultural sector have been fully involved in the consultation process. I hope that the hon. Gentleman recognises that there has been detailed discussion with companies throughout the country, including in his own constituency. We are considering the responses to that document and we will publish our response, including what we intend in relation to SAWS, in due course. I am not in a position today to state precisely what we intend to do in relation to SAWS, but I will go through some of the issues that are shaping our thinking.

In 2003 nationals of countries that have since acceded to the European Union accounted for 60 per cent. of the 20,430 workers admitted under the scheme in that year. Romania and Bulgaria, which should accede to the European Union in the near future, accounted for a further 12 per cent. In 2004 we decided to cut the SAWS quota from 25,000 to 16,250 in the light of levels of take-up of the scheme by nationals of the accession states. Since their accession, nationals of the new member states have taken up employment in the agricultural sector in significant numbers. Since 1 May 2004, some 36,621 nationals from the eight accession countries have registered as employed in the agricultural sector under the worker registration scheme. The distribution of applications suggest that many are coming to do seasonal work. I can tell the hon. Gentleman that in the second quarter of 2005 there were 9,283 registrations, compared with 3,996 in the first quarter. That suggests that the expansion of the European Union and granting the nationals of the eight accession countries access to our labour markets has resulted in people continuing to come to do agricultural work.

Hugh Robertson: I entirely accept what the Minister says, and I thank him for his earlier remarks. The problem, as many farmers will tell him, is that many students from the EU come to work for farmers at first, but quickly move on to other jobs in the UK economy—they go to work in the hospitality industry, for example. In contrast, people who come to the country under SAWS can work only in the agricultural sector. They come, work on the farms for six months, and go back to their home countries, whereas those from inside the EU work on the farm for a month or so, then quickly get a better paid and more comfortable job in the local pub, for all the reasons to do with strawberry picking that the Minister mentioned. The retention of students from inside the EU is very small indeed.

Andy Burnham: I understand, and I take that point on board. I can understand the attractions for the agricultural sector of a scheme that is tied in that way. The figures that I gave suggest that people are coming to work in the agricultural sector. I know that the hon. Gentleman believes in the free market, in market enterprise, and in people being able to offer their labour where they can get most return for it, but if there is the pressure that he describes, people will have to look harder at how to retain the staff that they want, which is not necessarily a bad thing. One of the strengths of EU enlargement is that people can come and work in a range of sectors. The effect that the hon. Gentleman describes will be considered when the points-based system is developed, but it must be balanced against allowing people to contribute fully and to use all their skills, rather than being tied to a particular sector. That is particularly true of EU nationals, who should have that freedom.

Let me pick up on a point that the hon. Gentleman made about the rest of the EU beginning to open its labour markets to nationals. He mentioned that there was greater competition to attract people to work here. That might be true, and we have to respond to that, which raises the issue of how easy we make it for people to come here and work. I do not accept his point about Britain not being an attractive place for students to gain work experience. It is an extremely attractive destination and will continue to be so.

There may be more A8 nationals employed in the agricultural sector than the worker registration scheme statistics suggest. The National Farmers Union and the Association of Labour Providers consistently tell us that the worker registration scheme under-records the number of accession state nationals employed in the agricultural sector. If so, one reason for the under-recording may be that the WRS requires workers to be registered only if they have worked for a particular employer for a month. Seasonal agricultural work is no doubt more transient than other types of work, and many workers—research suggests almost half—may stay with a particular employer for less than one month, so it is possible that those people are moving to other employers within the agricultural sector.

The Government's view is that the availability of workers from an expanded EU calls into question the continued need for SAWS. It is not simply that an alternative source of labour is available; it is also a question of the robustness of the scheme. SAWS is a temporary migration scheme. Participants who are students are expected to return overseas at the end of their six-month stay. The evidence is that participants from eastern Europe have traditionally complied with that requirement. We are, however, responsible for upholding the integrity of the immigration system, and if SAWS were to continue alongside accession country migration, participants would necessarily be recruited from further afield and possibly from countries whose nationals have less incentive to return at the end of their stay. That is why this is an immigration matter—I must take issue with the hon. Gentleman on that point. SAWS must be seen within the context of the changing picture of immigration more generally.

There are two principal objections to a policy of relying on EU labour. The first is that employers in the agricultural sector have difficulty retaining workers who are free to take more attractive employment. I understand and accept that point, although the evidence does not entirely bear that out. We have examined WRS applications and have found that 50 per cent. of those who initially registered as employed in the agricultural sector and then changed employment changed jobs within the sector. As I said, the hon. Gentleman's claim has some basis in fact, but it is not entirely accurate. Individual employers may have problems retaining workers, but that is not necessarily true of the sector as a whole. If the retention of workers in this sector is an issue, however, we must find long-term solutions other than temporary migration schemes.

Secondly, as the new member states prosper, they will cease to provide a source of workers who are prepared to take unattractive jobs in the UK. That may well happen and we will need to monitor the situation, but there is little to suggest that it is happening now. Furthermore, the drying up of the new member states as a source of workers for low-skilled jobs may occur in tandem with the further expansion of the EU, which will compensate.

The role of temporary migration schemes in meeting the need for temporary workers in the agriculture industry needs to be put into context. SAWS is designed to meet a seasonal need for labour rather than any endemic labour need, but the evidence is that labour need in the agricultural sector is increasingly a year-round phenomenon. Research commissioned by the Department of Environment, Food and Rural Affairs and the Home Office suggests that demand for temporary workers, the majority of whom are engaged in packing and grading, peaks in the winter rather than in the picking season. If agriculture increasingly needs a year-round work force, it follows that that need is best met by relying on those with the freedom to enter the labour market rather than relying on seasonal immigration schemes.

We need to be realistic about how far migration, or at least specific low-skilled, temporary migration schemes, can or should meet the labour needs of the industry. The objection that removing such migration routes would lead to an increase in illegal working in the sector also needs to be put into perspective.

The research that I just mentioned suggested that the total number of temporary workers employed in agricultural, horticultural and collocated primary processing businesses was between 420,000 and 611,000. Only 3 per cent. of businesses in that sector that use temporary labour use the seasonal agricultural workers scheme. Some of those businesses may be concentrated in particular parts of the sector, but the seasonal agricultural workers scheme is quite marginal to the overall labour needs of the sector.

The number of workers admitted under SAWS is also small compared with the total number of migrants admitted to the UK in other categories and who are free to work some or all of the time. The figure was approximately 450,000 in 2003, and no doubt some of those migrants work in the agricultural sector. One way forward where needs emerge may be to encourage those who enter under other categories, such as youth mobility schemes, to take work in the agricultural sector. We continue to consider those issues as we develop the points-based system.

The Government are taking measures to address illegal working in the agricultural sector. In particular, the Gangmasters (Licensing) Act 2004 will require the licensing of labour providers in the sector and compliance with conditions set by the Gangmaster Licensing Authority, including compliance with the law on illegal working.

As I have said, no decision on the timing of phasing out SAWS has been taken, and we will want to take account of the views of the industry in taking that decision. We will also take account of the views expressed by the hon. Gentleman today. It remains the Government's view that opening up our labour market to the new member states should remove the need for temporary migration schemes to meet labour shortages at low-skill levels. The Government hear what the hon. Gentleman says. We are working to develop a system that responds to the needs of the industry and gives us an immigration system in which we can all have confidence.

Health Services (Huddersfield)

Mr. Roger Gale (in the Chair): I understand that the hon. Member for Wakefield (Mary Creagh) has arranged for other Members to participate in this debate. As she knows, this debate is strictly limited to 30 minutes, so it is up to her to manage the time.

1 pm

Mary Creagh (Wakefield) (Lab): Thank you, Mr. Gale, for your flexibility in allowing colleagues from neighbouring constituencies to speak in this debate.

Hon. Members may be asking why, as the Member for Wakefield, I am discussing Huddersfield health services. The reason is that my constituency contains two wards, Denby Dale and Kirkburton, that fall under the local authority area of Kirklees. The wards are large rural areas covering some 80 square miles with poor roads, and my constituents will be deeply affected by the proposed changes. I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Colne Valley (Kali Mountford), in whose constituency the Huddersfield royal infirmary lies, and my hon. Friend the Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) for attending today, and I look forward to hearing their views on how the proposals will impact on their constituents.

In October 2005, the Calderdale and Huddersfield NHS trust and the local primary care trusts published proposals in the "Looking to the Future" consultation on the future of health provision in the area. The laudable aims are to move services closer to people and to provide safe high-quality hospital care. However, maternity care and gynaecology and obstetrics are to be transferred from Huddersfield royal infirmary to Calderdale royal infirmary five miles away in Halifax. The document states that the changes are being made because local people said that they wanted as much care as possible to be provided closer to their homes. The trust wants to provide local services, and local people want local services, but the changes in maternity services will have exactly the opposite effect. Obstetricians and anaesthetists who are on call for childbirth at Huddersfield royal infirmary will no longer be available, and women who need specialist treatment during childbirth will have to travel to Halifax. Fewer services will be available locally and specialist care will be provided further from my constituents' homes.

At present, women from Denby Dale or Kirkburton can give birth at Huddersfield royal infirmary, which offers the full range of back-up should the birth prove more difficult than expected. Under the new proposals, that option would no longer be available to any woman at risk of complications. The trust proposes a new midwife-led unit at the hospital for low-risk women, but the criteria by which women are judged to be high or low risk are fairly wide. I can understand the reason for that, as birth is a risky time for mother and baby. Women who are considered at risk include those who are having their first baby, those who are aged under 18 or over 35, and those who have a medical condition such as diabetes or high blood pressure. They also include women who need epidurals and caesarean sections, women with infections, users of class A drugs, those who have received in vitro fertilisation treatment, and women with a high or low body mass index. In short, a large percentage of pregnant women would be unable to give birth in the new midwife-led unit.

[Mary Creagh]

Women from Denby Dale and Kirkburton and their partners would have to travel 25 miles to the Pontefract general infirmary in the Wakefield district, 15 miles to the Calderdale royal infirmary in Halifax, or 12 miles to Barnsley. At present, 2,700 women give birth at Huddersfield royal infirmary. It is expected that a maximum of 400 or 500 women will give birth at the midwife-led unit, so the remaining 2,200 will have to travel to the Calderdale royal in Halifax.

There is a birth centre in Wakefield in the heart of my constituency. I wish to discuss some of the issues that have arisen there. Despite the excellent care provided by midwives, the number of women choosing to give birth in the birth centre has been much lower than expected. One of the consequences of that is that staff sometimes spend entire shifts without helping a woman give birth, so the centre has been downgraded from a 24-hour service to a 9-to-5 operation.

A woman at the proposed midwife-led unit at Huddersfield royal infirmary would be transferred if she developed unexpected complications during her labour to Calderdale royal infirmary. She would be moved out of the room that she was giving birth in, taken out of the building, put in an ambulance and transferred to a new hospital with a new set of carers. We must ask ourselves whether that will prepare the woman mentally to welcome her new baby.

Carolyn Saville, a Royal College of Midwives steward, has written a consultation response, in which she highlights the concerns of midwives and ambulance services working in this area. The ambulance crews are concerned because they do not feel that they have a great deal of specialist maternity training to support midwives who are transferring labouring women. Both sets of professionals feel that they have not been properly consulted. She also talks about the figures from the Halifax midwife-led unit—the Calderdale midwife-led unit—where between one third and half of the women were transferred to the consultant-led unit during labour. That is just a transfer down a corridor, but women labouring in the Huddersfield royal infirmary would be transferred 5 miles.

Women rightly have high expectations for a positive, safe and comfortable delivery of their child. The stresses that that type of transfer brings will not help their sense of being in control and of being in a positive frame of mind. Women with a retained placenta or extensive tearing after the birth will also be transferred. What will happen to the partner and the baby? Will they travel with them in the ambulance? How will the partner choose between caring for their new baby and supporting their sick partner?

My hon. Friends the Members for Huddersfield and for Colne Valley and I have collected a petition and postcards as part of our campaign against the changes. We have spoken to our constituents, who want to keep a fully supported maternity service in Huddersfield. My hon. Friend the Member for Colne Valley and I met Diane Whittingham, the chief executive of Calderdale and Huddersfield NHS trust, and her officers and colleagues last Friday to convey our constituents' concerns. It is clear that the changes are driven not by a lack of funding but by the need to maintain specialist training of doctors and provide consultants with sufficient cases to ensure professional development. We want well trained specialists, but if it is necessary for them to undergo training, surely transport could be provided for the doctors to travel between the hospitals, rather than forcing labouring women to make the journey in an ambulance when they are giving birth?

A woman who suffers the tragedy of her baby dying in the womb would have to leave the midwife who supported her during her pregnancy, travel to Calderdale and have a different midwife caring for her if she wished to have an induced labour or a caesarean. A woman who presented at accident and emergency in Huddersfield with an ectopic pregnancy would have to make the same journey or, if she was in extreme danger, would be operated on by a general surgeon in Huddersfield. All of those things happen, albeit rarely—we might be talking about only 10 cases a year—and they all matter.

We believe that the trust should re-examine the proposals. We are grateful to the Minister for taking part in this debate. We want mothers to have confidence in the service and to know that they will be fully supported should anything go wrong. I look forward to hearing what my hon. Friends have to say.

1.8 pm

Kali Mountford (Colne Valley) (Lab): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Wakefield (Mary Creagh) for securing this important debate. It is important for three MPs present, because it affects our constituents so profoundly.

The changes date back to before I became an MP. Changes to local services were considered as long ago as 1996. Indeed, in 1999 a consultation took place in our constituencies whose findings were profoundly rejected by the local community. That set of proposals would have resulted in all the maternity services and many other services being transferred to Halifax. The health authority at that time rejected the proposals because the campaign against them in our communities was so strong.

It is important to mention that, because the current consultation has to be real and has to be listened to. Local people have developed a certain cynicism about what lies behind it. They do not hear doctors' concerns for their patients and for their own long-term development as clinicians; instead, they hear little more than, "We have something that you want to take away." Some people were consulted before the so-called official phase of consultation took place, and I applaud the hospital trust for attempting to find out what women of birthing age who had recently had babies or were about to have them thought. What they thought was very interesting and must be considered. The key thing they wanted was to have midwife support throughout the pregnancy and up to the birth; they did not want to have a break in care at any point in between. They needed that confidence.

It is not that local women do not want a midwife-led centre, but that they want one in which they can have trust and faith. If the midwife-led centre is set up as proposed, there will be dangers and worries. The key worry for me is whether it would have the public confidence it needs to be set up successfully.

I wish to discuss one or two issues other than the maternity services, so I shall try to make sure that I have time to mention them, but maternity services are the ones in the consultation that draw the most concern. Most other conditions mentioned in the report are special cases, for which people would travel anywhere to get the best treatment, but giving birth is seen as an ordinary, everyday event. It is not an illness, but an ordinary part of every family's life. People expect to have their babies at home or near home, and certainly in their home town. The idea that they may not be able to have their babies in Huddersfield causes the people I have mentioned great concern. Indeed, our local paper's last campaign was called the "born in Huddersfield" campaign.

This is a serious issue for people. Some clinicians have turned their noses up at it, but it matters, not only because of the real concerns outlined by my hon. Friend the Member for Wakefield about whether we can clinically support women during transfer, but because of questions about whether the women would have the confidence to use the midwife-led unit.

I would like to see a successful midwife-led unit. The evidence is that if a midwife-led unit has a home-like setting, it produces a better birth experience and fewer clinical interventions—certainly fewer unnecessary ones. We have seen a rise in unnecessary Caesarean sections and in all sorts of other procedures that some of us might have experienced but that the gentlemen here will certainly not have. For the sake of your stomach, Mr. Gale, and that of my hon. Friend the Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman), I shall not go into a description of them, but a lot of them are now demanded by women when they are really not necessary. In a more home-like setting, such births and procedures would not be necessary. The proposals could, if handled properly, give women the confidence to give birth in a more natural way, and I applaud that idea.

The problem is that even in the most natural and normal of settings, even if there is only a one in a thousand chance of something going wrong, people want to know that the moment it does, the person who can best help them will be there on site. The real dispute is about whether there are people on site who can help. On Friday, my hon. Friend the Member for Wakefield outlined to our colleagues in the health service the particular case of an ectopic pregnancy. They said immediately, "Yes, of course we would have general surgeons on site. We would be willing to come immediately ourselves; we would be good Samaritans. In such circumstances, we would obviously not transfer a woman, but help her there and then in the hospital where she had presented herself."

If we can be good Samaritans, can we not build into the protocols a means by which women can be confident that when something that has not been sorted out by the sifting process goes tragically and unexpectedly wrong, they will be assured of giving birth with some surety that they will be safe? That is paramount. Otherwise, a midwife-led centre will not be successful because people will automatically choose the place where clinical interventions can be made immediately and where all the obstetricians, gynaecologists and paediatricians that women feel they need are already on site.

I do not want a centre to be set up to fail. We need to be careful about how it is set up in the initial stages so that we can have the confidence and build up the number of births in that centre before making any other changes. I cannot see how removing services when the number of births is still about 200 a year can be a viable proposition. I want to see as many babies who can properly be born in Huddersfield to be born there; it is the right place for them to be.

I should like briefly to mention breast cancer services. Public subscriptions were used to buy equipment and local people feel that they paid for it, but they fear that it will now be taken to Halifax. I want people to know that on Friday we received an assurance that the equipment will stay in Huddersfield and will be there for local people, who have paid for it. That part of the breast cancer service will stay there. It is important that that is known.

It is important that the consultation takes account of all the public concerns and that the postcards and petitions that have been sent in do matter. The Socialist party petition, which unfortunately does not even mention these particular services has been signed by 1,700 people, who do not realise that they are not being counted. In my view, they believed that they were signing something that said that they did not want maternity services removed. Unfortunately, the petition refers to having no Government cuts to health services, so those people are not being counted. I want to put on record that those 1,700 people, with those who signed the petitions run by my hon. Friends and myself, want maternity services to stay in Huddersfield.

1.15 pm

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield) (Lab/Co-op): I shall be brief. Given the considerable expertise on these issues of my hon. Friends the Members for Wakefield (Mary Creagh) and for Colne Valley (Kali Mountford), who am I, a mere mortal man, to contribute to the debate? However, I have four children and a family history of using the excellent facilities of the excellent Huddersfield royal infirmary over many years. The service is great. We all know how much we appreciate a first-class service from a local hospital when our children are ill. A good general hospital is founded on two pillars: a good accident and emergency department and a good maternity department. If one of those pillars is taken away, it undermines the whole notion of a good, comprehensive general hospital.

Let me give some background. Huddersfield is a much larger town than Halifax. The healthy Huddersfield trust—it was financially healthy and well run—merged with the Calderdale trust, which had been less well managed and faced an expensive overrun on a private finance initiative hospital. Huddersfield residents, taxpayers and council tax payers have a right to believe that they got the short end of the deal not only in terms of having rescued the other trust, but because, further down the line, it seems that some of the services to Huddersfield are threatened.

There is an important issue at stake in the sense that we have been scrutinising midwife-led units throughout the country. There is no doubt that it will be some time before the National Institute for Health and Clinical Excellence inquiry reports. It seems strange to make a big decision before there has been a full evaluation of how midwife-led units work. Some of the evidence that has come to the attention of my office and those of my colleagues suggests that there is a question mark over some of the units. They may be appropriate: certain women, usually those from more affluent backgrounds, consider that to be the sort of unit in which they want to deliver their children. That is perfectly all right, but most of the units are small, dealing with an estimated 400 or 500 births a year each. As my colleagues have said, there are 2,500 births a year in Huddersfield, so 2,000 women would have to go elsewhere.

Many people who look at the topography of our part of the world do not understand that the 5 or 6 miles between Huddersfield and Halifax is a hell of a long way, given the hills, valleys and traffic. If we build into that the experience that my constituents have had trying to park at the new Halifax PFI hospital, it is a daunting prospect indeed. It does no one any good if people estimate that it will take only 12 minutes to travel between Huddersfield and Halifax, when most of us who have travelled that way know that one would be a lucky man or woman to do it in that time. It is much more likely to take at least half an hour. There are real difficulties.

Do not let us dismiss—I know that my colleagues have not—a town that produced Harold Wilson, who was born in the local hospital. People feel that they should be able to be born in the hospital in their town—born in Huddersfield. If you had seen the valiant display Huddersfield Town put on against Chelsea on Saturday, Mr. Gale, your heart would have swelled with pride in Huddersfield and you would know what we are talking about. Unfortunately, we were robbed of a draw, but the fact of the matter is that pride in one's local area and local town, especially when it is the larger town, is important.

I must make one party political point and I hope that it will not upset you, Mr. Gale. We ran a wonderful democratic campaign on the issue. In 1999, my hon. Friend the Member for Colne Valley and I fought and won the campaign. We were proud of that success and we have worked constantly for the hospital. It is a fine hospital that has delivered excellent care and usually obtains all the stars that are available to it. No one can take away my pride in its public servants, whether porters, consultants, administrators and so on. All are first class and I do not want to downgrade or do any disservice to them. However, the Liberal Democrats, without a majority, have overall control of Kirklees metropolitan council. They went on the attack and made the issue a party political one. That destroyed my faith in local democratic politics because it should not be a party political issue. It is about local people who want a local resource that is accessible. That is the strong message from Huddersfield and I hope that the Minister is listening.

1.21 pm

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Ms Rosie Winterton): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Wakefield (Mary Creagh) on securing this debate on an important local issue. I also congratulate my hon. Friends the Members for Colne Valley (Kali Mountford) and for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) on the way in which all contributions have reflected their constituents' needs. Their constituents will be extremely reassured to know that their views are being so eloquently voiced in this place.

I concur with much of what has been said about Calderdale and Huddersfield NHS trust being well resourced and well managed. I congratulate it on being awarded three stars this year by the Healthcare Commission, thanks to the hard work and dedication of local NHS staff. I am sure that they are pleased to have Members of Parliament who take up issues in the House and thank them for their hard work. Too often, we do not thank our NHS staff. However, the trust and local PCTs clearly feel that despite the stars awarded more changes need to be made to build on the improvements and to ensure that high-quality services continue to be offered.

I reiterate that we are discussing proposals which are out for consultation. It is absolutely right that that consultation process should take account of all views expressed. I remind my hon. Friends that Kirklees metropolitan council will be able to refer any changes to the Secretary of State if it contests a substantial change to health services and feels that there has been inadequate consultation or that the proposals do not have merit. We are in the middle of a consultation process and it is right that local decisions are taken in that way. Local people know their priorities and the services that are available and it is important that they have the right to make their views known.

I know that a number of the proposals are controversial and I shall explain the information that I have been given on why the PCTs and the trust feel that they need to make changes. I have been given an assurance that after the proposed changes the majority of women who currently give birth at Huddersfield will continue to do so. Most births will take place at the two new midwife-led units based at hospitals in Huddersfield and Halifax. The trust has planned for 500 births a year at the unit in Huddersfield initially, and hopes that this will rise over time.

The trust proposes that neonatal intensive care, paediatric in-patients and obstetric care all be centralised at the Calderdale royal site in Halifax. Let me be clear about this: I have been informed that there is real concern that without those changes the trust will lose its intensive care accreditation awarded by the Yorkshire Neonatal Network, because the trust is unable to provide senior medical staff cover on the labour ward from Monday to Friday. Withdrawal of intensive care accreditation would result in all local babies who require intensive care having to travel to Leeds. That is one of the clinical reasons the trust has given to explain why it does not believe that children's and maternity services can be maintained at both sites.

Mr. Sheerman: Will my hon. Friend address the arithmetic? If there are 2,000 or 2,200 live births in Huddersfield per year and only 500 will be accommodated by the new unit, 1,700 mothers will have to go to Halifax. It is not just the more difficult cases, but most women who will have to travel. I think that she has been misinformed.

Ms Winterton: That is certainly one of the issues I would expect the trust to take into account. However, the concern is that the trust cannot provide the level of round-the-clock cover on children's wards it believes is needed. By centralising in-patient services, Calderdale will be able to have two consultant paediatricians available in an emergency at all times. It is also struggling to meet national clinical standards for obstetric services which state that an obstetrician should be present on labour wards for at least 40 hours a week. The trust is the only one in Yorkshire and Humberside that is unable to provide readily accessible senior medical cover to the labour wards from 9 am to 5 pm, Monday to Friday.

I know that some people have expressed concern that patients will not be able to receive the best care from the midwife-led unit in Huddersfield, but I hope that I can give some reassurance following the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Colne Valley. Research shows that for a healthy woman with a normal pregnancy, delivery at home or in a midwife-led unit is as safe as a hospital birth. There are already 100 such units across the country and the vast majority of women in a midwife-led unit have a problem-free labour.

I return to a point that my hon. Friend the Member for Wakefield raised with me before, which is the capacity of the ambulance service to deal with increased transfers between Huddersfield and Halifax. I have followed her question up and I have been assured that the trust is already discussing the matter with the West Yorkshire metropolitan ambulance service to ensure that a robust service is in place. I hope that that reassures her.

My hon. Friend the Member for Colne Valley suggests that the changes should not go ahead until the midwife-led unit at Huddersfield is up and running. She has mentioned that to me before and I have some sympathy with that view. I have made inquiries and I am assured that the midwife-led unit will be up and running before consultant-led services are transferred to Calderdale.

Final decisions about the reorganisation of these services have not yet been made. The purpose of any consultation exercise is to seek out and listen to the views of the public on proposed changes. However, I felt it important to give some of the important reasons relating to the need for emergency services and so on for the proposed changes. It is important to have that intensive care accreditation, because there would be bigger problems without it—

Mr. Roger Gale (in the Chair): Order. We must move on to the next debate.

Post-doctoral Scientific Careers

1.30 pm

Dr. Evan Harris (Oxford, West and Abingdon) (LD): I am pleased to have the opportunity to discuss a matter of importance to the present and future success of the United Kingdom science base. I note that the Hansard record is not full of previous debates on the topic. I am pleased that you are in the Chair, Mr. Gale, as I know that you take an active interest in all matters relating to the future of the UK science base. I also welcome the Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, the hon. Member for Brent, North (Barry Gardiner). The Minister for Science and Innovation, Lord Sainsbury, sits in the House of Lords, so it is the role of the hon. Gentleman, who is also a Department of Trade and Industry Minister, to substitute for him in this place, which he does ably. It seems as though it was only the other day that we were discussing scientific publications and open access in another Adjournment debate.

The people we are discussing—post-doctoral researchers or post-doctoral students—are scientists who have got a good result in their degree, which has enabled them to get funding for and then to complete a doctorate, and the majority of whom have gone on to work in what is called contract research. There are tens of thousands of them and they are some of the brightest people our higher education system has produced. They have the potential to help to make great discoveries through science, pure research and applied; through the application of experimental techniques and the basic knowledge taught to them at university during their degree courses and doctorates; through interactions with other people in their laboratories and work areas as well as internationally through collaborations and conferences; and through their reading. It is my contention that they feel undervalued and that we are not making the best use of them, because many of them are leaving.

That is not a new concern. In fairness, it must be said that the Government have recognised the problem, as have the higher education funding councils, research funders, and the Wellcome Trust and other charities that are members of the Association of Medical Research Charities. The questions now are: has enough been done, are the initiatives working, and do the Government have mechanisms in place to determine whether the initiatives are working? I shall set out what post-doctoral researchers hold the problems to be, examine some of the initiatives that have been put in place, question how well we are measuring the outcomes, and then address what next steps the Government can take—or help to catalyse, because responsibility in this area does not lie with Government alone, although the Government have an important role, as they are the major source of public funding for schemes and have a role in quality assurance in science and in personnel and human resource policies.

I am grateful to the individual post-doctoral researchers who have told me their views. In my roles as Liberal Democrat science spokesman and as a member of the Science and Technology Committee, I visit institutions and I take the opportunity to ask to meet with post-doctoral researchers on a group basis, without senior management or heads of department being present. Heads of department usually provide excellent hospitality on such visits and they tell us about their strategies and the progress that is being made, but, speaking as one who is particularly interested in the careers of scientists, I believe that there is no substitute for asking them individually and in groups, and in the absence of their bosses, what they really think of their lot. One of the questions I wish to discuss is to what extent the high-level bodies that look at research careers are directly in touch with the views of the people who are affected.

Post-doctoral researchers, whether they have jobs in rigorously selective research departments of high reputation or in other research departments also doing excellent work, report their concerns to me. The concerns are not specific to the departments that may be seen to be struggling in terms of the research assessment exercise, or to those who feel that they are not the brightest and the best of a very bright and effective group of people. We are talking about some of the top people who are still not happy, who are leaving and who are encouraging people not to stay in this role.

I am grateful to Cancer Research UK in particular, to Universities UK and to the British Heart Foundation for their briefings. I pay tribute to the work of people in the Wellcome Trust such as its director, Mark Walport, who has looked into this issue, and those who have served in the Research Careers Initiative, particularly Professor Sir Gareth Roberts, whom I was pleased to meet just last week at the Association for Science Education conference in Reading. He has gone beyond the call of duty in what he has sought to do. He has not only taken the thorny crown of dealing with the research assessment exercise which has a bearing on this subject, but, with his report "SET for Success", he looked at the supply of scientists to the UK science base and then chaired the Research Careers Initiative and the Research Careers Committee of the Research Funders' Forum, which flowed out of it. I pay tribute to his work and I was pleased to have the opportunity, albeit brief, to talk to him in advance of this debate.

Cancer Research UK describes the position well. It says that post-doctoral researchers are a valuable asset to UK research but that the lack of job security and clear career structure is a disincentive for scientists to stay in research. Let me explain what the real issue is. We are talking about people who have completed their undergraduate training, accumulating debt on the way. The Minister knows that I think that that is a flawed policy because it deters people who could benefit from it from going into higher education. In particular it deters those who graduate with debt, particularly those from debt-averse backgrounds, from going into less well-paid public sector jobs, which are highly valuable to this country's economy and certainly as valuable as better paid jobs in the City and in industry. Those people emerge from university with debts and they then do doctorates. I acknowledge that the stipend for doctorates has been increased, which I welcome, but it is also not sufficient to enable them even to think about living independently. They then go on to get three-year contracts which do not pay well compared with the earnings of people who are likely to be as bright as them, but who took their degrees in other subjects and are now working in the private sector. The people we are discussing are often earning between £20,000 and £30,000 three, four or five years after getting their doctorates.

We are talking about people in their late twenties and early thirties who may still be in debt from their student days and who have no prospect of being able to buy a house on their own or even with their partners. They are stuck with the prospect, particularly in high living cost areas such as my constituency, Cambridge and London, of sharing a house, just as they did in their student days. When people ask them whether they would encourage others to go into their career, they often reply, "What career? There is no career. There is a job. There is a pretty poor salary. It has been improved recently and there are some career development opportunities. There may be sources of more advice but fundamentally things have not changed."

Post-doctoral researchers play a crucial role in UK academic research and losing people of their valuable experience is a real problem. Let us consider what happens if someone with great experience of how a lab works and the experimental techniques in the broad area in which the work is being undertaken leaves because his funding runs out. The university cannot retain him because it has not been able to attract the grant that it requires to keep on an experienced person, or it is more likely to receive funding if within the grant application it substitutes an experienced post-doctoral salary for a more junior post-doctoral salary even though the junior person does not share the experience of the person who has done the good work that has enabled the university to renew the grant or explore new areas. In those circumstances, who will be left in the lab to supervise the students? As the Minister knows, the principal investigator is often not around to do the hands-on supervision and training of students. Often, the result will be either demoralised doctoral students or poorly less incisively done science. The role of the laboratory expert with experience must be recognised, cherished and nurtured. I fear that that is not happening at the moment.

Despite the initiatives that the Minister will no doubt describe, the position is not getting better. Although I welcome the initiatives, in recent years the proportion of research funding that universities receive in the form of fixed-term grants has gradually increased. The type of funding that promotes short termism has increased, as a result of which the proportion of researchers on short-term contracts has also increased markedly. Currently, more than half of post-doctoral researchers in United Kingdom universities are funded through short-term contracts, and that proportion is increasing. We are now left with a growing number of people who have a lack of job security as a result of working on multiple short-term contracts, which is a strong disincentive for scientists to remain in academia. Researchers can end up spending many years on short-term contracts, each lasting for only two to three years, but as their experience grows they become more expensive to employ, and ultimately they may be priced out of the market in favour of young, less experienced scientists on a lower pay scale.

It is a matter of chiefs and indians. I am not arguing that every post-doctoral researcher should be given a job for life and tenure. No one would argue that, but there must be ways to enable the best of the post-doctoral researchers who are not in a position to take on lectureships or principal investigator roles to convert to open-ended contracts. Some people are simply not interested in doing that and are interested only in doing the work that they love. They recognise that that will limit their lifetime earnings, but there must be a way to allow them to convert to open-ended contracts.

Another problem engendered by the present culture is that researchers are constantly moving every two to three years. Research projects have little continuity and suffer as a consequence, making it less likely that research goals can be reached. I accept that we cannot be too purist about such matters because it is necessary for researchers to be mobile at an early stage in their career if that suits the area that they are exploring. They must be able to look at different groups, try different techniques and have the opportunity to move around. I am not saying that there are no benefits in mobility, but it is not the case that those benefits cannot be achieved—indeed, I believe that they can be best achieved—from the basis of an open-ended contract that people can move from because they have the confidence to put everything into their scientific career without worrying about whether they ought to consider training in something else in order to have some form of career that will give them the job security that they need as they enter their 30s.

There is also concern that the training received by post-doctoral researchers on short-term contracts does not meet all their development needs. It often relates specifically to their research fields and does not provide them with transferable skills. I am pleased that there are initiatives to provide a certain number of sessions and funding to go with that to tackle the problem, but has the evaluation been done?

I am not the first person to raise the issue. It has been raised in the main outside general parliamentary debate. It has certainly been investigated in Science and Technology Committee reports—there have been Lords and Commons reports into such issues. Sir Gareth Roberts' report "SET for Success: The supply of people with science, technology, engineering and mathematics skills" clearly stated several points. It said that research councils and other research sponsors should significantly increase starting salaries for post-doctoral researchers. Some of that has now been done through the initiative in the higher education sector to tackle issues of equal pay for work of equal value, which has generally tended to uplift salaries, but no one could argue that that solved the problem—the difference between people of the same age in different jobs who are and are not clinically qualified is enormous—or that that current post-doctoral research salaries are satisfactory. Sir Gareth also pointed out that unattractive career structures, including short-term contracts and low levels of responsibility, are responsible for deterring postgraduates from pursuing a career in science.

The final report of the Research Careers Initiative, which stemmed from the work of Sir Gareth Roberts and his colleagues, recommended that various issues be taken forward by the Research Funders' Forum and dealt with in the promulgation of a new protocol to renew the old protocol on setting higher standards for post-doctoral research. I should like to ask the Minister what point that work has reached, because the timetable set in the report appears to have slipped drastically. No help is found in the minutes of the careers research sub-committee of the Research Funders' Forum, because the only minutes available on the website are of what appears to be the first meeting, held on 1 October 2004. That talks about reporting to the Research Funders' Forum in April 2005, and states that it is intended that work on the replacement for the concordat will be completed by July 2005 and presented to the Research Funders' Forum in autumn 2005. I should like the Minister to tell me what has happened.

Finally, I should like to touch on the European working time directive on short-term working. The EU fixed-term contract directive is designed to protect workers by preventing employers from using successive contracts as a means to avoid making employment permanent. To comply, Governments and the member states must introduce measures that specify

"(a) objective reasons for justifying the renewal of such contracts and relationships;

(b) the maximum total duration of successive fixed-time contracts or relationships;—

and—

(c) the number of renewals of such contracts or relationships."

Crucially, the directive requires that fixed-term workers

"shall not be treated in a less favourable manner . . . because they have a fixed-term contract or relation unless different treatment is justified on objective grounds."

It is unclear what the impact of that has been in this country. I shall be grateful if the Minister clarifies what work is being done to identify whether—in contrast to what we hear from Cancer Research UK—there has been a move towards universities giving people open-ended contracts funded by the prospect and prediction of grant income, which is one of the key ways forward. Post-doctoral researchers tell me that that directive means only that they get a few hundred pounds in redundancy money; it does not change the situation on the ground.

Finally—recognising that we do not have time for a full debate about all the issues—I remind the Minister that one of the key points about the treatment of this group of people is the differential and disproportionate affect that it has on women and ethnic minorities in science. That message runs throughout the reports—it is not directly dealt with, but is certainly referred to in almost every report—and the Government clearly recognise it. If the Government's commitment to promoting science as a career for women and promoting the careers of women in science is to mean anything, they must tackle the problems of short-term contract working, a demoralised work force, and the loss of expertise and the waste of talent and investment that results from people leaving science because of unsatisfactory career prospects for those who are good at science and who would otherwise want to continue. I look forward to the Minister's response.

1.48 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Barry Gardiner): Mr. O'Hara, anyone reading Hansard may be confused about why I address you in the Chair, but the quick change that was done in the hot seat while the hon. Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon (Dr. Harris) was speaking has brought you to it and I am glad to see you there supervising the remainder of this afternoon's debate.

I thank the hon. Gentleman for raising the subject of post-doctoral scientific careers and for the way in which he based his contribution on the experience of conducting his own research among the researchers. He spoke with great candour and I shall try to respond in the same vein.

The Government attach importance to this subject, which is particularly significant if we are to realise the UK-wide and European-wide targets that depend so much on having enough well trained scientists. If the UK is to have a supply of highly motivated and well trained post-doctoral scientists, it is essential that their career options are attractive. The Government's determination to achieve that has been evident in the last two spending review commitments. For example, one key theme of the 2004 spending review allocations was the importance of strengthening the health of the engineering and physical science disciplines. The £10 billion allocation of funding for the period between 2005 and 2008 aims to lay the foundations by improving the health of key disciplines.

The hon. Gentleman introduced one perhaps contentious note when he spoke about student fees and the legacy of debt that they leave. I trust that he acknowledges that whereas under the old regime post-doctoral students would face a requirement to pay back 9p in every pound that they earned over £10,000, under the new regime the threshold is raised to £15,000. Year on year, while they are doing their post-doctoral studies, the chances are that they will be at least £450 better off and less likely to have to repay the debt in the first place. I shall not dwell on that point, because the hon. Gentleman made a great many important comments to which I want to respond.

The Government have already taken steps to improve the attractiveness of careers in science and to maintain the future supply of skilled people by enthusing schoolchildren about science and careers in that field. In recent years we have made a number of changes that have improved the attractiveness of research careers generally and the conditions for those engaged in them. Those changes stem from the review, which the hon. Gentleman mentioned, carried out by Sir Gareth Roberts on the supply of people with science, technology, engineering and mathematics skills. The "SET for Success" review brought to wide attention the key issues that affect post-doctoral and other research staff in universities and their impact on the recruitment and retention of those individuals. Issues included a lack of a clear career structure, uncertain career prospects, unsatisfactory training and increasingly uncompetitive salaries.

Although universities and research organisations are the employers of post-doctoral scientists, the Government, through the research councils, have introduced a series of measures designed to encourage employers to improve the attractiveness of research careers and to support the training and development offered by universities and research organisations. The Government have provided £185 million of new money up until 2007–08 to introduce the so-called Roberts measures. They are aimed at not only post-doctoral researchers, but at PhD students, who have benefited enormously from them. Specifically, research council PhD students, who comprise about one third of the total, receive a stipend of at least £12,000, tax-free. That represents a tangible increase in their remuneration, which has almost doubled since 1998, and it improves the attractiveness of further study to those who have the capacity to go on with it. That is at least one way in which the Government have attempted to address the problem, on which the hon. Gentleman commented, of people feeling under-valued.

Research council PhD students also receive two weeks of training in transferable skills every year—another issue mentioned by the hon. Gentleman. That has already had an impact on attitudes to such training in UK universities, and universities are actively participating in the sharing of good practice. Measures are also being developed in consultation with the sector to evaluate the impact of that additional training on the employability of PhD graduates.

For post-doctoral researchers, funding has increased research council salaries in areas that experience recruitment and retention difficulties. Research council researchers are also now provided with career development training through that funding. In addition, a new academic fellowship scheme has been developed to provide 1,000 new fellowships over five years. The schemes aim to provide more stable and attractive routes into academic careers, for which the hon. Gentleman was calling.

As part of the process of assessing the effectiveness of these measures, the research councils have commissioned a study to monitor the impact of increased funding for post-doctoral salaries on the higher education employment culture. They are particularly interested in the impact that that aspect of the funding has had on the employment practices of universities and research organisations.

With regard to the other measures aimed at post-doctoral researchers, the academic fellowships scheme has had a positive impact, and at least two universities have effectively cloned the scheme for the recruitment of their academic staff. The scheme has a clear structure that aims towards an academic career and includes outreach work into schools and teaching duties. That clear structure tackles the concern that the post-doctoral researcher has no identifiable career path. The scheme was launched in March 2004, and 398 fellows are now in place. If their performance is satisfactory, those fellows will be given a permanent academic post at the end of the five-year fellowship.

The funding for skills training for post-doctoral researchers has enabled universities to expand considerably their training and support for post-doctoral researchers and to provide them with opportunities to develop broader professional skills. That step change in the training and support provided to post-doctoral researchers in universities allows them to explore the full range of their responsibilities as scientists, including commercial awareness and sensitivity to public concerns about the advancement of science. The training focuses on a researcher functioning in a variety of research environments and therefore equips them with broad experiences that they can apply to a range of research problems. In addition to that training, the research councils operate targeted schemes that provide researchers with broader training, including public engagement training, and grants for public engagement activities.

Further changes in recent years have had positive impacts on post-doctoral researchers in the university sector. One such change was the introduction of the fixed-term employee regulations in 2002, which the hon. Gentleman outlined. Under the regulations, from July 2006, when a researchers contract is renewed, those with more than four years' fixed-term employment will have to be considered for permanent employment. The use of short-term contracts is a fundamental issue that affects the recruitment and retention of researchers in the university research sector. Placing the risks and uncertainties created by short-term funding on to the researchers makes it difficult for them to plan their lives and careers. It is not uncommon for researchers to work without pay while they are waiting for the outcome of grant applications, yet such dedication to their profession is often taken for granted by their employees. The fixed-term regulations should deal with many of these issues by encouraging universities to move away from over-reliance on the use of fixed-term contracts. They will need to be far more proactive in the management and development of their post-doctoral researchers.

Some employers have already taken steps to reduce the use of fixed-term contracts. Research council institutes, for example, have already introduced guidelines to ensure that fixed-term contracts are used only in very limited circumstances—for example, when specialist skills are required in the short term. The reliance on fixed-term contracts in the higher education sector is also being challenged through other initiatives. For example, the introduction of the full economic costing of university research now means that universities can include so-called bridging funds as an indirect cost in grant applications to research councils. That allows them to continue the employment of a researcher while grant applications are pending, so although the fixed-term regulations require universities to provide proper redundancy procedures, full economic costing of research allows universities to build contingency funds to manage the redundancy of their permanent researchers should it become necessary.

The fixed-term regulations are also likely to have an impact on the mobility of researchers. At present, while such mobility is very beneficial generally to the development of research, it can also be viewed as being enforced in some instances. Those who are less mobile, perhaps because of family commitments, could be disadvantaged, as the hon. Gentleman described very succinctly. The regulations should, however, help in that researchers will be able to take control of their careers. They will be able to seek out further career moves as and when it suits them, rather than having relocations forced on them because a contract ends.

Salaries are also seen to affect the attractiveness of careers in research. Although most researchers often cite their interest in their subject area as the prime reason for undertaking such careers, the role of pay cannot be overlooked.

It being Two o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment lapsed, without Question put.

Westminster Hall

Wednesday 11 January 2006

[FRANK COOK in the Chair]

Energy Review and Coal

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Claire Ward.]

9.30 am

Jim Sheridan (Paisley and Renfrewshire, North) (Lab): I feel extremely fortunate to have been chosen to introduce this debate on future energy needs. Many of my colleagues applied for a similar Adjournment debate, which underlines the importance of energy and our future needs in the United Kingdom. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister recently said that global warming and the environment was one of the most important issues of our time. I do not want to disagree with the boss, but in my view energy and the environment go hand in hand and are not mutually exclusive.

If anyone were in doubt about the importance of energy, the first few days of 2006 will have created absolute clarity. The dispute between Russia and Ukraine brings the issue of future energy needs into sharp focus and emphasises how important it is for diversity to be at the centre of the UK's energy policy, including domestic supply and the import of energy. A detailed examination of Europe's dependence on Russian gas should instruct our future policies. We should consider the following. France obtains 20 per cent. of its gas from Russia, Italy 30 per cent. and Germany 35 per cent. The figure is 20 per cent. for Poland, 60 per cent. for the Czech Republic and 60 per cent. for Austria.

What is the position in the UK? This year, the UK will no longer be self-sufficient in gas production and will depend on gas imported from Europe. That gas will come from various sources. Some will come from stable democracies such as Norway and some from less politically stable countries and regions. In those circumstances, we must ensure that we are never a hostage to fortune.

The Parliamentary Office of Science and Technology has said:

> "The UK's gas reserves are declining. Government and industry analysts estimate that by around 2006 the UK will no longer be self-sufficient in gas production and will revert to being a net gas importer. Gas is the largest proportion of the UK's primary energy supply, and gas-fired power plants are the main method of power generation. The UK will increasingly depend on gas imported from Europe and further afield."

If in the past few weeks European countries have been shivering, that may well be down to more than the weather. We have witnessed President Putin send a shiver throughout Europe.

Paddy Tipping (Sherwood) (Lab): Has my hon. Friend seen the projections from the Department of Trade and Industry, which suggest that, by 2020, 70 per cent. of our electricity needs will be met by gas, 90 per cent. of which will be imported? Is that not a perilous situation?

Jim Sheridan: I thank my hon. Friend for his intervention. I have not seen the figures, but I have no reason to doubt them. He is right to say that we are in a perilous position, and action must be taken now.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): The statistics cited by my hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood (Paddy Tipping) were known five or six years ago, when, sadly, our Government allowed the north-east Leicestershire coalfield around Asfordby, with 800 million tonnes of coal on the Nottinghamshire borders, to be sterilised and not used for the future of the country. Is that not a rather sad position? Should we not be reinvesting in deep mines with clean coal technology and avoiding the scar of open-cast coal, which would be the short-term, easy option that Governments might be tempted to pursue?

Frank Cook (in the Chair): Order. Perhaps I can explain to hon. Members that I am somewhat short of hearing facility and it would be better if the words spoken were addressed directly to the Chair, as is proper.

Jim Sheridan: Thank you, Mr. Cook. My hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) makes a valid point, and I will be interested to hear what the Minister has to say. No doubt some of my colleagues, who have a long history of working in the coal industry, will be able to make a contribution later.

If we are to reach a sensible conclusion, any energy analysis or assessment must be free of prejudice and, above all, totally objective and evidence-based. That is a challenge we face in considering our future energy needs.

The starting point of any energy review must be an audit of the contribution of our present energy sources. That assessment needs to consider nuclear, coal, gas, wind, oil, tidal, biomass and hydro. My view is that there is not one answer to our future energy needs. We need an energy mix that rejects dependence on foreign supplies.

In planning our energy needs, a central question will be the decline of our oil and gas reserves. The prerequisite for any energy review and new policy is that the debate should not be about conventional versus renewables. Both have a valid and relevant contribution to make to our future energy needs.

At the outset, I confirm my standpoint—I would like to see the development of renewables. I want wind, tide and wave to play a greater role in our energy jigsaw, but there appears to be a lack of urgency in the development of renewables in the UK.

On the question of manufacturing and the energy industry, trade unions such as the Transport and General Workers Union are already expressing concern about major gas suppliers moving abroad. That raises genuine concern among many of us.

All forms of renewable energy will create jobs and some manufacturing in the UK. The number of jobs will depend on the type of technology and on how far and where it develops. The jobs will cover a range of skills, including design, construction, manufacturing, assembly, installation and maintenance. The key is to provide appropriate support from the research and development stage to demonstration projects and fully operational plants.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on securing the debate and on his remarks about the importance of us not being, as we are about to be, over-reliant on imports of energy from overseas.

Drawing upon the hon. Gentleman's last point, the energy review is a wonderful opportunity for Britain to start to become the world leader in some of the new energy technologies. Not least, it is an opportunity for this country to become a leader in clean coal technology, given the huge reserves we still have.

Jim Sheridan: The hon. Gentleman makes a valid and important point. The UK should become a showcase for the world, placing UK companies in a good position to win export orders for new technology. Without UK-based, full-size plants, it becomes much more difficult to prove the technologies and, more importantly, to win export orders.

As I said, many hon. Members present represent mining areas. Britain has some of the largest coal reserves in Europe and that should not be lost on us. At present, many of the UK's coal-fired power stations are planning to implement the large combustion plants directive, which demands a significant reduction in emissions by 1 January 2008. The challenge to the coal-fired stations is to fit flue gas desulphurisation equipment and to guarantee themselves a future. In my own constituency, Mitsui Babcock is at the leading edge of new technology for coal-fired stations, which will assist them in reducing emissions of sulphur, nitrogen oxides and dust. I pay tribute to the management and work force of Mitsui Babcock. Not only can they make a major contribution to our future energy needs, but hopefully they can realise the export potential of their emissions capture technology.

At the beginning of the debate, I expressed the view that our future energy policies need to be a genuine mix, with nothing excluded. For too long, hydropower has been the poor relation in the energy debate. It is often described as relevant in the 1940s and 1950s, but of no consequence today. I, for one, completely reject that analysis. Hydropower is relevant today. If we upgrade the pumping equipment at plants in the UK, we could achieve a 5 to 15 per cent. improvement in output. I also welcome the decision of Scottish and Southern Energy to build a new hydro-station at Glencoe near Fort Augustus, in Inverness-shire, which will generate up to 100 MW of electricity.

I have said that future UK energy policy needs to give validity to every source of energy. The final portfolio needs to recognise our future needs and the protection of the environment against global warming.

Mr. David Marshall (Glasgow, East) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend agree that as well as ensuring continuity of energy supply, there needs to be some tighter price control mechanism? Many poor people in constituencies such as mine are struggling very hard to pay ever-increasing, spiralling energy costs, yet the profits of the energy companies increase even quicker than the prices.

Jim Sheridan: My hon. Friend makes an important point. People are struggling to pay the ever-increasing, spiralling energy costs. It is not just consumers; local businesses are struggling to pay as well.

Mr. Jim Devine (Livingston) (Lab): I do not know whether my hon. Friend is aware of the situation in Grangemouth, where every night a lot of energy pours out of the top of the spiral and into the atmosphere. A similar plant in Sweden provides free heating for about 150,000 pensioners. Does he think that such an initiative could be part of the strategy?

Jim Sheridan: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. There is a learning curve that we all have to follow. If we can learn lessons from countries such as Sweden, so be it. We would be the better for it.

Sir Robert Smith (West Aberdeenshire and Kincardine) (LD): Does the hon. Gentleman think that another important lesson that we need to learn from Scandinavia and other countries is that prices of energy will go up and down, as will the cost of heating homes, so the crucial thing for the long-term health of the occupants of homes is to get better quality standards for the conservation of energy and to reduce demand for energy and the need for people to buy it, whatever the price?

Jim Sheridan: The hon. Gentleman is right. I disagree on only one point and that is that I have had no experience of prices going up and down. I know that they go up. They very seldom come down.

I hope that the Minister will confirm that the Government-stated objectives of getting 10 per cent. of electricity from renewables by 2010, 15 per cent. by 2015, and 20 per cent. by 2020 will not be amended or discarded. We collectively need to realise those objectives and we need to formulate our decisions with speed and consideration. Time is not on our side.

Consumers and local businesses depend on us to provide and safeguard energy supplies. They should not, and hopefully, with Government support, will not, be held to ransom by any one supplier or source of energy supply. If we do not act now, future generations will rightly ask why we did not when we had the opportunity to do so. Economies such as China, India and Brazil are expanding and their thirst for energy will mean our competing with that to secure our own supplies. That is why I was delighted to hear that our Government and China have secured an agreement on the development of clean coal technology with carbon dioxide capture and storage, which also aims to reduce significantly the climate change impact from coal-fired electricity generation.

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on securing this important debate. Coal has a part to play in our future energy supply. He has just mentioned carbon capture and storage—

CCS technology. Carbon is, of course, a bête noir in this. He mentioned previously sulphur and nitrogen but not carbon. Does he believe that this country has an opportunity to lead in that technology, and that the Government must come forward with a regulatory framework for CCS and promote a demonstration plant, so that we can not only use up the coal that we have without damaging the environment, but sell that technology to the world, including China?

Jim Sheridan: I have no reason to disagree with what the hon. Gentleman says. I am sure that the Minister has also listened to what he has said. The hon. Gentleman's proposal will take a great deal of investment, and that is what we need.

There is tangible evidence of willing partners in the agreement reached with China, working together to combat the global challenge of climate change. New technology available today could cut CO_2 emissions from power stations by up to 90 per cent. There are estimates among our energy experts that, within our shores, we have the capacity to store our total carbon emissions for decades to come. Known as carbon sequestration, the technology can be used to separate CO_2 from coal-firing and gas-firing power stations. The CO_2 is then pumped into depleted oilfields via disused pipelines.

There are opportunities forthcoming for Government and private interests to invest in drilling into coal under our shores with a combination of drilling rigs, pipelines, storage facilities and power plants, exploiting an energy resource that has a 300-year future. Underground gasification of coal is an idea whose time has come. It has green credentials, with the potential to pump waste carbon dioxide into the underground holes. Hydrogen could be extracted from the gas for a new generation, emitting nothing but water vapour.

Who knows where that new technology could take us and what other uses it could have. One thing is clear, however: there is a window of opportunity in the review. We must take it and resurrect old king coal from its premature death.

Frank Cook (in the Chair): I have had a formal request for the removal of jackets, and those of you who have had the misfortune to work under my chairmanship in Committee will know that I am normally amenable to such requests. However, in this instance, this is a parallel Chamber to the parent Chamber below, so for that reason and that reason alone, I am afraid that jackets must remain on—not necessarily buttoned, but on.

9.48 am

Mr. Michael Clapham (Barnsley, West and Penistone) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Paisley and Renfrewshire, North (Jim Sheridan) on securing this debate. It is timely because my hon. Friend the Minister has announced the review, and he has the unenviable task of deciding the energy mix for the future.

I want to make three points: first, I want to consider some of the issues that the Minister will have to deal with in the energy review; secondly I want to make the point that all forms of energy have a substantial impact on the environment; and thirdly, I want to refer to the position of the United Kingdom coal industry, urging the Minister to act to ensure that the industry is around when the review is completed, so that it can play its part in ensuring the security of supply of UK energy.

During the review, the Minister will need to consider the impact of the energy mix on climate change, the retention of a diversity of suppliers, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Paisley and Renfrewshire, North referred, and the security of supply. Having watched events during the past few weeks, I have no doubt that the security of supply issue will loom large for the Minister.

There is also the commercial framework of the energy market to consider. The Minister will be aware that we have gone through a number of phases. We had the pool system, which gave way to the new electricity trading arrangements. Each system has impacted differently on the energy scene. Although at present there is a sparsity of gas, in the next 18 months, much more gas is likely to become available from Norway. Unless we are prepared to consider how the commercial framework of the energy economy has altered, we are likely to see a second dash for gas. In my estimation, five or six years after the start of that dash, the position for the UK could be far worse. I refer to the point that my hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood (Paddy Tipping) made: it is estimated that we could be 80 per cent. dependent on imported gas if we go down that route.

The Minister will have to consider those matters in the review. I take the point that my hon. Friend the Member for Paisley and Renfrewshire, North made in opening the debate: there is a need for diversity and there is room in the energy market for all energy sources. At present, roughly 40 per cent. of electricity is generated by gas, 33 per cent. by coal and about 19 or 20 per cent. by nuclear, with 4 or 5 per cent. from renewable sources. The 40 per cent. reliance on gas should be our limit. We should not allow a second dash for gas to take us into an area where we are 80 per cent. dependent on gas. In future, gas will come from areas of the world that are less stable than Norway and at the same time we have to consider the current phenomenon of terrorism. Terrorism could place us in a very vulnerable position should those gas supplies be interrupted.

During the review, I should like the Minister to think about the limits on gas. In thinking about the commercial framework of the energy economy, he may decide that it should be divided between the current sources. We know that 2020 is the target for 20 per cent. of renewables. That is a commendable target. We should ensure that we reach that target because we need the renewable technology. I must tell the hon. Member for Castle Point (Bob Spink) that, in 1992, a world-leading plant at Grimethorpe in Barnsley, a clean technology plant, which was built and administered by British Coal, was dismantled by the Conservative Government. It certainly put us in a far worse position in catching up on the technologies, which we must do now.

All forms of energy have an impact on the economy and the environment. Some have a worse impact than others, which are detrimental nevertheless. I have a wind farm in Penistone in my constituency. It caused a great deal of concern when it was built because it is a very picturesque area. Many people took the view that it created visual pollution. I agree. Some argue that wind farms add to the beauty of a scene, but when one sees the wind farm on the hills above Penistone that is certainly not the case.

I understand that experts who have been looking at the nuclear industry will be reporting to my hon. Friend the Minister. Monday's report in The Guardian showed that a new regime of nuclear generation would not result in less waste, as some have argued. According to experts on the matter, it could increase eye-level waste fivefold. The Minister will need to consider that issue.

John Robertson (Glasgow, North-West) (Lab): I have a copy of the article. Is my hon. Friend aware that the points made in the article have not been substantiated? It was just the opinion of the person who wrote it.

Mr. Clapham: The article is based on the report coming to the Minister and when it is available we will know the position. I am not attacking the nuclear industry, but just pointing out that all forms of energy have a substantial impact on the environment, which the Minister will need to consider. Coal has a substantial impact on the environment, which is why we argue for clean coal technology.

My hon. Friend the Member for Paisley and Renfrewshire, North referred to the large combustion plant directive, which will require the fitting of flue gas desulphurisation to power stations that burn coal by 2008. I understand that it is likely that 16 gigawatts of capacity will be fitted with flue gas desulphurisation. That leaves us with CO_2 and how to deal with it. My hon. Friend also referred to clean coal technology, which could be dealt with by developments in his constituency. Mitsui Babcock has a super-critical boiler that is fitted with a facility for carbon capture. Some super-critical boilers are being offered to China, as my hon. Friend said.

What we require is to incentivise the generation industry to take on the retro-fitting of the new technology. Most of the coal-fired stations will be decommissioned by about 2015, so between now and then a new regime of coal-fired power stations will be needed, which means using the new technology and giving the generators incentives to do so.

Mr. Mike Weir (Angus) (SNP): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that generators will invest in the technology to retro-fit the stations if a signal is given to the coal industry that there is a long-term future for coal generation in this country? That is what is lacking at the moment.

Mr. Clapham: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his intervention. We need to send that signal. We need to be able to tell the UK coal industry that there is the potential for long-term contracts, which would give the industry a future.

That brings me to my final point: the UK coal industry is in a perilous state. Three large collieries are in mothballs, two owned by UK Coal and one by RJB.

Mr. Denis Murphy (Wansbeck) (Lab): Is my hon. Friend aware that at a recent meeting between UK Coal and the National Union of Mineworkers, Mr. Spindler, chief executive of UK Coal, stated on the record that he was not concerned about the coal industry? His concerns lay in the property portfolio. Does my hon. Friend share my view that it is extremely worrying that the nation's coal reserves should be vested in a company whose chief executive has no concern for the coal industry?

Mr. Clapham: I thank my hon. Friend for his intervention. He is right. If we allow a major energy supplier to switch to property, we will lose what could be a major plank of energy security. The Minister should be willing to emphasise that he is prepared to incentivise UK Coal to remain in energy.

Paddy Tipping: My hon. Friend will know, because of his knowledge of the coal industry, that UK Coal has been in discussions with the Department about loan guarantees. The work force at Harworth is listening closely to this debate. It is important that an early decision be made. I believe that UK Coal, with support, can keep the pits open. Is that my hon. Friend's view?

Mr. Clapham: I thank my hon. Friend for that intervention. It is my view, and I hope that the Minister will respond favourably to UK Coal's suggestion for loans to be able to keep the industry going.

As I said, there are three large collieries in mothballs. One of those collieries leads into the last large reserve on the east side of the country; it is an enormous reserve. If the Minister is prepared to respond to UK Coal favourably, we could see those collieries open. There is an opportunity for growth. I understand that applications have been made for a new shaft at Daw Mill in the midlands, and a new colliery at Margam, and I understand that Scottish Coal is talking about the sinking of two drift mines. It is important that the Minister responds favourably to UK Coal, because we need the UK coal industry to be able to provide that security of supply.

Several hon. Members rose—

Frank Cook (in the Chair): Order. There are currently five hon. Members seeking my eye, only three of whom have taken the trouble to send written notification of their intention to intervene. We are left with only 29 minutes, so I look to all hon. Members to make their comments suitably brief and pertinent, and not to accept all interventions. If they do accept interventions, they should make their responses brief.

10.1 am

Mr. Mike Weir (Angus) (SNP): I congratulate the hon. Member for Paisley and Renfrewshire, North (Jim Sheridan) on securing this important debate. The future of coal in the energy review is important to Scotland and the UK generally. I was interested in what he said about an energy audit. He will be aware that, during the previous Parliament, the Select Committee on Scottish Affairs—several members of which I see in the Chamber today—considered the issue. It said:

"As a matter of urgency before any final, irreversible, decisions on what sorts of power generation are the most appropriate for Scotland are taken, we recommend that the Government undertake an audit of the energy resources that are currently available, and then to use that as a basis to work out the energy requirements that will be needed in the future."

That is good advice for the Government, for the UK as a whole and for Scotland. We all agree that we need a mixture of energy resources, although we may disagree about what goes in that mix and what the proportions are. We cannot rely on any one energy resource to provide our energy for the future.

Coal clearly has a potential for producing energy within the UK. It is reckoned that there are some 200 years of coal reserves left, as opposed to perhaps as little as 38 years of gas. However, most of our energy at present is produced from gas-burning stations, which does not make great economic sense. We talk about the security of energy supply, but in the UK—the situation is different in Scotland, which produces much more gas than it uses—we will shortly be reliant on imported gas. We have already seen, as the hon. Member for Paisley and Renfrewshire, North mentioned, what happened between Russia and Ukraine over the new year period, and the potential difficulties in that situation. There is no point in going for coal-burning technology if we do not ensure that there is a coal industry in this country to produce that coal. Otherwise, we will then start to import coal from places that are as remote and unstable as those from which we are importing gas.

On the question of the security of energy supply, we must examine the coal industry. However, there are difficulties in doing so. As the Scottish Affairs Committee pointed out, if coal is to have a viable future, coal stations will have to take on the European directive on large combustion plants. The difficulty is that coal produced in the UK is generally higher in sulphur than elsewhere. Coal from Scotland is less sulphur-intensive than that from England.

Nia Griffith (Llanelli) (Lab): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that in south Wales we have some of the finest anthracite in the world, which produces far fewer side products than many other forms of coal?

Mr. Weir: I will take the hon. Lady's word for that. Certainly in Scotland the coal is less sulphur-intensive than that in some areas of England. None the less, flue gas desulphurisation plants will have to be fitted to coal-fired stations if we are to meet the directive and if there is to be a future for coal. I understand that only two stations in the UK at present—Drax and Radcliffe—have that technology fitted, so considerable investment is needed and the cost of fitting the equipment to coal-fired stations will be considerable. The coal and generating industries will do that only if they are given a clear signal that there is a future for coal generation in this country. The nuclear industry is looking for such a signal in the energy review before investing in new stations—I shall not go into whether that is good or bad—and the coal industry is also entitled to look for direction from the Government and perhaps some Government investment in the production of that technology.

Many other countries will invest in coal. China, India and the US all have huge coal reserves and can make a political reality of the situation. Despite international agreements on climate change, their coal is a large economic resource and they will burn it, particularly in countries such as China and India which have booming economies. We must deal with that reality and we must do so by considering clean-coal technology. In this country, we have developed that technology, as has the United States, and we must work together to ensure that it is available throughout the world. We must take account of climate change and we must ensure first that it is put into our coal stations that generate electricity from coal.

Carbon capture has been mentioned and it is a relatively new technology with huge potential. Large areas in former oilfields under the North sea could be used to store carbon and new developments could help to get more oil out, as well as storing carbon gas. However, that is a relatively new technology and it may be many years before it has a significant impact.

Mr. Clapham: Is the hon. Gentleman aware of the project being run in Scotland, supported by work of the university of Strathclyde, to infuse CO_2 into coal seams and announce gasification? For some reason, CO_2 does not separate at the point of burning.

Mr. Weir: I am aware of that and various other technologies that could help.

The debate has wandered somewhat from coal to other energy resources. When considering energy resources for the future we must accept the necessity for a balance between our energy and environmental needs. The hon. Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone (Mr. Clapham) talked about the wind farm at Penistone and the hon. Member for Paisley and Renfrewshire, North talked about the hydro-station at Glencoe. That hydro-station also faced objections from environmental and other groups that were concerned about its environmental impact despite the fact that it is undeniably a green energy resource.

The sad fact is that whatever energy source we adopt we must meet environmental objections, and that is as true of coal as it is of any other method. Many traditional mining areas were environmentally blighted by the coal industry for many years. Much of the current coal industry is open-cast and any proposal for open-cast mining invariably produces many objections. We must consider those issues and balance the two but, ultimately, the Government must give a clear steer to the coal industry, stating that it has a future and that, if we are to burn coal, we shall not import foreign coal, but use the massive coal reserves in this country. That is the only way to obtain security of energy supply from coal.

When talking about the security of energy supply, perhaps we should consider what is happening with our energy companies. It is only recently that the German company E.ON Energie proposed taking over Scottish Power. I noticed in the weekend press that the Swedish state energy company, Vattenfall, is proposing a bid for Scottish and Southern Energy. If we are to consider the security of our energy supply, we should perhaps consider also the future of our energy companies.

Frank Cook (in the Chair): There are 20 minutes remaining and four hon. Members bidding.

10.10 am

John Robertson (Glasgow, North-West) (Lab): I have two speeches, and I have now created a third to try to shorten my contribution to the debate and allow other Members to get in as well. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Paisley and Renfrewshire, North (Jim Sheridan) on securing the debate. I was fortunate to get a similar debate at the beginning of December, in which hon. Members who are present today took part. Would that more Members than the usual suspects take part.

Along with my hon. Friend the Member for Midlothian (Mr. Hamilton), I was a member of the Scottish Affairs Committee that the hon. Member for Angus (Mr. Weir) mentioned. The Committee produced the report on the energy needs for Scotland, and I have no doubt that the report could be easily transferred to the whole of the United Kingdom. We agreed that we should include everything in the energy mix to ensure that the needs of the people of Scotland are met, but a few members of the Committee were against nuclear energy at all costs. The hon. Member for Angus was one, and it was a sad indictment of his party. The Liberal Democrat Member, who is not present today, took the exact same position.

The energy review will come up with a balanced energy policy for our energy needs, and that is the most important thing that it can do. There is also a place for coal. As far as I am aware, we in this country can have only three energy suppliers—gas, nuclear and coal. They are the main producers of energy. Although it is more than acceptable to look for new ways of creating energy, we must consider this country's needs.

The plight of the Ukrainian people and the five-fold price increase imposed by the Russians gives an example of the type of outcome that in previous discussions we were always worried could happen when 70 per cent. of our needs were made dependent on other countries. As my hon. Friend the Member for Paisley and Renfrewshire, North said, we must have a sustainable energy policy that is secure for the needs of the people of this country.

It is correct to mention what happened to the coal industry in the 1980s and 1990s: the industry was dismantled by a short-sighted and vindictive policy from the Conservative party. Tens of thousands of miners were put on the dole, and there were hundreds of thousands of knock-on job losses. The unemployment list, high as it was, increased manifold as a result. Those of us who were active in the trade union movement in those days well remember the collection of food and moneys for the mineworkers and their families.

We should not forget that we would be at the forefront of any new coal technology if it had not been for the then Thatcher Government. I deplore everything that they did, and I have never, ever failed to feel hatred towards that Government. The circumstances that I have mentioned are the main reasons why I feel that hatred.

I should be very pleased if the Conservative Front Bench spokesman took this opportunity to apologise not only to the mineworkers and their families but to the country for what that Government did. It is important that that is put on record.

I suggest to my hon. Friend the Minister that we seriously consider something that, again, the Conservative party did with the Board of Trade when the Department for Energy was got rid of. There is a justification now more than ever to recreate a Department of Energy with a Secretary of State who takes care of our energy needs. There is no doubt from what we have seen in Russia and Ukraine that there is a need for more than one source of energy. We must also consider how we preserve our gas reserves in the North sea and how they can be maximised for the use of the British people.

I believe that many people will take part in the review and put forward their ideas about what should and should not be done, and that is absolutely right. It is important that the review and the Minister consider the needs of the nearly 60 million people in this country and not take on board some of the petty and unsustainable lies and half-truths that some opponents of coal, gas, nuclear or, in many cases, renewables have put about. The review and the Minister must seriously consider planning departments and how planning permission is given to build new energy installations, and come back to us and explain why things were done. I hope to take part in the review—I hope to make a submission—and I hope that other hon. Members will do the same.

Mr. Frank Cook (in the Chair): Fourteen minutes remain, and three hon. Members wish to speak.

10.16 am

Mr. David Hamilton (Midlothian) (Lab): I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Paisley and Renfrewshire, North (Jim Sheridan) for bringing the debate to the House. Like many hon. Members present, I was part of the debate that took place previously on the Scottish Affairs Committee report. As my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, North-West (John Robertson) said, many of the recommendations in that report could be taken forward with regard to a UK position. There are differences in the market in Scotland, but I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will consider the essence of the report when examining the energy review.

I am mindful of your comments about the time remaining, Mr. Cook. The debate is about both the energy review and coal, and I would like to talk about some of the other issues relating to coal. When the comment was made about "old king coal", I felt myself sliding down in my seat, because I am sometimes referred to as old king coal.

With regard to the security of energy for the United Kingdom, alternative energy sources must be considered. In Scotland, hydro is about 6 per cent. of the market. Hon. Members have referred to nuclear, to renewables, including wind—wave power has not been referred to—to gas and coal and to security of energy. There was the problem that we faced at the beginning of the year. Every national newspaper carried the same headline, which was "Russia turns off the gas to Europe". The issue was not just about the UK. Politicians throughout Europe did not really care about Ukraine; they were much more concerned about the pipe coming through into Europe. Many of us have been saying for many years—I do not say that with any glee—that the most important issue that we must face is Britain's dependence on sources of energy coming from abroad. That debate must take place in much more detail, and I am glad to see that there will be a debate on Thursday, although there is only a one-line Whip.

As politicians, we must decide on the principle of whether we leave ourselves being dictated to by other countries or, indeed, whether we leave ourselves to market forces. I do not believe that either situation is acceptable to us. Or do we rely on our own resources, knowing that there will be a cost to that decision? That is important. It has been alluded to on a couple of occasions that whatever decision is made, there will be a cost factor. If we make a decision about self-reliance in the UK, there will be a cost to that, and we must bear that in mind, not only for consumers but for business and so on.

We need to consider what is happening throughout the world and especially in China, which has become the engine house of the world. According to the 2002 statistics—not the latest ones—1,393 billion tonnes of coal were produced in China. Germany is the biggest European producer, producing 207 million tonnes. The UK is right down the line again, producing only 30 million tonnes.

It is also important to realise that several European countries produce coal, about one or two of which I was surprised. They produce coal on a greater scale than the United Kingdom does—not just Germany, but also Poland, with 161 million tonnes, Greece, with 71 million tonnes, and the Czech Republic, with 63 million tonnes. We are therefore in a market within the European network. Recognising that that is important. Britain, which has used only 15 per cent. of its coal resources, has some of the biggest reserves within Europe. At the end of the day, that we have not improved on our position is a tragedy.

In many instances we are at the cutting edge of developing new coal technology, but at the same time the coal industry is on its knees. That that is happening is a contradiction in terms and, to me, ironic. We have the transport and the expertise, which we have developed along with other European countries, but at the same time we are not paying heed to our own coal industry.

There are a number of issues that I will come on to, and one is about the Glencoe station. The hon. Member for Angus (Mr. Weir) said that there were objections when it went ahead. There will be. There are objections to every single thing that is proposed in relation to energy, whether that be open-cast, wind farms or tidal. There will be objections to hydro, which is very attractive in Scotland. The decision was made many years ago about hydro. Indeed, the organisation that represents renewables within Scotland has indicated that hydro could take up at least 20 per cent. of Scotland's needs, and in the renewable market it is talking in terms of 40 per cent. of Scotland's needs being met by renewables.

The wider base brings in not only energy, but the Department of Trade and Industry. What about when planned applications go forward for housing and so on? Industrial units are being built to specifications with the worst common denominator. They are not built with a specification that includes ensuring that there is heat retention, for example.

I will give some examples. Midlothian council is a good example, with a housing stock of 7,500 council houses. Every such house in Midlothian has wall cavity filling, insulation in its attic and double glazing. Each house had to have all such things installed after the houses were built. Could the planning process not have been better? Building contractors agree with us. When we talk to them about planned applications, their argument is that they want a fair crack of the whip, a fair playing field, when they make applications to build houses.

If every housing contractor across the UK was told that when they build a house they must have cavity filling, attic insulation and double glazing—to make sure that heat is retained, which in turn reduces the demand on energy—that would be very positive. We must look more at how we save energy, as much as how much we can produce energy. That issue has to be addressed much more than at present.

A report from a debate in the Select Committee on Scottish Affairs has another good example from Midlothian. Please excuse me for the argument, but Midlothian boasts an area including Monkton Hall colliery, where I worked for 20-odd years. Although closed, the colliery, 3,000 ft deep as it was, is producing substantial amounts of hot water—geothermal water. An experiment in Midlothian, with £3.5 million allocated from Europe, is considering how to use the geothermal water coming up from Monkton Hall to heat some 230 houses—to start with—industrial units and a primary school. There is a possibility of expanding the use of that geothermal water to some 4,000 new-build houses. I ask the Minister to come along for a meeting, and, with the council, to discuss these matters.

There are 230 ex-collieries within Scotland, two-thirds of which have the potential of using geothermal heating coming up from them. Therefore, using old collieries can take us up to the 21st century, which in turn can develop a strategy for us.

I am mindful of what the Chair said and will cut short everything, because other speakers took far too long.

Several hon. Members rose—

Frank Cook (in the Chair): Order. I remind the Chamber that the Chair is required to call the first of the three Front Bench wind-ups at 10.30 am.

10.24 am

Dr. Roberta Blackman-Woods (City of Durham) (Lab): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Paisley and Renfrewshire, North (Jim Sheridan) for securing the debate. Our prime consideration must be to argue that coal should not only feature in the energy review, but be given a degree of prominence. Like many other Members, I am pleased that the debate about using coal has moved on and we no longer have to argue about renewables versus coal. Because of developments in clean coal technology, we can argue strongly for both. I stress that the Government should continue to press forward with their target to reduce CO_2 emissions by 60 per cent. by 2050, but hopefully that can be achieved by investing in coal as well.

I press the Minister to look at developments in clean coal technology and how they can be used in the UK. A number of us in this Room were at a seminar just before

[Dr. Roberta Blackman-Woods]

Christmas where the more recent developments in clean coal technology and carbon capture were outlined. It is gratifying that many UK universities are at the forefront of developing that technology. We clearly want to invest in that.

We know that coal can be part of the environmental solution, instead of being part of the problem. We know that processes exist to remove SO_2, nitrous oxide and CO_2 during the electricity generation process. Coupled with modern mining methods and high energy prices worldwide, that means that we can make a powerful case for investing in a new generation of coal-fired stations, providing that the technology is in place. The National Union of Mineworkers and others make a strong case that Britain's coal reserves could contribute to our energy supply for a number of years, hence the need for long-term investment.

It is also worth pointing out that we are not arguing for a return to the mining industry of the past, much as I celebrate that. I represent a constituency where mining has been really important and I would like mining to be part of the future of the industry in that constituency. We no longer have to produce coal tips because waste can be stored underground. Modern ventilation methods are better. Accidents still occur. We know that, tragically, from what has happened in America recently. However, there are fewer incidents. Methane gas, or mine gas, can be captured and used in electricity generation. We can also blend coal with biomass or other renewable sources, including household waste. We should be investing in the production of those renewable coal products. That should be a feature of our energy supply for the future. I am told—I do not profess to know the details—that we should be considering integrated gasification combined cycle power stations. Alongside carbon capture, that is what I press the Minister to consider.

I will conclude in the hope that there is time for another Member to speak, but it is worth emphasising that a number of us are really concerned about what happened in our constituencies during the Thatcher years. It would be very much welcomed if a Labour Government could again invest in our coal mining industry.

Huw Irranca-Davies (Ogmore) (Lab) rose—

Frank Cook (in the Chair): Order. I must counsel the hon. Gentleman that if I call him he will have to relinquish the Floor in one minute.

10.29 am

Huw Irranca-Davies: What a challenge. The Minister will know that I am making my own contribution—I am building my house with a wood-powered boiler, solar panels and a rainwater harvesting system. I am doing my bit. When the Minister looks at the Welsh coal industry, will he return the favour? He knows my support for the UK coal industry is firmly on record. Tower colliery is facing declining reserves in its seams. There are applications for new deep mines in Wales. There is also the issue of keeping skills going in the deep mining industry. It is vital that rapid decisions are made on that.

I also want to flag up one of the issues that was raised earlier in relation to marine and tidal energy. This is not only about south Wales and the Severn estuary, which has the second highest tidal range in the whole world; we also have the Menai straits and the Irish sea. That source of energy is massively underused and we need to do a tremendous amount on that.

There is also a place for wind energy. There is already one wind farm in my constituency. One community has one in front of it and there is an application for another behind it. It has two more on either side of it. I do not want it to be like Custer's last stand surrounded by wind farms. We have a role to play. I have lived opposite a wind farm. I have no problems with them, but they should be in the right place and there should not be too many of them. Thank you, Mr. Cook, and do not forget Welsh coal.

10.30 am

Sir Robert Smith (West Aberdeenshire and Kincardine) (LD): I congratulate the hon. Member for Paisley and Renfrewshire, North (Jim Sheridan) on introducing today's debate, on raising the wider issues of the energy review and on concentrating on the future of coal. He raised the question of our dependency on the worldwide energy market. Whatever happens and whatever the mix, we are in an interdependent world and we cannot completely hide from market forces and our trade with the rest of the world. We must therefore ensure that we maximise the stability and predictability of that trade.

Can the Minister give us any reassurance about how market liberalisation is getting on in the rest of the European Union? One of the big distortions at present is that our market is connected—and becoming even more connected—to another market that operates under different rules. A larger market becomes a more stable market because people can predict more effectively how it will operate and how the future will pan out. They can make investment decisions based on their judgment of the commercial risks in an open and fair market in which they can have confidence.

I must declare my entry in the Register of Members' Interests: I am a shareholder in Shell. Coal has played a major part in building the UK economy. As many hon. Members have pointed out, there are major reserves of coal, so the potential is there. As has been outlined, however, the environmental impact of coal still holds it back from playing its part as an energy source in this country. I think in particular of climate change. We understand more how our world is affected by the emission of carbon dioxide into the atmosphere, and how we must meet the challenge of reducing our emissions, not only at home but around the world.

Clean coal technology shows how coal can play its part without doing any environmental damage. The ultimate goal must be carbon capture and storage. In previous debates, we have talked about the excitement of the Miller project in the North sea, where we are getting much closer to seeing the full cycle of capturing the carbon, producing the electricity and returning the CO_2 under the North sea, rather than letting it out into the atmosphere, with the added benefit of enhancing oil recovery in the process. There is a virtuous circle in making that process work.

The Government have announced carbon abatement grants and a carbon abatement strategy. Can the Minister give us more details of how those grants will operate and how people will access them? If those grants are available and the details are out there, people can understand how best to make use of them. We could help to take carbon capture and storage forward if carbon credits were allowed under the emission trading system. Again, can the Minister tell us how that is developing and what the potential is?

The Miller project is able to take place because the CO_2 that is put in the North sea is used as an agent to recover more oil. Obviously, in the longer term, the discussion is about possibly storing CO_2 in exhausted and redundant fields. There we have the concern that the OSPAR and London conventions restrict the disposal of CO_2 under the North sea. People have talked about a long time scale for the development of that technology. The reality is that changing arrangements such as OSPAR takes a long time, too. It would be good to hear what initiatives the Government are already taking to ensure that conventions will not stand in the way of disposal of CO_2 under the North sea if we can prove the technology is successful and we want to make full use of it. That major resource, which we have developed through our oil and gas exploration and production, could now provide an added benefit. Using it to dispose of CO_2 could benefit coal and other energy sources.

This debate is part of a wider climate change debate. In response to a debate initiated by the hon. Member for Ogmore (Huw Irranca-Davies), the Minister stated that "the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs has also initiated a climate change review that will report by the end of the year."—[Official Report, 12 October 2005; Vol. 437, c. 416.]

That was last year. Perhaps the Minister can update us as to whether the DEFRA report will finally appear at the end of this year or, I hope, earlier in the year. Obviously, people need to know how environmental impacts fit together.

Blending coal with biomass has been raised. Perhaps the Minister could explain why the biomass that can be used in the blending process with coal is restricted to only 15 per cent. Again, a bit more flexibility could reduce the environmental impact.

The hon. Member for Paisley and Renfrewshire, North made an important point about the jobs that will be available in the renewable and marine sectors. This country has engineering skills and experience from working in the marine environment that would be eminently exploitable if we were to allow marine technologies such as wave and tidal to take off. There is great potential to transfer the skills that we have learned through all the other work that we have done in the North sea.

It was somewhat perverse of the Government, who deal with security issues, to turn their back on the resources that we have in this country. There was considerable disappointment with the Chancellor's approach to North sea oil taxation. His pre-Budget report created concern among investors that he is changing the fiscal regime. The big picture is that he is frightening away investment at a time when we seek to maximise the production of gas in the North sea, and that seems a perverse strategy. Has the Minister had a chance to review the studies that show how marginal the gas-gathering pipeline networks for the west of Shetland are, and to consider whether the tariffs on the use of the pipeline infrastructure will tip them the wrong way?

If we are to make full use of carbon storage in the North sea, the pipelines and infrastructure are important. Obviously, some of us who look at the big picture want the Chancellor to change the tax regime back to a more attractive one for investment. Have the Government considered in detail the impact of the tariffs on the use of infrastructure? Maintaining a core infrastructure of pipelines and production networks in the North sea allows the more marginal and newer discoveries to be exploited and would also allow carbon to be reinjected. It is crucial that full use can be made of them, so putting a tax on something that we want to incentivise seems somewhat perverse. Can the Minister give some assurance that the Government will reconsider that?

I want to finish by saying again that coal played a great part in the UK's economic development. It is facing the challenge of its environmental impact. If we can tackle that issue, coal will have a role to play in supporting the UK's future energy economy.

10.38 am

Charles Hendry (Wealden) (Con): I also congratulate the hon. Member for Paisley and Renfrewshire, North (Jim Sheridan) on securing this debate. As he said, it is timely, given what happened during the Christmas and new year period. I also want to thank him for the balanced way in which he introduced the debate. He raised a tremendous number of important issues, and his approach has characterised the whole of the debate this morning. We have had an opportunity to consider the important role that coal can play within the wider policy of the energy review.

I agree with the hon. Gentleman that we need balanced energy provision, and I broadly agree with the mix that he proposed. Of course, we all support greater use of renewables, but, as was made clear by several hon. Members, they are not without environmental consequences as well. As the hon. Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone (Mr. Clapham) said, there are considerable environmental concerns about wind power provision on land. That was brought home to me recently when I went to Switzerland. I drove out through Germany and came back through France. Throughout Germany, there is a tremendous reliance on wind power, but there is none at all in France. What strikes one is the environmental impact of row after row of wind turbines on an otherwise beautiful landscape. As the hon. Member for Angus (Mr. Weir) reminded us, even hydropower, which in the security of the south-east we think of as an extraordinarily valuable means of energy provision in Scotland, is not without its environmental consequences.

We have seen a huge amount of balance in this debate, and I hope that the energy review will focus on that need for balance, and not allow the country to become over-reliant on any single source of energy. The hon. Member for Angus also made a valid point that we must ensure that we do not end up depending on imported energy supplies. The debate has shown the degree of expertise that exists in the House on these matters, and I hope that, during the energy review, the Minister will use that expertise and not simply rely on external expertise. If all of us can be as brief and concise as the hon. Member for Ogmore (Huw Irranca-Davies), this House would operate in a better way. If, in one and a quarter minutes, hon. Members can make points that are pertinent both to the energy review and to their constituency, that is a lesson for us all.

In recent years, we have seen a dramatic reduction in the use of coal. In 1950, almost all the primary fuel used was coal, but in 2000 only 15 per cent. was used, the majority being oil and gas. We are also seeing a continuing decline in the provision of coal from within the United Kingdom. The hon. Member for Glasgow, North-West (John Robertson) commented about how that decline happened under a Conservative Government. However, he has turned his mind away from how that decline has continued under his own Government. Since 1997, the number of mines in this country has dropped from 22 to 13, and the number of miners has dropped from 14,000 to 5,000. Coal output has halved from just under 50 million tonnes to just over 25 million tonnes.

Mr. Clapham: The hon. Gentleman will know that when the industry was privatised in 1994 it was beyond its critical mass. It was in a failed market and depended on Government support. The industry's decline was inevitable, but it was built into the privatisation.

Charles Hendry: I understand where the hon. Gentleman is coming from. The point that I was seeking to make is that it has been a long-term decline which has not been reversed under this Government. Our reliance on imported coal has doubled over the last eight years, from 19 million tonnes in 1997 to about 36 million tonnes now. It is not a short-term phenomenon that only happened in the 1980s; it has been happening for over 30 years.

Mr. David Hamilton: Is the hon. Gentleman suggesting that we renationalise what is left of the coal industry, so that we can expand it?

Charles Hendry: I am not going down that route. The Conservative party may be going through a process of evolution at the moment, but I am certain that we are not going to go down the route of renationalising the means of production of energy, as the hon. Gentleman suggests.

In introducing the energy review, the Prime Minister said that by around 2020 the UK is likely to have seen decommissioning of coal and nuclear power plants that generate together over 30 per cent. of today's electricity supply. It is clear that if decisions to invest in new coal-powered power stations are not taken soon, the future role of coal will decline further.

It has become evident in today's debate that there is scope for a renaissance of coal as a result of new technological advances. As my hon. Friends the Members for Kettering (Mr. Hollobone) and for Castle Point (Bob Spink) set out, it is a sector in which the United Kingdom can become a world leader. There has been some discussion about carbon capture and storage, whereby carbon dioxide emissions are captured and can be kept safely. There are creative and imaginative ways in which that can be done. For many years, pure carbon dioxide has been captured and used in the food processing and chemical industries. To make that more effective, we need huge opportunities for storage. About 500 million tonnes of carbon dioxide per year is produced and that requires imaginative new ways of considering the problem.

The approach that the hon. Member for West Aberdeenshire and Kincardine (Sir Robert Smith) has talked about—storage in the North sea—would allow us to do something dramatic and novel. It is encouraging that British companies are in the lead in the use of that global technology. As he explained, additional benefits arise from that, such as improved methane extraction from the oilfields. Enhanced oil recovery, if achievable, will start to make carbon capture more economic.

However, there is the risk that international treaties will make that process more difficult. Will the Minister clarify the legal situation as to whether the injection of carbon dioxide into the sea bed for storage will be permitted, even when it is not linked to enhanced oil recovery? A distinction is drawn in the international treaties between those two approaches, and if we cannot put it there for storage, that approach could be made more difficult.

There is a tremendous, once in a lifetime opportunity to get decisions right in order to have a balanced energy policy that makes use of the natural advantages this country has in energy supply and other provision. We can take the lead in conservation and encourage new technologies where the UK can be a world leader. Without doubt, coal has an important part to play in that process. We wish to work with the Minister during the energy review, on a cross-party basis, to ensure that we take the right decisions. We want to examine what is right in the long term for this country in terms of provision and conservation and we hope to work with the Minister in that process.

Mr. Denis Murphy: Will the hon. Gentleman please clarify a point for me? Is it his party's policy to offer financial support to a privatised mining industry in order to keep the coal reserves there?

Charles Hendry: If one wants to have a balanced energy policy, certain aspects of it will require financial support from the Exchequer. We recognise that in order for renewables to make good progress, public funding will have to be involved. At this stage, we have not reached a conclusion—that is what we shall do during the energy review—but we do not rule out the need for Government investment in those areas to ensure a balanced provision. I hope that we can assure the hon. Gentleman that we are considering the matter in relation to the long-term needs of the country and starting with a fresh sheet of paper to ensure that we take the right decisions. After an interesting debate, we all look forward to hearing what the Minister has to say.

10.47 am

The Minister for Energy (Malcolm Wicks): I, too, congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Paisley and Renfrewshire, North (Jim Sheridan) on securing the debate. It is the latest in what is now a short series of recent debates. For some reason I was not invited to the Scottish debate—I am not sure why—but I remember a serious discussion in Westminster Hall.

I am struck by the fact that, while the prime focus has understandably been coal, we have debated the matter in the wider context of other energy sources and technologies, not least carbon capture and storage. We are examining those international treaties, which were designed to prevent dumping in our seas, and we are confident that we can get satisfactory outcomes. Other nations, including Norway, have an interest in that.

We have discussed the matter in that context, and in the context of what the United Kingdom's strategic energy objectives should be, which must be a part of the debate in the energy review. We have considered the matter in a global context. As has been noted, the new year was barely struggling into its early seconds and minutes before we had the serious dispute between Russia and Ukraine, which has now, I hope, been happily resolved. Perhaps we should delete the word "happily": it has now been resolved, at least in the short term. That reminds us of the global context and the important geopolitical and national security dimensions, which have come to the fore not only here but in other nations, and even since the White Paper of 2003.

We have had an important debate. Again, I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Paisley and Renfrewshire, North. I shall not refer to every contribution as it would take too long, although I too was struck by the one-minute dash, without gas, by my hon. Friend the Member for Ogmore (Huw Irranca-Davies). It was a model; it was energetic, yet energy efficient. Given his use of both brain and heart, it gave us an example of combined heat and power that we will remember for at least a few more minutes.

The House will be aware that the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry have asked me to lead a review of UK energy policy and to bring forward policy proposals by the middle of the year. Things have changed since 2003. North sea gas reserves have declined faster than many experts anticipated, and we know about the projected decline in nuclear power. We became a net importer of gas in 2004, and in a few years we will become a net importer of oil.

There have been other changes beyond our borders. I was asked about the slower than expected liberalisation in the European Union, as it has exposed us to higher, more volatile prices. We made some headway under our presidency at the Energy Council of Ministers in Brussels just before Christmas. The Commission is determined to press forward with that liberalisation, but there is still a long way to go. Even more internationally, China is already the world's second largest consumer of energy, and reports suggest that it has just overtaken the UK to become the world's fourth largest economy. It is truly an international problem.

We must learn from those developments, and from events so far this winter, both here and overseas. At the headline level, we need to answer a number of important questions. How do we ensure affordable energy in the future? How do we deliver a 60 per cent. reduction in carbon? That reduction was mentioned earlier, and we remain committed to it. How do we manage our reliance on imported gas, and what are the implications?

In a nutshell, how can we create and maintain a fully functioning market that provides secure, affordable and clean energy? I take the point about affordable energy for the poorest and eldest in our communities. Those are big questions. They raise vital and complex issues, and there are important and intricate links between the decisions that we make on coal and other fuel sources.

Some assumptions have been made about the outcome of the review, but it is not about finding one solution to all those challenges—a theme that was echoed today. Hon. Members recognise that, despite the fact that enthusiasts from various quarters think the whole answer is this or that, we are talking not about where 20 per cent. or 30 per cent. of our energy supply will come from but about 100 per cent. of our energy supply. We recognise the need for diversity. There is no one solution. There is no silver bullet. There is no uranium bullet. With respect, there is no coal bullet.

Renewables has been a theme of the debate, as has strategic support for renewables—although not necessarily in one's own constituency. That, of course, is one of the dilemmas when considering the investment that is needed. Renewables are important. We have a renewables obligation, with a 10 per cent. target of our electricity coming from renewables by 2010, and the aspiration that it will be doubled to 20 per cent. by 2020. I do not come to the review renewables-neutral; I am an enthusiast for renewables.

Huw Irranca-Davies: On that point, does the Minister accept that, with his Department's support, MPs could be a useful tool during the energy review, becoming involved in confronting the renewables issues with their constituents? I am very pro-renewables, but one has to deal with them in the full light of day, putting the hard facts before one's constituents. The Minister and his Department could be a great help in putting forward those arguments.

Malcolm Wicks: That is an important point. It is not that the whole answer is blowing in the wind; but some of it is, and we are also developing other technologies. MPs can play a role. Indeed, I would go further: when we publish the consultation document on the energy review, which I expect to be later this month, I hope that hon. Members on both sides of the House will help to lead a well-informed debate in their constituencies. There has to be a public debate, and renewables are a part of it.

I can promise that the medium and long-term role of coal and its potential contribution to secure energy supplies is an important consideration in the review. For coal to have a future, it must be used much more cleanly than it is now, with significantly lower emissions of carbon dioxide and other harmful gases.

We have therefore developed the carbon abatement technology strategy to develop mechanisms such as research and development support, which will encourage the development of more efficient coal-fired plants, the use of coal with biomass and eventually the deployment of carbon capture and storage technologies. The latter technology has the potential to eliminate up to 95 per cent. of CO_2 emissions from coal use, not only in power generation but in other industrial processes. However, the review will be investigating ways we might encourage generators to deploy all these important technologies.

[Malcolm Wicks]

The Chancellor has set aside £35 million of Government grant aid for the demonstration of carbon abatement technologies, which will be made available from April 2006 and will last about four years. My officials are working up a scheme for supporting those demonstrations and we plan to announce it by March, with a call for proposals to follow. I hope that my hon. Friends can see that we are providing serious support to enable coal to have a future in a sustainable world.

On coal production in the UK, the Government has paid out almost £37 million in coal investment aid and expects mine operators to draw down most of the balance of their awards during the first half of 2006. That investment aid, and about £160 million of UK coal operating aid, helped mines such as Thoresby, Kellingley and Daw Mill to maintain the investment they needed to keep them in production through the difficult early years of this decade. It was a relief to see the latest output figures, which show production at the remaining deep mines up almost 5 per cent. in the three months to the end of November compared to the same period last year. The outcome reflects the commitment of Government, management and, of course, the work force alike. However, as we know, there has been an overall decline in home production and an increase in imports—up 16 per cent. in the first nine months of 2005 compared to the same period a year previously. That compares with the latest figures of just under 18 million tonnes of UK production.

The continuing rise in imports highlights the availability of coal on world markets. The UK has unworked reserves of coal, in shallows and at depth, but with reliable, competitively priced supplies from South Africa, Colombia, Poland and elsewhere, many coal customers are choosing to import, which is the reality that we have to grapple with.

I said in a debate in Westminster Hall—back in those historic days when it was functioning as a modern debating chamber—that the time was right to take a new look at the UK coal industry and to consider how best to create a climate in which to attract the long-term investment needed to secure its future. The future of coal in meeting our energy policy goals in the medium and long term will be an important part of our review of energy policy. That is the right context in which to consider the matter. We are considering the proposal on Haworth colliery and I will respond to the company in the very near future.

The work on the energy review has now started, and I assure hon. Members that the views they expressed today and, indeed, the views I want them to discuss in the coming months with their constituents, will be taken into account as it continues over the coming months.

Again, I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Paisley and Renfrewshire, North for securing what has been a lively and energetic debate—pun intended—and hon. Members for their considered contributions to it. I wish you, Mr. Cook, albeit late, a very happy new year.

Private Sewers

11 am

Paddy Tipping (Sherwood) (Lab): I am grateful for the opportunity to discuss the problems associated with private sewers. This is an important matter, particularly for those facing problems, and has a long history but, until recent years, has not had much attention. Perhaps it has been a case of out of sight, out of mind.

I commend the Government for what they have achieved and particularly the Minister for his help over many years. However, I am concerned about the delays in making announcements on the way forward. The timetable for decision making has slipped and that underlies this debate. I want to press the Minister on what issues remain to be resolved, when definitive policy announcements will be made and, most importantly, when we will begin to tackle the problems on and under the ground.Most Members will know about these problems from their constituency work, and I am delighted to have the support of my hon. Friend the Member for Ogmore (Huw Irranca-Davies).

I have been associated with the problem for about 10 years and I am grateful to Newark and Sherwood district council, and particularly to one of its environmental health officers, Jeremy Hutchinson, who has provided a great deal of help and support. The council estimates that about 1,500 properties are involved in its area alone. I believe that that is an underestimate because we know the scale of the problems only when they arise.

I shall talk about three real and current problems in the Sherwood constituency. First, in Branston avenue, Farnsfield householders discovered in the autumn that their sewers had become blocked and sewage was being discharged on to gardens. The first that they knew about private sewers was when they began to explore the problem. They were horrified when they realised that they were responsible for repairs, and there is a profound argument in Farnsfield about who is responsible for the collapse of the sewer. The residents believe strongly that a new school—St. Michael's school—and the heavy traffic involved when it was being built or the utility companies making connections to the school have caused the problem. They pointed out that they had no problems for 40 years until the new construction. Not surprisingly, the school, the diocese and its contractors deny all responsibility and there is no causal link at this point. While we are debating the matter, contractors are digging the ground. I take the strong view that if the construction of the school has contributed to the problem, the school and the diocese, not the residents, should accept the cost.

At the moment, the residents are buying a pig in a poke. Newark and Sherwood council has issued notices, the contractor is on site and the repairs will be done. The householders may be charged, but they do not know what the cost might be. They are mainly elderly people and the situation is most unsatisfactory for them. They would like it to be resolved quickly.

Secondly, there are also problems in Hardwick drive, Ollerton. It is a nice estate and a nice place to live. The estate has been built for 40 years and the developer never put the sewers forward for adoption. There are long-standing problems on the estate and, again, Newark and Sherwood council has issued notices. The cost of the repair will probably be about £1,000. The repair will sort out a small gap, a leakage and a rodent problem, and I expect that the householders will be charged about £25 a house. That is not a great deal of money, but the problem does not stop there. It is a long-standing problem. The repair will be done but Severn Trent will not adopt the sewers and so there will be problems in future until policy decisions have been taken.

At Reynolds way in Calverton, residents have had to pay much more. In this case, Gedling borough council issued notices and major work has been done at substantial cost to the individual householders. Some, but not all, have been able to claim against their insurance. That has been a major piece of engineering work, but with all the work that has taken place, and despite much discussion, Severn Trent has decided not to adopt the sewer. It argued that the sewer is not up to adoptable standard. Most particularly, the company is not prepared to adopt because part of the system runs under a private household and is not on the highway.

There are further problems looming at Reynolds way in Calverton because a planning application has been made for major residential development on adjoining land. Gedling borough council and Severn Trent were unaware of problems with the sewers, and it has taken a great deal of argument from the residents, supported by myself, to establish that one of the issues in determining a planning application should be that of flooding and sewage disposal. Unless serious thought is given to the planning application, there will be increased problems at Reynolds way.

These are profoundly unsatisfactory situations for the householders involved. I am pleased to say that the Government are mindful of the issue, have recognised it and are taking action. A considerable amount of action is taking place. First, there has been some welcome research from WS Atkins, which, for the first time, has given indications—not definitive ones—of the scale of the problem. I was surprised—I think most were—when the Atkins report suggested that up to 50 per cent. of all households in one way or another could be connected to private sewers. Atkins went further and made a number of recommendations.

The second area in which the Government have made significant progress is in putting out those options for consultation. The overwhelming, rather than unanimous, view is that water companies and sewage undertakers should take responsibility for the sewers over a period to bring them up to standard. Of course, there are issues connected to that, particularly cost and timetables and the division between residential properties and commercial decisions. I understand that there are problems, but I know from the discussions in the consultation that the Minister is mindful that this is the preferred way forward.

Thirdly, the Minister convened and spoke at the opening of a seminar with stakeholders on 26 January 2005 about possible ways forward. I was at the seminar. It was lively. There was a good debate, acknowledgement of the problem and a resolve that we needed to make progress. In parallel to all that, the Government have taken other action. The Minister—in this Room, I think—accepted and refined amendments to what became the Water Act 2003, which gives the Secretary of State the opportunity to introduce a scheme by secondary regulation for the adoption of private sewers. We have a legislative peg to help us make progress.

Importantly, too, the all-party parliamentary group on sewers has been set up. I do get some jobs: I am the chairman of the group and 105 MPs are involved. Residents' associations and all the interested parties in the sewerage industry are also involved. It is a lively group that is keen to make progress. It recognises that it needs to have good relationships with the Minister and his officials, and those exist. I am pleased to be able to thank Frank Jones from the Plastic Pipes Group, who acts as secretary to the group.

Huw Irranca-Davies (Ogmore) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend on holding this important debate. He has already alluded to its scale. He has complimented the Department on the great strides that it has taken to clarify the matter and lay out the options, none of which is without pain. Does not he agree, however, that many residents, including hundreds who are affected on the Sarn estate in my constituency, are looking for a way forward, even if it is painful? They want to be able to say: "We can get out of this mess. Even if it is over a period of years, we know the way forward." That is what we are looking for.

Paddy Tipping: My hon. Friend has picked up the main thrust of the debate. That is what I am pressing the Government to do: to make an announcement, if not today, certainly soon, about the way forward. There are problems associated with any way forward, but I know the Minister, and I know that his officials are aware of the problems and are determined to take action.

One area in which action has been taken is on the new protocol adopted in April 2002 to deal with new sewers. The notion is that if new houses are built to adoptable standards, there will be no problems in future. Again, the Government have been careful about that approach, and they have asked WS Atkins to consider how successful the protocol has been. I was astonished to read in the Atkins report that only 1 per cent. of new houses are being built with sewers to adoptable standards. The report gives a variety of reasons for that, but its conclusion must be that when building new houses, mandatory steps must be taken to put the protocol in place.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): I apologise for missing the first few minutes of what my hon. Friend has said, and we commend him on bringing this matter to the notice of the House. Does he agree that as well as installing traditional sewers, water companies must be encouraged to consider soft technology solutions as one way forward? Does he agree that there have to be other options?

Paddy Tipping: My hon. Friend takes a great interest in the matter, and in rural areas the notion of reed beds may be one way forward. Severn Trent Water has undertaken some work on it, but unfortunately, it seems to have come to an end. Different steps will need to be taken in different areas, and I am keen to press the Minister to consider the use of building regulations, particularly part H, to ensure that new houses are built with sewers up to adoptable standards.

[Paddy Tipping]

I want to make two further points from the industry. First, although there is a code of practice for developers on the design and construction of new sewers for adoption, it is beset by several different appendices in different parts of the country. It would make sense to have a universal approach throughout the country to the laying down of sewers. Secondly, it would make sense to have a workforce that was able to do the work. The industry has been pressing for the energy and utility sector skills council to be tasked with producing appropriate NVQs in those areas. I should like the Minister to consider those practical proposals and solutions from the industry.

It is clear that the Government have achieved a great deal. Much research has been undertaken, more work is in hand and consultation has been successful; but my central concern that underlines the debate is the need for an established decision-making timetable, and to keep to it. In October 2004, Ministers announced that a decision would be made in spring 2005, but the timetable was extended to autumn 2005. In a recent parliamentary answer, the Minister stated that the Government expected to publish a decision on transfer in the new year that would not rule out further consultation on the options for implementation.

Happy new year. New year 2006 has come. It is almost a year since the seminar that I mentioned earlier. Important discussions are continuing between players such as Ofwat, WaterVoice and Water UK. For me, the way is absolutely clear: I want water companies to be able to adopt the majority of the sewers. I know that there are problems associated with that, but it is the appropriate way to resolve the issue. There will be costs, but the cost per householder of a levy across all water users would be less than the cost of private sewers.

I am confident that progress has been made, and I have been delighted with the help of the Minister and his Department. However, I want from him today a firm announcement about the timetable for the adoption of private sewers. Unless we take that approach, there will be dismay across the country.

The Minister for Climate Change and the Environment (Mr. Elliot Morley): I join my colleagues in wishing you all the best for the new year, Mr. Cook.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood (Paddy Tipping) on securing this debate and on the thoughtful and constructive way in which he presented what are, as he knows, complex arguments and real issues. I would like to express my appreciation for the work of the all-party group on sewers and sewerage, which had a major input in developing options to address the problems caused by private sewers and lateral drains.

My hon. Friend rightly stated that the Government accept that there is a problem that must be addressed. He also pointed out that there are no simple options. Alternatives for addressing the issues are what we need to deal with at present.

My hon. Friend said that a great deal of progress has been made to ensure that sewers in new build are built to adoptable standards and that we avoid the problems of the past. That has been done, and it has been effective. A new protocol has been introduced for the construction of new sewers. In fact, we are considering whether it should be made mandatory, as recommended by the Atkins report. I am pleased that it will be referred to in the reprinted building regulations and the upcoming review. That is the first stage in preventing such problems from developing in the future, and we have addressed it.

As my hon. Friend rightly said, we have taken the necessary powers under the Water Act 2003 to give us flexibility for implementing whatever option we decide on. That is part of the second stage, which involves dealing with the existing private sewers—the legacy of the past—and the problems that they present. He mentioned the Atkins report. Like him, I was surprised by the high percentage of sewers identified as being in private ownership. There has been extensive consultation, including the stakeholder conference in January 2005.

My hon. Friend asks, where do we go now, what progress has been made, where are we? Obviously, we must address the questions that came out of the seminar and the consultation about the scope of any transfer, the form that it might take, costs and funding, which, of course, are significant issues, the impact on the drain repair and insurance industries, and public expectation. Those are the key questions that we need to look at. If we decide that transfer is the best way forward, we have those enabling powers. We also need to ensure that we have the maximum input from the various stakeholders who are affected.

WaterVoice, which is now the Consumer Council for Water, felt that there was a need for further work to gauge customers' views. That is not an unreasonable request. To address that, DEFRA has been overseeing qualitative customer research which has examined customers' views on current ownership, and possible transfer. It comprises 20 focus groups—two in each of the water and sewerage company areas—and was completed in August 2005. DEFRA was closely supported by the Consumer Council for Water and we also received input from the Office of Water Service, which is another key player in this.

Huw Irranca-Davies: On a technical point, can the Minister confirm that that consultation included the relevant agencies in Wales?

Mr. Morley: My understanding is that it did. We are looking at England and Wales in relation to these measures. It will perhaps come as no surprise to my hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood that the outcome of those consultations was that the focus groups believed that current ownership arrangements were unfair, inconsistent, complicated and untenable. The majority also believed that private sewers and laterals should be transferred to the water and sewerage companies, reinforcing the support for that option expressed in other responses. The full report and the findings of the survey are available on the DEFRA website.

We need to look at the scope for and the form of the transfer, what the costs will be, the funding, the impact on industry and public expectations. None of those are straightforward issues. I share my hon. Friend's frustration that the wheels and machinery of Government appear on occasion to turn very slowly. I am as frustrated as he is. In fairness, my officials have done an excellent job in trying to pull together all these very difficult issues. Should private sewers, serving local authority owned commercial and industrial premises, be classed in the same way? That is a significant question that is complicated by the fact that some commercial sewers also serve domestic properties. Excluding some sewers might result in a piecemeal transfer leaving pockets of private sewers, thereby not securing effective and integrated management of the network as a whole.

The real options are overnight transfer—the whole lot moved into the ownership of the water and sewerage companies—or phased transfer, which could have the benefits of reducing the cost impact. If we go for phased transfer, do we encourage a voluntary approach or do we go for a compulsory approach? There are pros and cons for each option. While an overnight transfer would immediately resolve anxiety for private sewer owners and provide clarity for business, it might still take a considerable time as the companies work their way through the problems of the private sewers.

Whatever option is taken, we must be open and honest with people that in some cases it may be some years before there are solutions. We are talking of situations where nothing has happened for decades. Even if people expect that there will not be overnight solutions, if there is a potential solution, it will certainly be an improvement on the current situation.

Huw Irranca-Davies: Does my hon. Friend accept that one of the issues that I encounter in my constituency—I think that this happens throughout the UK—is that, because we are now decades into some of these ancient private sewer issues, an increasing number of residents will make complaints? While I fully appreciate what his Department has done and what he says about the complexities, there will be an increasing urgency to move forward on this matter.

Mr. Morley: I accept that. People suffer from problems with the sewage network. I well understand that there are real difficulties, which are likely to get worse rather than better the longer they are left.

Those are the considerations that we need to think about: overnight transfer, phased transfer, and whether phased transfer helps with the costs. All are important considerations. Ofwat has a major interest because of the impact on consumer bills. The last price round was a significant increase for many consumers, because of major works that are still being undertaken.

Paddy Tipping: Is it not the case that the consumer research—the focus group that the Minister referred to—addresses the problem and that the generality of view was that people were prepared to look at a levy?

Mr. Morley: Yes. Another question is whether the people affected would consider the option of a levy. Again, there are pros and cons. Some of the advantages are outweighed by the technical issues of applying the levy—the collection and costs. All the issues have to be weighed up.

My hon. Friend might like to know that Ofwat's research estimated that the impact on the average bill would be between £3 and £6 per annum for the highest cost option and between £1 and £2 for the lowest cost option. Those are within a range that is not unreasonable. The crucial issue before us is that, whatever step we, the Government, take next, we will have to produce a regulatory impact assessment. That is right. The assessment will look at the options, costs and of course benefits.

My officials are well into the process of drafting two RIAs. The first is to accompany the Government's decision on the transfer of private sewers and laterals to water and sewage companies, if that is the step we take. The second is a partial RIA to accompany the public consultation on implementation options that will be taken forward if the decision to transfer is made by the Government. That looks at the burden on the industry, which is an important issue.

A competition assessment and a small firms impact test have already been undertaken as part of the RIA process. That work, which is a crucial precondition of the decision the Government will make, is well established. The object at the beginning of the review was to alleviate the anxiety and distress caused to householders who suffer from some of those problems, which I know well and which have been clearly highlighted by the all-party group. I thank Ofwat, Water UK, the Consumer Council for Water, the all-party group and other stakeholders, which have been very much involved in and have assisted the review.

While I cannot give an exact time scale for the announcement, I can say to my hon. Friend that Ministers across Government will soon be in a position to weigh up the costs and benefits of transfer and to make a decision. I want to see that done as quickly as possible.

I also appreciated the point about skill training. I welcome proposals from the industry. It is essential to have proper qualifications and skilled work force and companies—both the water companies and small companies can do that kind of work.

In relation to the particular constituency issue that my hon. Friend mentioned, I understand that the work he referred to will start tomorrow. I certainly hope that that resolves the situation.

In conclusion, we are not too far away from an announcement. I know that my hon. Friend and others have worked hard and long on the issue. Although an announcement will not solve the problem overnight, I hope that what will be clear is that there is a solution in the offing for those people who have suffered from the problem for many years.

Rural Post Offices

2.30 pm

Danny Alexander (Inverness, Nairn, Badenoch and Strathspey) (LD): It is a pleasure once again to serve under your chairmanship in Westminster Hall, Mr. Cook.

I am very grateful that this important topic has been selected for debate today, because the future of the rural post office network is vital to rural communities, not only in my constituency, but throughout the highlands and islands of Scotland and the length and breadth of the United Kingdom.

As the Minister knows, I requested the debate after his answer to my question to him during Trade and Industry questions on 1 December, which led me to have real concerns about the Government's intentions for the future of the rural post office network. What is the Government's commitment to the network, and are they willing to consider more broadly how its value should be assessed? That assessment should not simply be a crude financial one; it should consider much more broadly the social and economic value of the rural post office network.

The Minister's answer followed Postcomm's advice, which was published earlier this year after requests made under the Freedom of Information Act 2000 by my hon. Friend the Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Carmichael). That advice on what should be the future of the rural post office network called, in effect, for a rural reinvention scheme to mirror the urban reinvention scheme that has already taken place. It postulated that some 1,600 rural post offices should be closed.

How should we assess the Government's record on post offices so far? To be fair, the social network payment of £150 million a year to support the rural post office network is a significant item on the credit side, and is worth noting. On the other hand, of course, it is equally worth pointing out that that is due to run out at the end of March 2008, subject to the funding for the period 2006 to 2008 securing the appropriate European Union clearance. Perhaps the Minister will mention that in his response.

Furthermore, Post Office Ltd has a duty to prevent avoidable closures of post offices in rural areas. That requirement, too, expires at the end of March 2006, and the Government have yet to say whether it will be extended or what will take its place.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on securing this important debate, which, as he rightly says, is relevant up and down the country. I draw his attention to Naseby post office in my constituency, which closed as a result of an armed robbery. Mr. Steane of the local "The Fitzgerald Arms" wanted to reopen it, but the Post Office has refused him leave to do so. I do not believe that avoidable closures are being dealt with as the Government say they should be.

Danny Alexander: I am very grateful for that intervention. The point is that, as well as preventing avoidable closures, we should also consider reopenings, where appropriate.

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): On the very same point, my office received a note from the Post Office only five minutes ago telling me that the post office in the village of Isham in my constituency, the only post office for miles around, is now to be considered permanently closed. There seems to be a difference between what is being said and what is actually happening.

Danny Alexander: I am grateful for that intervention, which again serves to underline the point that despite the duty to prevent avoidable closures, there are closures. Indeed, they number some 100 a year, and are gradually eroding the breadth of the rural post office network. That in itself is a significant concern.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley) (Con): Does the hon. Gentleman believe that the Post Office needs to be imaginative about its network, particularly in rural areas? I suspect that there are few villages without a pub. Rural post offices may have been closed, but is it not time that the Post Office started actively to consider how many pubs in rural areas could double up as post offices? Some already do, including "The Eagle and Child" in Hurst Green; the post office there was closed but it has been reinvented in the pub. That is the sort of reinvention that we want to see; we want openings in rural areas, not closures.

Mr. Frank Cook (in the Chair): Order. I am not in the business of encouraging bad habits. As I am partially deaf, and because Hansard writers have to hear precisely what is being said, I would appreciate it if hon. Members directed themselves to the Chair and to the microphones.

Danny Alexander: Thank you, Mr. Cook. I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for that intervention. The point about imagination is important and I shall return to it later. As for the duty to prevent the avoidable closure of rural post offices, I would be grateful if the Minister spelled out what the position will be beyond March 2006.

On the downside when assessing the Government's record on post offices is the urban reinvention scheme—a title that conceals more than it reveals. In effect, the scheme closed a substantial number, several thousands, of post offices in cities throughout the country. In my constituency, three post offices in Inverness were closed under that scheme. All those who passed the main post office in Inverness during the run-up to Christmas will have seen queues stretching out on to the streets, with people having to wait for 40 or 45 minutes; they will have seen at first hand the consequences of those closures and the additional pressure brought to bear on the post offices that remain. That scheme was by no means a unalloyed benefit—I see hon. Members nodding. It significantly eroded the post office network.

Another major issue is the direct payment of benefits. People who used to collect their pension from the post office using their pension book have been encouraged, or even persuaded through aggressive telephone sales campaigns, to switch to having their pension paid into their bank account.

John Thurso (Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross) (LD): Does not my hon. Friend think that it is particularly regrettable, given the lack of footfall that that decision has caused post offices, that the Government did not look creatively at the delivery of their own services, perhaps using post offices to deliver those services?

Danny Alexander: I am grateful for that intervention. The point is very sensible. A much more innovative consideration of what Government services could be delivered through the rural post office network would help increase the footfall—the number of customers coming to post offices for a variety of services. I intend later to suggest some of the services that could be extended to rural post offices to help sustain the network. Direct payments is one.

It is important to understand why rural post offices are so important. Put simply, they are the heart of our rural communities. At the end of June 2005, there were 8,001 rural post offices in the UK, of which 1,144 were in Scotland; 170 of those were in the Highland council area within which lies my constituency. The rural network currently serves about 12 million customers, and provides communities with about 170 products, including, in some places but not all, new services such as mobile phone top-ups and foreign currency exchange. Indeed, over two thirds of villages with populations of between 500 and 1,000 have a post office.

Sir Robert Smith (West Aberdeenshire and Kincardine) (LD): I congratulate my hon. Friend on securing this debate. It gives us the chance to emphasise again to the Minister that in many villages the post office is the last available public service, and the last point of contact for public services generally. That is why the Government should be obliged to come forward with a safety net—one that will keep those services going—especially given that their decision on direct payments created the crisis in the first place.

Danny Alexander: I agree. One example of such a post office, which is the only remaining public service in the community, is in the village of Foyers, in my constituency, between Fort Augustus and Inverness on the banks of Loch Ness. Through creative and sensible business practices, opening a café and shop alongside the post office, the post office has been maintained, but the income generated through it is vital to ensure that all those services can continue in that village. There will be hundreds or thousands of similar examples up and down the land.

The public view is that the rural post office network has a special value as a focal point for our communities, forms a social function and is a trusted source of guidance and advice. The post office provides vital financial services to the 15 per cent. of rural households that do not have a car and the 49 per cent. of people living in rural settlements who do not live within walking distance of a bus stop with a daily service. Post offices are essential for vulnerable people. The people most dependent on post offices are the elderly, the disabled and people living on low incomes. Those are also the people who are least able to adapt if a post office closes. As Citizens Advice says,

"the closure of rural Post Offices has a profound impact on the local community and hits vulnerable groups such as the elderly, the disabled, and those with mobility problems particularly hard."

Of course, post offices are economically important, too. They support village shops and other businesses—cafés, pubs and even petrol stations—where they are co-located. As I mentioned earlier, the post office combined with a shop is often the last remaining retail outlet. If the post office side of the business is removed, the private retail business may lose customers, threatening its viability. In rural areas, only 4 per cent. of villages have a bank but 60 per cent. have a post office branch. Rural post offices provide for many people the only method of accessing financial services on their doorstep.

Local post offices have environmental benefits, too. Carbon emissions are reduced because people can walk down the road to their post office rather than driving 10, 15 or 20 miles to the next town or village. We talk a lot about building sustainable rural communities. There are many elements to that: affordable housing, good health and education services and so on. However, a community is much less likely to be sustainable if basic financial, communication and retail services are not provided within it. That is what post offices provide and support, and it is why they should be seen as a cornerstone of rural policy, not to be dispensed with lightly as a financial burden.

If rural post offices are so great, what is all the worry about? There is uncertainty about the funding for the rural network from 2008 onwards. The Minister will, I hope, acknowledge that the lack of certainty is causing problems for all concerned. Without a clear Government policy that goes far into the future, sub-postmasters and Post Office Ltd cannot plan for the future or ensure that rural services are maintained.

Post Office Ltd is a company with financial responsibilities, and the nearer it gets to 2008 with no decision taken on what funding will be available from that date, the more it will have to take steps to reduce the service. It has been made clear to me by Post Office Ltd that "changes to the funding would inevitably mean changes to the network—but the extent and timing would depend on the detailed nature of the funding change."

In plain English, if funding is cut, branches will be closed. Postcomm says that 1,600 branches face closure, but it has also said that only 10 per cent. of branches are financially viable, so a purely financial measure could mean even more closures. Indeed, the Minister has hinted that he considers the issue in such financial terms with his remarks about 800 post offices serving an average of only 23 people.

I am grateful to the Minister for his letter prior to the debate, but I am not convinced that it offers a great deal of reassurance. He writes that "we must look beyond the number of outlets and focus more closely on the accessibility of service provision."

Indeed, he goes on to say that

"it is clear that many existing Post Offices have too few customers to be viable"

I urge the Government to put away their slide rule and bring their social conscience to bear. The fundamental driver of Government policy towards the rural post office network should be its social and economic value to the communities that it serves, not just the Treasury bottom line. I would argue that £150 million is a relatively small price to pay for a network of 8,000 branches serving 12 million people in rural communities across the country. With a bit more innovative thinking on the part of the Government, as my hon. Friend the Member for Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross (John Thurso) suggested earlier, much better use could be made of that network.

Let us take a comparative example; it may not be perfect, but I will use it just the same. My constituents are among the taxpayers from all over the country who contribute every year to the £2 billion Government contribution to the London transport network. The post offices in Aviemore or Foyers in my constituency are as important to the social cohesion and accessibility of services in those communities as the tube is to London.

Mr. Evans: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that many people who live in rural areas do not benefit from the expenditure of taxation in urban areas on services such as swimming pools and libraries? They are not able to access those as much as people living in urban areas, so expenditure on the rural post office network is giving some of that money back to support those in rural areas. It is basically giving them their fair share.

Danny Alexander: I share the sentiment of that intervention. Public spending needs to be spread throughout the country in different ways and there has to be a balance. I urge the Minister to give us his estimate of the overall social and economic value of the rural post office network. I am sure that it is hundreds of millions of pounds more than the funding provided by the Government.

The Minister will no doubt tell us that the Post Office is piloting innovative new ways of delivering its services. Indeed, it is, and I welcome those pilot schemes. I would be grateful if the Minister told us of any assessment he has received on the success of the pilot schemes and whether he will publish any such reports. I know that some have been relatively successful—those using the hub and spoke method—but new ideas also include the use of mobile units. I hope that the Minister will be honest about what he finds from the pilots. According to one report that I have received, a scheme to provide post office services through a mobile unit in Caithness has been "a disaster" with technological problems proving to be a real "nightmare" and causing difficulties to many individuals.

John Thurso: I gave my hon. Friend that report, so perhaps I should first draw to his attention the fact that the scheme has suffered from considerable difficulty with the technological support that was promised. Secondly, post offices that were open daily or for several days a week are now open for half an hour or one hour per week. Thirdly, I extracted from the Post Office a promise that if the scheme failed, it would revert to the status quo. Perhaps in his questions to the Minister my hon. Friend would like also to ask whether such a promise will be valid in light of the fact that the guarantee expires in 2006?

Danny Alexander: I am grateful for that intervention. My hon. Friend has put the question more eloquently than I could and I trust that the Minister will answer it during his response.

It is also worth pointing out that the trials have their limitations. Postwatch has expressed its disappointment that the different types of services were not piloted in each region or in any remote island communities. The pilots only address how the service is delivered; they do not look at what service is delivered. Through direct payments, the Government have taken away a large chunk of income from rural post offices. What about looking for new services that could provide income and help the Government?

A joined-up approach by the Government could find a wide range of additional services to be provided through post offices. For example, the Government are currently embarked on a process of opening 70 new passport offices, to which every new passport applicant will have to travel for an interview. How absurd, when there is a perfectly serviceable network of local offices throughout the country that could do the job perfectly well: post offices.

In Fife, local police have worked with the post office to allow local residents to report low-level crime and lost and found property at the post office. Witness citations may be served and people required to produce driving documents may do so at their local post office. That not only improves access to police services, but helps to safeguard post offices in those rural communities. The scheme has recently been extended to Newburgh and Tayport. Why not consider rolling it out throughout the country?

In my constituency, pensioners are having real difficulty booking bus tickets. That will be even more of a problem as free bus travel for pensioners is rolled out. Why not enable post offices in rural areas to take such bookings? The technology is already available to make that happen. Other examples include locating lottery ticket machines in post offices, which will help to encourage footfall, and providing vehicle licensing, which is currently available in some post offices but not in others. In my constituency, there was a temporary switch of DVLA services to the Kingsmills post office in Inverness because another post office had closed, and a dramatic boost in services took place as a result. Spreading that to rural post offices throughout the country would bring real benefits.

The Government must acknowledge the importance of rural post offices to the community and to vulnerable people in particular. They must take decisions on future funding based on the social and economic value of that service. The Minister will know that Professor John Farrington and his team at Aberdeen university received Treasury funding to develop a tool for measuring the impact of policy changes on social inclusion in rural areas. Why has that not been used in this case? Currently, the risk impact assessments that are undertaken when considering where money should be spent do not include the social impact that rural post offices have on their community. The Government should have a statutory requirement to maintain the rural network. Will the Minister consider legislation to introduce such a duty before embarking on any further change to the network?

Will the Minister also explain how he is working with other Departments and the devolved Governments to put together a joined-up plan for the rural network? For example, is the Department of Trade and Industry willing to continue funding the rural network from its budget, or is the Minister currently seeking financial support from other Departments? Given that the DTI does not necessarily have a social remit, is it necessarily the best place to make decisions about vital community services?

The Minister will understand that there is real concern that the urban reinvention scheme that led to the closure of several thousand urban post offices is soon to be followed by a rural reinvention scheme that will do the same. Let us be clear what that means. In many cases, it means reinventing rural communities without post offices. I do not want that to happen, and the attendance at this debate shows, I hope, that many hon. Members from all parties do not want it to happen either. Let us have a Government policy that ensures a flourishing and sustainable rural network long into the future, because that is in the best interests of rural communities, vulnerable people and the country as a whole.

2.51 pm

Mr. Russell Brown (Dumfries and Galloway) (Lab): I congratulate the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn, Badenoch and Strathspey (Danny Alexander) on securing the debate and thank him for sending me a letter, also congratulating him on securing the debate, that he received from some constituents in my area who are part of the ongoing rural postal pilot.

This is about the delivery of the service. For many years—we have already heard this mentioned this afternoon—we have seen postal services delivered through village shops. My previous constituency had a post office in the village pub. I do not know whether that meant that people were picking up their pension and then spending a fair amount of it. There are also post offices in garages. The issue is about the service, not necessarily the structures and methods of delivery.

We are talking about the rural network. I want to mention something that happened 12 months ago in my constituency, in the town of Dumfries. When Safeway changed to Morrisons, Morrisons immediately decided that it wanted the post office out of the supermarket. There was quite an outcry, because it was a busy post office. However, I was quite astonished to discover that over 50 per cent. of the business being transacted through that post office came not from the townspeople of Dumfries but from people from further afield—from villages and some of the smaller towns. We are now looking at what some people would deem to be the Crown post office in Dumfries—the directly managed service—being franchised out to Spar supermarkets. To a certain extent, it has come as a bit of a surprise—although I am not totally astonished—that only 15 per cent. of the business transferred from Safeway to the main post office. The big question is: where has all the other business gone? I suspect that it has gone to a couple of the other urban sub-post offices, but some of it may have gone back to the rural localities from whence it came.

The public want a service and, in general, they do not worry too much about how it is being delivered—whether it is in the village shop, the pub or wherever. We have to ask ourselves what we are being asked for. Is it a public service, a social service, or a combination of both? In rural localities, it is a combination of both.

As I indicated, my locality is one of three in Scotland where a rural postal pilot is ongoing. It is what is deemed a hub and spoke service. In other words, from a centre—the town of Castle Douglas—the sub-postmaster operates the post offices in three villages. That started back in mid-September, and there was an outcry because the first thing that happened was that the hours were reduced. All three of the post offices operate out of shops. I visited two of them and asked the sub-postmasters, as they still were at the time, whether they believed that the significant reduction in hours—one of them had gone down from 21 hours to 10—was reasonable. Both of them believed that their new opening hours reflected the amount of custom that came through their doors.

The big difficulty was the way in which the hours were configured. A Post Office member of staff goes from one of those post offices to the next to provide the service. Like anybody else, that individual can be in only one place at a time. People wanted the post offices to be open for more hours in the morning, and there was a great demand for Saturday opening. I went to a meeting in one of the village halls and by pure chance, nothing more, a retired sub-postmaster and his wife were there when the public were demanding Saturday opening. The guy stood up and said, "People can make these demands, but the reality is that when I was running the post office nobody used it on a Saturday morning, so why do people want it open then?"

I will not paint a rosy picture; difficult decisions have to be made. Because there was an outcry, I asked people for feedback about whether the hours suited their needs. In general, the answer was no. I am a townie, and I was surprised to find that some people used the post office every day. That might well be the case. I even had people writing to say that they did not use the post office at all, but that the new opening hours were not right. I think that we would all agree that one has to respect people's views.

The pilot is to run for 12 months, and it requires the co-operation of the shopkeepers. I have made the point on the two occasions on which I have attended public meetings, one of them last night, that if there is no shop there is a difficulty: from where should we deliver the service? We could use the local pub, or whatever the case may be, but we need co-operation, especially when we are running a pilot.

I do not want to have a go at anybody, but I must be honest. Two of the villages seem to be operating fairly well. The other one has been something of a problem, and that is putting it kindly. From day one, one individual has been turning up at the post office with a clipboard and pen. I know that I said, "Keep me posted on any problems that arise," but that is harassment and intimidation, and it is not required. The gentleman has become a prolific letter writer and he is trying to drag me along.

Mr. Evans: That is more business for the post office.

Mr. Brown: The hon. Gentleman is quite right, and that point was made to the gentleman last night by a representative of the Post Office. Let me give hon. Members an indication of the situation. I wrote to the constituent in question on 16 December, and he wrote back on 17 December. Regrettably, I did not get a reply away to him until 27 December. I went into my office on 28 December to discover that he had written to me on Christmas eve asking for a response to his letter of 17 December. I responded to him on 29 December and, lo and behold—I appreciate that the man has moved into the area and is not a Scot—he found time on Hogmanay to write me another letter. I have responded.

The local newspaper has been filled with nasty letters having a go at the Government and at me. I do not have a problem with that. However, I do object when the sub-postmaster and her staff are being harangued by a few individuals. That is not fair on them. They are public servants and they have been doing their best to keep the service running. During the initial two to three months, the position was reviewed. That demand from one village for morning sessions resulted in a change of hours on 5 December. That gave it two morning sessions, a late morning to early afternoon session and an afternoon session. It was admitted last night at the public meeting that some of the problems have died down. It did not help that, in the first week after the introduction of new hours, the machine for giving receipts broke down, but therein lies a problem with IT.

The new hours were introduced on 5 December. I visited two outlets on the previous Friday with the Under-Secretary of State for Scotland, my hon. Friend the. Member for Inverclyde (David Cairns). As far as I was concerned, the good news at those outlets was that business in the shop had not diminished in any shape or form; in fact, those involved were quite pleased with what was happening, and I suspect that there might have been a little additional business. If those shops closed, we would need to find a new base for the post offices, so I am relieved that business is going well.

I mentioned my constituent, the prolific letter writer. Among the things that he has written to me about is the fact that only 860 mm of counter space was negotiated. In the same letter, he even talks about the payment that the shopkeeper gets from the sub-postmistress. I have had to write back to him to say that that is neither his business nor mine, but a business transaction between two parties.

Some of the problems, I have to say, are being stoked up by the previous sub-postmaster. Nobody has been forced out of their position. There has been co-operation, although—this may have been the same with the urban reinvention programme—some sub-postmasters may not be too happy to tell their customers that they have co-operated in what is happening.

There is a great fear that there is an alternative agenda on the part of the Post Office. In another village in my constituency, the sub-post office operates out of a portakabin—there is nothing else there. The lady who runs it is getting on in years and decided that she wanted to call a halt to the whole thing. Fortunately, the Post Office moved in, knowing that it probably would not get anyone else in the area to run the post office. It went to the lady, looked at the hours that she operated and at the amount of business going through the post office and said, "You really need to be open only three sessions a week." On hearing that, the lady decided to stay with it and open only three sessions a week. We need to be conscious of just how much business goes through some of these places.

About 50 people went to the meeting that I attended in my constituency yesterday on what we in Scotland would call a dreich winter's evening—it was wet and windy to say the least. All but three or four of those people were elderly. We need to recognise that all ages use the post office, but there is a clear indication that the elderly value post offices more than the generations that are coming through.

At the meeting, the public were able to air their views. The Post Office rep, Steve Miller, who is a tremendous guy, said—this comes back to the point made by the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn, Badenoch and Strathspey about the customer base—that one post office in the highlands had eight or nine customers a week. The cry in the village hall yesterday evening was, "Close it! We in this village are paying the price for that." I would say, however, that we should not close it down, but look at delivering the service in some other way. If people need a service, let us ask what other structure we can put in place to provide it. It is always the same: everyone believes that everything in their patch is fine and that everyone else is to blame. One person commented, "We just want the Royal Mail the way it was," but I sincerely hope that colleagues in this Chamber accept that it is 2006, that life has changed and that people carry out their business in a different way.

One of my great frustrations as regards the postal pilot is that the sub-postmistress is unable to do what she wants to develop, promote and market products. The one respect in which we have problems is that she is constantly tied up doing other things. She appreciates more than anyone else that she has to build the customer base—the opportunity is there, and she sees it. Last night, the Post Office representative pointed to the full range of products that were available, and it was astonishing that people were simply not aware of them. The fact that the sub-postmistress's efforts to promote those products are frustrated creates difficulties.

Others will learn from the postal pilots and from the experiences that my constituents are going through. Last night, I was asked how much longer the sub-postmistress wanted to promote products—was it a week or two weeks? I had to say that it is a 12-month pilot. I look forward to further debates in this Chamber and the main Chamber once we have a report about the pilots, just to see how we might deliver services to people. I emphasise again the importance of this debate, and repeat my congratulations to the hon. Gentleman. The future is about the services and the way in which we deliver them, not the structures.

3.5 pm

Mr. Owen Paterson (North Shropshire) (Con): I congratulate the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn, Badenoch and Strathspey (Danny Alexander) on securing the debate on this important issue, in which I have taken some interest as the Member for North Shropshire.

A couple of years ago, in the summer, I drove 150 miles around my constituency. The Minister bumped into me in the Tea Room and asked whether I represented a rural seat; the fact that my constituency is a 150-mile drive around shows that it is rural to an extent. I visited 28 post offices—I apologise to the four that I did not get to on that day—and found an extraordinary, consistent pattern. At that time the Government were being, quite frankly, brutal in ramming through a change in the way benefits were paid. The proportion of turnover in relation to benefits then was extraordinarily high in my post offices: it was 60 per cent. in Gobowen, 80 per cent. in Treflach, 70 per cent. in Pant, 60 per cent. in West Felton, and 50 per cent. in Baschurch and Prees. There was a real feeling that, unfortunately, the Government had not pursued the outgoing Tory Government's plan to pay benefits by card, which would have been just as secure but would have kept a proportion of the £400 million annual income going through the sub-post office network.

The current problem is very much of the Government's making, and is partly because they are an urban Government. I do not think that there is a single rural Member in the DTI team—they are all urban Ministers. I sympathise with the hon. Gentleman who secured the debate, and I want to get across the point today that this is a real problem in rural areas.

I draw attention to one particularly hard-working sub-postmaster, Colin Doyle, who has just retired after 25 years of working, probably seven days a week, in Knockin. His marketing has been to allow those who do not come from Shropshire to pronounce Knockin "Knockin", and he has a large sign over his shop saying "The Knockin Shop", which attracts large numbers of tourists on their way to Wales, who buy merchandise from his shop. He knows an awful lot about post offices and was very helpful when I went to see him. Following my tour, I took him to see the Minister's predecessor, the hon. Member for East Ham (Mr. Timms), to try to ram through to him the problems with what the Government were doing in so brutally forcing people to receive benefits by direct payment.

Colin Doyle had done everything one could ask for: he acknowledged the importance of benefits as the core of the post office business, which attracts customers in for other post office products, letter-writing materials and other stationery, he had a fresh food business and a fruit business, and, like many other post offices that I visited, he had diversified into having an off-licence. In fairness to the comments made by hon. Member for Dumfries and Galloway (Mr. Brown), I take my hat off to the sub-postmasters in my constituency, who have bust their guts to diversify and get into general merchandise.

I have a great quote from Colin. He said, "If the post office goes, the shop goes, and if the shop goes, the village goes." There is a real social benefit in keeping that focus of activity in the village, because the post office is not just about postal activities and other products that are sold; it becomes a focus for information. There is a village notice board for advertising jobs and so on. There is a real social dimension to the post office in an area such as mine, where large numbers of elderly people live on their own. It is noticed if they do not come into the shop and pick up a pint of milk or a loaf of bread.

Julia Goldsworthy (Falmouth and Camborne) (LD): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that older people are among the most vulnerable and often the most isolated groups in rural areas who depend on post office services? On my last trip to a rural post office, an elderly gentleman visited, and it was the first time that he had left his house for two years; it was the major social event of his day. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the Government should accept and recognise the important social role that those village post offices play for many older people, in particular?

Mr. Paterson: Yes, I entirely agree. That was a most helpful intervention.

The point that I was trying to get across was that the activity of rural post offices is not just commercial and postal, and it cannot just be replaced, as the hon. Member for East Ham said when Colin Doyle went to see him, by the universal bank—which we have not heard much about, I must say—and other banking services. Those are all welcome, and the hon. Gentleman was hopeful that insurance products and foreign exchange products, which have taken off, would be of real benefit. However, I must be brutal with this Minister: it was a terrible error to rip out £400 million of benefit payments. As the hon. Member for Falmouth and Camborne (Julia Goldsworthy) said, the majority of people claiming those benefits were elderly. It brought them to the post office, but now there is no need for them to go, because the benefits are paid directly. That was a major error, and it has got the Government into a mess on the issue.

Following all that, I have become secretary of the all-party group on sub-post offices. I do not expect everyone to stand up and sing "Ode to Joy", but it is a most interesting role that I enjoy, under the splendid chairmanship of the hon. Member for Vauxhall (Kate Hoey). We intend to hold a series of regular meetings, to which all Members of all parties are invited. My neighbour, the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik), is the treasurer, but I think that he may be otherwise occupied, as many Liberal Democrats may be this week.

I invite all hon. Members to attend meetings of the all-party group, and I hope that the Minister will come along. I am indebted to the National Federation of Sub-Postmasters for statistics showing what an important sector of activity rural post offices are. There are 8,000 post offices in rural areas, which are defined as areas with a population of fewer than 10,000 people. The rural network serves about 12 million customers a week, and 84 per cent. of the rural population live within one mile of a post office. The other interesting figure, which I found surprising when I received it, is that the 14,500 sub-postmasters each provide jobs to an average of 4.6 people, 83 per cent. of whom are part-time. That ties in with other comments that were made earlier, about the social aspect of the activity, which provides part-time employment in thinly populated rural areas.

To get themselves out of their muddle, the Government put up the £450 million, which was due to run at £150 million a year. I find it hard to see how sub-postmasters can gain access to the money. How is it available? How do sub-postmasters get at it? Most of those in my constituency find it difficult to do that. As I understand matters, it was originally scheduled to run from 2003 to 2006. That is what the hon. Member for East Ham told me at our meeting. I understand that it will now continue to 2008, but that it is subject to EU approval, because it might count as state aid. What is the exact position? The issue ties in with the comments made by the hon. Member for Dumfries and Galloway: is the matter in question a social activity or is it a state-funded activity, and how does it qualify, if it counts as a social activity, under EU state aid rules?

We have had trials of hub and spoke, mobile vans and so on, carried out by Post Office Ltd. I understand that they were due to be completed in December 2005. Is that correct? Will the Minister tell us when Post Office Ltd will report, and what the Government's reaction will be?

What does the Minister see as sub-post offices' role? How does he see the future? We cannot keep stumbling on. We have ripped out the £400 million of benefits, and that presents a huge threat unless we obtain other viable activity. I strongly support all the attempts to bring in banking and foreign exchange, but according to the National Federation of Sub-Postmasters there is a £140 million a year deficit—a gap between income and cost—in the activity. I should like to know the Minister's long-term strategic view.

Mr. Evans: While we are trying to work out exactly what the role of the rural post office is—and we know that it has a social role for those in receipt of its services—will my hon. Friend also pay tribute to the men and women who staff rural post offices? Some of them do not earn much money; they are on marginal incomes. They offer a social service to their community, and they should be rewarded, not spurned.

Mr. Paterson: I thoroughly endorse my hon. Friend's comments. When the previous Government were in power, many of those people took a big risk, made the post office the activity for the latter part of their working lives and sank their pension into it, trusting that there would be a steady income stream based on benefits, around which they could build a range of other activities, as I tried to explain. As my hon. Friend said, those men and women work extremely hard and they are exasperated.

I quote the postmaster for Prees, which the Minister will not like—I could quote some much ruder comments, which would not be parliamentary—who described the Government's attitude to sub-post offices. He said:

> "They are totally clueless. They are destroying the infrastructure of country life."

That sums up the frustrations of sub-postmasters. Perhaps the Minister will tell us his long-term view, so that we do not just stumble from crisis to crisis.

Mr. Frank Cook (in the Chair): I remind the House that the common protocol in these debates is to call the first of the three Front-Bench speakers at 3.30 pm.

3.16 pm

John Thurso (Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross) (LD): I am grateful to have had the opportunity to catch your eye, Mr. Cook. I came into the Chamber with the intention of supporting my hon. Friend the Member for Inverness, Nairn, Badenoch and Strathspey (Danny Alexander). Having listened to the excellent way he presented the case and to the other excellent contributions, I am moved to make a short contribution myself.

It may not need to have been said, as it is obvious, but it is worth repeating how important rural post offices are to the whole of rural life and to sustaining the communities. They are important for two distinct and different reasons, both of which have come out in the debate. The first is the provision of services to people who need them, who are often the most vulnerable in society, whether through age or infirmity, and who would not otherwise have access to those services. Secondly, the point must be made in relation to the highlands about the provision of services to people on low incomes and without access to a car who live in areas where there is very little public transport. We assume these days that everyone will be able to use a car or other transport, but many people cannot do so, for a variety of reasons. Therefore the simple provision of a service is important.

A wider point made this afternoon is that a functioning post office is often the last service to remain in a village, after the shop, the pub and so on have gone. It is the post office that keeps going. It is a point of contact, somewhere that people who do not often see other people go to see the sub-postmaster or postmistress. Sometimes that is how they signal that they are still around, alive and well. It is not uncommon in villages for people to notice that somebody has not been into the post office for a day or two and to go and check that they are all right. The wider good of the community is important in this debate.

We would all like the rural network service to be kept and, if possible, enhanced, and I want to consider where the responsibilities for that lie. It would be easy to slam the Post Office and say that there is a vast conspiracy to get everything wrong, but we must be clear that in the climate that has been created for the Post Office, the commercial realities are inescapable. We cannot expect the Post Office to be a profitable organisation and at the same time to provide traditional services, as it has always done.

For that reason, I welcome the pilot scheme that is under way in Caithness. When I was consulted about it I pointed out the pitfalls. In my meetings with those who were responsible for setting it up, I said that the number of hours being offered was likely to be so small that the outcome would be that people would fall out of the habit of using the post office at that time. That seems to have been the case. However, we should not criticise the Post Office for seeking to be innovative in putting forward solutions, and it should not be the whipping boy in this exercise.

I am worried about what is happening in Caithness. The John O' Groat Journal, a fine paper that I can recommend to anyone, drew attention in its issue of 30 December to the severe problems that are being encountered through lack of service. They are not helping the Post Office's case.

I had an interesting conversation with the chairman of Postwatch about a month ago when he told me of innovations in America, which has gone for the opposite solution of a fixed, unmanned station in rural communities. By using a card people can post a letter and extract things. I shall be meeting the chairman to find out more about that because it is another innovation that the Post Office may be interested in.

The Government have a clear responsibility in these matters, and opportunities have been missed. One was the opportunity with the migration of benefits. We warned the then Minister what was likely to happen to footfall. We received assurances that the marketing would be even-handed, but my correspondence with every sub-postmaster and postmistress told me that they were unable to compete with the heavy marketing and telephone campaign that took place. We have a huge range of Government and local government services that we want to deliver more closely to the population. We have a network of offices with some fine equipment which are capable of delivering some of those services. Can the Government not put the two together so that delivery to our citizens could be made through the Post Office in a profitable way?

Mr. Alan Reid (Argyll and Bute) (LD): My hon. Friend is quite right about the importance of post offices to rural communities and the need for Government support. Does he agree that unless the Government give a commitment soon to provide more funding through social network payments or more services, post offices will close? They are businesses, and if the people running those businesses do not have a guarantee of long-term security they will not continue to invest in them.

John Thurso: My hon. Friend is quite right. That is precisely what happened in the town of Golspie where the gentleman who ran the business decided to quit because he could not see a way ahead. My comment to the Government is that there are two requirements. The first is a long-term vision and the second is a bridging plan to get to that.

I commend some of the private sector. For example, Clydesdale Bank is now using post offices to distribute cash and front-line services for the bank. There are opportunities. Will the Government please understand how necessary post offices are to our communities and that if we do not act reasonably quickly those post offices will not be there to be saved?

3.23 pm

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley) (Con): I did not intend to speak either, but I was also enthused enough to have my two-penn'orth. I shall make a short contribution; it is not worth going over the same ground as we are all much of the same mind on the importance of rural post offices. It is difficult to put a price on their service because of all the various components that make up the worth of post offices to people in rural communities. We all recognise that they will not be profitable and that they require support because without it they will close—it is as simple as that. I cannot envisage how many rural post offices could ever be profitable.

I want to speak about matters such as the ageing population. We all know that this country has an ageing population, which will get worse—that is not the right way to put it. The ageing population will increase as more people remain alive longer. [Interruption.] At least I corrected myself. Many elderly people come into my retail convenience store in Swansea. I can see that that is a bit of a social thing for them and I wonder what will happen to people in rural areas. At least the location of my shop is urban; in rural areas, the situation is much more difficult. Going to the post office may be the only time when some people get out of the house during the day, and mixing with other people in the post office and with the postmaster or postmistress is important.

My hon. Friend the Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson) mentioned that the postmaster or postmistress knows if people have not been in. In my village, Pendleton, the postmistress once told me, "I have to nip out. Mrs. Jones hasn't come in for her pension and I want to see if she's okay." That is exactly what she did, and what a fantastic social service it is. I therefore ask the Minister to consider carefully what will happen in such areas to people and disabled people. How will they be looked after? Not everyone will be able to access everything on the internet. I know that the future is rosy as far as new technology is concerned, but it is good now and again to value what we have. I suspect that if we let it all go, some bright-spark politician in 50 years' time will try to reinvent and reintroduce everything that we have lost, but we know how much more difficult that will be.

There was mention of the experiment with a mobile unit, which is interesting. I am thinking of large urban areas in the United States. I have seen mobile units operating in New York and I suspect that they work fairly well there, but to have one turn up for half an hour once a week is pretty pointless; it means the loss of the social aspect of the post office and the convenience of its being there when people want to use it.

The Government can be imaginative in the sense of putting post offices into pubs, which already happens, and perhaps into some garages, village halls and other places. Perhaps they could even be put into people's living rooms in certain villages, but we should not let everything go and just have a mobile unit. I do not think that it would work. In addition, because the postmaster or postmistress knows the people, they help to cut down on fraud in the post office. The value of the fact that they know the people who are turning up should not be underestimated.

We want the Minister to answer all these questions and we are putting many challenges to him, but the call must also go out to the 12 million people in our communities who can make use of the post offices to do so more often. "Use it or lose it" is a message that everyone knows, but we cannot over-emphasise it. When people go into the post office and use it time and again, they are doing their little bit to ensure that the service that they are receiving will continue for future generations.

3.28 pm

Norman Lamb (North Norfolk) (LD): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Inverness, Nairn, Badenoch and Strathspey (Danny Alexander) on securing this important debate. I shall now try to confine myself to describing him as my hon. Friend. I am not nearly as brave as the hon. Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson), who tried to say the name of my hon. Friend's constituency and performed extremely well.

[Norman Lamb]

My hon. Friend has been very active and effective in campaigning for rural post offices, and I applaud him. As I said, this is an important debate, and valuable contributions have been made by hon. Members on both sides of the Chamber. Why is there so much concern about maintaining the network? It is a remarkable network. We have heard that 60 per cent. of villages across the country still have a post office. The relevant figure is massively higher than that for all the banks put together. The network is a precious resource. My great frustration is that much more could be done with it but is not being done; it could be exploited much more effectively. Several hon. Members have made that point, to which I shall return.

The hon. Member for North Shropshire and others have said that the network serves 12 million customers a week. That is a very large number of people throughout rural areas in this country. It is an essential service and that is how it needs to be seen. It is essential for elderly people, disabled people and people without access to a car. There is often a fear that the Government do not fully understand the problem of rural poverty. Government Members largely represent urban areas, and sometimes there is a failure to recognise hidden poverty in rural areas and the problem of isolation that goes with it.

If the public transport system is no good, as my hon. Friend the Member for Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross (John Thurso) mentioned, and there is no post office or shop in the village, one really is stuck. More and more frequently, carers who look after loved ones are completely isolated in small rural communities. My hon. Friend the Member for Inverness, Nairn, Badenoch and Strathspey also referred to the dramatic loss of business through the transfer to direct payments and the aggressive pressure on people to transfer.

It has not been mentioned that the core function of post offices, the dispatch of letters and parcels, is important for rural businesses as well. I have been fascinated by the potential growth area whereby more and more people are trading on the internet through eBay. When I visited two small sub-post offices in North Norfolk and asked whether they were seeing any growth of business from eBay, they pointed to two people in their 20s or 30s who were there to dispatch goods that they had traded on eBay. The fascinating thing is that those people were much younger than the average age of customers that we have become used to in post offices. We should not ignore that potential for growth.

The other point that has been made is that often, the post office is part of the only shop left in the village, and it helps to keep it going. Without the post office, the shop goes. As a note of dissent from the other Opposition party present, I have to say that the decline has been going on for a long time—the challenge dates from long before 1997. One big problem with Royal Mail is that it has had no investment for 20 or 30 years, and that has affected the post office network as well as the delivery of services.

What is the Government's strategy? I find it hard to define or identify it. In October 2004, Postcomm urged the Government in a report to be clear about their objectives for the network. Postcomm referred to the "pressing need" for the Government to decide what they want from the rural network. In a report way back in June 2000, the performance and innovation unit said that by 2006—now—there should be a framework in place to ensure "continued convenient access" to post offices. The year 2006 has arrived, but sub-postmasters and postmistresses are still waiting. An air of depression hangs over the network and those people running small businesses. No one has any confidence in the future, and we are still waiting for the Government to decide their strategy.

In March, in seven or eights weeks' time, the obligation on the Post Office to prevent avoidable closures of rural sub-post offices expires. That could open the floodgates for closures unless something is put in place. To make matters worse, the £150 million subsidy of the rural network runs out in 2008. Post Office insiders say that if the extension is not confirmed soon, they will have to embark on a wholesale closure programme. Small businesses need certainty, and many sub-post offices will be worthless in terms of their saleability without the renewal of the subsidy. Still, however, there is no announcement from the Government.

I want to highlight a couple of structural problems that pose a bigger threat to the network. Responsibility within the Government rests with the DTI, a Department that can hardly be said to have a core social remit. When it asks other Departments whether they are interested in supporting the network in some way, it gets a flea in its ear. Every Department's budget is already committed. There is no objective reason why Royal Mail, which is required to make a profit, should want to maintain the social network. It is a drain on the resources of Royal Mail, but it has an interest in keeping competitor mail delivery companies away from the network. The danger is that Royal Mail will preside over a declining network that it has no real interest in maintaining, and that it will deny business opportunities to small sub-post offices that are desperately in need of a break.

That all points to a fairly bleak future—no wonder morale is low—but things could be so different if the Government had vision, if they were determined to exploit this remarkable network to the full, and if post offices were able to develop new business opportunities in the competitive mail market. How could the network be exploited? My hon. Friend mentioned the crazy fact that the Government are opening 70 new passport offices—an obvious opportunity for post offices goes begging. There are also real opportunities for local authorities and Government agencies to work in partnership with post offices, which would give them reach into so many deprived and remote communities. The police are conducting some interesting pilots in Scotland and Norfolk. There are also the Learning and Skills Council and health services. All those bodies could use the local post office to provide information and to establish links with communities.

I mentioned internet trading and shopping over the internet. Post offices ought to be free to develop new business opportunities with other mail and delivery companies. These days, many goods are delivered to people's homes. The post office is the obvious deposit point if the person is out, but that real business opportunity is denied to them unless the goods are being delivered by Royal Mail.

Sub-post offices often complain about tight restrictions on their right to enter other business arrangements; for example, the sale of pre-payment cards for electricity. I have nothing against their finding new, innovative ways to deliver post office services—I positively support such experimentation—but can the Minister confirm when he will receive the report from Post Office Ltd? I admit that I am confused. In a letter to my hon. Friend dated 5 January, the Minister says that he is still waiting for it, but the chief executive of the Post Office states in a letter dated 4 January that he has already delivered it. Perhaps it has been lost in the post—I do not know—but I urge the Government to change their mindset from one of contraction to one of taking advantage of this far-reaching network to help in the delivery of services to remote and deprived communities.

I wish to conclude by posing some questions to the Minister. I would be grateful if he could answer them in this debate or in writing. Of most pressing concern: will the no avoidable closures obligation be extended beyond March, and, if not, what will be put in its place? Secondly, will he confirm whether the rural subsidy will extend beyond 2008, given the serious concerns of Post Office Ltd? Thirdly, what assessment has he made of the number of post offices that would exist if the subsidy were ended, given that 90 per cent. of rural post offices are already unprofitable, according to Postcomm? The east of England would be left with 88 post offices if 90 per cent. closed.

Fourthly, given the structural problems that I referred to, will the Minister consider introducing a statutory obligation on the Government to maintain the network? The framework could be set for fixed periods, giving some certainty to post offices. Fifthly, will any pool of money be available at any stage for investment in the network, so that sub-postmasters and postmistresses can take advantage of the opportunities that could be available to them to help them make their business profitable?

Sixthly, serious concerns have been expressed about rumours that the Post Office card account will be phased out in 2010. Can the Minister give an absolute undertaking that that is not the case? What steps will he take to enable sub-post offices to build new business opportunities by working with other mail and package delivery companies? Finally, will he conduct a comprehensive review of the true social and economic value of the network, which still has not been done?

To conclude, the post office network faces an uncertain future. Morale is low, and there is a sense of terminal decline. The Government give no impression of having any effective strategy to turn it around and reinvigorate the network. I hope—but doubt—that the Minister will be able to reassure us on that.

3.39 pm

Charles Hendry (Wealden) (Con): I join others in congratulating the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn, Badenoch and Strathspey (Danny Alexander) on securing this debate and on the way in which he introduced it. Can I link that with a plea that there should be no further boundary changes in Scotland? Every time that that happens, the name of his constituency gets longer and longer. I remember when it was Inverness, then it became Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber and now it is this hugely lengthy constituency name. I cannot imagine what his letterhead is like, because there cannot be any room for writing any text on it after he has printed the constituency name on the top. However, I warmly congratulate him on the way in which he introduced the debate, which has been extremely useful and constructive.

It is disappointing that, with the honourable exception of the hon. Member for Dumfries and Galloway (Mr. Brown), there has not been any Government contribution to the debate. They were claiming before the election that they were a rural party, but when it comes to a key rural issue that affects all of us with rural constituencies, they could not find Members, from south of the border at least, to take part in the debate.

As has been made clear, post offices are the lifeblood for many small rural communities. They are not just a source of stamps, or from where people collect their pensions. All too often, it is the sub-post office branch that ensures the viability of other local services, particularly village shops. If the village post office closes, so too does the only other shop in the village. We have often seen that if a post office closes, it never reopens, and examples have been given during this debate about where that has been the case.

There is an example in my constituency: the shop in Hadlow Down closed, and when it was found that someone wanted to reopen that facility, they were refused permission by the highways authority, which said that it was not safe to park there. We had a village shop there for 100 years, and after it was closed, somebody said that they were prepared to put in the hours and effort to make it work again, but they were denied the opportunity to make it work.

We should recognise the tremendous dedication of the sub-postmasters and sub-postmistresses who run village post offices, who work many more hours than they are paid to do, and who provide a tremendous social service to make their communities work cohesively. In introducing the debate, the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn, Badenoch and Strathspey talked about the range of other services that can be provided through post offices. I introduce a note of caution when he talks about the national lottery, because it can compound the problems. There is a recent example of Buxted village shop where, because a pedestrian crossing was introduced outside, that reduced the number of people stopping outside the shop and using it. Because of that, the turnover of the national lottery was reduced, so the shop had the lottery taken away. That has compounded its problems as a village shop, so we should not always see the lottery as a solution. It is a hard-headed business making hard-headed decisions about where it wishes to be.

The rural post office network is the largest retail branch network in Europe. About 84 per cent. of people living in rural areas, as has been said, live within a mile of a post office branch. Other ideas have been suggested, notably by my hon. Friend the Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans), who suggested that we could put post offices in pubs. That would lead to 24-hour post offices. How convenient that would be: every time that someone needed another pint, they could draw out a bit more of their pension. However, we must look creatively at how we go down that route. As my hon. Friend also said, the solution is also partly in our hands. If we and our constituents do not support the rural post office network, it will close. Although we recognise that the Government have a role to play in that, so do we as individual consumers.

Mr. Angus MacNeil (Na h-Eileanan an Iar) (SNP) rose—

Charles Hendry: I will not give way to the hon. Gentleman, if he will forgive me, because I know that we are tight on time and the Minister wishes to address many points.

It is clear that the Government do not have a long-term strategy for the rural post office network. Without a strategy, sub-postmasters, sub-postmistresses and Post Office Ltd cannot plan for the future or ensure that rural services are maintained after 2006. The Government have made comments that ostensibly show a commitment to the rural post office network, and in an answer to a parliamentary question to the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew), the Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, the hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Sutcliffe) said:

"The Government recognise the importance of the rural post office network to local communities and will not take any decisions on the future of the network without a proper assessment of those needs. My officials are working closely with Defra and the devolved Administrations to identify future options for sustaining access to post office services for rural communities. This work is still at an early stage, but I am sure that they will seek the views of bodies representing parish and town councils at an appropriate point."—[Official Report, House of Commons, 21 December 2004; Vol. 428, c. 1616W.]

The Government have made a firm commitment to prevent avoidable rural closures until this year. Perhaps that is not so much a long-term commitment as one to get them past a general election, but to do it they made available a £2 million fund to support community post office initiatives.

As has also been said, the Government made available £450 million—£150 million a year for three years—to help to continue to provide access to services in rural areas when they could not otherwise be sustained commercially. They have announced another £300 million to help rural post offices until 2008, but they do not continue to provide that duty to avoid closures, which is what so many people have called for in this debate.

That may sound all well and good, but it masks the frightening decline in the number of village post offices. The total number of post offices has fallen by 17 per cent. in the past 10 years, but the figures are even more dramatic for sub-post offices. The number of sub-post offices has declined by 35 per cent. since 1997. That is a drop of 4,600 sub-post offices in eight years. The hon. Member for North Norfolk (Norman Lamb) said that this had been a longer-term trend, but we need to get it into perspective. The 4,600 small post offices that have closed in the lifetime of this Government are more than have closed in the previous 22 years. That is an extremely worrying decline.

The closures are partly a direct consequence of Government policy. The Government's decision to introduce pensions and benefits to be paid directly into bank accounts has removed 40 per cent. of post office income, causing many smaller rural post offices to close. As has also been said, the Government were not passive in all this, but actively encouraged people to switch to that system while saying that they were neutral.

As my hon. Friend the Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson) said in a notable contribution, they were brutal about the policy; they recognised what the consequence would be. Indeed, when the Conservatives considered the matter back in the 1980s, when I was a special adviser at the Department of Trade and Industry, we rejected that change precisely because of the implications for small post offices. We decided that it was sufficiently important to support the Post Office network not to go down that route then.

Direct debit payment was not supported by the National Consumer Council, which said:

"The end to cash benefits just hasn't been thought through properly," and that the new arrangements

"take little account of people's real needs".

Direct debit payments were also criticised by the National Association of Citizens Advice Bureaux, the National Federation of Sub-Postmasters, the trades unions Amicus and the Communication Workers Union, the National Federation of Women's Institutes, which should frighten the Prime Minister, and Age Concern, which expressed concern at the considerable hurdles that seem to be put in the way of opening Post Office card accounts.

We believe that the Government have been hasty in pushing the policy forward, and we recognise, just as the Countryside Agency has done in a survey that it recently carried out through MORI, that these changes have had a negative impact, and are likely to lead to mass post office closures.

What is needed is for the Government to have a clear vision of the future of the rural post office networks—a genuine plan for stopping closures—to ensure the longer-term prosperity of post offices. As my hon. Friend the Member for North Shropshire has said, not one member of the ministerial team at the DTI represents a rural constituency. The team represents Hull, Croydon, Dudley, Cardiff, Bradford, Brent, and Sheffield, and it is unsurprising that the interests of rural consumers are being overlooked when no one in the entire ministerial team at the Department that is driving the policy represents a rural post office.

The Government should consider allowing post offices to offer more services. At present, post offices are not allowed to offer services that would compete with the Royal Mail, but independent parcel delivery firms such as DHL and UPS would welcome the opportunity to sell their services through post offices. Indeed, postmasters and postmistresses are in favour of that prohibition being lifted. It would be lifted for all post offices, but it would be of particular benefit to rural post offices.

As well as expanding the financial services that post offices can offer, the Government should also be more imaginative in expanding the role of post offices as a banking portal. They would then become places where people can access banking services from high street banks in the way that it is suggested that they can have access to the postal services of companies other than the Royal Mail. That would be more relevant for postal services that may not have a high street bank than for post offices in towns and cities.

The Government have thrown some money at the issue, but they have shown little vision. While they dither, the post offices that are so central to the economic life of villages throughout the country quietly slip away. The key issue which the Minister must answer is the one posed by my hon. Friend the Member for North Shropshire: what is the Government's vision for rural post offices? We have had an excellent debate and I hope that we can now have some answers.

3.50 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Barry Gardiner): I begin by saying that our debate has lasted one hour and 20 minutes and I now have 10 minutes in which to attempt to respond, which is completely inadequate. I want to assure you, Mr. Cook, and all hon. Members present that I will write to all those who have spoken in today's debate, ensuring that all the questions that were raised and are recorded in Hansard receive a full and proper response.

The hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn, Badenoch and Strathspey (Danny Alexander) is not only the Member for the parliamentary constituency with the longest name, he is also the Member for one of the largest geographically and most beautiful constituencies—I say that as someone who has holidayed in Glen Affric—in which all but six of the 42 post offices are classified as rural. The reason for his interest in the future of the rural post office network is therefore self-evident.

The future of the post office network is an issue of relevance to every member of the House, whether our constituencies are rural, urban or a mixture of both. We all share concerns for the future provision of post office services to our constituents. Most of us recognise that there had been underinvestment in the business for decades until the Government reversed the decline with our sustained programme of investment since 1999. Some £500 million was injected to create a fund for new IT infrastructure and since 2003 the Government have committed £150 million a year up to 2008, subject to state aid clearance, to support the rural network. On top of that, the Government put £210 million towards the urban reinvention programme.

That represents an investment of £1.41 billion of taxpayers' money from the Government. Yet on the website of the Highland Liberal Democrats the hon. Member who initiated the debate is quoted as saying:

> "There has long been a suspicion that Mr. Blair's Government is not committed to the rural post office network".

The hon. Gentleman should perhaps take a leaf out of the book of his colleague the hon. Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon (Dr. Harris), who told me following a recent debate that the more research he carried out, the more he realised just what the Government had done.

Advances in technology, greater mobility and changes in shopping and financial habits have resulted in a growing proportion of people not using post offices in the way that they did in the past. Custom across the network has sharply declined creating the spectra of the spiral of decline. If the post office network is to survive and thrive it needs to change significantly. The Government want to see a post office network that can prosper, but on the basis of today's needs and those of the future, not those of 20 or 30 years ago. In doing so we also must face present reality.

Major sectors of the network are losing substantial amounts of money. The rural network is making losses of about £150 million a year and the directly managed Crown offices are losing in the region of £70 million a year. Clearly the status quo is not sustainable. Several important steps to restructure and revitalise the Post Office have been taken but the future of the network rightly remains an issue of national debate, and it is clear that there are still considerable challenges to be faced.

The decline in transaction volumes is not just about the changes in benefit arrangements that were completed last April. The decline started well before the move to direct payment. Even before the migration from order books started in April 2003, 43 per cent. of the Department for Work and Pension's customers had opted to receive all of their benefits by direct payment. By last October, 97 per cent. of customers were receiving direct payments with 76 per cent. opting for payment in a bank account and 21 per cent. for payment into a Post Office card account. That is an example of an efficient Government delivering benefit more cost effectively, reducing the burden on the taxpayer at the same time as being more convenient for the recipient and cutting out the potential for fraud. However, the hon. Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson) portrays us as a mean Government plotting to reduce the profit margins of sub-postmasters.

Mr. Paterson: Will the Minister give way?

Barry Gardiner: I will give way to the hon. Gentleman if he will rise and commit his party to reversing policy so that that profit margin does flow back to sub-postmasters. If he were prepared to rise to do that, I would happily give way, but I see that he is not.

The trend of declining transaction volumes applies not only to benefit payments but to a—

Mr. Paterson: Will the Minister give way?

Barry Gardiner: No. I must answer some of the points that have been made.

Mr. Paterson: On a point of order, Mr. Cook. Is it right for a Minister to name an hon. Member twice, but not to allow him to respond in order to make the point that the Government have taken £400 million a year from the network?

Mr. Frank Cook (in the Chair): That is not a point of order for the Chair; it is a point of debate, and it is possible for it to be answered in other ways.

Barry Gardiner: Thank you, Mr. Cook, for that clarification. Of course the hon. Member for North Shropshire is refusing to respond to the proper issue. That is clear; it is that the Government have acted entirely responsibly in delivering the service more cost effectively. The Public Accounts Committee would have something to say if they did not. The hon. Gentleman's party will not pledge itself to row back that policy because it knows the truth of what I am saying.

The trend of declining transaction volumes applies not only to benefit payments but to a much wider range of services, including Girobank and national savings transactions, telephone bill payments and postal orders. We must also recognise that 96 per cent. of the nation's post offices are run by sub-postmasters. They are private business people who have invested in their businesses not only their own money but, as has been mentioned particularly by the hon. Member for Wealden (Charles Hendry), a great deal of care, which has helped the post office network to achieve its highly regarded status.

However, with declining profitability in the network as a whole, the viability of many individual offices has taken a severe knock. Decisive action, in the form of the urban reinvention programme, was taken to restructure a sector of the network in which there was extensive over-provision, with the aim of better matching supply to demand, and of creating the viability necessary for a network that would be sustainable into the future. That is why we backed the plans of Post Office Ltd for managed restructuring of the urban network, which involved almost 2,500 office closures but ensured that, nationally, 99.3 per cent. of people in urban areas still live within 1 mile of their nearest post office. Lest anybody should forget, each one of those 2,500 closures happened in a place where the sub-postmaster wanted to close and volunteered for closure. Nobody was forced out of business by POL or Government. They closed because they chose to do so.

We now need to address the issues facing the social network of sub-post offices in rural and urban deprived areas. That part of the network is no longer financially sustainable in its present form. That is a problem, but it is not the only problem. It is no longer clear that the needs of those communities, or of the most disadvantaged, are best served by the present traditional costly and inflexible fixed office network structure. Those who believe that financial sustainability does not matter, and that Government should simply pour more money in to sustain the network come what may, are failing those of their constituents who are not getting the service that they deserve because somebody else in a village down the road is keeping an inefficient physical structure.

The social network payment of £150 million a year from the Government was introduced in 2003–04 as a transitional measure against the background of migration to direct payments of benefit. It was intended to provide a financial breathing space in which POL would develop new products to replace lost income from traditional business, and would identify more cost-effective ways of delivering its services. It is becoming increasingly urgent that we find innovative and more cost-effective ways of delivering post office services to rural and many urban deprived communities. We cannot ignore the fact that many rural offices have an impossibly low customer base, with some 1,600 offices averaging fewer than 100 customers a week. The 800 smallest offices are averaging 23 customer visits a week and generate—

Mr. Frank Cook (in the Chair): Order.

Transport (Greater Reading)

4 pm

Mr. Rob Wilson (Reading, East) (Con): I thank you, Mr. Cook, for the opportunity to hold this debate. I want to raise a matter of local, regional and national significance. The Thames valley makes a huge contribution to the UK's economic performance and success. Through its businesses and people, it generates a larger slice of revenue for the Government than anywhere outside central London.

At the heart of that success over the past 20 years has been Reading, which has been transformed from a modest industrial town into a vital regional centre. Reading's economic transformation began in the 1980s, but it is becoming harder to sustain the success story in Reading and the Thames valley. One of the biggest threats to our continued economic success is transport infrastructure, which will fail without significant investment—possibly within the next decade.

The implications of failure for the region and the UK's economic performance will be huge. The region is particularly susceptible to the forces of globalisation. Just as multinational companies make their homes in and around Reading, taking advantage of the area's strengths, our collapsing transport infrastructure could rapidly force them to relocate, probably overseas.

It is little wonder that transport infrastructure is failing. It sounds incredible, but my local authority assures me that there has been no Government transport infrastructure investment in our region or in Reading for the past 20 years. What investment there has been seems to have come from the private sector. I do not know whether the Minister knows this, but committed Government investment in the south-east is currently 40 per cent. for the Thames Gateway, 35 per cent. for the south coast and 25 per cent. for other areas, but there is 0 per cent. for anywhere in the Thames valley.

It is not that we do not put forward great ideas and excellent schemes. For example, there is the M4 junction 11 scheme, which is ready to go. When assessed against the Government's own criteria, it gives very high value for money.

Mrs. Maria Miller (Basingstoke) (Con): I share my hon. Friend's concerns, particularly on his last point. In the Thames valley, the point has been reached where we shall not be able to cope with the additional pressure on our roads without more infrastructure investment. The M4 junction 11 scheme is a case in point, and it is vital not only for my hon. Friend's constituency, but for mine. At peak times, traffic can stretch all the way to the Hampshire county boundary, causing congestion on the A33 for constituents who use the route as a way to work or for business. The situation is set to get considerably worse, with proposals for 7,000 houses at Kennet meadow. Additional investment is vital.

Mr. Wilson: I thank my hon. Friend, who makes the point well.

As businesses in the Reading area—big and small—will tell the Minister, no more infrastructure capacity is available, and only new provision will ensure that Reading and the Thames valley maintain their role in the national economy.

We have seven major schemes for greater Reading listed in the regional priorities and businesses are asking me why none has had any commitment to funding or any time scale for implementation. Perhaps the Minister could explain why that is the case. I invite her to come to Reading and listen to what businesses are saying for herself. They are saying to me that we need transport infrastructure investment and that we need it now. One needs only to read the latest report from the Thames Valley Economic Partnership to see that.

In Reading, we have a dual problem, involving both roads and rail. As I have said, roads are at pretty much maximum capacity in Reading. The problem is made worse by the fact that we have only two crossings over the River Thames. Reading needs a third bridge, which will make a north-south bypass for the town.

Mr. Richard Benyon (Newbury) (Con): I remind Members of my entry in the Register of Members' Interests. This year is the 10th anniversary of the opening of the Newbury bypass, which has made an enormous difference to the sustained economic viability of the community at the centre of my constituency. That has dealt with the north-south problem. We now have an east-west problem, which my hon. Friend has highlighted in relation to the M4. I firmly support what he says about the need to consider the difficulties faced by traffic on the M4 if we are to maintain the prosperity of the region.

Mr. Wilson: I thank my hon. Friend for that helpful intervention. He makes the point very well. As in Newbury, the north-south bypass in Reading is extremely important to the sustained viability and economic success of the town. The problem that we face is that the boundaries of four local authorities are involved. We cannot start planning for another Thames bridge unless those four authorities come to an agreement because access to the bridge will involve infrastructure in all four of those local authority areas.

Until recently the Government have not expressed a view on the need for the additional north-south Thames capacity, so some local authorities have pursued specific local, rather than regional or national, agendas and have tried to dismiss any third Thames bridge scheme through their own structure plan process. Fortunately, following a study in 2003, the Secretary of State for Transport agreed that the issue of the north-south routes over the Thames in Reading needed to be resolved. He required the authorities concerned to come together in quantifying the problem and identifying and delivering a solution, which all political parties in the town have welcomed. That has led to some progress in terms of some cross-boundary meetings of officers and lead councillors on a reasonably regular basis.

However, the process has been painfully slow and it appears that, for every two steps forwards, there are three steps backwards—mainly because of the view of South Oxfordshire district council, which is being incredibly parochial about this matter. Meanwhile, Reading borough council is adopting strategies that prioritise local traffic in Reading, obviously to the detriment of through traffic. We have now reached the point at which we desperately need direct Government intervention to break the logjam between those local authorities.

Business is saying that it needs answers to these questions and it needs them urgently. It needs a time frame from Government for the preliminary work to be completed and for a scheme to progress. At the moment, it seems that we can settle the problems of a civil war in Ireland, but not the difference between two of our local authorities. It is preposterous.

My suspicions about Reading's roads having a negative impact on business were confirmed when I recently had a meeting with the managing director of Hewlett- Packard in the UK. His company has just announced that it is pulling out of Reading, taking more than 1,000 jobs with it. The Hewlett-Packard site lies to the south of Reading, which is just outside my constituency, by junction 11 of the M4. The managing director told me that one of the main reasons—admittedly not the only reason—for moving away from south Reading was the terrible traffic congestion at junction 11.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): I congratulate my hon. Friend on securing the debate. Does he share my disappointment that much of today's traffic congestion is caused by poor estimates of future traffic growth by the Department for Transport and the Highways Agency? Does he share my concern that not enough money is being invested by the Highways Agency in vital road schemes throughout the country?

Mr. Wilson: I share my hon. Friend's disappointment. There seems to be a failure to get those numbers right in the planning process.

Huge queues have developed at junction 11. One of the main reasons that Hewlett-Packard finally decided to up sticks and move out was that its staff were sometimes sitting for hours in these queues, which is not sustainable for staff productivity in any company. Over the years, Hewlett-Packard says that millions of pounds were wasted by staff sitting in traffic. Not only that, staff were increasingly dissatisfied about their quality of life. No one likes to spend two hours plus sitting in their car trying to get to work in the morning.

The impact of the lack of investment in transport infrastructure is seen on the ground in Reading today. Junction 11 has long been identified as a problem—since 1999, anyway. It is a key gateway to Reading, and both Woking district council and Reading borough council have put in first-class bids to resolve the issue. Those bids passed all the Department for Transport's assessment criteria.

Great hopes were raised in 2004 when the Government accepted the junction 11 scheme and the Department allocated some funding. On that basis, Reading borough council spent £6 million on structural reviews, geotechnical surveys, contamination works, landscape architecture and so forth, which is equivalent to 12 per cent. of Reading's council tax: a huge investment for the local authority to undertake. The scheme was then delayed for a public inquiry on the basis of a complaint from one individual. We do not know the result of the inquiry, but funding for the scheme has been suspended in the meantime.

The business community in the Thames valley and Reading needs a message of reassurance from the Minister. We need a positive decision about the junction capacity improvement. The scheme is supported in the east by BAA and in the west by Vodaphone in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Basingstoke (Mrs. Miller). We would like to know when there will be a decision. Are the Government prepared for the adverse affects to actual and perceived business confidence if that decision is negative or is positive but not implemented particularly quickly? Perhaps the Minister will deal with that in her response.

There is also a significant problem with Reading railway station. As the Minister is probably aware, Reading is the second busiest station outside London, providing direct train services to more than 360 towns and cities throughout Britain. More than 20 million passengers use the station each year. Pressure on the station has already passed saturation point. Put simply, capacity constraints on Reading station cause one of the major bottlenecks in the national rail network. There are not enough platforms or track capacity to accommodate the frequency of services, especially at peak times. Currently, the north-to-south freight services coming from Southampton mean that passenger services are often held up.

The Great Western main line connects London to Wales and the west country. The problems at Reading station are considered by those region's governing bodies to be a paramount issue for them. As the Minister will know, they have made representations to the Government on the matter. We have a once-in-30-years opportunity to do something about it because re-signalling is required at Reading station by 2013. With that, comes the opportunity to resolve the capacity issues in a cost- effective way.

The cost in addition to the re-signalling—the latter is already budgeted for—is about £68 million, and it would offer a 5:1 return on the Government's assessment terms, whereas normal rail schemes achieve less than 3:1. To assist the Minister, I would add that because the Great Western mainline is a trans-European network, it could attract European funding. I would like to know whether that is a possible source of funding.

Reading has the status of a transport hub in the south-east plan, in which housing and business development opportunities will be created. Improving the station capacity will be an important part of that change. A good proposal has already emerged, funded through the resourcefulness of local authorities. However, it is time for the Government to step in, with ongoing funding for the detailed design of the scheme and a commitment to its being implemented at the same time as the re-signalling in about 2013.

When questioned, the largest companies in the area say that they have located in Reading because of its proximity to the airport. Visitors to Reading are therefore astonished to find that we have no direct rail link to Heathrow. We have direct links to Gatwick and Stansted airports, and Heathrow has three links from the west. If Crossrail comes about, there will be a fourth link.

We could easily have a link to Heathrow if we were to build what rail people call a collar at the point on the Great Western railway known as Heathrow junction. That would cost only £56 million. The benefits to Reading and the region would be huge. It would add to the region's selling points, and it would reduce car travel as well as improving access to the airport. Reading would then become a hub for international travellers from the west of the UK.

There has been no proper commercial rail study of the links to Heathrow via the Great Western line. The Government should undertake a realistic and practical assessment of direct rail access to Heathrow from the west. It could be done as part of Crossrail. I have said it before, and I shall say it again, but if Crossrail is to be of value to Reading and the west in general, it must be extended to Reading, connected to Heathrow airport and able to provide a fast and semi-fast commuter service into London. If it cannot do that, Crossrail might as well end at Paddington.

I have spoken at some length, and I want to give the Minister enough time to respond, but if I had three wishes this afternoon they would be these. First, the Minister would pledge that the Government will intervene to press for a timetable between local authorities on a third Thames bridge. Secondly, the stalled M4 junction 11 would be given the green light immediately, or as soon as possible. Thirdly, the Government would intervene to get the Reading station upgrade properly scheduled and supported. I thank the Minister and other hon. Members for their patience. I hope that the Minister will come to Reading for further dialogue about these important issues.

4.18 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Ms Karen Buck): I congratulate the hon. Member for Reading, East (Mr. Wilson) on securing this debate. It gives us the opportunity to discuss transport in Reading itself and between Reading and the greater Reading area. As the hon. Gentleman said during the Christmas Adjournment debate, Reading has the good fortune to sit at the hub of road and rail links and to be within a short distance of one of the world's major airports. He was right to say that that is a major factor in business location and quality of life.

Reading also has the good fortune to have excellent staff working in the transport office of the borough council. I congratulate them on helping to make it one of only five local transport authorities to achieve the top rating in the annual performance report and the provisional second local transport plan document. As a result of that, the council will receive an additional 25 per cent. of funding on top of the original indicative baseline allocation for 2006–07. That will help Reading to build on the progress made during the first five years of the local transport plan period, during which time it received more than £36 million.

Reading has received the highest level of Government funding per head through the local transport settlement of any local transport plan area since 2000, at an average of £38 per head compared to a national average of £13 per head. Over the next five years its local transport settlement will be 27 per cent. higher than the national average. It could, of course, continue to receive even more if it produced an excellent local transport plan and continued to demonstrate strong delivery.

The hon. Gentleman concentrated on three issues and I am grateful to him for giving me an idea of what they would be. I hope that I will be able to answer many of the matters that he has raised today, although I will probably not be able to deal with all of them.

We all recognise the importance of the case that has been made for the proposal to improve junction 11 on the M4. Indeed, I met Reading councillors and representatives last year to hear about that. They impressed on me the fact that, as the hon. Gentleman has reiterated, that is the most important transport infrastructure issue for greater Reading. I appreciate that the scheme has had a long and sometimes difficult history and I am also conscious that, following the decision in 2004 to refer the scheme for regional consideration, there are increasing calls from local partners for Government to provide some clarity about whether and when funding for the scheme will become available.

The Government have set out and consulted on proposals to establish regional transport funding allocations. We believe that that will give the regions a stronger base on which to plan and that it provides a better basis for informing resource decisions. Now that the principle has been established, any decision on the junction 11 proposal, as with any other scheme of the size, will be made when we have obtained advice from the region on its relative priority compared with other major schemes that are being put forward.

Once the region has advised us on the priorities I shall be able to consider the scheme in more detail, to provide as much certainty as I can, as quickly as possible. As part of the process we will also, of course, take into consideration the inspector's report on whether the compulsory purchase orders and side road orders that form an essential part of the scheme should be confirmed. Of course, if the south-east region recommends the scheme as a priority for funding, it will need to meet value for money criteria, to ensure that we are using public money effectively.

Mr. Wilson: Will the Minister give us some indication of how long the process might take? One problem that we have is the great uncertainty that is being caused. While it continues, companies such as Hewlett Packard will move out of the area. That company is not moving too far—to Bracknell—but the thinking in overseas businesses in the area might be that if things do not improve they should up sticks and go. A timetable would be enormously helpful.

Ms Buck: The certainty that I can give the hon. Gentleman is that we are expecting the advice on regional priorities to be received shortly—in early spring. It would be completely wrong—tempting, but wrong—to pre-judge the outcome of the regional prioritisation process, because it is part of a much broader and longer term strategy to encourage more local, regional ownership, because of the size of the schemes, of what will always be competing demands for a pot of resources that will never be unlimited. Therefore, it would undermine the process if I were to jump in with comments in advance. However, I assure the hon. Gentleman that time is very short for conclusion of the relevant process.

The hon. Gentleman also mentioned congestion. I am very pleased that Reading has made progress in tackling the issue and appears to be willing to make some difficult decisions. The fact that Reading managed to increase bus patronage by nearly 450,000 journeys last year is to be celebrated. Obviously, encouraging modal shift, from cars to public transport, is one integral measure that helps us to tackle congestion.

Reading has not just sought to reduce congestion through more buses. It has also considered, and is developing, a wider range of interventions, which has led to an 87 per cent. increase in the number of park-and-ride journeys into town. I congratulate the council on that, because, almost inevitably, whenever an option arises that might involve encouraging or incentivising behaviour or, in some cases, introducing disincentives for drivers to use their vehicles, there is always a degree of controversy. The development of park-and-ride schemes is not without controversy, but I am afraid that if we are serious about tackling congestion across the country, we will have to consider requiring some courage from local authorities. Reading has certainly demonstrated that courage.

The hon. Gentleman talked about progress on the proposal for a third Thames crossing. I am aware that the issue of additional capacity for crossing the Thames in the Reading area has been subject to much debate. The hon. Gentleman is right that the Government have asked the local authorities to work together to address the issue and a group has been set up to take the work forward. The group has carried out study work that suggested a need for additional capacity and made suggestions on where any possible structure could be placed. I understand that some councils have expressed concerns about the study results, but further work is to be carried out that aims to address those.

I fully expect that all local authorities involved will make a joint statement on progress in their final local transport plan second-round documents, which are due to be submitted by the end of March. However, it is entirely appropriate that local authorities continue to work in partnership to come to a collective view on the appropriate way forward. Once they have developed a suitable scheme and a robust business case, we can then consider any request for funding and that will be dealt with in the normal way in light of advice from the region on its priorities.

The hon. Gentleman's third area of concern was the development of Reading station. He is right to say that Reading is a busy hub that acts as a major strategic point on the national rail network. Passenger numbers are increasing across the country, including at Reading, and in response to that the new Greater Western franchise will see a further increase of 20 per cent. in additional seats to Paddington in the morning peak and a 30 per cent. increase in seats back from London in the evening peak. That is in addition to similar increases introduced in December 2004.

I am pleased that local partners are working together to bring forward plans for the redevelopment of the station, which include the development of two new through platforms. It is a reflection of the "can do" mentality in the local partnership that it has been able to reduce the proposed cost of the core scheme, which builds on the re-signalling works, as the hon. Gentleman mentioned, and have brought that cost down to £68 million. I appreciate that that meant that certain aspects of the wider proposals have been delayed but I think that it at least means that we will be able to take advantage of the opportunities that the proposed re-signalling works will provide.

[Ms Buck]

When the re-signalling work takes place, we will want to take account of the views of the region and many of the surrounding regions on the relative importance of the proposed redevelopment scheme compared with other major schemes coming forward from the south-east. I assure the hon. Gentleman that the Department for Transport has attended the Reading station partnership board and has been kept fully briefed on the proposals as they develop. As the business case becomes available, the Department will be happy to assist further in working through the proposals, although I have to tell him that no public funding has yet been identified for the enhancements.

On the issue of access to Heathrow, the hon. Gentleman is right to say that at present the connection from the west is not direct. However, there is a recently introduced stopping service to the airport, which means that passengers from Reading can interchange at Hayes and Harlington without having to travel all the way into Paddington and back out again. The hon. Gentleman may also be aware of Airtrack, an alternative proposal to serve Heathrow from the west that would provide two trains per hour from Reading and Guildford to the new terminal 5 at Heathrow and to London Waterloo. The Department is working on the specification for the new south-western franchise. We are considering the inclusion of Airtrack services as a priced option within the new franchise so that those services could be provided if third party funding can subsequently provide for the infrastructure changes required. We are also continuing to discuss the scheme with BAA in the context of improved surface access to the airport.

In conclusion, I reassure the hon. Gentleman that the Department has a good understanding of the transport issues that affect the greater Reading area. There has been considerable investment through the local transport plan and we are working with local partners to see how the major developments that he has identified can be addressed in the most cost-effective and efficient way.

West Yorkshire Police

4.30 pm

Mr. Paul Truswell (Pudsey) (Lab): This is a sad day for the people of West Yorkshire and for West Yorkshire police force in particular, as we commemorate the ultimate sacrifice made by Police Constable Sharon Beshenivsky. It would be wrong not to record our respects to her and her colleagues—especially Teresa Milburn, who was wounded in the incident in which PC Beshenivsky died—and to extend our condolences to her family.

Although we often join constituents in robust discussions with senior police officers about shortcomings in the police and their performance, we should also acknowledge their successes and support their efforts to sustain those. There are serious concerns in West Yorkshire about whether movement in the right direction might be undermined by developments regarding resources and major reorganisation. Those concerns prompted me to request this Adjournment debate, which Mr. Speaker has been kind enough to grant me.

Crime levels in West Yorkshire have been falling. The division covering my constituency has made a significant contribution to that. In the past full year, April 2004 to March 2005, there were 8,383 fewer crimes in the Pudsey and Weetwood division, a fall of 19 per cent. for the year. Figures for burglary, robbery and theft of and from motor vehicles fell even further. The latest figures show a continuing downward trend. Police numbers are at record levels after falling for most of the 1990s, but we still need more resources to exert downward pressure on burglary, robbery and car theft, and to make an even greater impact on antisocial behaviour and violent crime.

The recent assessment of West Yorkshire police by Her Majesty's inspectorate of constabulary, published in October 2005, showed improvements across the board, with an "excellent" rating for investigating crime, and "good" ratings for reducing crime, promoting safety, and use of resources. However, the force's ratings in the areas of local policing and dealing with the public, although now improving, still fell far short of what is required. The handling of calls, for example, is a continual source of complaints from my constituents and, no doubt, those of other Members present.

In terms of funding, the greatest concern is that once again West Yorkshire police appears to have been penalised by the allocation of an almost flat-rate grant across the board. On paper, it has gained from changes to the funding formula, and if it had been applied this year, the formula would have provided raw allocation for West Yorkshire of £151.51 per head of the population. That is still below the allocations for comparable forces such as Greater Manchester police, Merseyside police and West Midlands police, but it is a movement in the right direction. Notionally, the formula would have provided £320 million—a figure sufficient, together with a modest precept, to fund the base budget.

Although some dampening was expected to avoid major budget cuts for other authorities, we did not anticipate the bucket of cold water thrown on West

Yorkshire's legitimate expectation of a much fairer proportion under the formula. In total, £14.3 million has been clawed back from the force to subsidise forces that would otherwise receive an increase of less than 3.2 per cent. That is the third largest clawback for any force, and it represents 10 per cent. of the total amount needed to support those forces below the 3.2 per cent. floor.

The three forces most affected, including West Yorkshire, all contain significant deprived communities, and they have particular protective service needs. Last year it appeared that a greater emphasis was being placed on the formula, but this year we appear to have reverted to a rigid system of floors and ceilings.

To compound that formula-funding failure, the change to the new pension financing arrangements has also hit West Yorkshire police adversely. Although it was intended to be cost-neutral at individual authority level, its impact means a loss of £2 million for the year 2006–07. It has impacted also on the budget that the authority can spend before capping criteria are breached.

Those factors have created a serious funding shortfall. To bridge it would require a double digit precept or measures that would seriously undermine the capacity of the force to move things forward as we should want it to. The force's latest estimate of the budget increase needed for next year is £17 million higher than the funding available with a precept increase of 5 per cent. In fairness, the estimate includes growth of £4.4 million in the areas of counter-terrorism, quality of service commitment and police community support officers. However, even without that desirable growth, the gap is substantial.

I appreciate that Ministers cannot make special provision for individual forces, but there are at least three specific and legitimate ways in which my hon. Friend and his colleagues could assist West Yorkshire police to make up some of the budget shortfall. The first would be to fund a counter-terrorism unit. The second would be payment in full of the force's outstanding claim in respect of the policing that it carried out as a result of the 7 July bombings in London, and the third would be the designation of Leeds-Bradford airport for security purposes.

The force's request through the terrorism and allied matters advisory group of the Association of Chief Police Officers for funding for a local counter-terrorism group similar to the one that has already been set up in the west midlands is still outstanding, and the force would be grateful for any influence that my hon. Friend can exercise in that direction. The current estimate of the cost of policing arising from the London bombings is £5.9 million, which would make a significant contribution to dealing with the funding gap, at least in the short term. Again, I trust that my hon. Friend and his colleagues will smile favourably on that bid.

It has long been argued that Leeds-Bradford airport should have designated status for security purposes. It has always been inexplicable to me why it does not. It certainly impacts on the day-to-day policing in the Pudsey and Weetwood division, which covers my constituency as well as the airport. As I understand it, designation would bring in some £300,000 of additional funding. It would allow the force to provide the right level of security, and it would also mean that it would not constantly suffer from abstractions from the local division.

Let me turn to the question of force mergers. There has been considerable concern in West Yorkshire about this process, starting as it did during the recess and with tight deadlines and little opportunity for engagement, especially by MPs. It sounds a bit like the Department of Health and primary care trusts, but I shall not go down that avenue. There were also concerns about a prescriptive agenda that makes merger obligatory rather than optional. I appreciate that the Government cannot ignore the advice of the Her Majesty's inspectorate of constabulary about protective services and the inability of smaller forces to meet the challenge, but I make no apologies for looking at the issue from a West Yorkshire perspective.

There continue to be major concerns: the cost and funding of the restructure, the nature of the new governance arrangements that will be required, implications for council tax, fear of a levelling down of services and, above all, fear of a massive reorganisation submerging the thrust to develop community policing. To, varying degrees, both amalgamation options have the same shortcomings, and it is incumbent on my hon. Friend and his colleagues to demonstrate why West Yorkshire must be merged when there are strong arguments, including the Home Office's own criteria, for retaining the present operational boundaries.

West Yorkshire is the fourth largest force in the country and easily meets the Home Office's minimum size for a strategic force. It has demonstrated its capacity to deal with the challenge of terrorism. The requirement to address the need for protective services must not impinge on, or undermine, neighbourhood policing—that is a given. The fear is that the enormity of the work required to achieve mergers, especially on the massive regional basis that is being considered, will inevitably do just that. Inevitably, work at neighbourhood level will be diverted, but the resources available for dealing with yobs, burglars, robbers and car thieves must be maintained and increased, not submerged into some gigantic bureaucratic change.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Truswell: No. The hon. Gentleman is not observing the conventions of the House. Many other Members would have wished to contribute, but it would have been invidious to select individuals.

The distinction between West Yorkshire and other forces in the region is reflected by the fact—nominally, at least, as I have already said—that it receives more Government funding per head than other forces. There are also significant differences in performance. West Yorkshire's score on the protective services assessment recently carried out by the HMIC was relatively high. It was the highest scoring force in the region, with a combined score of 53, compared with totals of 42, 35 and 32 for South Yorkshire, Humberside and North Yorkshire respectively. There is, therefore, an understandable fear that there would be a levelling down of services as far as West Yorkshire is concerned, rather than a levelling up, especially in the early years.

[Mr. Truswell]

Using the Home Office's own criteria, the option is easily the best approach for West Yorkshire, and has achieved a protective services score of 502. The Minister will be aware of the much lower scores that were achieved using the other two options.

Some collaborative and lead force arrangements with neighbouring forces are already in place, and I understand that they operate pretty well. As the submission from West Yorkshire police says, such arrangements could be formalised and extended if necessary to provide extensive and robust policing to meet the requirements of the protective measures. That would satisfy that particular requirement without incurring the enormous set-up costs and disruption associated with amalgamation.

I appreciate that that option requires creative thinking rather than a neat bureaucratic solution. It is not a no-change option, and its financial and operational impact needs to be taken into account, but its impact would be much less than that of either of the two options that the Home Office currently seems to favour. Policing must be tailored to geography and population, especially if neighbourhood policing is to be a reality. West Yorkshire has little common ground with neighbouring forces in its social diversity, culture and ethnicity.

The Government recognise those differences in policing demands through the funding formula, if not through the grant system at the moment. Compared with other forces in Yorkshire and Humberside, West Yorkshire receives a relatively high level of Government support, which as I said is nominally about £151 per head, which reflects the comparatively high risk of crime. Residents in other counties receive comparatively less support. In North Yorkshire, for example, the figure is £83.73 per head.

Although Yorkshire people are proud of their county and its traditions, in practice its local services have never been provided or governed at county level. We had the ridings, and now we have the diverse structures that have developed in more recent decades. The four counties have distinct and different economic, industrial, social, demographic and ethnic profiles that would present significant barriers to a successful merger.

The regional merger option in particular looks and feels overblown. A service that has such an intimate impact on neighbourhoods and individual citizens has never been delivered by such a large organisation outside London. Without major changes to existing arrangements, the effect of amalgamation would be to equalise Government funding in the new police region, and to equalise the police precept paid by residents. That would immediately create unfair disparities in the precept. Currently, annual precept payments for a band D household in the region range from £176 in North Yorkshire to £107 in West Yorkshire.

Using a crude equalisation approach, both the amalgamation options would lead to an increase in the precept paid by West Yorkshire residents by 20 per cent. There are other organisational considerations. Policing boundaries in West Yorkshire are coterminous with crime and disorder reduction partnerships and other community safety partners. All district councils have representation on the police authority that is proportional and reflects the political make-up of the county. The number of councillor members of the authority allows them to engage fully as members of the authority, as well as carrying out the other duties for which their constituents elected them. That would not be possible under either amalgamation proposal.

West Yorkshire has recently reorganised its basic command units. That was not a painless exercise, but they will, we hope, develop better neighbourhood policing and improve engagement with the community and individuals who need to contact the police. However, trying to get that right amid the maelstrom of a major strategic reorganisation would traumatise any student of local government and services and fill them with trepidation. It certainly has that effect on this student of local government.

The regional amalgamation of personnel would be on an unprecedented scale in mainland policing outside the Metropolitan police. Integrating two different sets of systems and work forces would be difficult enough; integrating four would be a mammoth and elusive challenge. It would certainly, whether fairly or unfairly, be blamed for every shortcoming in service at every level for the foreseeable future. A regional force would feel very remote to the public. It would not have a firm political identity and would not share any current boundaries with partners. Most of the amalgamated force would be concentrated in the south-west of the region, which would be a bone of contention with residents and the force in the rest of the region. We want to avoid that sort of resentment.

In summary, those are the principal reasons why West Yorkshire police authority, West Yorkshire police force, councils in West Yorkshire, MPs such as myself who are present, and those who are not, feel that West Yorkshire, in the Home Office's own terms and beyond, meets the challenges of providing protective services while continuing to develop effective neighbourhood policing. It would be a great irony and perversity if in striving to address the demand and needs of protective services, we were to undermine policing at the grass-roots, neighbourhood level.

4.46 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Paul Goggins): I congratulate my hon. Friend on securing the debate, and begin, as he did, by mentioning the funeral of Police Constable Sharon Beshenivsky, which took place earlier today. I join my hon. Friend and all Members present from West Yorkshire in conveying my sincere sympathy and thoughts to her family. Her tragic death is a timely reminder to us all of the bravery of our police officers in dealing with all aspects of crime, sometimes, unfortunately, as in this case, with tragic consequences.

I welcome the fact that my hon. Friend has touched on some controversial issues this afternoon. I say that as a humble Mancunian facing the serried ranks of the force of West Yorkshire. It is important that we have this debate. Having what I hope will be an informed and constructive dialogue will be an important part of our reform programme. We need to engage with and try to understand and answer some of the legitimate questions being raised by hon. Members and the communities that they serve.

The effectiveness of British policing is based on the principle of consent. It is important, particularly through a period of change, that police forces are supported and understood in terms of both structure and purpose by the communities that they serve. Although the debate about restructuring has sometimes been caricatured as a move toward regionalisation or the creation of large forces for their own sake, it is precisely because we value local policing services that we are making reforms. A constant theme of my hon. Friend's speech was the need to keep the focus on local neighbourhood policing. I hope to persuade him in the next few minutes that that aspiration lies at the heart of the reform programme on which we have embarked.

For most people, indeed for everyone, policing is about their local community. Many of the concerns that my hon. Friend expressed today centre around neighbourhood policing and the connection with local communities. People want their police to help create a safe neighbourhood for them to live in. Increasingly, they also want to have a greater say in setting the priorities for the police who operate in their area. That is right and legitimate. Any proposals to restructure police forces will build on that approach, improving the services that are provided to individual neighbourhoods and addressing the particular problems that they face. We are committed to providing dedicated, visible, accessible and responsive neighbourhood policing in all parts of the country by 2008.

The focus for neighbourhood policing has always been the basic command unit and levels below that, and that will not change through the period of reform on which we have embarked. In fact, I contend that local people will experience an improvement in their local policing. The creation of strategic forces with sufficient capacity and resilience to deal with major investigations or public order incidents will help to safeguard local policing by reducing the need to abstract officers away from policing local neighbourhoods to deal with those serious incidents, so it is to protect neighbourhood policing and stop people from being drawn away from it that we are taking the measures that we are taking.

My hon. Friend used the word submerged. He does not want neighbourhood policing to be submerged in the process of change. I promise him that that will not happen, and that that focus on neighbourhood policing will remain.

The real purpose of our reforms is to create police forces that are committed to local policing, but have the necessary capacity and resilience to respond effectively to serious crime or public order incidents whenever they happen. We need forces that can be more proactive in countering organised criminal networks—by gathering the intelligence that is needed to understand and pre-empt their activities in communities—while working consistently to national standards.

This is not an academic exercise in redrawing boundaries on a map. We need a fundamental change in our approach to terrorism, serious and organised crime, civil contingencies and emergency planning, public order and other protective services. It must be more strategic, but must have neighbourhood policing very much at its heart.

My hon. Friend mentioned the report "Closing the Gap" produced by Her Majesty's inspectorate of constabulary. It is an extensive examination of how effectively the protective services are currently provided. The expert and independent advice given in the report was that, given that the current structure of policing is no longer fit for purpose, strategic forces offer the best business solution. HMIC concluded that if nothing were done, the situation would be likely to worsen rather than to improve in that, increasingly, resources would be drawn away from neighbourhoods in order to provide protective services. It found that larger forces—my hon. Friend mentioned the figures: those with at least 4,000 officers or 6,000 staff—are more likely to have the capacity and resilience needed to cope with the demands of cross-border crime without abstracting from local policing. Below that level, forces are not considered to have the critical mass to provide the protective services that all communities require.

To achieve the reforms, the process needs to be owned and led by the police service itself. I do not have a blueprint for reorganisation, nor does my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary. I accept that the time scales that have been set for the process are challenging. Police forces and authorities have been working extremely hard, and I am grateful, as is the Home Secretary, to all, including those in West Yorkshire, who have contributed to the process, for all the work that has gone on and the efforts that have been made to identify the options for restructuring. Some forces and authorities have been extremely proactive and creative in the ways in which they have sought to engage with the public and sound them out about the proposals. There has been a high level of consultation throughout the country.

We need to keep to the challenging time scale. This is an important discussion, but we do not want it to detract from the important business of day-to-day policing; we do not want it to sap morale, and we do not want the police to lose their core focus on protecting the public. Going forward, we will need to consider a range of issues. My hon. Friend mentioned a number of them. I cannot dwell on the detail of the answers this afternoon, but I acknowledge that important questions have been asked and that we are determined to get a proper response to them.

Mr. Truswell: Going back to what the Minister said a few minutes ago, the crux of the concern in West Yorkshire is that the force easily meets the minimum level that would satisfy the requirements of the HMIC. He mentioned 4,000 officers. I think that there are 5,700 in West Yorkshire, so that is not marginal; it easily meets the criteria. I should be grateful if my hon. Friend would explore why West Yorkshire is still being pushed down the road of amalgamation.

Paul Goggins: My hon. Friend makes a good point and reads my mind. He is right, and I can give the precise figure. The current strength of West Yorkshire is 5,671 officers and 3,452 staff, a total of 9,123, so the force fulfils the criterion set down by HMIC on its own. However, that is only one of a number of criteria, and my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary has made it clear that any force standing alone should not do so to the detriment of other forces within a particular region. There is a balance to be struck.

There are two other options, which I shall mention. The option of the stand-alone police authority and force for West Yorkshire has not been dismissed. That will be evaluated as part of the whole process. Two options have come forward: one for a regional force and the other for two forces based on the current system with West Yorkshire police merging with North Yorkshire police and South Yorkshire police merging with Humberside police. Those options will be evaluated properly and we shall continue to engage in discussion of them. My hon. Friend is right. On its own, West Yorkshire police fulfils the criteria, but we must take account of the wider context.

I hope that my hon. Friend understands that it is not possible in the context of this debate to comment further on the details or merits of the proposals. We must continue to evaluate all the options carefully to ensure that we have a coherent system for West Yorkshire and the whole of England and Wales. We want to continue to work with local forces, police authorities, other bodies and Members of Parliament in that discussion.

My hon. Friend raised a number of issues about finance and I want to respond to them in the time that I have left. He spoke particularly about the estimated loss of some £14 million in each of the next two years compared with what the raw grant would have given to the West Yorkshire authority. It is true that had it been just the grant the figure would have been higher. However, we set a floor of 3.2 per cent. for next year and 3.7 per cent. for the following year. In setting that floor, there are winners and losers and the money must come from the pot. I freely acknowledge that a tough decision must be taken, but we are clear that we want all parts of the country to benefit from the considerable increase in funding for the police in recent years—a 27 per cent. increase in real terms since 1997 with a huge cash increase and more police on the front line. We have had to take a balanced view about that. West Yorkshire police has benefited enormously overall from that extra investment. We want all areas to benefit and we have had to make a balanced judgment. The decision was tough but we believe that it is the right decision.

I confirm to my hon. Friend the application for special grant for the cost of policing in the period immediately after 7 July and join him in commending the police on the careful, sensitive and robust way in which they dealt with many of the issues. That application is still being considered and as soon as a decision is made we will convey it to the police authority.

My hon. Friend also mentioned counter-terrorism units and asked whether there was a possibility of funding for such a unit in West Yorkshire. That will be considered as part of the roll-out of counter-terrorism units throughout the country but it plays into the debate about future force structure and we cannot have one debate without the other. However, I acknowledge the importance of my hon. Friend's point, which has registered strongly with me.

I cannot make a promise to my hon. Friend about the designation of Leeds-Bradford airport although I acknowledge that issues arise. I have an airport in my constituency and am familiar with the sort of issues that he raised. I promise to look carefully again at the matter and will write to him setting out our detailed thinking behind the issues.

I acknowledge that many difficult issues must be addressed in the restructuring process. Crime is still too high despite the fact that we have reduced it by 35 per cent. in recent years. We need police forces that can deal with bigger issues of counter-terrorism and organised crime as well as the bread-and-butter, day-in, day-out issues of neighbourhood policing. As we go forward we seek a force structure that enables us to do both so that my hon. Friend's constituents can rely on a police service that meets all their protective needs.

Question put and agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Tony Cunningham.]

2.30 pm

Mr. Alan Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed) (LD): I am pleased to serve under your chairmanship, Mr. O'Hara, and to have the opportunity to debate the fourth report of Session 2004–05 of the Select Committee on Constitutional Affairs on family justice and the operation of the family courts.

The report was issued during the previous Parliament, which means that several of the Members who took part in preparing it are no longer in the House. Clive Soley, for example, is now Lord Soley, and is elsewhere, although he still takes an interest in these matters, as I am sure do the other Members who served on the Committee and others who are still in the House but are engaged in other Committees and in other work. The report was a very important part of our work, and we attached a great deal of importance to it. It certainly attracted a great deal of interest.

Our interest in the field began with our work on the Children and Family Court Advisory and Support Service for the third report of the 2002–03 Session. The situation at that time was such that we had to produce a very critical report that led to the replacement of the entire board of CAFCASS and a fresh start for what was then a very troubled organisation.

This report considers more widely the operation of the family courts. We took evidence from a wide range of organisations that represent families, mothers, fathers and children, as well as legal practitioners, academics and judges at all levels, from the magistrates court to the president of the family division of the High Court.

Since the report was published, we have had the Government's response, the draft Children (Contact) and Adoption Bill last summer, and the Joint Committee's report on that Bill. Conveniently, the Joint Committee was chaired by Clive Soley while he was still serving on the Constitutional Affairs Committee. That provided helpful continuity between the work of the two Committees. The Bill is now well on its way through the House of Lords, and we look forward to receiving it in the House of Commons.

The report examines the way in which the court system tries to deal with unresolved disputes involving the care of, and contact with, children where parents have divorced or separated. In the vast majority of families where breakdown occurs, the problems are resolved without the involvement of the courts. Courts become involved when there is a great deal of emotion, bitterness and mistrust, which court processes rarely dispel and often make worse. Raking over bitter disputes in an adversarial process does not make them easier to resolve, and the delays and enforcement problems inherent in the process can mean that an aggrieved parent is denied the very contact that they seek, and the child is denied their right to contact with both parents. Our first conclusion was therefore that the courts are not the best place in which to resolve complex family disputes and should be a last resort.

We heard a great deal in Committee and in public debate about non-resident parents who have persistently been denied contact with their children. Most, but not all, of those parents are fathers, many of whom have drawn the conclusion that the courts are biased against them, either because of the court's decisions or because contact has not been enforced. That view has led some to argue that the existing legal presumption, which puts the welfare of the child first, should be supplemented by a legal presumption that both parents should have contact with the children.

We found two serious obstacles to that view. First, many cases involve allegations of domestic violence or abuse, and those concerns cannot simply be overridden by imposing such a presumption without regard to the safety of the child. Secondly, and more generally, the judges expressed their concern about attempting to operate two legal presumptions at the same time. Dame Elizabeth Butler-Sloss says:

"we can only have one presumption that the welfare of the child is paramount. If you have two presumptions, which one takes precedence?"

We therefore recommended that another way should be found to assert the principle, which is enshrined in the United Nations convention on the rights of the child, that a child has the right to have contact with both parents. We recommended that that should be achieved by adding it to the welfare checklist in the Children Act 2004. What is the Government's latest thinking on this central point?

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): I endorse the right hon. Gentleman's point. In my constituency, I receive an increasing number of letters from fathers of young children who are in effect being denied access to their children. One of them has not seen his child at all for 18 months. I am sure that the sort of resolution that the right hon. Gentleman suggests would go a long way towards dealing with their understandable concerns.

Mr. Beith: The hon. Gentleman makes a fair point. That has been the experience of many of us in dealing with constituents, in addition to what we know of some of the more public cases. In that and in other respects we must deal with the matter without creating new problems or worsening existing problems in the process. As I develop my argument, it will become clear that there is a difficult balance to be achieved. We are dealing with human issues that affect our constituents.

We strongly supported shared parenting agreements and the extension of that approach into court settlements. We did not accept that there could be a pre-determined statutory template for the division of time that a child should spend with each parent, because that would put the child's welfare and wishes into a secondary position. We said that the amount of contact that a child would want might vary during their childhood. We also recommended a change in the law to give grandparents the right to apply to the courts without having to apply for permission, in recognition of the potential value to the child of their support.

We considered delay in the courts, which is of particular concern in cases that involve children. A long period without contact as a result of delay can lead to a situation in which the court no longer believes that it is in the child's best interest to resume contact. Delay can change the status quo that the courts must deal with.

Mr. Oliver Heald (North-East Hertfordshire) (Con): Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that one problem is that nowadays the courts treat as contact something that is very minimal? For example, sending a letter, postcard or Christmas card is called contact, whereas for most of the public it means a face-to-face meeting. Should not the courts, in any order that they make, try to set up an escalating programme of contact that leads to face-to-face contact?

Mr. Beith: The hon. Gentleman is right about the nature of contact, although I am not sure that the courts generally interpret it so narrowly. It would certainly be contrary to the public understanding of contact if such a minimal level was all that was meant. For most people, contact means quality time spent with their son or daughter. That is what it is all about. The situation that the hon. Gentleman describes may arise in cases where acute safety considerations lead, in effect, to a denial of contact and the maintenance of a minimal link by Christmas cards and so on. I have come across tragic cases where letters have not been delivered and Christmas cards have not reached people. That goes back to the early days of the problems at CAFCASS.

I am particularly worried, as are many of us, about the fact that if delay occurs it is not merely an inconvenience; the life of a child is directly and drastically affected. There is a risk of delay being used tactically by the other parent in the proceedings. The professionals all insist that tactical delay is not practised and that it is contrary to the principles on which they work. However, the perception is so widespread that we asked for more research. Until now, such research has been restricted by the closed nature of family court proceedings, but it is necessary.

As regards general court delays, we have asked for more effort to recruit specialist judges, continued improvement in case management, and a change in the way that CAFCASS operates. I should be interested to hear a progress report from the Minister on those points, especially in the light of a newspaper report that appeared just before Christmas using Law Society research to show that 70 per cent of relevant cases in London are held up by a lack of judicial staff. It said:

> "The Law Society said that delays were due to insufficient "judge hours" being allocated to family matters and inadequate staff recruitment and training in family courts."

The Department for Constitutional Affairs admitted—I do not know whether it is news to the Minister—that > "there was a problem in London, which it blamed on a higher than forecast increase in cases. However, a spokeswoman said it is addressing the issue through initiatives such as the appointment of a case progression officer to the Principal Registry to improve case handling."

Clearly, we all want the problem of delay to be dealt with.

Central to our report was a recommendation about mediation, which we saw as a better way of resolving disputes in many cases. Anyone who is claiming legal aid can be required to consider mediation, but there is no such requirement on non-legally aided parties. We recommended that where it is safe to do so, all parties should be required to attend a preliminary meeting with a view to mediation. That is not the same as compulsory mediation, but it requires the possibility of mediation to be explored. The witnesses whom we saw said that such a process quite often leads to people accepting, at first reluctantly but after discussion more willingly, that mediation could help them. Our view was endorsed by the Joint Committee on the draft Children (Contact) and Adoption Bill, which commented:

> "We recommend that the Government include within the full Bill a provision giving the Court discretion to refer parties to a mediation service in order to explore whether this could be a viable option in their case."

The Minister can advise us as to whether the powers in the Bill are sufficient to make this happen and, if so, will be used to make it happen.

The Government have been piloting a form of mediation with the family resolutions pilot project, but that seems to have been singularly unsuccessful in terms of the number of people taking it up, probably because of the lack of compulsion. Last summer, The Guardian carried a report, using figures that must now be completely outdated; it would be nice to have them updated. It said that nine months after the pilot started, only 47 couples had entered it, against an estimate of 1,000, and only 23 had completed the programme. That was pretty disappointing, and the figures cannot have improved all that much since then.

Many people have argued that the Government should pilot what is loosely called the Florida model, which involves an element of compulsion. Judge John Lenderman of Florida says:

> "I'm totally convinced mediation should be mandatory. Every judge that I've talked to around the United States says mandatory mediation is the way to go."

Far fewer cases go to court in Florida. The US is not the only country that has compulsory mediation. Neither we nor the Joint Committee went so far as to recommend compulsory mediation, but we did recommend a compulsory meeting, at the court's discretion, to require people to consider the option of mediation and to be taken through the possibilities it could offer.

Mr. Heald: Would the right hon. Gentleman care to comment on the nature of the parenting plans that are used in Florida? When parents are first brought to the meeting they are shown the sorts of orders that the court would normally make if they do not reach an agreement. Expectations are much more realistic than one might find in British family courts.

Mr. Beith: People are told what the likely outcome will be if they do not come to an agreement. That is not the normal process in a court proceeding. The solicitor acting for one side may tell them what the outcome might be if they do not agree, but the judge will not normally engage in that kind of process. That illustrates the fact that mediation allows for an approach that differs greatly from usual court proceedings.

The Committee felt that it would have been much better if a Florida-type model had been piloted, perhaps at the same time as the family resolution project. The Government said in their response that they felt it was "not . . . suitable in this jurisdiction."

We thought that it might be made suitable, and I hope that the Government might have change their view since then. We are glad to have the Minister of State here with us this afternoon, and she can tell us more later.

I very much welcome the fact that through the Children (Contact) and Adoption Bill the Government were addressing the lack of effective and usable enforcement measures, which is another problem that would be faced by the constituents of the hon. Member for Kettering (Mr. Hollobone). They get the court judgment that to some extent meets what they believe they ought to have, but it then it is repeatedly not enforced. Clearly the courts will not make a bad situation even worse by sending a mother to prison for failing to carry out contact orders. A family already in crisis will be in an even bigger crisis if that course is taken.

The Bill offers some new avenues, including what I presume is intended to be an equivalent of community service—the unpaid work provision—and compensation as a possibility where a financial loss to the other parent has been caused. For example, a holiday may have been cancelled because the contact arrangements have not been adhered to.

Few things discredit the court system more than the perception that its rulings can be flouted with impunity; we have to change that perception. However, the powers of the court will not be sufficient in themselves to deal with the problem. The courts need to remain actively engaged in cases where contact orders are being ignored, and CAFCASS officers need to be proactive in supporting court orders and quickly bringing the cases back to court where necessary. We pointed out that the Government's own welcome proposals in that direction represented a radical change and a major new responsibility for CAFCASS, which will need more caseworkers with relevant skills and quite a change in culture to carry through the proposals. How confident are Ministers that that will be achieved?

One of the most difficult issues that we considered was that of safety and domestic violence. Groups representing victims—

3.1 pm

On resuming—

Mr. Beith: When the Division was called, I was about to turn to one of the most difficult issues that we considered—safety and domestic violence. Groups representing victims of abuse, such as Women's Aid and the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, focused on the inappropriate granting of contact where there was a fear, or indeed experience, of domestic violence, including violence against children. Groups representing non-resident parents argued that false accusations were frequently made to frustrate contact and that that was not adequately recognised by the courts. Resident parents with fears for the children's safety pointed to well-known cases of death and injury involving children who were in the care of the non-resident parent, but other witnesses pointed to the occurrence of child abuse, often by stepfathers or new partners, while children were at the resident parent's home. We found that there is a serious lack of research and reliable statistical information on the issue.

The Department has introduced gateway forms to identify at the earliest possible stage whether domestic violence is an issue. We said that that needs to be carefully monitored to address safety issues and to guard against some parents being encouraged to use the forms to raise unfounded safety issues, leading to more delay in deciding cases. Enforcement action by the courts should not occur when there are unresolved safety concerns, but false accusations should not be allowed to become a mechanism to frustrate contact. The Department needs to follow up the introduction of the gateway forms by examining how often violence or abusive conduct subsequently occur. The evaluation of the forms is due to be completed by June this year. Will it include such an assessment? If not, perhaps because not enough time has elapsed to assess the consequences, will further work be done? We recommended the development of a wider range of options for supervised contact, and the Department for Education and Skills has allocated extra resources to that work. What decisions have been taken on expanding it over the next two years?

Lack of transparency has been a major factor in creating dissatisfaction with the family justice system among those involved in cases. We found the rules on communicating the details of particular cases to be too strict. The restrictions on communicating details of family cases to those not involved apply to Members of Parliament handling constituency cases. The Minister of State became embroiled in the problem when her sister, who practises in the field, wrongly communicated details of a case to her. Although I think that she did so with the best of intentions, she faced a severe penalty. The restrictions have served to fuel the perception of bias and unfairness.

Some of the evidence that we received suggested that the lack of openness has prevented proper scrutiny of the work done by family judges and court officials and made it impossible to prove or disprove perceived unfairness. The Government have addressed those limitations in so far as they affect MPs, peers and a wide range of those to whom parents might wish to refer their individual cases to seek advice or make a complaint, and new rules came into force last October. However, there remains the wider issue, which is publicly recognised by judges, that the secrecy with which family court cases are dealt with is, in Mr. Justice Munby's words, "crippling public debate" and doing "serious harm". The restrictions are designed to protect children and families, but they are so extensive that, to quote Mr. Justice Ryder, they militate against "public confidence in the sensitive balancing of people's rights and needs that is an essential component of the social contract of family justice".

He and other judges have delivered some judgments in open court, subject to restrictions to protect the identity of those involved, to help to deal with the problem. We welcome that. Greater transparency is needed so that the public can have a more informed picture of what happens in family courts. We want family court proceedings generally to be open, subject to the discretion of the court and appropriate protection. We await the Government's final view and the consultation paper.

The report considered very important issues affecting the lives of many children and separated parents. Some of those issues have generated heated and emotive public debate. There is a lot at stake for those most closely involved. In disputed cases, the non-resident parent—in most cases, but not all, the father—is deeply hurt and frustrated by the inability to maintain a relationship with and contact with his children. That is very painful for him.

The parent with whom the child lives may find the contact arrangements disruptive and may, in some cases, have fears for the safety of the child, particularly if there has been previous domestic violence. Resolving those issues will be much more difficult because of the bitterness, resentment and mistrust that is part and parcel of the breakdown of the relationship between the parents. At the centre of it all is the child or young person, pulled in opposite directions and expected to live according to rules set by a court while trying to grow up, learn and enjoy life. To the child, a delay in the system often means separation from a parent, grandparents, cousins or even brothers and sisters. That is impossible for the child to understand and may mean that relationships are lost altogether. A year's delay is an age in the life of a child. As a young person develops their own life and activities, the requirement on the orders of a court to be in a particular place for a particular time, perhaps a long way from home, may seem increasingly unacceptable. Sometimes we need to step back from the paperwork and the processes and look at this from the standpoint of those whose daily lives it concerns.

As the vast majority of parents recognise, the courts, by their very nature, are not well suited to organising people's family lives and resolving their conflicting emotions. If informal agreement cannot be achieved, the next best step is probably mediation. When that cannot be made to work and the courts become involved, we owe it to the children to make the system work for them as best we can. That is what many judges, court staff and practitioners are trying to do, and we have suggested ways in which they can be helped to do it as well as possible.

3.8 pm

Annette Brooke (Mid-Dorset and North Poole) (LD): I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) and the members of his Committee on producing an excellent report. It was well timed to some extent; there was a slight lack of synchronisation between some Government papers and the Select Committee's report, but I am glad that it has come together in a timely fashion.

I considered the title of the report, "Family Justice", and my experiences of constituency surgeries and thought, justice for whom? Are we talking about justice for parents or justice for the children? Somehow one loses sight of the fact that there was a family unit. We need to proceed in such a way that we retain the importance of a family, even though they might not all be located in the same residence. That is a very important objective.

Support for the family generally is very important and I would like to declare an interest, although I wish it was greater than it is: I am a trustee of Poole community family trust, which I do not think will have any funding in the near future. The principle behind community family trusts of working on relationship education prior to partnerships becoming permanent—by, for example, working through checklists and in particular through providing relationship education in schools, which happens in quite a lot of other ways—is excellent.

Those preventive measures are not part of the report, but are part of what I see as a lifetime raft of family support that can be accessed at appropriate times. When we consider the amount of support needed once a breakdown occurs, we realise that such early investment is crucial. It is clear that even if there is an irrevocable breakdown, if the parents have an amicable split the contact arrangements are that much easier to deal with. That is very important. I shall pick up on other aspects of support for families later.

Another aspect that does not relate directly to the report is the suggestion that this whole area is under-researched. Do we know the extent of contact denial or breakdown? I wonder whether the Government want further research in that regard. I know that there is the Office for National Statistics work, but people may feel that all the work should be much more extensive. It certainly needs to be done in a sophisticated way. The evidence that I have seen is that rather different answers are given by the resident parent and the non-resident parent. Perceptions are different, which makes careful research all the more important.

Sadly, some parents reach the point of irrevocable breakdown. The report and the Government response are all about how well the processes work in those circumstances and what we can all do—there is a great need for consensus in this respect—to improve them. As a background to the comments that I shall make, I want to make it clear that we would support the presumption that the welfare of the child is paramount. We would certainly want to take on board the United Nations convention on the rights of the child. In particular, the views of children should be sufficiently taken into account. I am also referring to the right of the child to be cared for by parents, the parents' right to exert parental responsibility in allowing their child to develop and evolve their capacity—parental responsibility is all-important in this—and the child's right to contact unless it is in their best interests not to have contact.

Now that we have had "Every Child Matters" and the Children Act 2004, we have at the back of our minds achieving the five all-important outcomes for children.

However, I have structured the order of my response slightly differently. I put safety issues at the top of my list of things to talk about, because I thought that they were all-important. I wanted then to consider mediation, contact, enforcement, resources and transparency, and I think that I have listed those issues according to my order of priority.

The Minister has made a very big contribution to tackling domestic violence, and we have discussed the issue at great length. As regards contact and the safety of children given the frequent history of violence in those cases that come to court, the often-cited statistic is that in 2003, 16,000 cases involving domestic violence came before family courts, but only in 601 were contact orders refused. It is a difficult question whether domestic violence is under-recorded—some groups feel strongly that it is—or over-recorded. I shall return to that question.

I am pleased to congratulate the Government on the fact that the availability of supervised contact centres is improving but, as the report points out, much more is needed in that regard; the current provision is inadequate. I am pleased that the Government responded favourably to the point made in the Committee's report about thinking about more innovative solutions: using children's centres and extended school and looking at facilities in different ways. I have no idea whether the resources that the Government are allocating will be adequate; I hope that they will.

We have long felt strongly that any contact activity should be subject to careful and separate risk assessment to minimise possible risk especially to children and also to individuals involved, particularly women. The Joint Committee responsible for scrutiny recommended that before making contact or enforcement orders the court should explicitly be required to consider the safety implications for both the child and the parent of such an order. I am pleased that in the other place there has been an agreement to introduce mandatory safety assessments where accusations have been made—the Minister will correct me if I am wrong, and I look for clarification in her response.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed mentioned the gateway forms. Why are we getting more reports of domestic violence? Have the forms encouraged people to come forward and say something or are people using domestic violence as part of the unfortunate game? I have had a very sad constituency case. My constituent suggests that the case is entirely trumped up; he has never been involved in domestic violence, but he feels that the form has affected the outcome of his case. He is particularly aggrieved because he feels that he has never had a chance to put his side. The mandatory risk assessment will be helpful, because I imagine that both sides would at least have an opportunity to present their points. That would all be part of the assessment and would be healthy for such difficult cases.

Mr. Beith: May I point to a further difficulty that occurs in such cases, which the risk assessment would have to consider? When the breakdown has been attended by a degree of low-level violence, possibly involving both partners, which is of no threat to the children and the children have never seen it let alone been the victims of it, such an assessment is difficult to make. However, if we do not make it, we create a presumption that if the slightest element of violence has ever occurred between the two parties, one party can never see the children again. That cannot be a reasonable conclusion in all cases.

Annette Brooke: That is quite interesting. My right hon. Friend anticipated my next point, in his usual, instinctive way. The safety issue needs to be revisited over time, because no family is static, and people can go on programmes if there has been concern. It also needs to be revisited because there are additional strains as time goes on and domestic violence may occur when it has not done so in the past.

Safety considerations are also important before going down the mediation route. Mediation has to be the priority. The Government have made a good start. We can criticise the choice—which product the project has been used for and which it has not, but there is now much more emphasis on mediation and an understanding that it has to be better than ending up with warfare and conflict, where the child becomes a pawn. We need to use mediation as an opportunity to strengthen those relationships and make sure that the outcome is best for the child, and does not merely serve the interests of the parents. It might be good for the parent to see the child, but if it involves hundreds of miles of travel, that should be considered. Considering the child first is all-important.

The 10 per cent. of cases that reach the courts are those in which the people need sustained support and help with problem solving. That might seem like a small percentage, but it represents a large number of cases—annually, there are 40,000 applications to the courts over child contact and 70,000 breaches of child contact orders—and that must concern us greatly.

To emphasise the point about early intervention, the consultation document issued by CAFCASS, "Every Day Matters", contains some really good points. It says:

> "CAFCASS (and other agencies) frequently intervene too late, long after parents' attitudes have hardened against one another, or long after one parent has created a new household, excluding their former partner. Indeed, many attitudes have hardened long before the first court application, hence the need for even earlier intervention where possible. Arguments about the fine detail of contact arrangements occupy huge amounts of scarce professional time, often unproductively. Once a court application is made, there is a clear risk of an adversarial model of law being started up".

That illustrates why we have to put such emphasis on early intervention. However, we have also to make information easily accessible. The point was made earlier that that is not always the case—there might be booklets, but they might not be the best format for those who seek to access information. It would be interesting if the Minister would comment on the type of information that is available to parents—whether, for instance, there are videos as well as printed leaflets.

University of East Anglia and other research indicates that many of the parents represented by the 10 per cent. of cases are very young, poorly educated and on low incomes with extremely young children. Partly because of their lack of education, they often find it difficult to communicate not only with each other but with those who try to help them. There might be a deep lack of trust between the parents, a history of violence or poor parenting skills—parenting skills play a very important part in such situations before they become adversarial—giving rise to worries about the vulnerability of the children.

In the draft Children (Contact) and Adoption Bill, the Government attempted to find a different way to resolve the issues. We welcome that, and would like as many as possible to be resolved through mediation, although we agree with the Government that it cannot be made compulsory. One can put two people in a room with somebody, but if they are not prepared to participate, one cannot make it work. However, we support the case for a compulsory referral meeting about mediation. I would be interested to have an update on that. Any meeting would need to take account of the principle that the welfare of the child is paramount.

We have already mentioned the family resolutions pilot project. I know that there was general disappointment when it appeared that very few cases had been referred, because there had almost been a presumption that everybody would be referred to the project. That was not the case. That led me to ask a parliamentary question, in response to which I was told in March 2005 that 71 couples were referred to the pilot project—14, correctly, because of domestic violence. I eventually received a breakdown—it must have been difficult to obtain the figures—and found that 18 parents had already reached agreement and did not need to go, and in one case there was only a residence dispute. So the list went on. We are never going to get 100 per cent. referral, but even 71 cases is a long way from the sort of numbers that we would like to see.

We spoke earlier about the Florida project, comparing it with what the Government are doing. It is important to wait for the full report before reaching too many conclusions about the project. I am supportive of it, although I realise that people may have good reasons for not attending. The report is due to be published in March. Perhaps the Minister can tell us a little more about it before full publication.

It would be helpful if the court application triggered compulsory attendance at the preliminary meeting. At that introductory session—the couple might choose to meet the mediator separately—the options for mediation could be outlined, including offers of other parenting help. That information could be given to the parents face to face, which I suspect would be the most efficient way.

I believe that the first meeting should be free; if not, cost could be a barrier. I understand that couples for whom the mediation is funded must meet, but I do not know what happens if one partner is on legal aid and the other is not. That must be taken into consideration, as it could be another barrier. We need to give couples the greatest possible encouragement to attend that first meeting, and we must try to remove possible barriers.

It would help if that first meeting could be held before going to court. That may cause a little difficulty, but perhaps the court hearing could be postponed. It might cause delay, but an earlier referral meeting might be more productive. I know that judges would like to see CAFCASS engaging in more conciliation.

We have mentioned safety, which is all-important, and mediation, counselling, parenting classes and the other supportive elements, but what about the contact itself? It is difficult to know how big the problem is. It is obviously a high-profile issue. We know that people feel aggrieved, and we have probably all heard stories from friends saying how difficult it is and that, on the surface, they appear to involve genuine grievances. We cannot just brush that aside and say, "Well, it's okay. We are doing all these other things. It's going to be all right." We need to address the question of contact. We should bear in mind the fact that the United Nations convention on the rights of the child says that the child has the right to direct and regular contact with both parents unless it is contrary to the child's best interests.

It is generally acknowledged to be in the child's best interests to sustain a full relationship with both parents. Obviously, in some cases it will not be—for instance, if there a risk of harm. Indeed, we have heard that relationships involving conflict can be immensely damaging for the child caught in the middle. We certainly should not be too prescriptive. I would not like to go down the 50:50 route, saying that that would be a fair starting point, because every case is different. However, I feel that there should be a bit more than we have now. Parents should be able to assume that contact should take place in most cases.

Difficult discussions have taken place on the Floor of the House, and in the other place on consideration of the Children and Adoption Bill. Even Resolution—the new name for the Solicitors Family Law Association—which gave evidence to my right hon. Friend's Committee, appeared to have difficulty with the concept. Its written evidence suggested that there should be a first presumption and then a second presumption—the child first, but a second, lower-order presumption relating to the right to see both parents.

This is a difficult matter, and we need to grapple with it. The Committee made a recommendation to insert a statement into the welfare checklist of the Children Act 1989 that the courts should have regard to the importance of sustaining a relationship between the children and a non-resident parent. That is a valid point, and the Government's response leads me to understand that they will consider it. As the response was printed some time ago, I would like the Minister to tell us whether any progress has been made on that. It seemed from the evidence that people were coming together around that proposal, and that it could actually work.

We are repeatedly told that the assumption of reasonable contact is established in case law, but there is no certainty about that. We should try to find some wording that could be added to the Children and Adoption Bill so that there can be clarity and guidance for parents. However, I accept that discussions in the other place have been difficult. I know that there are lots of booklets; I think that Bridget Lindley is involved in producing booklets. However, I am unsure whether that alone can provide the answer.

My right hon. Friend spoke about bias. With the delays that have occurred in the past, it has been almost a self-generating bias. If the non-resident parent has not had contact for six months or longer, resolution is harder to achieve. The outcome is then almost a self-fulfilling prophecy.

We have been looking at the idea of there being a default model contract arrangement that can be applied in the absence of agreement until an order can first be made—while, of course, also putting in a lot of safeguards. That would give some clarity, so that parents could have a reasonable expectation. Every case will be different, and millions of cases will be considered. The idea is not for there to be a template, which my right hon. Friend's Committee rejected. It would not be as rigid as that; it would just provide something so that the delay can be cut down.

Abuse of children is an important subject, and the Government are committed to tackling it in many ways. It is my impression that in good situations with CAFCASS the views of children are brought in and dealt with very well; the Minister might have more evidence about that. However, I also have the feeling that that is operated patchily in different areas across the country; that is only hearsay—it is not evidence. The ideal is the shared parenting that the report refers to. I like the following quote from "Every Day Matters":

"a separation for adults should not be a separation for children".

That makes us think about things.

Enforcement is an important matter, and the best interests of the child must be considered. It is good that the Government moved to put in other enforcement measures to try to tackle this issue, which has led to much conflict.

On resources, the report contains a telling point. The table on page 20 shows the number of High Court judges in the different divisions, and the percentage increase between 1979 and 2004. There was a 12.5 per cent. increase in the family division, a 54 per cent. increase in the chancery division and a 57 per cent. increase in the Queen's bench division. I am not a lawyer, so will the Minister say whether those figures reflect the growth in casework? Given the resources, surely judge power is important.

We know that delays have been caused because of CAFCASS, which, in "Every Day Matters", is almost putting on a brave face. It says that it does not have enough resources, but that it has proposed new solutions. We must be concerned about resources for CAFCASS. I asked a parliamentary question concerning the average amount that is spent on training for people who work for CAFCASS. Obviously, a number of people are self-employed, but the response showed low figures such as £390. That would not buy many training courses. The figure increased to £600 in one year, but it was back down to about £300 in the last year for which I was given figures. Things have moved forward, with good proposals for the reform of CAFCASS, but I am worried whether it will be adequately resourced.

I agree with everything that was said in the Select Committee report about transparency. We need openness. It will help with the difficult cases that we deal with at our surgeries. When people consider matters unfair, they can challenge them in some way. Although we often focus on the fact that non-resident parents suffer so much, as so many cases show, to balance matters it is interesting to note that, on the other side of the coin, resident parents sometimes become aggrieved when non-resident parents do not turn up on time or do not take the opportunities that are presented to them. To return to my first point, it would be good if comprehensive research were undertaken so that we knew where the greatest problems lie.

3.37 pm

Mr. Oliver Heald (North-East Hertfordshire) (Con): I am pleased that we have had the opportunity to debate such an important issue. I join those who paid tributes to the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) and the other members of the Select Committee for their report "Family Justice: the operation of the family courts". I agreed with much of what the right hon. Gentleman and the hon. Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole (Annette Brooke) said. Relationship education is important, as is access to early intervention. A lack of education and parenting skills is a problem in many cases. It is fair to say that the Minister has a lot of work in progress on the issues set out in the report.

There are now between 150,000 and 200,000 separations a year; 30 per cent. of children are from a family in which there has been a separation. Usually, 80 per cent. of children remain with the mother. There is a lot in what has been said about the need for more information about what happens—particularly to contact—when a family breaks down. I welcome the major worthwhile research projects undertaken by Baroness Ashton about what happens in contact cases. I agree that courts should be the last resort. If mediation, some other form of conciliation or consensus building is possible, that is obviously the best way forward.

My experience of family cases has shown that often those who end up contesting them are people who feel deeply wounded by the facts and reasons for the separation and cannot drag themselves away from the extent to which they consider that they have been wronged in the process. Other issues that must be considered are finance, housing and concerns about security. We should not forget that, although the welfare of the child is paramount in such cases, the parents are vulnerable when the cases come to court or are being sorted out.

It is worth paying tribute to the lawyers, CAFCASS workers and judges who work in the area. Although it is often said that it is an adversarial area, the mood of a family court is different from that in other courts. There is, these days, a mood among family lawyers of wanting to be consensual, to reach agreement and to find a way through a difficult experience for the parties involved. Often, it is not that the lawyers hold things back, but that the parties have no expectation of what the reasonable extent of an argument over contact should be. Often, one party will feel that there should be absolutely no contact, but the other party will feel that there should be a great deal more contact than a court would normally suggest, or that many of us would think was reasonable. Against that background, it is right to consider it a difficult area.

The Green Paper on parental separation, which came out in June 2004, made clear what the extent of the damage can be when parental separation is badly handled. I agree that if an amicable settlement can be reached and both parents are actively involved in the welfare and raising of the child or children, the outcomes for everybody are much better. However, the reality is that an amicable settlement is not always possible. Domestic violence is a concern. There is a problem, as the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed said, of weeding out the cases in which there really is a safety issue from those cases that—although there are depths of despair in the relationship and parties may have come to blows—are different from cases of genuine abuse in which there is a worry and a fear about the safety of the children. It is difficult, without a finding of fact from the judge, to make such an assessment. That is a point that the hon. Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole made.

One of the worries that I have—the right hon. Gentleman made the point—is that there are a lot of delays in the courts. He referred to the Law Society survey that showed that seven out of 10 cases in central London suffer from delays. Some of the examples that were given by the Law Society were rather striking. One case concerned Mrs. B, the mother of an autistic child, whose marriage broke up. She went away for the weekend and the husband built a wall in the family home, separating her from the main part of the house and confining her to a restricted area. She applied for an injunction to protect herself and to make him remove the wall. It took 10 months for the application to be listed. I am sure that the House will agree that that is not an acceptable length of time for such an urgent case. The Law Society has rightly launched a campaign to speed up the listing of family law cases.

There are a lot of reasons why such cases are delayed. One reason—I know that the Government are looking at it—is that many judges have to add family work to their other duties, so that insufficient hours are available for the judges to deal with family cases. Something must be done to tackle that problem. Suggestions have been made that a streamlining of the system and more focus on mediation would improve matters. However, nobody should be in any doubt that it is an urgent problem that must be tackled. Another problem that leads to delays is that contact has become a much wider ambit of actions than it used to be.

When the term access was first used, it was about face-to-face contact between a parent and a child. Courts are interpreting contact to mean everything from a letter once a year, or a birthday or Christmas card, to staying contact, where the child stays overnight with the parent. That is a wide set of disposals. If a contact order is made that involves only writing letters or a phone call, it is inevitable that the parent who wants contact will come back to court. Rather than the court taking one bite at it and giving that sort of contact for a period and then the case coming back to court and another order being made, we should have guidelines under which there can, in more cases, be an escalating schedule of contact that goes from that minimal contact to something more meaningful. I hope that Ministers will consider that in relation to the Bill that is being considered in the House.

As the hon. Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole said, the right to reasonable contact—at the moment, it is a right to contact—is important. She suggested guidelines that fall short of being absolutely set in stone, which the Select Committee does not want, but that are pretty clear. That would be helpful. If the court felt that it was under a duty to make orders that went from something minimal to something more substantive, rather than taking several bites at it, the delays could be less and those who are dissatisfied with the system would feel more satisfied. More substantive orders at an earlier stage would be good for the system generally.

I move to the issue of professional advisers unnecessarily delaying proceedings. That is not really what happens. Obviously, from time to time people say that it happens, but generally, it is the lack of court time and the willingness of courts to make tiny orders on contact rather than more substantive orders that leads to the delays that we have.

The role of CAFCASS has been mentioned. There has been a dire period as far as its work is concerned, but it is crucial, and I hope that some of the difficulties can be resolved. At one time, CAFCASS was devoted to writing long reports at great length. That was such a lengthy process that it gummed up the whole proceedings of the courts. I hope that it will be possible to have shorter, oral reports made in court and a much more problem-solving approach, and that that will lead to CAFCASS being able to do the job more effectively.

Annette Brooke rose—

Mr. Heald: The hon. Lady is probably going to make the point that I was about to make: that we cannot make those changes without proper resources. That is a concern.

Annette Brooke: Does the hon. Gentleman think that CAFCASS is capable of being reformed? Are there signs that we can have some confidence that we should keep that institution?

Mr. Heald: We need to keep the matter under review, but I think that it is making progress. Some of the people who work for CAFCASS are absolute jewels—people who do an incredibly difficult job extremely well, but that has not been the overall perception of the organisation. It is right that we should expect high standards from it, and I certainly do not disagree with the Select Committee report on CAFCASS, which pointed to some appalling problems. As with everything, it is easy to ignore the fact that, in extremely difficult jobs, there will always be people who do not reach the top standard, but we should not forget the ones who do. There are some good people working in the family law arena.

Will the Minister comment on the way in which the courts will be streamlined to reduce delays? Obviously, some cases will have to be determined by the courts, regardless of all activities that are put forward to encourage mediation and the like. Will she confirm that there is no intention to remove the role of judges, district judges and magistrates from the system? Such an assurance would be helpful. There will always be a class of case where they are needed.

The Government also need to concentrate their efforts on issues such as the crisis in legal aid. My hon. Friend the Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Djanogly) asked questions about that last summer and received the reply on 27 June at column 1332W of Hansard that a third of the firms dealing with family law had given up doing legal aid work in the previous five years. That is clearly worrying in terms of access to justice. I would be grateful to hear what the Minister intends to do about it. I know that Lord Carter is examining the issue but, even so, the fall is dramatic.

I am also worried about court fees. This week, the Government have confirmed a massive increase in fees. Parents trying to secure a contact order will have to pay a court fee, which has increased from £30 to £175. On 10 January, the president of the Law Society, Kevin Meehan said:

"This places a heavy burden on low income families who simply want the best for their children. The financial benefits of the courts being self funded have not been demonstrated and so this looks like another stealth tax".

The Law Society is also concerned about two other effects. The first is the effect on the legal aid budget, where there will be less money available for services. The other is the effect on local authorities when they have to apply for a care order. The cost of applying for such an order has increased from £50 to £150—a rise of 200 per cent. It is difficult to work out how that can be in the interests of family justice. I would be grateful to hear the Minister's comments on that.

On the question of mediation, we are not convinced that the family resolutions pilot project is the best way of tacking the issue. We support the idea that there should be early intervention. The well known family barrister, Caroline Willbourne, who is now a district judge, suggested looking to the early interventions project in Florida two or three years ago, which has been mentioned. The essence of it is that couples were shown at an early stage the sorts of orders that a court would make if they did not reach an agreement on contact. They were known as parenting plans and were effective in giving guidance to people about what the reasonable ambit of argument might be. A couple who were not very educated in these matters and who were robustly arguing with one another at least knew what the reasonable area of argument was. It was a successful scheme in Florida. It concentrated minds and gave parents an early idea of the realistic ambit of debate.

Interestingly, the chairman of the Family Law Bar Association, Philip Moor QC, is cited in paragraph 100 of the report. He stated:

"We strongly support the Early Interventions Pilot Project (which has become the Family Resolutions Project). There is a slight problem with that and that is in our view the parenting plans were a good idea and we liked the idea that you have a sort of template for these cases and that the parents that went into the system knew that unless there was something pretty exceptional in the case the template was the sort of order that the court would be thinking of making. We thought that set things out pretty clearly for them at the beginning and that is a project that we would like to see carried through . . . We would like to see the parenting plans in there and we would like it to be pretty well known that that is what the judges are going to do if the mediation breaks down and there are no good reasons for a change from the parenting plans."

Of course, Philip Moor QC is extremely experienced in this area of law. The Minister knows quite a lot about it and is certainly capable of finding out a good deal about it very easily. I do not know if I ought to declare that Caroline Willbourne was in my chambers, but she knows about this area, and so does Mr. Moor. The Minister has good access to people who know about this subject.

If somebody does not understand the system, it is helpful to give them a clue at the beginning of the process about what the sensible area of argument is. I will not go on too much more about it, but it would be worth getting that sorted out.

The parenting plans that the Government have brought forward are worthy, but wishy-washy. The plans say that there is no template for contact, and although they say some good things, they are not really focusing enough to be any use to the practitioner who is talking to a parent when the need is there to explain things in a simple or straightforward way. The point is that it is not being dealt with as the Florida project was.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May), who was dealing with this issue until November, received information in November saying that of the 62 couples who participated in the project from September 2004 to September 2005, only half completed all parts, despite the fact that hundreds of thousands of pounds were devoted to it. If that fact is taken together with the information put forward by the hon. Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole about how few took part, it is a worrying picture for the pilots. Most people who are involved in family law think that there is something there that could be built on, but it is probably a bit more like Florida and a bit less like the family resolutions pilot.

I shall turn now to the question of presumptions. Obviously, the presumption that the welfare of the child is paramount is important and should be the main focus of a child's case. Having said that, however, something needs to be done to get the idea of co-parenting, including contact being reasonable and being expected, and the right of the child, more firmly up the list of things that a judge considers in such cases.

I am not sure that the welfare checklist is enough on its own, so I welcome what the hon. Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole said about the statutory right to reasonable contact being somewhere in the Bill. Something like that would be a good way forward, particularly if it were backed up by the sort of guidelines about which we have been talking.

I think that we could move more in the direction of compulsory mediation and, as far as the court system is concerned, we need to open up the closed doors a bit more. I agree with the Minister that the culture of secrecy has not done much to instil confidence. If we are going to be able to scrutinise this area, something needs to be done. Indeed, something is being done.

The Select Committee concluded that although there is disagreement as to whether all the criticism of the system of family justice is justified, it is widely agreed that reform is needed. We agree with that and look forward to hearing from the Government the full extent of how they intend to proceed. However, we recognise that a lot of what is going on at the moment is work in progress.

3.58 pm

The Minister of State, Department for Constitutional Affairs (Ms Harriet Harman): May I start by thanking the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith), the Chair of the Select Committee on Constitutional Affairs, for his work and for the work that the Committee has done on family justice? Without the work of the Committee, it would be difficult for us to find our way forward.

I say this not as a platitude, but because the Committee's work in this area is essential and without it progress would be incredibly difficult to achieve, not just because this is an area where a lot of professional issues need to be picked through. In a way, that is the fodder for all Select Committees and all Departments. However, this is, possibly uniquely, an area of intense emotional personal conflict, which all of us as Members of Parliament, and our constituents, are engaged with.

When such things happen to families, they are passionately and intensely emotionally concerned, and at a high level of conflict. That feeds into an acrimonious public debate, with accusation and counter-accusation about how the system is working. That being the situation, what is needed, and what we are fortunate in having in the Select Committee, is a place where such issues are brought together on a cross-party basis and where light can be shed without heat, but with commitment and expertise.

Although it is for us as the Government to take responsibility for CAFCASS, the courts and what the courts do operationally, and although we are responsible for bringing legislation to the House, in that highly conflicted atmosphere, the way that the Constitutional Affairs Committee deals with family justice issues gives us an opportunity to make progress that we would not otherwise be able to make. I want to thank the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed for the work of the Committee as I turn to the report that we are discussing.

I shall focus my comments on the four issues that the right hon. Gentleman raised, which are highlighted in the report: openness, enforcement, judicial continuity and delay.

Mr. Beith: I am grateful for the Minister's kind comments. It is worth adding to the list of reasons why the Select Committee process is helpful: thanks to the undertaking we worked out with the previous Lord Chief Justice, the judges are very happy to come to the ordered atmosphere of the Committee and give us the real benefit of their experience so that Parliament can hear what judges, from the High Court to the magistrates court, experienced in dealing with such matters, have to say. We find that hugely beneficial.

Ms Harman: I agree. It is to the Committee's credit that the judges feel confidence in it. By their actions and preparedness to attend, the judges show that the Committee is seen as a space in which people can put forward their views and be listened and responded to in a committed and sophisticated way.

I do not want to pre-empt the debate on Second Reading and in Committee on the Children and Adoption Bill, which will come to the House of Commons shortly. I am not sure that I can add value by rehearsing what will be discussed then. Many important issues will be debated in the context of the clauses of that Bill, and some points to which I do not respond precisely will be the subject of legislation.

However, I shall start by breaking that rule and talking about the paramountcy of the welfare of the child. The Government and I agree with, understand and accept the point made to the Committee by Dame Elizabeth Butler-Sloss, the former president of the family division. We are always tempted to make many things paramount. The Government love to make plenty of things a top priority, and if we counted up our priorities, we would see that they were crowded at the top. However, when judges look at a case, paramountcy needs to mean what it says. A number of things cannot be paramount; if something is paramount, that means it is the top concern. There cannot be two top concerns, only one, and that is the welfare of the child.

We agree with Dame Elizabeth's view on that. The debate around other issues such as the undesirability of contact when violence is involved creates an atmosphere in which light is generally shed before the decision about what is in the best interests of the child is made, as does the debate about the importance of children having contact with both parents, the resident and non-resident. All those things are paramount issues for debate, but when it comes to the process in court, we take the view that we should not disturb Dame Elizabeth's formulation, which is that there is one chief consideration—the welfare of the child—although the other issues are important.

I would like to talk about openness, enforcement and judicial continuity and delay. I start with openness, an issue on which the Select Committee has made a real contribution. I think that openness will make a difference. Family courts are moving inexorably from being completely cloaked in secrecy to being in the open, and the Constitutional Affairs Committee plays a pivotal role in that transition. Let me say why that should be the direction of travel, and why we should move promptly in that direction.

Of course the anonymity of the child will be important, but we know from criminal cases, such as those in which the victim has been subjected to a sexual offence, that it is possible to have open court proceedings with anonymity for the victim. It is possible to have open-court family proceedings with the child remaining anonymous. Actually, that is possible now under the court rules, because the judges always have discretion to waive the automatic presumption of the exclusion of the public and reporting restrictions.

Mr. Heald: The right hon. and learned Lady will agree that it has always been possible to report a family case on appeal because of that power of discretion; all the reports of family cases in law reviews anonymise so that the legal principle can be made public. There is no real reason why that should not happen with other, lower courts.

Ms Harman: Precisely. The hon. Gentleman points to the anomalies, as did the Select Committee. The rules about secrecy and the restriction on reporting and attending family courts are incredibly complex. For a start, that means that they are often breached by accident. Also, it shows that there cannot be huge points of principle involved. Otherwise—the hon. Gentleman rightly alluded to this—why is it possible to report cases, subject to anonymity, in the Court of Appeal and the High Court, but not in the lower courts?

Part of the problem is that the rules change when one goes up to appeal and sideways between different proceedings, so they are complex. It is not just that, as the hon. Gentleman said, the rules are complicated and inconsistent; there are two further reasons why the trajectory away from secrecy to openness is right. First, as is highlighted in the Committee's report, there is a sense in which the secrecy restricts individuals who are parties to the case. It might deter people from seeking the help that they need, if they are not able to talk to people about their case.

The judgment of Mr. Justice Munby in Re B reminded everybody that, before we changed the rules in response to that case, constituents were not allowed to come to see Members of Parliament about such cases. No woman was allowed to come in and say, "Social services have applied to take my children away," because she would have been breaching the law, although it happened all the time as a matter of course, because people wanted help and support. They wanted to share their concerns and air their sense of injustice, but the law prohibited that, which was obviously ridiculous and wrong.

We were all fully aware of the experience of a woman coming in and saying, "My husband's violent, yet the court have ordered contact." I am also aware of men coming in saying, "I never laid a finger on her. The child loves me, but I've been denied contact." However, all that was unlawful under the rules, which were honoured more in the breach than in the observance. The Munby judgment has precipitated a change in that regard.

However, it is not only the issue of who individual parties can speak to that makes openness imperative; there is also the matter of public confidence. The courts and their work have been overlaid with accusation and counter-accusation. For example, there is the accusation that the courts too readily grant contact to violent fathers. However, there is no sense in which anybody can think of anything other than a few anecdotes, because everything is, by definition, secret and private.

The courts then face the opposite accusation—that fathers are denied contact. However, there is no sense in which anybody can rebut that criticism; they cannot know whether, or to what degree, it is right or wrong, or whether everything is perfectly fine. All the judgments are being made with the utmost sensitivity and common sense and on the basis of the evidence, but because they are made behind closed doors, it is impossible to counter the accusations that the courts are not doing justice in the way that we, by law, ask them to. Openness therefore goes hand in hand with public confidence in the justice system. Justice must not only be done, but be seen to be done. It must not be seen to be naming the child or the family, but it must be seen to be done.

With that in mind, we have already changed the rules with regard to Members of Parliament. My noble Friend Baroness Ashton, who takes the lead on these matters in our Department, has announced a public consultation on the issue, prompted by the Select Committee. She intends to publish that consultation in late February or early March, and it is already being worked on. Thereafter, there will be the possibility of rule changes or further legislation. The judiciary are well involved in the discussions, and I am sure that progress can be made.

Of course, it is open to the judiciary to introduce that bit of openness now, under their inherent jurisdiction to decide what goes on in their courts and using their powers to make orders under the various statutes. I therefore think that we shall see openness in the future. The Select Committee has been pivotal in this process and will no doubt remain so.

I find it difficult to disentangle and deal separately with the questions of enforcement and delay. On enforcement, public confidence and justice reside not in a court order being made, but in that order being carried out. Therefore, public confidence will not attach to a justice system if it makes the right order, but that order is not carried out. We are in no doubt about the importance of enforcement. The Bill will deal with some enforcement issues and with the remedies that will be available to the courts. Those remedies will stop short of imprisonment, but they will add to the courts' ability to ensure that orders are enforced.

One of the key issues raised earlier was the frustration of orders as a result of delays. Such delays mean that it becomes more difficult as time goes by to make the order that one might have made had the case come to court earlier. Prompt hearings and enforcement therefore go absolutely hand in hand. The current president of the family division is greatly concerned that there should be an urgent hearing to review a case within 10 working days when contact has not taken place as ordered. The next question is how often that happens. What matters is not what is in the guidance or the orders, but what happens. We will get back to the Committee in due course about the effect of that guidance and how much it can be kept to, which is critical.

Mr. Heald: One of the points that Lord Howe made in the other place—it is all there in Hansard—is that his research shows that the outcome of about a quarter of contested cases does not involve face-to-face contact. A contact order may be made for a letter or Christmas card, or there may be no contact order at all, but a quarter of all cases seems to be a very large number. On the question of delay, does the Minister agree that one problem is that courts are making orders that are too insubstantial to start with, and that there should be a schedule of contact that escalates to substantive contact, so that there is no temptation constantly to return to court to ask for a little more?

Ms Harman: As I said, what is important is the ability to return to court if that is necessary for enforcement. The hon. Gentleman's point will be discussed further when the Bill comes to this House, as it involves the substance as opposed to the process, but I will give the Committee further information when we can see to what extent cases—the vast majority, I hope—operate within 10 working days.

Two causes of delay have been mentioned. One is the London problem and the other is the question of insufficient judge days being available and not enough judges being appointed to the High Court. There is a particular problem in certain parts of inner London that besets many public services there. The question is whether we can take advantage of extra capacity, or at least of capacity that is available further away, the extent to which it is difficult to solve the recruitment and retention problems in inner London, and whether we are making best use of the capacity that is within travelling distance, perhaps just on the outskirts of London. There is also the question of using specialist family magistrates who have the capacity to deal with such cases. As I said, we are conducting pilots in London in which cases are moved to courts that have capacity.

Mr. Beith: We were quite surprised to find only one magistrates court judge—or stipendiary magistrate, as we would call them—engaged full-time on family work in the country. One or two more such appointments might help to deal with the situation in inner London.

Ms Harman: I might write to the right hon. Gentleman and copy my response on whether that position has changed to other Members who are in the Chamber.

Another matter referred to by the Committee is the problem of judicial continuity, and therefore of delay and enforcement. The process will take longer if the judge has to read all the papers from scratch, and enforcement will be more effective if the judge has a deeper understanding of the case because he has been involved with it from the outset.

There has been a view that a grip needs to be taken by good case management at the earliest possible stage, and that there should be judicial continuity. The president's private law programme also issued guidance on that in January 2005. The question is whether the rate of judges per case is unacceptably high, and whether the measures that have been taken for good case management are working to bring down the number of judges in any one case.

I have agreed with the president of the family division, in direct response to the point made by the Constitutional Affairs Committee about judicial continuity, that we should do a quick dip sample to tell us the rate of judges per case in five court centres. We shall provide the Committee with that information and measure it again in due course to give us a sense of the numbers. Otherwise, as the Committee heard, there is concern about judicial continuity, but no sense of whether it is very bad only in some cases, or is a problem in all, or of whether it is getting better or worse. That has been a helpful prompt to some progress on that matter.

As to the matter of a sufficient number of judges, we have just completed a review of the work of the High Court and are consulting on proposals to make better use of High Court judges. It is clear that a good proportion of the cases that go to the High Court could be heard by circuit and district judges. We must deal with capacity and allocation, and the question of whether work that circuit judges are doing could go to magistrates if there is sufficient capacity.

The right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed and the hon. Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole (Annette Brooke) raised the issue of domestic violence. Obviously, every case must be judged on its merits; in questions of contact, the interest of the child is paramount and the facts of the case must dictate the outcome. However, we now understand that it is very unlikely, in cases that involve domestic violence by the father against the mother, that the child is not affected. It is most likely that the child witnesses the violence. All too often, the child is physically caught in the crossfire. Even if the child does not witness the violence, they are in a room nearby and hear it.

It used to be said that if a woman was being beaten by her husband, she should stay with him for the sake of the children. We have thought better of that and decided that, more often than not, children will be damaged by being brought up in a household where there is domestic violence, not least because fear is ever present in such households. Being brought up by a mother who lives in fear for her physical safety must have an effect.

A good friend of mine, talking about the domestic violence suffered by her mother at the hands of her father, said that when her father came home from work, she and her mother would listen to the sound of his key in the lock, because that would tell them whether the mother was going to get a beating. Even on the days when she did not, and the key went smoothly into the lock, with no sense of anger or whatever was conveyed by its sound, there was still fear. Much of the work that has been done has been to recognise not only the higher than previously acknowledged prevalence of domestic violence, but its effect on children.

I speak of a father being violent to a mother because for the most part that is what happens. It is not a 50:50 split between mothers being violent to fathers and fathers to mothers, as one can tell from the homicide statistics. Obviously, everything else is subject to reporting vagaries, but one thing that is not subject to those vagaries is the homicide statistics, as one can count the bodies and look at the gender. Domestic violence and the overwhelming majority of domestic homicides and injuries that are serious enough to put the victim in hospital are still mostly perpetrated by men against women.

We were asked about the monitoring and evaluation of the gateway forms. At present, we need sufficient cases to get a sense of how things are working, what are the outcomes and what orders are made.

On mediation, we all say that we wish that we could force people to agree with each other and we all know as we say it that it is a contradiction in terms. The hierarchy of desirability is, first, that parents agree, which is in their best interests and, of course, those of the child, and that they never go near the family justice system; secondly, that the parents seek mediation if they cannot agree; thirdly, that there is a court process; fourthly—the least desirable—that there is a court process followed by enforcement proceedings. We are all on the same page in that respect and there is a healthy ferment of discussion about the best way to proceed.

Mr. Heald: Although it is impossible to force people to agree, it is important for there to be some pressure for them to talk at an early stage. If they do not talk to each other, they tend to talk to other people, often those who do not have much clue about how these matters should be resolved. They make allegations to their lawyer that the lawyer then makes to the lawyer on the other side; it goes round in a great circle. The allegations that they make and the things that they say are not necessarily what they would wish to say face to face to the other party. To avoid the hardening of attitudes, it is useful to get in early and make them talk.

Ms Harman: I can only agree that mediation or conciliation is needed at the earliest possible moment. The effect of being involved in a court process can often harden attitudes the further things go on, and we want to counter that. It was the theme of the Green Paper that we published in July 2004, which focused on resolving matters before people are at daggers drawn in court, and as the hon. Gentleman said, on ensuring that an even smaller minority go to court, because issues are satisfactorily resolved in other ways.

There is no instant solution and no single way of doing things. We must look at international experiences, as the hon. Gentleman advised. That is a good suggestion; we must consider practice and pilots. We all agree what the outcome should be, but we must keep looking at what actually works.

The capacity of CAFCASS was raised and the Chairman of the Select Committee spoke about the changes in CAFCASS and the work of his Committee in highlighting the problems that exist. I join the hon. Member for North-East Hertfordshire (Mr. Heald) in acknowledging, as the Committee does, that it is a really important area of work. There are some extraordinarily dedicated people working in this difficult field and they have to take a great deal of responsibility. However, we cannot just say, "This is important work and people are doing a heroic job," and not ask ourselves whether the system is as good as we know it must be for the sake of children and families.

The question of resources has been raised. I am glad to hear that the hon. Member for North-East Hertfordshire is in full-on spending mode. Clearly the new broom of the Tory Leadership—[Interruption.] I thought that the hon. Gentleman was arguing for reduced court fees and increased spending on conciliation and CAFCASS. Clearly I got that wrong.

Mr. Heald: It is important to recognise the situation that people going to the family courts are in. The Lord Chancellor made some concession to that in his statement earlier this week. My points were about the way in which the court fees are dealt with. It is right to give particular attention to the family courts when it comes to trying to keep the fees at a reasonable level. I would be amazed if the Minister were about to tell us that she is not going to give sufficient funds to CAFCASS.

Ms Harman: It clearly was a mistake for me to go off the rails and make a spiteful party political point. I regret it. The hon. Gentleman is right, of course. CAFCASS was allocated a budget of £107 million, a £12 million—12.6 per cent.—increase over its 2003–04 budget, particularly so that the backlog of unallocated cases, which the Constitutional Affairs Committee drew attention to, could be cleared. It was decided to sustain that increase in 2005–06 because we know that resources are an issue.

Everybody has acknowledged that there is a great deal of work in progress, so let me finish where I started, by assuring hon. Members of the Government's concern about the issue, our commitment to dealing with it and our continued focus on it. However, we accept that our ability to take work forward in this area is not only informed but enormously helped by the approach of the Constitutional Affairs Committee and the climate that it has created, as well as its detailed, specific suggestions. Therefore, I should like to thank all those—many of them, as has been pointed out, no longer Members of the House—who were involved in preparing the report. I look forward to more good work from the Committee in future.

4.33 pm

Mr. Beith: With the leave of the House, I should like to take a moment to thank the Members who have participated today. They might have been few in number, but they are high in quality and in their commitment to the subject. My hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole (Annette Brooke) ranged over many of the issues that I had raised plus one or two others, and the hon. Member for North-East Hertfordshire (Mr. Heald), speaking on behalf of his party, reflected his personal knowledge and experience in a constructive way.

Not only has this debate been constructive, but the process in which we are engaged is constructive too. We are egging the Government on to pay extra attention to issues that we all think are important and need attention. We are reviewing what the Government have done so far, and saying what we hope they will do in the near future, alongside the judiciary and agencies such as CAFCASS, and we are trying, as the Minister kindly said, to channel the emotions and anxieties that attend such matters into an effort to get the system to work for children. That is what this is all about.

The Minister has said that a number of issues will best be resolved when she and her hon. Friends come to address us about the Children and Adoption Bill on Second Reading and in Committee. Some of them may be the issues on which we feel that we have not got much further today; perhaps we will do so then.

Let me pick up on a few of those issues. I am still not clear about the Government's thinking on what to do, having recognised that one cannot have two legal presumptions. The paramountcy of the welfare of the children cannot be disturbed by an alternative presumption. That is my view, that of my Committee and that of the Minister. But how do we best reflect the United Nations charter right that the child should have the opportunity of contact with both parents? It is in the interests of the child in most cases for that to happen. By what process can we best do that? We used the Children Act welfare checklist, but other suggestions have been made. We need to clarify how best we can achieve that. I still need to know where Government thinking is going on how far we can get people to the table to consider mediation, using an element of compulsion to get them to that point. That will come up in the context of the Bill.

There are one or two other issues where we want to hear more about progress, but we have had some definite announcements today. For example, the transparency consultation paper will come out at the end of February or the beginning of March. We have had a helpful indication that there will be a sampling of what happens in five court centres on the continuity of judges. That, too, is very helpful. We have had an indication that the Minister will get back to the Committee on whether the system is getting cases back into court within the 10 days that we want to achieve. Those are all positive steps forward. They illustrate a constructive process, which will go on.

There are a few aspects of this matter that have passed beyond the remit of my Committee: the primary responsibility for CAFCASS now rests with the Minister for Children and Families, who has been moved since we started all this into the Department for Education and Skills and therefore to some extent into the purview of that Select Committee. We have continued to be interested because CAFCASS is a servant of the courts for which the Department for Constitutional Affairs is responsible. We will certainly continue to take an interest in these matters, as will the hon. Members who have spoken today. I am grateful to everyone for their participation in this process.

Question put and agreed to.

Equity Release Schemes

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Roy.]

9.30 am

Mr. George Mudie (Leeds, East) (Lab): It is a particular pleasure to speak for the first time under your illustrious chairmanship, Sir Nicholas, and an honour that I did not think would befall me in Parliament.

I am delighted to have the opportunity to discuss equity release schemes and their regulation. I would like to thank the numerous people and organisations who contacted me to offer assistance and information, and I congratulate the Consumers Association on its recent Which? report. It seems to have ruffled some feathers in the financial industry, particularly among some providers, but it offered an objective study and a warning to anyone who is tempted by the often inappropriate marketing of such products.

The products are aimed mainly—I shall touch on that later—at the retired or soon to be retired, and fall into two main types. With lifetime or roll-up mortgages a loan is secured against the home and interest is charged, but not collected until the borrower dies or goes into care and the property is sold. With home reversion schemes the provider takes a share or all of the property in return for a lump sum, the owner continues to live in the house and, when it is sold, the provider takes its share of the property at the full market price.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): I echo my hon. Friend's praise for the Which? report, and also praise that by Age Concern. He referred to reversion and roll-up mortgages, and the number of reversion mortgages has declined significantly but roll-up mortgages continue to increase in number. Is he concerned that if a 70-year-old widow sold 30 per cent. of her equity, she would have a debt that would wipe out the value of the home at the end of just 20 years? Many women today live to the age of 90 or more.

Mr. Mudie: I share my hon. Friend's concern about the financial effects, and I will deal with them later. I am also greatly concerned about the surge of home reversion sales this year, which means that the market balance is changing.

This subject was last discussed in 2003, when neither of the two main types of equity release were covered by regulation. Since then the Government have moved to deal with lifetime mortgages, which have been regulated since 2004. Although home reversion schemes are still not regulated, the primary legislation went through the House in December 2005, just before the recess, and we await the decision of the Financial Services Authority as to when it will trigger the cover.

The objectives of the financial measures should be non-controversial. As is recognised in the debate on pensions, people are living longer and often find that their income is insufficient to meet their needs. It is not difficult to understand that the need for capital may arise, perhaps to fund home improvements, house repairs or even— although this is doubtful—a new car. People who have paid off their mortgage have considerable equity in their homes, and the schemes are designed to release that equity. Estimates of the available equity in the homes of the age group being targeted are in the range of £700 billion to £1,100 billion. That is the market that is being targeted. Only £4.6 billion has been taken up in schemes to date, so the extent of the opportunity becomes clear, in a market that could be as high as £1,100 billion.

The actuarial profession has issued two reports on the subject and suggests that take-up will increase from 6 per cent. to 15 per cent. within the relevant group, but others suggest an increase to four times the present level. That covers a tremendous number of elderly people.

Clearly, the opportunity to release some of the money tied up in a home to provide greater financial freedom for the elderly makes sense. However, as always when large amounts of money are involved, there are dangers for consumers. The 2003 debate took place against the background of an unregulated market, or perhaps a confused market with so many regulators that the matter sometimes fell between regulators, and no one picked up the difficulties. There was also a background of very bad schemes and inappropriate sales. The main demand was for the Government to empower the FSA to take over the regulation. That has largely been met, so why have a debate now?

There is no doubt that things have got better. Regulation is clear and schemes have been developed, but there is, understandably, great concern and nervousness about the products and whether they are being appropriately sold. The Minister could take the line that the products are regulated by the FSA, so what more is there to do? Knowing him as I do, I am sure that he will not say that, but other Ministers could take that line.

Let us look at the concern and nervousness. The major reason for it is that the target group is elderly and includes some of the most vulnerable people. If a younger person makes a bad or inappropriate financial decision, they can recover, but for the elderly on low incomes there is no way back. There is also concern that people who have worked all their lives to buy their house can see that asset drain away as the charging system operates.

In the current discussion, it must be understood that equity release is complex, long-term and a scheme of last resort. Customers should not enter into such schemes without fully understanding the extensive financial effects and, as the Consumers Association stated, should be aware of the possible effects on other benefits being claimed or to be claimed, and on tax, as well as the problems that could arise for people who downsize and move house, or remarry, or even if a member of the family moves back into the family home.

To touch on the more tangible financial effects of the two schemes, with a lifetime or roll-up mortgage the lump sum is paid immediately with no repayments. It should be realised and understood that the interest charge may be as high as 7 per cent. and compounded monthly or annually. Someone who borrows £20,000 would find that after 10 years the repayment would be around £40,000, and after 20 years would rise to around £80,000. The FSA—the regulator itself—gives the example of Hilda, who takes out a roll-up mortgage of £45,000 with a fixed interest rate of 7 per cent. When she dies 10 years later, the lender receives back the original loan plus the rolled-up interest, which totals £88,522. Her family receive the balance from the sale of the home, but 10 years after a £20,000 loan she is charged £88,500.

The financial effect of a home reversion can be equally disturbing. Someone who sells 50 per cent. of their property receives less than market value for that half in the first instance, and all future increases in value are shared with the provider. The FSA gives the example of George—it is certainly not me, because he is 68—who enters a home reversion scheme. He sells half his home for a lump sum of £20,000, which is 40 per cent. of the market value of the half share. When George dies 15 years later, his home is worth £150,000 and the provider—the company—takes £75,000 for that £20,000 loan. Such details of how compound interest eats into the value of a property may mean good business for the lender, but are chilling to the objective onlooker, especially if people who are not entirely clear about the costs and consequences involved.

All those schemes would be acceptable to the regulator, provided that the company had fully explained and advised the old person. Considering that most of the firms involved are household names, one would think that that could be guaranteed, yet the FSA found some worrying practices when it sent people to pose as customers. Mystery shoppers spoke to independent financial advisers and direct sales company providers. The FSA asked whether the question,

"Were you asked if you had considered alternative methods of raising funds?"

had been asked. It is important, as this is a last-resort product. Customers should be asked whether other things such as downsizing, the local authority, banks and so on had been tried. Seventy-seven per cent. said that the independent advisers had not asked that key question for determining the product's suitability for an elderly person. They had not been asked whether they had considered alternative methods. The figure is worse for the direct sales companies: 83 per cent. did not ask.

When the FSA asked,

"Were the disadvantages of equity release explained?"

38 per cent. said that the independent financial advisers had not explained them, and 67 per cent. said that companies with household names had not explained them.

There were many other questions. The conventional wisdom, according to the mystery shopping survey, is that 70 per cent. of the individuals posing as customers were not asked about their financial situation, yet 77 per cent. were told by independent financial advisers, and 83 per cent. were told by direct sales companies, that they were eligible for equity release. If those people do not ask for information that, clearly, the majority of elderly customers are not asked for, they cannot look the customer in the eye and say that they are or are not suitable for equity release. The work that the FSA would demand simply had not been done.

David Taylor: My hon. Friend paints a vivid and bleak picture of what is happening with mortgages and reversions. Does he agree that a smallish minority of firms encourage the elderly to borrow more than they need? That drives up the charges that they pay and, of course, lines the pockets of a small group of advisers. Is that not reprehensible? Should the FSA step in there when it eventually produces a regulatory scheme?

Mr. Mudie: As usual, my hon. Friend anticipates an important point that I planned to make. I shall take the opportunity of his intervention to confirm that, for example, Norwich Union requires those who apply for one of the equity release schemes to borrow a minimum amount. Indeed, that is the situation with most, if not all, the providers. Someone may need only £2,000 or £3,000, but they have to take £15,000, £20,000—or, in an example that I have, even £25,000—over a long term. The time ticks away and the amount doubles in 10 years; it is quite frightening.

Clearly, the figures produced by the mystery shoppers suggest that the customer's specific needs are not being investigated. As such products should be taken up only as a last resort, the fact that in too many cases advisers make no real effort to satisfy themselves that the customer has exhausted every consideration, and that equity release is the only way forward, means that the potential for mis-selling is arising, if it has not already arisen.

The other sad thing about those details is how badly direct sales compare even with the less than satisfactory advice being given by independent financial advisers. The mystery shopping exercise has resulted in solicitors who deal with equity release being advised in a training course to refer any client who has been involved in a direct sale by the producer to an independent financial adviser immediately.

All this information raises a series of questions for the Minister. As mystery shopping demonstrated that complex high-risk products—the FSA's description, not mine—are being sold unsatisfactorily under regulated circumstances, what conversations has the Treasury had with the FSA about putting an end to such practices? Will the Minister discuss with the FSA what follow-up is taking place with the advisers and firms that perform so badly? Will random checks be made with customers to determine whether such practices took place in actual sales?

The Minister should consider how any delay in the FSA's becoming proactive on the checks may allow firms to avoid action. With mis-selling of endowments, not only were paper records available, but in most cases customers could advance arguments and describe the selling experience. With equity release, the elderly person may not have told his or her family what they signed up for, and it is only when the person has died and the estate is wound up that the existence of the contract becomes apparent. The customer would not be there to describe what happened, and the firm would be in a stronger position to deny mis-selling. Random checks seem the least that the FSA can do. Can the Minister can comment on that?

I congratulate the Government and the Minister on introducing primary legislation on home reversion so promptly in December, but the latest word is that the FSA will not begin regulation until 2007—and that is on home reversion, which is an even fiercer instrument than the roll-up mortgage. I have been told that the timetable is in the hands of the Treasury. Can the Minister tell us whether that is so, and in view of the upsurge in sales of home reversion schemes, can he promise that he will take all steps possible to expedite the start of regulation?

It is almost universally accepted that greater than ever care must be taken with the selling of such products, in view of the vulnerability of the target group. Schemes in the late 1980s and 1990s were ill designed, and are a source of customer unease even today. There is a lack of confidence that providers appreciate the need to ensure that this financial product, which is probably the most sensitive one on the market, is sold only to the most appropriate people. The sort of hard-nosed behaviour illustrated by the mystery shopping exercise, the response to the Which? report and the way in which the industry defends stories such as the one in The Mail on Sunday last week—in which an astonishing interest rate of 367 per cent. was charged, and defended, by a household-name firm—leads the public to worry whether their trust that the elderly are in safe hands is correct.

I suggest that the Minister has immediate discussions with the FSA to agree steps towards telling the industry that investor confidence has been damaged too much in the past few years and that the mis-selling of such products is banned. It should be said that the remedy will be not only compensation but the stiffest financial penalties, and even the barring of firms whose selling of this product is found wanting. That is the least that we can do, bearing in mind the sensitivity of the product and the vulnerability of so many of the customers.

I shall quickly draw the Minister's attention to some other aspects of the sale of such products. I have concentrated my remarks on how important it is that they must not be mis-sold by giving bad advice to the elderly. The way in which the schemes are marketed is also very relevant—not only to the elderly. Norwich Union has been running an advert seeking to sell its product to people at the tender age of 55. My hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) obviously comes into this category, so he should perk up—[Interruption.] Or is he 45?

In The Times on Saturday, Norwich Union ran an advert headed "Over 55? Thinking of equity release?" An attractive lady is pictured next to the heading, "New York? New car? Something for the family?" On visiting the website, it transpires that someone of 55 can get a loan for all those purposes, but the minimum loan appears to be an index-linked lifetime mortgage of £25,000. The Mail on Sunday the week before showed a gentleman of 55 in the same advert. According to actuarial tables, a lady of 55 can look forward to being around until she is 85, with a bit of luck, so this trip to New York, the new car or something for the family could end up costing her between £100,000 and £200,000, if we take the amount of compound interest and double up over 30 years. That is a staggering sum.

Is the Minister content that a provider such as Norwich Union is selling such schemes to someone with five or 10 working years remaining? Would it make financial sense for this lady to commit herself to a possible 30-year loan—for an amount that she clearly does not need to pay for the items mentioned—instead of taking out a perfectly straightforward bank loan? If Norwich Union were doing its job and if someone of 55 asked for an equity release, they would be directed to another product straight away. It is clearly not appropriate for someone to sign up for this product when they have the possibility of earning additional income through work.

David Taylor: I saw that advert, and I can also confirm that I am in that age category. Should it not be headed, "Philippines and Hawaii at 55: poverty and homelessness at 85"? That is the roll-up impact of such loans, is it not?

Mr. Mudie: My hon. Friend talks perfect sense. What he describes is a real worry.

In case I am accused of being unfair to Norwich Union, I shall mention another household name: that of Prudential. The Pru is seen—probably deservedly—as a more enlightened provider, which is new to the market. It has an attractive draw-down scheme. Such schemes work on the basis that one can avoid the doubling of interest over 10 years by taking out the money in bits, so people are not charged for the parts of the loan that they do not need at the time. In other schemes they have to take out the whole loan because there is a minimum amount: they may need £5,000, but they have to take £25,000.

On its website, the Pru has an attractive draw-down scheme, which, instead of saddling customers with a big loan with compound interest, allows them to take the money in bits. The only drawback appears to be that the minimum amount that they can borrow is £20,000, so they would have to take a large amount overall. They can take more—the Pru will set a maximum sum and they can draw money up to that amount—but in the first instance they have to take £20,000, and over 10 years, the customer will have to pay back £40,000.

The last point that I want to raise with the Minister relates to the uncertainty in the market about whether the industry can discipline itself to act sensitively on appropriate sales. One of the main reasons for seeking a loan is for house repairs or improvements. Will the Minister begin discussions with the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister and local authorities to see whether the initiatives launched by councils to formulate loan schemes, often as a replacement for grant schemes that have been withdrawn, are worthy of encouragement and wider publicity?

If the Minister contacts Which?, he will be provided with a list of interesting initiatives around the country on the basis of which it would be easy to produce a scheme that could be put into the public domain, which would lead private providers to behave more sensibly.

In his pre-Budget report, the Chancellor introduced measures to encourage pensioners to install central heating and energy conservation in their homes. If a scheme could be introduced that meant pensioners did not have to take a chance on such costly, uncertain, long-term commitments as equity release to have urgent repairs or improvements carried out, it might mean that only those who genuinely understood the schemes and their consequential costs would use equity release.

However inadequate my remarks, I hope that I have put across the danger of those products—or, as the FSA describes it, the "high risk" of them. It is a great concern that firms market them as easy, almost painless ways of buying luxuries. Above all, the evidence of products being sold without the customer—who is sometimes frail or vulnerable—being fully advised should be deeply worrying to everyone connected with the product. There is a role for such schemes, but I fear that at this moment in the development of schemes, a number of ordinary decent people are being harmed. That should be made public, and should be addressed.

9.58 am

Dr. Vincent Cable (Twickenham) (LD): I congratulate the hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Mudie) on raising this subject, not least because it affects substantial numbers of our constituents. I have had some appalling cases, as he has, and it is absolutely right that they be brought to light. Where the Government can help, they should. I have the slight advantage of having participated in the original debate in 2003 when the Minister's predecessor, who is now the Secretary of State for Education and Skills, led for the Government.

The context, as the hon. Member for Leeds, East has reminded us, is that there was no regulation of this market at all at that stage, in respect of either lifetime mortgages or home reversion. What there was, and is, is a self-regulating scheme called the SHIP—safe home income plans—scheme, which is important because it protects customers at the moment, until the new regulation comes into effect, which may well not be until 2007. Although it gives some credit to the better firms in the industry that have subscribed to the agreement and offers some protection from negative equity, it is seriously flawed in all sorts of ways. It offers very partial coverage and provides compensation that is far less than would be available through the financial ombudsman system. There is no monitoring, and no sanctions for companies in the industry that break the rules.

The structure of self-regulation was flimsy and it was clearly right to move on from it, which the Government have done. Lifetime mortgages are now regulated by the FSA, and when the Regulation of Financial Services (Land Transactions) Act 2005 comes into effect, it will cover home reversion too.

My second introductory point echoes the point made by the hon. Member for Leeds, East in his introductory remarks. In principle, there is nothing wrong with equity release; indeed, the concept is attractive in many ways. Many people in our society are asset-rich and income-poor. If market mechanisms can be developed to turn assets into income, we should welcome that. Indeed, Lord Turner, in his report, drew attention to the potential of equity release as a partial solution to the long-term problems of pensions. As the hon. Gentleman emphasised, the vast potential has not even begun to be tapped. Total domestic property assets are worth some £2.2 trillion, and probably half of that, as he said, is realisable under equity release. However, less than 0.25 per cent. of the market has manifested itself in equity release products, so the market is very under-developed, but it has a lot of potential if things are done properly, which involves regulation.

I shall raise a series of issues with the Minister. The first and most important question, which the hon. Member for Leeds, East touched on, is what happens now. The Government's responsibility will be to introduce secondary legislation, and the FSA's responsibility will be to consult on the detail of regulation. That process poses a series of questions, some of which I shall list.

The first question has already been mentioned: what happens in the intervening period? It may be as long as two years before the regulations come into effect, and during that time people will be unprotected. I imagine that at the very least, the Government can give us some assurance about the speed with which the secondary legislation will be introduced, and urge the FSA to get on quickly with its consultative process. Another way of dealing with the matter, which would give confidence to people in the industry and borrowers, would be for the Government to give an assurance that the protection provided by the new regulation could be backdated, possibly to the date on which the existing lifetime mortgage regulation came into effect, or at the very least, to the point at which the new legislation on home reversion was introduced in the House. If that was available, some of the anxieties about the long hiatus would be dissipated.

The second set of questions relates to the scope of the regulations when they are introduced, a matter on which the Minister will be reflecting. The National Consumer Council has produced an extremely good report, posing some of the technical questions that will have to be addressed at the next stage. It asks, for example, whether there should be limitations on protection under the legislation in respect of age. Should this option be simply for older people, or for everyone? I think that the NCC concluded that it should be for everyone; an age division would be arbitrary. What would happen if one person in a household was 65 and their partner 55? Absurd situations would be created.

The NCC also raises the question whether there should be a de minimis provision. I am talking about people being able to raise small amounts of equity to go on holiday, rather than going for this option as a big savings decision. That should not necessarily be discouraged by complex and costly regulation. The NCC makes the point that an arbitrary limit would be easily abused by unscrupulous providers and probably is not practical, but it would be interesting to have the Minister's preliminary thoughts on that question.

A third issue relating to the forthcoming secondary legislation is value for money. Do the Government intend some protection to be built into the system to ensure not merely that people are not ripped off, but that they get genuine value for money in the transactions? There are various questions about that, one of which is whether there should be a stipulation that an equity release transaction should be accompanied by independent valuation—valuation by an independent valuer rather than by someone from the provider. That seems quite a sensible provision.

Various other arguments have been advanced, such as that there should be a minimum threshold for the cash released from a scheme. Should that be specified in the regulations? The conclusion of those who have considered the matter is that that simply is not possible, because there are many different dimensions to the cost of a home reversion scheme, and all that can realistically be demanded of providers is full transparency.

A fourth set of questions relates to compensation, and how much there will be. Will it be £100,000, which I think is the Financial Ombudsman Service limit, or, probably more plausibly, should it be equivalent to the compensation available to people under the existing regulations for mortgages—or should it be another amount?

Those are the questions that I wanted to pose on the follow-up to the new legislation, the secondary legislation and the FSA rules. I shall conclude with a series of broader questions about where all this leaves us. First, there are unresolved questions about the lifetime mortgage regulation. Although the regulation is now in place, it is beginning to emerge that there is a lack of clarity about certain points. As I understand it, the lifetime mortgage regulation protects consumers from negative equity, but in practice the definition of negative equity has proved rather difficult to pin down. Some customers find themselves in a serious net debt position, although theoretically they are protected.

Another big issue is retrospection for people who have suffered from shared appreciation mortgage mis-selling. I have dealt with two such cases in my constituency—appalling cases of people who were blatantly mis-sold products by Barclays or the Bank of Scotland. I think that there were two particular sub-products in their range, in respect of which quite sophisticated people, who had studied the small print carefully, had a very firm impression of their maximum exposure to risk of loss of capital value under the appreciating mortgage. The banks interpreted that in a totally different way, and their interpretation was utterly lacking in transparency.

Those people have never been able to obtain redress. They are not covered by the new mortgage regulation, because what occurred was before the relevant time, and the banks' own self-regulation scheme does not cover them. The banks involved have refused to accept that they have any liability, and some people have lost enormous sums of money because of a not terribly reputable set of arrangements. I wonder whether the Government feel that they have any responsibility for trying to secure some justice for the people concerned.

The second broad issue was raised, rightly, by the Minister's colleagues when we had the debate on home reversion protection. The good point was made that when one set of products is regulated and another is not, the more unscrupulous providers in the industry tend simply to migrate from one to the other. One of the main reasons why home reversion protection was introduced was to stop that happening. Now that that loophole has been plugged, the industry will migrate elsewhere.

In some bits of the property market there is a serious lack of protection for consumers, the most obvious of which—I encounter a lot of these cases, perhaps because I represent a relatively prosperous part of south-west London—are the so-called property investment clubs, whereby many people are seduced into parting with large amounts of money as a result of totally specious arguments about the endless appreciation of the property market. All kinds of scams will emerge, and people will lose large amounts of money. It is a completely unregulated market, and the FSA is reluctant to take responsibility for it. Are the Government considering the possibility of being proactive on that matter?

The third general point was touched on by the hon. Member for Leeds, East—the relationship with the benefits system. It matters enormously to an individual whether the income that they derive from the liquidation of capital is counted, or how the capital is treated, from the point of view of savings disregards under the pension credit system, and the benefits system more generally.

The arguments are extremely complex, and I do not want to make a political point about them. I wonder whether it might be helpful for the Minister, in conjunction with the Department for Work and Pensions, to publish a note describing the relationship between the benefit system and equity release, and whether there is any need for reform. I am not proposing anything; I am just suggesting to the Government that there is an issue that somebody needs to address comprehensively.

My final point, which the hon. Member for Leeds, East made effectively, is about advice. Large numbers of financial advisers, who vary enormously in quality and integrity, are simply not in a position to give quality advice on this matter Because they have never been trained, they do not understand the complexities of the benefits system, and ultimately, they have an interest in selling products. They do not have an interest in telling people to find a simpler solution such as trading down. As a result, people often receive bad advice. The hon. Gentleman's implication was that the way to deal with that problem is through the framework of regulation. That may be appropriate, and the advisory process may need regulation, but I have a slightly different take on the matter.

I thought that the Treasury would broadly agree with the view, which I have expressed for many years, that some kind of independent pro bono system of advice is needed, so that people can go along to a body, be it a citizens advice bureau or some other organisation with no axe to grind, and obtain a financial health check. They should be able to go to an adviser who has no interest in the transaction for some simple, common-sense advice, and ask: "Do I trade down my house, or do I buy a home reversion product? Do I use cash to pay off my debts? What is a sensible way to approach my family finances?"

I debated the matter with the Minister's predecessor. Three years ago the Government were thinking about putting certainly some energy and possibly some money into a national roll-out of independent financial advice centres, which would provide such advice in order to avoid the difficulties that the hon. Member for Leeds, East so eloquently described. I hope that the Minister will be able to provide answers to the, regrettably, rather large number of questions that I have put to him.

10.12 am

Mr. Mark Hoban (Fareham) (Con): I join the hon. Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable) in congratulating the hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Mudie) on securing this important debate, and on the way in which he introduced it. He rightly pointed out that the schemes exist to address a need. Many pensioners who find themselves asset rich but income poor look for some form of financial security by trying to use the equity in their house.

The hon. Member for Leeds, East was right to point out the complexity of the schemes, the problems that people have understanding them and the need to ensure that consumers understand their consequences. One duty of the Financial Services Authority is the promotion of financial literacy and education. It is important that consumers understand the product, and are not reliant on the sales process undertaken by an independent financial adviser or a direct sales force. The hon. Gentleman identified some of the issues involved in that process, which were brought out by the FSA's mystery shopper programme. Customers must be able to understand the consequences of what they are attempting, and organisations such as Age Concern, which focus on supporting people in retirement in particular, must take part in that education.

The importance of the mystery shopper campaign was not just to identify problems in the sales process and tie up those loose ends; I was pleased to hear the FSA say in August that enforcement action would be taken against continuing problems. Crucially, that means that issues arising from the sale of such products will be identified now, rather than when the person dies, or 10 to 15 years down the track, when a significant problem with the products is found. Enforcement will accelerate the regulatory process and ensure—I hope—that the proposed regulations for home reversion plans reflect some of the issues that were identified earlier.

One point on which I would question the hon. Member for Leeds, East is the minimum draw-down and the minimum amount borrowed. Setting a minimum, even at a high level, forces—or perhaps "should force" is the right way of putting it—independent financial advisers, direct sales forces and the consumer to think, "Is this the right route? Do I really need to borrow £25,000 when all I want to do is go on a £5,000 holiday?" The other factor to bear in mind is that the cost of selling such products can be significant, and the greater the regulation of those products, the higher the costs incurred by the provider, which need to be recovered. Regulation increases either up-front charges or interest rates, so a balance needs to be struck.

The hon. Member for Twickenham was right to say that including a de minimus level in regulation would encourage smaller loans. Rather than one £25,000 loan, there would be a series of £5,000 loans, if the de minimus happened to be £6,000 or £7,000, for example. We must be careful about the use of de minimus limits in terms of regulation and the amounts borrowed, because borrowing larger amounts can work in the consumer's favour.

The hon. Member for Twickenham touched on the issue of shared appreciation mortgages. I, too, have come across examples in my constituency of people taking out such mortgages. In the marketing literature supplied, I was struck by the crystal clear calculation of the amount that—in this case—Barclays would take. The obligation or liability that the customer would take on was apparent; however, the complexity of the decision making that one would have to go through to take out a shared appreciation mortgage in the first place was not clear. That is the issue with such products, and it applies to all equity release schemes. With a shared appreciation mortgage, one is taking a bet on one's longevity, on interest rates and on the appreciation of the value of one's house.

In the cases concerned, it turned out that the lender achieved a good deal at the end of the day—but if circumstances had been slightly different, the lender could have suffered and the borrower could have been better off. The decisions are complex. People need to understand them, and they need to be taken through the sales process.

As the hon. Members for Twickenham and for Leeds, East have identified, there is a legitimate demand for equity release schemes. A report yesterday said that the value of pensioners' housing assets had reached £1 trillion. Many pensioners who consider themselves asset rich but cash poor—in particular, those who have been retired for some time and have seen their pension eroded through inflation or higher costs such as council tax, or those who have relied on the returns from lump-sum investments or savings and seen those returns diminish—want to use their equity to meet some of the costs of retirement. They want to use it to help themselves and, perhaps, their families too. Given that demand, it is right for the financial services sector to respond to it with products that can meet the needs of consumers.

There is rightly some concern about some products, and we must analyse the sales process. One of my concerns, which was touched on earlier, is about the delay in the regulation of the home reversion market, given that the Regulation of Financial Services (Land Transactions) Bill went through the House last year.

The hon. Member for Leeds, East noted that the sale of home reversions is on the increase. I suspect that that is in part because of the heavier regulation of lifetime mortgages, with people squeezed into the home reversion market because of the lighter regulatory touch on it. In a report from The Times last August, one comment speaks volumes:

"A further brake on sales growth is expected as the second part of the equity release market"—

becomes regulated."

The report implies, first, the need for firms selling such products to tighten up their sales process, and secondly, the suspicion that business that would otherwise have gone through the regulated lifetime mortgage schemes has been channelled through home reversion schemes. Prompt action is important. I look to the Financial Secretary to give us an update on that process and say what discussions are taking place with the FSA.

Regulation is important. Two thirds of advisers in the mystery shopper exercise were not gathering sufficient information about their clients. The hon. Member for Leeds, East gave examples of that. How can products be sold properly if the information process has not been gone through? I hope that the FSA will learn from the lessons of the mystery shopper exercise when looking at home reversion plans to see how it can further tighten regulation of lifetime mortgages to deal with the concerns, and that it will repeat the exercise at regular intervals to see how member firms are tackling the problem. As I said earlier, mystery shopper exercises will help to reduce incidents of mis-selling later in life.

Regulation leads to increased costs being imposed on providers. Those costs are recovered from their clients. The up-front fees that some advisers charge on equity release schemes can be greater than 2.5 per cent. of the loan value. Obviously, that will recover in part some of the cost of regulation, so we must make sure that the regulation is right, but does not inhibit the condition of the market and lead to a bad deal for consumers. Complementary to regulation is the importance of competition in the market. We need more providers.

The hon. Member for Leeds, East referred to Prudential. Some in the industry said last year that its involvement in that market would add new stimulus to sales by reducing cost. When Prudential published details of its scheme, Saga reduced its loan costs to 6.39 per cent. That was still quite high, but competition was acting to spur the reduction of the costs.

Given the importance of the interest rate in calculating the final liability for lifetime mortgages, the further interest costs are driven down by competition in the market, the better deal it will be for the consumer. Last year, Dean Mirfin from Key Retirement Solutions said:

> "Interest rates on equity release plans have been falling since the start of the year and are likely to fall further as competition becomes more intense."

There will be a benefit to customers. More competition will lead also to more sophisticated products being introduced.

The hon. Member for Leeds, East referred to the Prudential policy with the draw-down. That is an important benefit for customers because it reduces costs. If people draw down sensibly when they require it, there will be a lower interest bill. That process has been spurred on by competition and by the involvement of more sophisticated providers in the marketplace. It works to the advantage of customers.

Competition by itself is not the only answer. We need better regulation, but we must bear in mind that the products are of interest to constituents. They look to use the equity in their houses, perhaps to help their families, and to provide some income in retirement, given the threat that many people now see to their pensions. We need a regulatory competition regime that helps to meet the aspirations of our constituents, but in a way that encourages the market and protects customers.

10.23 am

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (John Healey): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Mudie) on securing the debate. He is a distinguished long-serving member of the Treasury Committee, which in my experience over recent years has acted as an effective inquisitor of the Government. It is also an effective champion of consumers, especially in the financial services sector. My hon. Friend has played a part in giving some high-profile companies a hard time in front of the Committee. He has certainly done so with some of the providers referred to in this morning's debate.

I say to my hon. Friend that I will make sure that the chairman and chief executive of the Financial Services Authority receive a full transcript of the debate. I know that they will take carefully into account his specific comments about certain products and companies. I am certain that the FSA will take into account the broader comments that have been made in the debate as it puts in place the full regulatory cover that we intend to result from the legislation passed last year.

Like my hon. Friend, I pay tribute to the work of the Consumers Association, and, in particular, the work of the publication Which?. With other publications, it plays an important job in providing in-depth, well-researched and reliable information to consumers in such matters. He was right to say that the last time that equity release schemes were fully debated, it was before the Government made moves to regulate in this area. I welcome the fact that in opening the debate, he said that there was no doubt that things had got better since then. I welcome the debate; now is a good time to take stock because, as some contributors have said, many anticipate an increasing market in equity release, based on the regulation, and the fact that it should give greater confidence to consumers and lead to better products, and to the better provision of those products.

However, while stressing the potential of this market, it is worth keeping its scale in perspective. The SHIP—safe home income plans—group produced figures that suggested that the value of new lending in the equity release market in 2004 was just above £1.2 billion. That means that the size of the equity release market in that year compared with the volume of overall mortgage lending was less than 1 per cent. While the number of firms specialising in equity release is only 57, lenders and brokers in the more general mortgage market total almost 14,000.As the debate has made clear, it remains a fact that the products are complex. They can be valuable to consumers, but accurate information, good advice and care is required when taking them out.

My hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, East asked specific questions. He referred first to mystery shopping and talked about discussions that Ministers plan to have with the Financial Services Authority about some of the worries that he thinks arose from the mystery shopping exercise. As a result of the exercise and the FSA's review, many main trade bodies have issued new guidance to their members. The FSA remains in active discussion with the industry and consumer groups about how to secure higher standards of advice for consumers. My hon. Friend will know, better than I do, that the FSA holds firms to account and has been clear that it will take a hard line with those that do not sort out the problems about which it is concerned. As he will be aware from his work on the Treasury Committee, the FSA is operationally independent of the Government. However, it is required by law to ensure that regulation is effective and proportionate.

The hon. Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable) raised his concerns about the timetable and the process for getting the regulation in place, especially for home reversion schemes. The first step towards bringing the arrangements into full FSA regulation was the primary legislation that enables home reversion plans to fall within the scope of potential FSA regulation, and that received Royal Assent last year. The second step is the secondary legislation required to amend the Financial Services and Markets Act 2000 (Regulated Activities) Order 2001 to bring home reversion plans into FSA regulation. The Government—led, of course, by the Treasury—are preparing for consultation on that stage. The third stage is for the FSA to draw up and consult on the rules that it proposes regarding sales of home reversion plans, and the fourth is for firms then to apply for permission from the FSA to sell home reversion plans.

The Government have a commitment to allow 12 weeks for public consultation based on secondary legislative proposals. Further down the track, the FSA normally needs to allow a minimum of six months between the publishing of its rules and the regulations coming into force. I concede to my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, East that some may consider that process to be somewhat lengthy, but I assure him and other Members that this process is currently proceeding very smoothly, and my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary to the Treasury and I do not anticipate any unnecessary delays.

I welcomed the presence, and brief contribution, of my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor). He is a former accountant and I welcome his interest in, and concern for, the consumer. I regret that he has been unable to stay for the conclusion of the debate, but I will ensure that he receives a copy of the Official Report so that he can catch up with the points that he has missed—perhaps that is a threat rather than a promise.

The hon. Member for Twickenham correctly stated that there is nothing wrong in principle with equity release schemes, although he has concerns that in certain circumstances they may not be fully appropriate for the consumers who purchase them. He asked a number of specific questions about backdating, scope, value for money in transactions and independent valuations. I expect that he will appreciate that those specific matters will be settled during the period when secondary legislation is being made, and in particular, when the FSA draws up proposals for the detailed rules.

The hon. Gentleman made a point of stressing his participation in debates during the passage of the Regulation of Financial Services (Land Transactions) Act 2005, and some of the issues that he raised—such as the de minimis question—were discussed during the consideration of that legislation. I think that on that issue it was agreed on all sides—the hon. Gentleman can correct me if I am wrong—that a de minimis rule risked distorting behaviour; it would probably allow unscrupulous firms to avoid the regulation intended by the legislation by dividing a loan up into more than one loan in order to keep below any de minimis threshold.

Dr. Cable: I fully understand that there are a lot of complex issues that the Minister and the FSA need to think through, but could I just get his reaction to a specific question that I put to him? Given that this is a complex—and possibly time-consuming—process, what are the advantages and disadvantages of backdating the coverage that consumers would derive under the financial ombudsman scheme?

John Healey: I think that that specific issue would be better examined in the context of the introduction of the regulations and rules, rather than in this general debate. However, the hon. Gentleman raised several more general points, to which I can respond.

The first point was about shared appreciation mortgages. I understand the concern arising from the particular cases that the hon. Gentleman cited. All MPs come across such constituents, and they—and certainly Ministers—have every sympathy for consumers who find themselves in financial difficulties having taken out a shared appreciation mortgage. Consumers can access the Financial Ombudsman Service if they feel that they have been badly advised about the mortgage or that it was mis-sold to them. However, the financial ombudsman has not to date found any evidence of mis-selling, and in those circumstances it is difficult to see that there are any grounds for compensation, let alone for the Government to step in and accept some sort of responsibility for compensation.

The hon. Gentleman then turned his attention to property investment clubs. Regulation to deal with collective investment schemes is already in place. In the light of concerns about the activities of property investment clubs, the FSA has reviewed what it calls its perimeter guidance. In general terms and in principle, the Government do not believe that it is appropriate for the FSA to regulate property purchase; that is a very different matter from the financial services regulation that it was specifically set up to deal with. However, the FSA's clarification of the perimeter has made it clear that some schemes that have previously regarded themselves as unregulated might need to be regulated by the FSA.

The hon. Gentleman also raised the question of the provision of free money advice. He may not be aware that only last week the FSA launched, jointly with the BBC, an online advice tool designed to help consumers by offering good advice on financial services. The FSA's more general financial capability work is now looking into what might need to be done further. In addition, the Chancellor—the hon. Gentleman will remember this, because he was shadowing the Chancellor at the time—announced in the 2004 pre-Budget report a £120 million financial inclusion fund, part of which goes towards supporting the development and provision of free face-to-face money advice through providers such as citizens advice bureaux, which the hon. Gentleman mentioned.

That leads me directly on to the contribution of the hon. Member for Fareham (Mr. Hoban). He began by stressing the importance of good financial literacy and understanding by consumers. I hope that he welcomes the moves that we have made and the investment we have put into financial literacy and money advice for consumers. He also stressed the fact that there is a legitimate demand for equity release schemes, and in a reflective contribution he helped to set the broader context for some of the specific issues that have cropped up. He urged us to bear in mind the interests that our constituents have in these financial products and their potential, and emphasised that they help to provide income for some people in retirement. He also rightly said that there is a need for regulation, but that we must also regulate in order to meet the aspirations of our constituents and potential consumers.

Regulation has been the crux of the debate. Regulation is not intended to discourage the sale of such products. Instead, our approach is to enable people to make informed choices, to offer necessary consumer protection, and to ensure that there is a competitive level playing field in the equity release market.

I was prepared to set out a degree of detail and background for equity release products and the development of regulation in this field, but the participants in the debate are probably far better informed than many other Members. Therefore, suffice it to say that there are two basic types of scheme: mortgage-based schemes or lifetime mortgages, and reversion plans. The difference between them is clear: in mortgage-based schemes the householder retains ownership of the property, whereas in reversion plans the reversion provider becomes the owner of whatever proportion of the property is sold.

Mortgage-based equity release schemes have been regulated by the FSA since 2004. However, home reversion plans are not currently regulated by the FSA, as they are, effectively, transactions in land and are therefore not covered by the Financial Services and Markets Act 2000. However, the Government fully accepted the case that such schemes needed to be regulated to help people to make informed choices, to offer proper and valuable consumer protection, and to make sure that there is a competitive and fair market in these products.

As I have said, home reversion plans are not currently regulated by the FSA, but that is not to say that purchasers of such plans are completely without protection. The home reversion market is subject to voluntary regulation through the SHIP group. Members of SHIP agree to comply with the code of practice and to undertake a fair, simple and complete presentation of any plan that they offer. Crucially, they also offer a guarantee that consumers will never owe a lender more than the value of their home; in other words, they give a "no negative equity" guarantee. Clearly, those protections are a long way short of the protection offered by statutory regulation and by the FSA's more general regime.

Mr. Mudie: When I looked at the SHIP website, I counted 19 firms that are members of SHIP, which is a voluntary organisation, whereas there are 57 providers. Does the Minister not agree that the home reversion scheme operates in a market in which a minority of providers are in SHIP, and so give some cover? The majority are free to operate as they think appropriate.

John Healey: My hon. Friend makes a reasonable point, but just to be clear, the figure of 57 that I gave earlier is the number of firms operating in the equity release market. The majority offer lifetime mortgages rather than home reversions—in other words, they offer the products that are already regulated—so he should take as an encouraging sign the total number of members of SHIP, as that represents a large part of the biggest providers of the home reversion-type product.

Because the current voluntary system does not provide the sort of protection that consumers need, we launched a consultation in November 2003, and in 2004 the Government announced that we would in future empower the FSA to regulate those financial products. We introduced the required primary legislation, the Regulation of Financial Services (Land Transactions) Act 2005, last year. I am pleased to say that it received support from both sides of the House. It was debated pretty fully, and my close friend and colleague the Economic Secretary led the debate as the Bill made its passage through Parliament. It gained Royal Assent just before Christmas.

As I have said, as soon as possible, we in the Treasury will introduce the necessary secondary legislation to define precisely which products and activities will be regulated by the FSA. Once the secondary legislation has been consulted on, the FSA will consult on the detailed rules that will apply to those products.

Given the powers granted by the 2005 Act, the sort of rules that one would expect the FSA to apply to home reversions would include rules to ensure that providers advise of risks as well as benefits when advertising reversion schemes, and rules on advice to consumers to ensure that advisers have considered implications for tax and benefits—a point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, East and the hon. Member for Twickenham—and have matched the consumer's overall needs and circumstances to the product features. Also, one would expect a requirement for firms to issue key product information to consumers in a clear and understandable format. Furthermore, FSA regulation will offer consumers access to the Financial Ombudsman Service in the event that they wish to make a complaint, and that will provide them with cover under the financial services compensation scheme.

Encouragingly, although perhaps not surprisingly, the industry has been a keen proponent of regulation for reversion plans, as it wants to remove any consumer confusion and, of course, boost consumer confidence in the market as a whole. Indeed, when my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, East secured this debate, my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary was contacted by the Association of British Insurers, which made clear to him directly its support for enhanced consumer protection of home reversion schemes. It makes three recommendations: first, advice provided by firms to consumers should be simple and complete; secondly, advice should include schemes' implications for tax and means-tested benefits; and, thirdly, consumers should have their properties independently valued, a point raised in this debate.

In summing up, it is fair to say that equity release schemes can help people—particularly the asset rich but cash poor—to enjoy a higher standard of life, but they are complex products and are not suitable for everyone. It is important to understand what they will mean in practice, and consumers should always seek independent financial advice. I direct consumers and hon. Members, if they do not have copies to hand in their constituency office, to a leaflet on equity release published by the FSA called "Thinking of Raising Money from your Home?"

FSA regulation ensures that consumers have the right information and advice to hand when choosing a mortgage, and it provides redress mechanisms in the event of complaints. Proportionate and effective regulation should protect elderly people, who are some of the most vulnerable people in our society, allowing them to make informed choices about the financial arrangements that are best for them. Of course, increased consumer confidence is an essential foundation for a competitive, diverse and fair mortgage market in the UK—a general economic aim that I am sure all hon. Members who participated in this debate would support.

Sir Nicholas Winterton (in the Chair): I congratulate the Chamber on an interesting and well argued debate, and we thank the Minister for his full response. I now suspend the sitting until 11 o'clock.

Sitting suspended.

School Closures and Surplus Places

11 am

Sir Nicholas Winterton (in the Chair): We have just had a tranquil period and I am sure that that will be typical of the next debate.

Dr. John Pugh (Southport) (LD): It is a pleasure to see you in your place, Sir Nicholas. The new environment for these debates strikes me as somewhat funereal in comparison with Westminster Hall.

The debate is a timely one, because the Government are proceeding on an agenda that has little resonance or connection with circumstances that prevail throughout most of the country. As I understand the Government's forward-looking educational agenda at the moment, they think that choice of schools is a serious issue for a large number of parents, that there is not enough choice and that there is a need for ever-new variety of providers and an ever-increasing number of them. They seem to feel that choice between schools—competition of a direct kind—is the main mechanism through which quality in education will be driven up and pupils will get a better deal.

The Government also seem to feel that schools and parents are crying out for greater independence for schools. That is reflected in the proposals that schools should have charge of their own admissions arrangements and, in some cases, control over the land, which alienates public assets in the process. In addition, the Government are fairly relaxed, unlike many people to whom I speak, about the increase in traffic and travelling around that will follow on from the proposals.

In looking at the matter and trying my best sympathetically to understand where the Government are coming from, I have decided that they are fixated by what I can only call a London perspective. I understand that in London there are pressures on admissions and that there is a mix of schools; some are quite poor and some are heavily oversubscribed. There is sometimes competition for the best ones and there is also a mixed pattern of local education authorities, some of which perform well whereas others are distinctly unpopular or are rather ideologically driven.

London has the luxury of much better transport infrastructure than is available in most parts of the country. If parents need to move their children around or children need to move around to get to schools, the transport infrastructure will support that, despite its flaws. Other places do not have the advantage of the London bus and tube system or the like.

Most people would accept that London is different from the rural environment, where the problems that schools face and the problems that parents have in choosing them are quite different. We must also accept that the situation is distinctly different in parts of the north. In fact, my research for this debate has shown that the problems are distinctly different almost everywhere outside the London fringe. There are severe problems as close to London as Essex.

The big problem is falling rolls. There are simply more places than there are children to fill them. Projections show that the problem will not diminish but will increase, in the short term at least.

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): The hon. Gentleman raises an important issue. He mentioned Essex and falling rolls, so this is an apposite moment to state that in the Thames Gateway area, in which my constituency lies, the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister is planning to build another 124,000 houses. Some communities in that area that have schools with falling rolls will get thousands of new houses, bringing along hundreds more children. Does he agree that it is premature to be considering closing schools in such communities?

Dr. Pugh: The hon. Gentleman makes a sound point. It just goes to show that sometimes education policies and other sorts of policies do not dovetail in the way that we hope.

Traditionally, when we faced such problems, local authorities endeavoured to balance out the situation by controlling admission limits, by sometimes forcing amalgamations and mergers through, and by using what was then their considerable power to put gentle pressure on management who simply were not performing. That was the traditional recipe in the 1970s, 1980s and before. Falling rolls are not a new problem; numbers fell by about a third in the 1970s and 1980s, but picked up a little later. Although it is not a new problem, it is now a severe one.

I believe that falling rolls are the major problem facing educational planners. A survey in The Times Educational Supplement showed that 54 per cent. of local authorities think that they will merge or close schools in the coming year. The birth rate in 2001 hit a historic low for modern times. The Audit Commission says that two thirds of council areas will have more than 10 per cent. surplus places, and so it goes on. The Government clearly recognise that because they are cutting back on training places, except in areas where shortages have already been identified, such as in science and maths.

If we consider specifics, some drastic statistics can be found. One in 15 schools in Cumbria is scheduled to go. A 47 per cent. surplus in places—almost half—is predicted in Nottingham by 2009. Two thirds of Gateshead primaries have too many surplus places and, in Derbyshire, there will be a considerable fall in the roll of between 10 and 15 per cent. in the next four years. According to answers provided to me by the Department for Education and Skills, about 250 schools close per year, and that has been the picture for the past five years. The picture is a dramatic one and the problem is severe.

I will address the specific issue of my own LEA, comment on what I know happens there and on how we have tried to approach the matter. I will also point out why the current Government policies are of no real assistance and have no resonance. They seem to be formulated on another planet, although it is merely down here, in the DFES.

Most people would accept that Sefton LEA is a good one, and has been for many years. It is popular with its schools, has statistically had good results and has funded its schools for many years above the average level. The schools may be caught out by the new national formula. An indication of the tenor of the educational environment in Sefton is that no school opted out of LEA control when it was possible to do so. There were two votes; one was lost miserably and the first vote was lost—I campaigned to ensure that it was lost—by persuading parents that an opt-out by one school would disadvantage others. That shows something about the parents. They were offered the opt-out, but they declined on that basis; they did not see themselves as the adversaries of the other schools. Hon. Members will recall that in those days funding for opt-out schools was top-sliced from the LEA in a rather generous and inequitable fashion.

Mr. Nick Gibb (Bognor Regis and Littlehampton) (Con): Does the hon. Gentleman accept that parental views are paramount in education policy, given that he valued the views that they expressed in the two votes to which he refers?

Dr. Pugh: Parents' views are very important. I am not sure what stress the hon. Gentleman wishes to place on the word "paramount". One must accept that in addition to parents' views there are the views of the community at large, in respect of the utilisation of its resources. The community—the council tax payers—ultimately funds facilities as well and its views are also an issue.

Mine has not been a backward-looking authority. We introduced local management of schools—or independent finance for schools—long before we were obliged to do so. The LEA was democratically accountable, and I am not flattering myself because I served on it. I want to pay tribute to the quality of the other members. I was impressed with their knowledge and involvement and with the standard of the debates that took place. The level of understanding of educational issues on the council was far higher at that time than I believe it to be now. In addition, most parents got their first choice.

If I were a Government ideologue, I would say, "Well, the snag with that sort of system—a local authority managed system—is that it is too secure an environment for schools that are underperforming. Although they get the numbers, they may not also get the results". However, we were mindful of that even in those days and pressed for comparators between schools so that their performance could be judged. We insisted—again, we were ahead of the Government—that those be value added.

We therefore have a history of school rationalisation, and it has not been half as contentious or difficult as the current process. In those days, to be fair, we could cushion some of the effects of school rationalisation by increasing nursery provision, abandoning old buildings that were past their useful life, proposing reorganisation that seemed popular and using local authority capital funding to ameliorate the effects of the process. There was, however, still a lingering issue of surplus places, and the Audit Commission repeatedly reminded us that allowing the situation to persist would not be the most effective use of public resources.

However, those were the old days, and I preferred them in some respects, although not in an absolute way, because they had certain advantages over the current education environment. I say that because the Government have said several times that the surplus places rule has been dropped. Indeed, they have had to say that several times because hon. Members did not take up their comments straight away or did not take them at their word. However, the Government are quite genuine, and the existence of surplus places is not a consideration when deciding whether to encourage other schools in the same community to expand.

The net effect is that we risk massive expansion in one place, while schools in a similar place not too far away topple over. The local authority's role is no longer to manage the process, but to deal with the fallout—clearing up when one school goes down because another has come up. In the Chamber, I told the current Home Secretary, who was Secretary of State for Education and Skills at the time, that the local authority's residual role was to be the undertaker for unsuccessful schools and that it did not have much of a strategic role beyond that. That is certainly how things look at times.

In Sefton, we have been through a process of painful primary school reorganisation. It was preceded in other places by unplanned expansion that was not terribly well thought through. The net effect for parents and children in the schools that were targeted for closure was pain, upheaval and a sense that time and resources had been wasted. Indeed, appreciable amounts of investment had been put into some of the schools that became vulnerable.

The free market in education was cross-grained with some of the more imaginative transport plans that were being drawn up to reduce traffic to and from schools. As has been mentioned, it also cut across community strategies. Indeed, one of the vulnerable schools played a pivotal part in reinvigorating a community that had been through some hard times.

To be honest, the process was not well handled, although that was not entirely the Government's fault. It was also partly the fault of the local authority, which released a plan from on high—suspiciously, it was immediately after the local elections—and with a lack of agreed criteria. It has now learned a little and agreed a matrix of assessment for primary schools and it is considering how it can better conduct any future reduction in surplus places.

The process was also dogged by difficulties and anomalies with the formula. There were difficulties with the funding of smaller as opposed to larger schools and there was a sense that some schools were being set against others. It will interest hon. Members to know that, whereas we previously had a knowing LEA that would have seen the problem coming and been part and parcel of the solution, councillors—apart from the cabinet member—were fairly baffled about their role in the process and about what they could and could not say. Many were governors of schools that would be adversely or positively affected by the closures of other schools and had to get a special dispensation from the standards board to get round the declarations of interest that they would have to put in if they were still to cast a vote. At one stage, there was a serious danger that practically nobody on the council who had not previously declared an interest would be able to vote at a full council meeting.

The second point that should be made at this stage is that the local authority promptly proceeded without a clear idea of where the Government were going on initiatives such as extended schools or children's centres, and that problem probably dogs many a closure proposal in many a place.

Even under the current circumstances, things could be done better if there was the prospect of new building or of better use being made of facilities that were relinquished for direct school use. However things are done, the mantra of calling for new providers, more independence and greater competition is relatively meaningless. Private providers of education in my constituency are currently failing, although I do not mean that they are not performing very well. The Birkdale school for hearing-impaired children, which is a private school, was performing exceptionally well, but it could not sustain the course for financial reasons. Another private school recently closed down for precisely the same reason. There is no flood of private providers trying to get into the market. That is a hard case, but let me give hon. Members a harder case still.

Currently, the problem in my constituency is most manifest at Ainsdale—Hope high school, which is earmarked for closure. It has seen a sharp fall in rolls, and a horrendous financial crisis is looming as a consequence. In business terms—I hate using them—we would say that it has lost market share and is starting to suffer. It is the only co-ed, non-Catholic school in the southern part of my constituency, and of the two schools up the road—they are not very near—one is an all-boys school and the other is an all-girls school. If Ainsdale closes, there will be a sharp reduction in choice, which will have been brought on by competition between schools. Ainsdale provides a distinctive special needs environment, for which it is highly commended, but that, too, may go, resulting in a fair reduction in choice. Ainsdale has had its problems academically and in terms of numbers, but that has not always been the case. In my observation of schools in my neck of the woods, the reputation of schools hinges very much on factors as transitory as who happens to be the headmaster.

However, it gets worse. Ainsdale was taken over and became a Church school only last year. It has received capital investment and the parents have gone out and bought new blazers for their children. I have spoken to the Church about its capacity to help, and it has told me that if capital is needed, the Church can find it—or, rather, it is legally allowed to find it. After all, the same diocese is opening an academy in Newsham Park in Liverpool. What the school needs, however, is revenue to tide it over, but charity law forbids the Church from providing that revenue. Furthermore, the Government have arranged the funding external to the local authority in many respects.

We now have the danger of implosion, which is offset only by the authority leaning on other schools not to take in pupils who want to find themselves a more secure education environment. That is legally contestable and is probably the wrong strategy, but it shows the difficulties that arise when a school faces such a severe problem. Leaving the education market is not like leaving the retail market—there is an awful lot of human damage involved in the process.

The solutions involve increased travel and reduced choice. Ainsdale is a victim of a market philosophy in education, and the effect of its closure will be traumatic. The local authority and the Church, which are the school's sponsors, cannot help. If the Government are confronted with the problem at some point, they will undoubtedly wash their hands of it and say that it is all down to local decision makers.

I do not want the Government to tell me what I know—that it is all down to local decision-makers. If the notes are already written, I suggest that they be hurriedly revised. I do not want them to give me the criteria for school closures. I have read them and I know that they say things about community involvement, travelling distance, alternative schools and so on. That does not help Ainsdale Hope high school to deal with a massive financial headache.

The Government would be right to say that they have repeatedly told local authorities that they must take community needs into account. They have also repeatedly given them a slightly different message—that they need to make efficient use of public resources. However, I do not want them to say that for two reasons. First, I know it already; it is perfectly true. Secondly, however, I do not want them to say it because it is evasive. The Government set the rules for this game. They fix the finance, define the objectives and micro-manage the process. In the past the LEAs would have managed the process in a benign way. They would have set admission limits and replaced failing management. They would have used LEA capital funding and they would have intervened early—at least, the best would have done. I accept that not all of them would have done; there are some poor LEAs. They would have inspected often. That is what I should like to have seen.

I should like the parents of pupils at Ainsdale Hope high and lots of other schools across the country to be spared some of the agony, and not to be drawn into the political debate. I had an interesting political debate about primary school closures with my Conservative opponent during the general election campaign. I think that the then Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale, Mr. Tim Collins, came down and said that schools would never be closed under a Conservative Government. Sadly, he is not here to deliver on that promise. However, I checked out what was happening in Cumbria, and I found that he had precisely the same problem as I had. He was trying to deal with a difficult human problem and a difficult problem of resources.

To get to the main point, the White Paper lays down a new strategic role for the LEAs—I have spotted that. However, it is not for the LEAs; I do not want to talk about LEAs any more. Let us talk about the "Cabinet member for education", whoever that is, because LEAs are a thing of the past, and it is silly to dignify them with the old description. There is a strategic role, and there is talk about early intervention and so on. Perhaps anybody who has difficulty believing me will believe the Audit Commission, which observes that analysis of the detail of the role is limited. In its most recent report it says that "the White Paper fails in a number of respects to utilise councils (as accessible and locally accountable, elected authorities) to address the issues of challenge and concern more directly . . . A recent public interest report further highlighted the absence of effective access and challenge at local level to provide the necessary check and balance to enhanced school autonomy."

It finds that

"if anything, councils are too modestly resourced in order to carry out their functions."

What we have instead is a view of the educational world from the more salubrious dining tables of Islington and Notting Hill. In the real educational world, outside Islington and Notting Hill, we are not clamouring for more choice. Again, these are not my words but those of the Audit Commission:

"In many parts of the country, choice is neither realistic nor an issue of primary importance to parents."

We are not calling for more independence. In fact, we are attracted by the White Paper's concept of federation; co-operation; a learning and sharing community. We are not really calling for more travel—we do not want our schools to be further away. There may be special reasons for travelling further at times, as there are reasons why one might make a trip to the Trafford centre, but in the vast majority of cases, people prefer good, local facilities. We are not calling for more providers, we are not calling for the end of the LEA provider role, and we are not calling for cut-throat competition.

However—this comes not just from me but from the main body of the educational community—we are calling for the intelligent management of public resources and less waste; for the recognition that schools are not supermarkets and that the effects of closing them are not like the effects of closing a supermarket. We are calling for the problem of poor local provision to be solved by improving local provision, making schools beacons in their communities, not deserted by their communities. We very much welcome the capital investment proposals in "Building Schools for the Future", which would ameliorate the situation, improve the process and sugar the pill. However, if they are linked to suggestions such as that the price of receiving the investment is to have an academy, they are not such an obvious solution. In addition, we are calling for proper, local, accountable control. If that is not available, perhaps because a council is composed of just one party, there are remedies that can be considered. We can introduce a better electoral system if that is the price of getting a better, more accountable educational system.

If LEAs did not exist, it would probably be necessary to invent them. I fear that one day we shall have to do that. We all want children to achieve their best. If we disagree, it is on how to enable them to do it. It is manifest in the language of the White Paper that the Government are poised between two incompatible strategies. They can either go down the competition-led, free-market line of the think-tank ideologues, or they can listen to the voices of educational experience. I am pleased to see that an increased role has been found for the former chief inspector of schools, David Bell. He will provide that voice.

The White Paper faces both ways, and that is not sustainable. It certainly offers no solutions to the problems in many parts of the country outside London.

Several hon. Members rose—

Sir Nicholas Winterton (in the Chair): Order. Before I call the next speaker, may I tell hon. Members that I intend to start the winding-up speeches at midday. Particularly, I would say to those winding up for the Liberal Democrats and for Her Majesty's official

[Sir Nicholas Winterton]

Opposition that I think that it is good to allow the Minister a little longer than the time allocated to the other Front-Bench speakers so that she can make a proper response to this important debate.

11.29 am

Mr. David Anderson (Blaydon) (Lab): Thank you, Sir Nicholas. It is a pleasure to appear in front of you again.

I want to speak about my part of the world, Blaydon, which is part of the Gateshead local authority area to which the hon. Member for Southport (Dr. Pugh) referred. We have no debate in Blaydon about governance, letting private companies run our schools or the failure of the LEA because we have good shared governance. We have accepted a local academy that has produced some good results. We have a well-respected, well-run LEA that has helped us to deliver good services to the children of Blaydon with good standards and improved results against any checklist. The real educational debate is about two issues, particularly in Blaydon—the need for additional money to upgrade the buildings at some of our schools and the future of our primary schools in a time of falling numbers, which is the subject of today's debate.

In Gateshead as a whole there has been a review of primary provision, and the figures speak for themselves. People have taken lifestyle choices, and responsibilities come with those choices. Between 1995 and 2005, 1,991 fewer children went to school across Gateshead. Without any changes, the figure of at least 847 fewer has been projected for the next five years. At a time when the aim of the LEA is to have no more than 10 per cent. surplus capacity, 35 schools have between 10 per cent. and 25 per cent. surplus places. Without a change, that will increase by 23 more schools by 2010. At the moment, 17 schools have more than 25 per cent. surplus places and, without a change, there will be 26 such schools by 2010.

The local authority has taken a positive view of the problem within the parameters laid down by central Government and sees it as an opportunity rather than a problem. It is trying to improve the quality of children's education and wants to improve the learning environment and accessibility. It wants to develop and extend community use of schools and to make best use of the limited resources, but it also has no choice but to reduce the capacity by 2,000 places.

Stakeholders across the community have been involved. During the summer there was a general consultation and awareness-raising exercise with people in the schools and parents. In November and December there were consultations on detailed options, area by area, and every home in the area was given leaflets about what was going on. This month formal proposals will be brought forward and statutory consultations will take place.

In the review, a number of options have been suggested. First, the size of schools could be reduced and alternative uses could be found for the buildings. Secondly, the schools could be reorganised and amalgamated with other schools. In most instances, two schools would become one. Thirdly, schools could be developed or replaced altogether and existing schools could be improved.

The review also considered alternative uses such as expanding children's centres, extending activities within the school, developing more special educational needs provision and allowing more use by the community and by health services—a key area of expansion. Other people were asked whether there were other ways in which their school could be better used in out-of-school hours. Finally, people are being asked to give other options and say what they think. Nothing has been set in stone, except that the capacity has to be reduced by 2,000 places.

As the hon. Member for Southport said, there are issues raised in the wider education debate that come out in the White Paper. I know that the White Paper is specifically about secondary education, but the people concerned with primary education are asking where their role is. How do we square the foreword in the White Paper, which is written by the Prime Minister and states:

"Parent choice can be a powerful driver of improved standards", and the Secretary of State's statement that we will deliver

"a system driven by parents doing their best for their children" with the fact that the parents affected by the proposals in Blaydon tell me that their choice would be "Leave our schools alone"? They want the schools developed on site, not closed. I realise that that option is probably obvious to parents, and that it may be costly, but if the Government are serious and want to respond in a positive way to parental choice, they should address the key issues.

We could reduce class sizes at primary level. That would be the radical choice for education in this country and would give young people in their formative years the opportunity to develop in the way provided by private education, which would be a step change in people's lives. It would make them much better equipped to go into the secondary system and help to fulfil the diktat of Government in a way that is both radical and bold. To quote someone not many miles away, we are best when we are bold. My Government proved that in the first term and when they reduced class sizes to under 30, despite howls of protest from some people. Reducing class sizes would also provide parental choice, removing the confusion between the rhetoric and the reality of education policy.

The local authority in Gateshead will do its best to square the circle within the parameters in which it has to work. Those parameters will, inevitably, leave some parents less than happy. If we as a Government are serious about parental choice, about improving children's education and about being radical, we should seize the opportunity.

Dr. Pugh: I asked the previous Minister of State, the right hon. Member for South Shields (Mr. Miliband), a direct question and he replied that he would not consider lowering class sizes. Does the hon. Gentleman think that a firm presentation of the evidence is required to show that smaller class sizes get results, particularly in deprived areas?

Mr. Anderson: It is quite clear that they do get results. It is obvious. One of the things argued for in the White Paper is more personalised individual learning. If a classroom is full of too many people, children will not get that. I accept that we should consider the matter and take on board what the hon. Gentleman said about the previous Minister. Rather than a problem, there is an opportunity that we should grasp with both hands. We should commit ourselves to small class sizes with more personalised learning and provide a real base for the next generation to move on from.

11.37 am

Mr. Ian Austin (Dudley, North) (Lab): I am grateful for the opportunity to speak in this important debate and to bring to the attention of the House the situation in my constituency, where the Conservative-controlled council plans to close two schools, Highfields and Sycamore Green. I want to focus in particular on the unsatisfactory consultation undertaken by the council and the thin case that it has presented for closing the schools.

I wrote to the council in October objecting to the proposed closure of the two schools. I enclosed letters and petitions that had been sent to me by parents and children, which demonstrated the strength of feeling. I received no response to those letters, to the proposals and suggestions that were made in them or to the questions that I raised. More important, parents told me that they received no response to their letters, questions or petitions. The local authority also failed to ensure that people were properly notified of the statutory notices that it has since issued proposing the closure of the schools and has not set out properly how parents can respond.

Parents should have been told in writing exactly how they could respond to the notices. At the very least, the council should have written to all who wrote to it during the initial consultation period and set out the details of the statutory notices, inviting a response. I am sorry to say that I and many parents believe that the consultation process has been deeply unsatisfactory. Other proposals suggested by the schools, the governors and parents should have been properly considered and they have not. The council should halt the process, think again and look carefully at the alternative suggestions.

I object to the proposals because I do not agree with the council's premise for changing the pattern of primary school provision in Dudley. It has failed to answer entirely legitimate criticism and questions about the projected birth rates. I have looked at the figures from the Office for National Statistics and the data suggest that birth rates could be increasing, not falling. It is true that birth rates in 2001 were very low, but they have subsequently risen from 1.63 in 2001 to 1.77 in 2004. Research by the House of Commons Library shows that the council's underlying assumptions do not take into account the fact that trends may rise further in the future. They do not consider the impact that policies such as child tax credit, increased support for child care, better maternity and paternity pay, and the child trust fund could have on family size in future, nor do they take account of issues that could result in an increased population in Dudley. For example, one of the objectives of the black country study is to increase the black country's population by 100,000 and it is not clear whether that has been taken into account. The council cannot show that it has taken account of the impact that the increased housing development planned for sites close to both schools could have.

It is not clear that rolls are falling so dramatically at the two schools that closure is the only option. The council's policy, as I understand it, is to have no school with more than 15 per cent. surplus places. Pupil numbers at Highfields are not far below that at the moment, and meeting that requirement could easily be done by other measures, which I will set out briefly later. Dudley council's policy is also to have 7.5 per cent. spare capacity in each locality and it is not clear in its proposals where that spare capacity could be found under the present proposals.

Even if the council's case that surplus places have arisen and that the birth rate is falling is correct, I do not accept that closing schools is the only way of addressing the matter, and I do not accept the council's assertion that small schools with fewer pupils would find it difficult to sustain high-quality education. It would be better to provide extra facilities, and both schools would be ideal for Sure Start centres. Both are in deprived areas that would qualify for such provision, both have the necessary space and such provision would generate increased revenue to help to meet the cost of running the buildings. Governors at both schools have drawn up proposals for extended school provision and have plans for new nurseries. Highfields has already applied to Ofsted, with a target date of January 2006, and governors at Sycamore Green are in discussion with the local authority about early-years provision.

There are many other ways in which local authorities have reduced surplus places without closing schools—for example, by combining schools with other community facilities, providing wrap-around child care, educational support facilities, libraries, extended schools and so on. Both schools—Sycamore Green in particular—serve areas of high deprivation where children need more support and stability, not less. Results at both schools are improving. Sycamore Green is achieving 82 per cent. in literacy, 63 per cent. in maths and 82 per cent. in science. Standards are also increasing rapidly at Highfields. Facilities at both schools are of high quality and have improved with extra investment recently. Those facilities, combined with the ethos of the schools and the support that they receive from parents and the wider community are serving the children well. I am worried that their education will be destabilised by the changes.

At the very least, the council should respond to the questions, criticisms and suggestions properly. It should think again and bring forward proposals to prevent the closure of the two schools. What power do the Government have to examine Dudley's proposals and the process that it has adopted?

11.43 am

Mr. Edward Davey (Kingston and Surbiton) (LD): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Southport (Dr. Pugh) on securing this debate. It is incredibly timely for two reasons. First, the debate on the education White Paper frames much of our discussion today. Secondly, we have recently seen the Audit Commission's submission to the Education and

[Mr. Edward Davey]

Skills Committee, which deals with many of the issues, particularly surplus places. Many of the points from his constituency and his wide experience were particularly apposite, and I want to build on his comments.

In the White Paper the problem of falling rolls in the secondary school system is mentioned once, but the number of secondary school-aged children in England will decline in the next 10 years by 500,000. Every English region will see a significant decline. In London, where everyone believes that there will be lack of capacity, the number will decline by 40,000, or the equivalent of around 40 secondary schools. I am not suggesting that that decline is spread evenly throughout the capital, but it is large, even in London.

When I have asked questions about that, the Minister has tried to hide the extent of the problem in the way in which the Government set their base years and final years and the way in which they make the different definitions. However, it is difficult to hide the large fall, so they try to make other little points in parliamentary answers. For example, they say that they hope to increase the number of people staying on post-16. I hope that they do, but still the numbers would nowhere near make up for the certain fall. The children have already been born and we know how many places will not be taken up.

The hon. Member for Dudley, North (Mr. Austin) talked about an upturn in birth rates in the last year, but that will take some time to feed through to secondary school education, even if it is maintained. I do not suggest that the White Paper should be based on one year's increase in birth rate last year.

There is a huge problem in the demographics. The Government admit that on the one hand—one hon. Member said that they were cutting the number of teacher-training places—but, on the other, they refuse to admit it in their provision for the future. I would have thought that a White Paper on English schools would have had that at its centre. This is such a major problem for local authorities, schools and education finance that I would have thought that the White Paper would have had at least a section on it, not half a sentence. That is a major dereliction of duty. I have made the point on the Floor of the House and to the press about how significant the problem is, but some people just do not get it.

How can we manage the problem? There are two basic choices—a market-based system and a system with strategic management through the local authority. The White Paper, as we all know, moves towards the market direction, with parental choice deciding which schools stay open and which close. The Minister may say that chapter 9 of the White Paper proposes that local authorities should have extra powers to close failing schools immediately. She would be right, but note the word "failing". In the White Paper, that means failing academic performance, not financial viability or whether there are too many surplus places. The White Paper is clear and it is not a solution to the problem.

The White Paper's focus is very much on a market-led reduction in the number of surplus places. Will that be efficient? Will it involve parents? Will it ensure that it happens quickly? My answer is, of course, no. It is the most expensive way, the most delayed way and the least consultative way of dealing with this major problem . Indeed, the Audit Commission's response to the Select Committee report on the White Paper is absolutely devastating. On page 5 it argues in a slightly underplayed way, which is typical of bodies such as the commission, that

"communities and"— local government—

"would benefit from the government acknowledging explicit advisory levels of acceptable surplus places within a council or a sub-regional area. There will be of course be regional local differences but the Audit Commission's view is that the previous benchmarks"—

they have been downgraded by the Department—

"of 10 per cent of places in aggregate and 25 per cent in individual schools should be reinforced."

That may be a way forward. I am not saying that it is the only solution, but we could debate it and discuss the level of spare capacity that is sufficient to provide parental choice. I am not against that. Spare capacity is necessary, but the question is how much. That should be the debate and the figures used may help that. Spare capacity costs council tax payers money and, as my hon. Friend the Member for Southport said, council tax payers, the wider community and parents want to know that public resources are being efficiently managed. They want some guidelines on how many extra places they are being asked to pay for. Will the Minister tell us whether her Department has some guidelines in mind and whether it will publish them? If not, what is the Minister's estimate of the cost of a surplus place today? How much does an empty place in a secondary school or a primary school cost the taxpayer? Obviously, there are various assumptions about that. If she cannot give an answer to the question today, I hope that she will confirm that she will write to me with one, as the question is germane to this debate and to the debate that we will have during the next few weeks.

We have done a few sums. In 1996, the Audit Commission took an authoritative stab at an estimate in a document called "Trading Places". If that figure is augmented by the extra amount that the Government have allocated per pupil, by the increase in surplus places and by inflation, it starts to approach £600 per surplus place. That is a huge amount, given that surplus places are increasing.

Let me give an authoritative notion—a feel—for the number of surplus places. Again, I quote from the Audit Commission's submission to the Select Committee. It states:

"In 2004 there were nearly half a million surplus places in the primary sector."

That is half a million at perhaps £600 each. The report states that that "represented over 11 per cent. of the total capacity."

Perhaps that is value for money in terms of parental choice, but let us at least have a debate about it.

The Audit Commission also looks forward to what will happen. Worryingly, despite the increase in the birth rate in Dudley, North, the report states:

"Unless action is taken, two thirds of council areas will have over 10 per cent. surplus places by 2008".

That will be a massive problem in the primary sector.

In recent years, there has been an increase in the number of pupils entering the secondary sector, but we are about to have 10 years of year-on-year decline in every region. In 2004, there were 22,000 surplus places in the secondary sector—6 per cent. of capacity. According to the Audit Commission,

"by 2011 more than a third of council areas will have greater than 10 per cent. surplus places."

That is in just seven years' time. With a 10-year planning horizon, it will be significantly more.

The extra capacity will have a huge cost. Are the Government saying that they will fund local authorities and schools to meet that cost? I do not think so. Therefore, they ought at least to have a strategy. They ought to tell us today what they will do. I would like the Minister to tell us whether the Department for Education and Skills commissioned any research or reports on the issue from anybody, be it the Audit Commission or anyone else, this year, last year or the year before. If it has not, it has been negligent. If the Minister cannot answer the question today, I hope that she will write to me and to other Members with the information.

There is a real issue about value for money and about the future of our schools. At present, we hear nothing from the Minister that suggests that the Government are at all on top of the issue.

Dr. Pugh: I suspect that many hon. Members who have spoken will disagree, when it comes to practical cases, on the most benign way of keeping surplus place figures down, but, surely, we are confronted with a Government strategy that is, in fact, likely to increase the problem—not only not address it, but make it much worse.

Mr. Davey: My hon. Friend anticipates exactly what I was about to say. We can see a little of the future. The Government may say that their plans are not like those for the grant-maintained schools of the past, and they are right—they are not identical. However, there are some lessons to be learned, as the grant-maintained school system was based on more independent decision-making by governing bodies and head teachers.

London had more than its fair share of grant-maintained schools, and what happened? In London, more than in any other region, there was a decline in planning for future places and a reduction in the spare capacity that was needed for youngsters. London has had more problems because of the Tory experiment with grant-maintained schools. Bizarrely, the Government have looked at London and said, "Let us find a solution for the whole country based on London's problems. In fact, let us give the rest of the country the Tories' solution for London and all the problems of London." That is bonkers.

My hon. Friend is right to say that we can debate the best way to manage the problem and how much surplus capacity we are prepared to pay for—the right amount of money to put into maintaining some capacity for parental choice—but we surely cannot think that the proposals in the White Paper are the way to deal with the issue. They are chaotic and non-strategic and would not involve parents in the way that the hon. Member for Dudley, North wishes.

Those who talk about parental choice as if it is the only thing that matters have some questions to answer. We may all want parents to be involved, but should that be the first-order issue when we are considering the management of schools? When parents do not choose choice because they want a good local school, should policy makers force choice down their throat or spend taxpayers' money in other ways—on smaller class sizes, on improving the supply of teachers and on improving the curriculum choice for young people? There are many reforms other than the ones on offer that would improve standards in our schools. There are many other ways of dealing with the surplus-place problem that is hitting English schools, and I hope that the Government, even at this late hour, will change their strategy.

11.56 am

Mr. Nick Gibb (Bognor Regis and Littlehampton) (Con): I should like to start by congratulating the hon. Member for Southport (Dr. Pugh) on securing this important debate. There is no more important issue in today's world than education, and all of us in the House who take an interest in education matters set out with the objective of improving the quality of education in our schools and raising standards.

I am sure that the Minister will agree that it is always tragic when a local school is forced to close. It is deeply unsettling when rumours abound that a school is about to be closed. Falling school rolls over the years present real challenges to many local education authorities, as exemplified in the speech of the hon. Member for Dudley, North (Mr. Austin). As the hon. Member for Blaydon (Mr. Anderson) said, 17 schools in Gateshead have 25 per cent. or more surplus places, and that is due to rise to some 26 schools by 2010. The parliamentary answer that the hon. Member for Southport received recently shows that, on average, 25 secondary schools have closed every year for the past five years.

The hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton (Mr. Davey) spoke eloquently about the problems caused by falling rolls, but I listened and waited in vain for his proposed solutions. He is surely not putting forward the proposition that no schools can ever close in this country.

Mr. Davey: The hon. Gentleman is right. I should have been more explicit about my party's solution. I believe that democratically accountable local authorities with a leadership role in their communities working with parents, schools and the Department is the way to manage the problem. That has been done in places such as Knowsley, where there are many education challenges. That authority is moving from 11 to eight secondary schools and taking the whole community with it. That is good local authority leadership, and that is what we should be promoting.

Mr. Gibb: I am grateful for the hon. Gentleman's explanation, but such an approach is not mutually exclusive of parental choice.

I listened carefully to the passionate defence of Ainsdale Hope high school by the hon. Member for Southport, who, clearly, is far better placed than most of us to know the truth about how good the school is. I do not question his judgment or his passion, but he said that parental opinion could often be influenced by transitory factors such as who is the headmaster. Issues such as the leadership of a school are not transitory matters. They are fundamental to the success and reputation of a school, and it is wrong to dismiss such factors as airily as he did.

Dr. Pugh: I hope that I did not give that impression. The point is that there is a rotation of head teachers and we have observed in our own constituencies that the reputation of a school can hinge on its head teacher, even if they are there for a decade. We are talking about institutions in which millions of pounds are invested over many years—several decades—and if a school is needed in the community it should not go under simply because there is a switch of resources from one school to another, which may not be sustained.

Mr. Gibb: The hon. Gentleman is right, but that shows the paramount importance of governors in selecting heads. The issue becomes increasingly difficult when there is a massive shortage of potential heads, and the number of applicants to schools is very narrow in some instances. In general, parents get things right.

Parents to whom I have spoken about local schools have very well informed views. They may or may not take much notice of league tables or Ofsted reports. Some regard such information as irrelevant, but some regard it as very important and will read the website and pay close attention to the facts and figures. However, few parents, even those who scrutinise the website in detail, rely solely on such information. They base their views on years of local knowledge about the school. I am not talking about Ainsdale Hope high school, but more generally.

Issues such as the behaviour of pupils when they walk to and from the school, how smart they look, the number of incidents of poor behaviour reported in the local newspaper and the number of Oxbridge places that pupils gain are often an influence on the reputation of a school. Word of mouth, the general view of parents of pupils at a school and how happy they are with the quality of teaching, the level of discipline, the prevalence of bullying and the amount of homework that the children take home are all factors. I trust parents' views, and if they dislike a school, I take the view that they are likely to be right. That is why the Conservative party supports the notion of parental choice in selecting a school.

Mr. Davey: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will accept that all the different factors that he listed can apply now and there should be no bar to parents reacting to them. However, the notion that everything should be decided by parents misleads people. The idea that parents can choose absolutely everything in their local education system is not true and cannot be. Is there not a danger that some of that rhetoric is not telling parents the full truth?

Mr. Gibb: The hon. Gentleman makes very valid points, which I shall deal with in a moment.

Choice is important. In this modern, consumer age of transparency where information on all things is widely and easily available, the idea that choice can be reduced or eliminated is not of the real world. The hon. Gentleman attacks the concept of choice—[Interruption.] He is either saying that he will increase or reduce choice. Leaving aside the practical realities and considering the legal basis of allowing parents to have choice within what is available, if he is implying by his criticism that choice should be reduced, that is a huge mistake and wrong in principle.

Mr. Davey: I am glad that the hon. Gentleman has given me a chance to clarify. I am absolutely not saying that. Indeed, one of my concerns about the proposals in the White Paper to give schools control of admissions, which his party supports, is that it will reduce parental choice. In many ways, by opting for the approach that the Government are taking, those in his party have become the enemies of the parental choice that exists at the moment through a fair admissions system decided by local admission forums.

Mr. Gibb: I am often amused by the concept that increasing choice somehow reduces it, but we shall leave that aside for the moment.

In many cases, as the hon. Gentleman said, such choice is limited, given the shortage of places at good schools, and there are other practical realities that limit choice. However, that is not a reason to limit choice. It is a reason to do more to expand the number of places at good schools. The hon. Member for Southport is right to say that the situation is very different in rural areas, or in suburban parts of Britain outside London, where the reality is that choice is limited. Again, that is not a reason for limiting choice by law where it is possible.

The fact that there are surplus places in an area is not a bad thing in itself. If every surplus place were to be driven out of the system, parental choice would be limited further still. We need a sizeable percentage of surplus places to oil the system to enable the choice mechanism to work, which is why, during the lead-up to the last election, we proposed allowing 10 per cent. of places to be surplus. As the hon. Member for Southport said, the Audit Commission has said that falling school rolls are likely to mean that 10 per cent. of places will be surplus. That carries a cost, as the hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton said.

The Schools Minister in a recent answer to a parliamentary question said:

> "Local authorities are responsible for planning school places in their areas. They have a duty to ensure that there are sufficient places to meet the needs of the local community and must also ensure that high quality education is provided in a cost-effective way."—[Official Report, 19 December 2005; Vol. 440, c. 2425W.]

She said later:

> "Where schools expand or new schools are created to meet parental demand we expect local authorities to act decisively to remove surplus places in schools which are not popular with parents and to ensure educational resources are used in the most efficient way possible."—[Official Report, 19 December 2005; Vol. 440, c. 2432W.]

The Minister is right. Surplus places should be removed in unpopular schools, and as I have said, we should trust parents' assessment of the quality of local education provision. However, I would not want the Minister's views as expressed in that answer to be interpreted as meaning a complete eradication of all surplus places. There was a report in last week's Southport Visiter. Is that a weekly newspaper?

Dr. Pugh: Bi-weekly.

Mr. Gibb: It is a bi-weekly newspaper. Its report said:

"Following the shutting of five schools and the merger of a further four in South Sefton last year, the council claims Southport now has the highest number of surplus places in the borough—with 975 empty desks."

I am not sure what percentage that figure is of the total number of places, but if the drive behind Sefton's school closure plan is to drive out all surplus places, it is not an efficient way to marshal resources.

For a long time, our party has claimed the existence of a surplus places rule, according to which a local authority would refuse to allow a popular school to expand on the grounds that there are surplus places in the area. I know from correspondence that the director of education in West Sussex council says precisely this, but the Government have consistently denied the existence of such a rule. In the five-year strategy published in 2004 they say:

"There is no 'surplus places rule' that prevents schools from expanding. All successful and popular schools may propose to expand, and we strongly support them in doing so where they believe they can sustain their quality."

Lord Filkin said, in another place:

"I should also touch briefly on the issue of the surplus places rule. There is no surplus places rule".—[Official Report, House of Lords, 18 January 2005; Vol. 668, c. 693.]

Such denials were blown out of the water in October last year when the Prime Minister said, in a speech on the White Paper given the day before it was published:

"In our schools, as I shall go on to describe, the system will finally be opened up to real parent power. All schools will be able to have Academy style freedoms. All schools will be able to take on external partners. No one will be able to veto parents starting new schools or new providers coming in, simply on the basis that there are local surplus places."

The Prime Minister told the Liaison Committee:

"I am simply saying that you cannot say that good schools are unable to expand simply because you have got surplus places elsewhere when the surplus places elsewhere may be in a school that is not up to standard."

So there we are. My party agrees with the Prime Minister, but I am less sure whether Labour Back Benchers agree with him. The Government will certainly have our support for measures in the Bill, when it is finally published, that genuinely enable good schools to expand and give genuine autonomy to schools.

The recent National Audit Office report, "Improving poorly performing schools in England", revealed that 23 per cent. of secondary schools in England are underperforming. All of us in the House have to work together to tackle that problem, and the Opposition will do all that we can.

Dr. Pugh: One final nagging doubt about the hon. Gentleman's stance afflicts me. He will accept that most parents would choose a very good local school and that parents do not willingly choose to send their children any further than they have to, because that is expensive and, although travel broadens the mind, most travel to school does not. If the net effect of that is that the local school is in financial difficulty and goes under, is that the best long-term solution? Might not a better long-term solution be to ensure that a good local school is there for everyone, because that must be ultimately what everyone would choose?

Mr. Gibb: Of course the hon. Gentleman is right. We want more local schools delivering high-quality education. Parental choice is not the be-all and end-all; it is not the only mechanism for driving up standards. I am thinking of a range of other measures, taken by the local authority, the Department for Education and Skills and the Qualifications and Curriculum Authority. All those bodies have a role to play in trying to drive up standards, so that we have more good schools in more localities throughout Britain. Ultimately, however, parents should have a say, and if parents do not want to send their child to a school because they are worried about its reputation, standards and quality of teaching, they are perfectly entitled not to, and consequences follow from that.

The Opposition are concerned about facts in the National Audit Office report and we will do all that we can with the Government, or by opposing the Government, to ensure that the problem is tackled as soon as possible, because in this global world, where high values of education are vital, we can no longer allow 23 per cent. of our secondary schools to be regarded by Ofsted as under-performing.

12.12 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Maria Eagle): I congratulate the hon. Member for Southport (Dr. Pugh) on obtaining the debate, which has been excellently conducted by hon. Members on both sides of the Chamber. The hon. Member for Southport perhaps raised more local issues about his experience in his constituency and with his local authority, but hon. Members on both sides of the Chamber have connected to the wider debate. We might consider today's occasion to be some of the opening skirmishes of the debate on the education White Paper, but it has been a thoroughly enjoyable and excellent debate. In the time available, I shall try to deal with as many of the points raised by hon. Members as possible, but given that the debate was initiated by the hon. Member for Southport, I shall also try to deal with some of the specific points that he raised about his constituency experience.

I am pleased to acknowledge—this fact is incontrovertible—that hon. Members on both sides of the House have the interests of children and schools very much at heart. We are all engaged as politicians in the game of trying to ensure that we improve standards for children; that children can, as they grow up, meet their full potential and that they have the best possible choices in life, which only a thoroughly good education can bring. By achieving that, they can perhaps overcome disadvantages that they may have in life. That is the core of all the policy thinking and all the interventions and speeches that we have heard today from hon. Members on both sides of the Chamber, so I am happy to acknowledge it.

The hon. Member for Southport did not specifically mention this one way or the other, but Sefton council, his local authority, has received significant funding increases aimed at improving and assisting in the running of schools in his constituency. Since 1997, its funding has increased by £1,270 per pupil in real terms, which is a 46 per cent. increase and is over the national average. In the current financial year, Sefton will receive a just over £3,500 guaranteed unit of funding per pupil. We are having this debate about standards and organisation of schools in the context of increasing resource levels and of a debate about how best to turn that money into real value and excellent outcomes for as many children as possible.

Of course, schools' organisation is primarily a matter for local authorities. The hon. Member for Southport suggested what I should not include in my speech. It is quite interesting to have the hon. Gentleman who called for the debate tell the Minister in advance what he does and does not want to hear. None the less, he will have to listen to a little of what he perhaps does not want to hear. There is no doubt that organisation of schools is a matter for local determination. That is just a matter of fact since the School Standards and Framework Act 1998, and I for one, as a Minister in the Department for Education and Skills, am happy that I do not have to sit at my desk and try to work out which schools in the constituencies of each hon. Member in England ought to stay open and expand, or close. To be perfectly honest, if I had to do that, I would have no time to do anything else and I would almost certainly be one of the most unpopular people in the country, whether or not every decision that I had made was perfect.

These matters have to be determined at local level, are sensibly determined at local level and should not land on the desks of Ministers. The hon. Member for Southport has to accept, although he did not want me to say it, that it is incontrovertibly the fact that these matters are dealt with, and are best dealt with, by local authorities.

My hon. Friend the Member for Dudley, North (Mr. Austin) said that he would like to see more consultation, discussion, information and openness about the way in which the decisions in respect of the two schools in his constituency are being made. I support him in that respect. He needs to ensure that he continues to press the council, as I am sure he will, to be as open, honest and transparent as possible, not only with him but with local parents, about the way in which that reorganisation should be pursued. If he is even disputing the facts about the birth rate, a lot more clearly needs to be done to ensure that there is a shared understanding locally of what the needs are in his constituency. However, I am sure that, like any hon. Member, he is perfectly capable of making that point to the relevant people who need it to be made to them, without too much assistance from me.

My hon. Friend the Member for Blaydon (Mr. Anderson) made specific points about surplus places. Not surprisingly, that was a strong theme running through the debate. It was flagged up by the hon. Member for Southport, who referred to the situation at what was Ainsdale high school and is now Ainsdale Hope high school. He will know that I know his constituency well, being a Member of Parliament from a not-too-distant place. He might not know that I attended for the whole of my secondary education one of Sefton's excellent local schools—Formby high school—so I have personal experience not of Ainsdale high school, but certainly of Sefton schools. That leads me to accept his assertion that it is a good local authority in respect of the way in which it carries out its duties to schools. Certainly, Ofsted reports do not indicate anything other than that, and it is grappling with this issue.

The hon. Gentleman did not quite mention what has happened in terms of numbers at Ainsdale Hope. My understanding is that it has gone from having 628 pupils in January 2005, which meant that there were 171 surplus places in the school, to having 366 pupils this January, so it is clearly moving in the wrong direction in terms of parents sending their kids to that local school. I am happy to accept that the local authority has been doing what it can to support the school, not only by closing it as a community school and reopening it as a voluntary-aided school, but by putting investment into the site. For example, a learning centre has been placed, I believe, in a building on the site. It is not, perhaps, in the school itself, but it certainly makes the school a centre of all kinds of educational opportunities in the area. The hon. Gentleman will have more insight into the subject than me, but from the numbers it seems that local parents have not been convinced. We know from constituency experience that we can run into difficulties. If local people feel that the school will inevitably close, it can become a self-fulfilling prophecy, as people move their children before the school closes.

There is no doubt that the local authority will have to handle the issue, as it seems determined to do. However, I should make one or two points about falling school rolls and surplus places, because it has been a theme of the debate. We know that nationally the number of children in primary education is falling—the hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton (Mr. Davey) made the point—and that that impacts on secondary schools.

In Sefton, in the constituency of the hon. Member for Southport, 15.2 per cent. of primary school places are surplus, which amounts to 3,911 places. Some 4.6 per cent. of secondary school places are surplus, which amounts to 1,013 places. As the hon. Member for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton (Mr. Gibb) said, it is not sensible to run a system without any surplus places; there have to be enough places to take account of people moving in and out, the needs of looked-after children, who may move from school to school, and people who move home between the usual rounds of admissions. We cannot be silly about that; there must be at least some surplus places. None the less, the point can be reached at which the inefficiency of a local authority operating at such a level means that action must be taken. If the level of surplus places is too high, it can represent a poor use of resources. Those resources could be used more effectively to support other schools in raising standards. In such problem cases, the local authority must take action.

Mr. Davey: Surplus capacity is not just about in-year transfers and a little bit of slack; it is necessary for parental choice and preference. That is why my party believes that there is some value in paying for surplus places. The question is how many.

Maria Eagle: I was not suggesting that the hon. Gentleman thought otherwise. Nor do we seem to disagree that if there is to be any choice, there must be some surplus and slack in the system to enable that choice to be made. I doubt that we would agree on the precise percentage, or that we would even have time for such a debate. I have no doubt that it will feature in our discussions about the White Paper and legislation arising from it.

The problem of surplus places was not created by the White Paper or by any policies introduced by the current Government. In any system, there must always be a question over what to do with surplus places. The problem did not suddenly appear with the White Paper; it is an issue with which every system must cope.

With the Audit Commission, we have produced a web-based toolkit, of which hon. Members may be aware and with which they may be familiar. It offers a range of practical advice and guidance to local authorities facing such issues. We encourage imagination. My hon. Friend the Member for Dudley, North suggested some imaginative ways of dealing with the issue, and he mentioned his local authority's need to close two schools. There are ways—less brutal than school closure—in which we can encourage the local education community to deal with such issues. However, I am not saying that school closures are not sometimes necessary.

Mr. David Anderson: The Minister has laid out exactly what we in Gateshead are trying to do. The options include extra community use and use by the health service. Reality clashes with parental choice, however. The parents do not want to see the schools close, and the only way around that is not to close them, and to reduce class sizes and provide a better education. That would be a win-win for everyone.

Maria Eagle: It is tremendously important that in such debates, all local implications are thoroughly discussed. That is why I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Dudley, North will get back on to his council to be a bit more open. When there is a thorough local debate, local parents are not totally selfish, nor are they interested only in their school; they are interested in all local facilities. There are other ways forward, including amalgamation, federation and collaboration, and the extension of schools to include public service facilities, such as health facilities. They are local solutions that may be appropriate.

I agree with the hon. Member for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton that parents are not daft. They, much more than somebody in Whitehall or in a council chamber, know what is best not only for their children but for their local community. It is important that parents are involved. Parents will not always be rational locally; they may sometimes do something that is not sensible. However, the essential arguments and discussions must take place locally. Through the school organisation committees and, eventually, the adjudicator, there is a mechanism for resolving any local disagreements.

The system is designed to attempt to ensure some kind of agreement—unanimous, preferably—among local stakeholders, so that such matters can be taken forward sensibly, without dictation by Whitehall, guided by good practice and toolkits on our website, of which people can make use in order to deal with the local situation in Sefton, Dudley, North or Blaydon.

Dr. Pugh: I am very much in favour of the benign solutions and the consultation of which the Minister speaks, but in trying to anticipate what will befall the local authority, one factor is knowing precisely what it needs to do about children's centres and extended schools, and precisely when "Building Schools for the Future", for example, will come its way. Early indications can turn problematic situations into almost beneficial situations.

Maria Eagle: I agree with the hon. Gentleman. Those decisions must be made with the maximum information, via the DFES, not only for the big, capital programmes such as "Building Schools for the Future", but for other public services, such as health or children's centres. It is not necessarily easy to obtain all the information when it is needed, but locally we must try to ensure the availability of as much information as possible in order to make the best possible decisions. I do not resile from the fact that those decisions ought to be made locally. The hon. Member for Southport did not want me to say that, but I have and it is now on the record.

Surplus school places and falling primary rolls will form a key part of the debate about the White Paper. The hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton asked me several specific questions about the cost to a local authority of paying for its surplus places. He will not be surprised that I cannot give him a figure, because it varies and one might choose to use many different parameters in order to work it out. Statisticians get excited trying to work out such figures. Although I cannot respond specifically to his points, I am happy to drop him a line to deal with the points that we do not deal with today. There is no doubt that surplus places provide a way of ensuring that schools can respond to the movement of pupils. Surplus places are not always 100 per cent. bad. It can become difficult if their level becomes too high in a particular area. I will write to the hon. Gentleman.

Derek Conway (in the Chair): Order. I am sorry to interrupt the Minister, but I think that she has fairly well finished anyway. We must now move on to the next debate on Darfur and the threat to security in Sudan, in the name of Mr. David Drew.

Security (Sudan)

12.30 pm

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): I am delighted to introduce this Adjournment debate, having escaped from Committee proceedings on the Animal Welfare Bill in which I was speaking about 30 seconds before I arrived in this Room. I am delighted also that the hon. Members for Buckingham (John Bercow) and for St. Ives (Andrew George), the Front-Bench spokesman for the Liberal Democrats, are present. I welcome the Minister to the debate. Its subject is not his particular portfolio, but I am sure that it will be a quick and helpful learning curve on Africa.

I wish to thank Senait Petros who has become the co-ordinator for the all-party group on Sudan, her predecessor Sultana Begum and my predecessor, Hilton Dawson, for the work that he did on Sudan. He is much lamented. We make no apology for continuing to raise the issue in this place, especially Darfur, which is in a parlous state. I thank Christian Aid, Amnesty International and Oxfam, which have also helped to bring to our attention some of the issues on which I shall dwell.

The humanitarian, security and political situations continue to deteriorate in Darfur. Atrocities happen daily. People are still dying of malnutrition and disease in large numbers and a new famine is feared. According to recent reports by the World Food Programme, the United Nations and the Coalition for International Justice, 3.5 million people are now hungry, 2.5 million people have been displaced due to violence and 400,000 people have died in Darfur. As the security situation deteriorates—I stress "deteriorates"—humanitarian access is becoming worse. The international community is failing to protect civilians or to influence the Sudanese Government sufficiently to make sure that there is proper access.

The breakdown of the peace process and the deterioration of the security situation in Darfur have led to worsening relationships between Chad and Sudan, and the rebellion has ramifications that go beyond Darfur into the east of the country and threaten the comprehensive peace agreement. I intend to refer to those issues, but with your permission, Mr. Conway, I hope that the hon. Member for Buckingham will be able to speak after I have finished.

The sanction report of the UN Security Council's committee on Sudan said that small arms and ammunition have increasingly been flowing to the anti-Government rebels from Chad, Eritrea and Libya in violation of the UN arms embargo. The UN-appointed panel also accused the Government of Sudan of violating the embargo by moving arms into Darfur from elsewhere in the country arming the Arab militias and deploying additional attack helicopters. That is all well known; the simple fact is that it continues to this day.

The report of the International Commission of Inquiry on 31 January highlighted the violation of human rights in Darfur. The main findings state that the Government of Sudan, the Arab militias and the rebels are all guilty of serious violation of human rights and humanitarian law that may amount to crimes against humanity and/or war crimes. Following that, on 29 March the UN Security Council passed resolution 1591. In reply to my parliamentary written question on 12 January, it was good to hear the Minister for Trade, who speaks on Africa in the House, make a robust statement on behalf of my noble Friend Lord Triesman, in which he stated that the UK Government want the International Criminal Court to be able to investigate what has been going on in Darfur. It is lamentable that the Government of Sudan continue to block that and not recognise the ICC. My hon. Friend the Minister might want to express some views on that.

The Security Council has put in place an asset freeze and travel ban on belligerents. It does not seem to be working. What does my hon. Friend have to say about that? What will the United Kingdom Government do to pressurise the Government of Sudan to fulfil their obligation to identify, neutralise and disarm militia groups outside the formal state security forces under their influence, as demanded by the Security Council? What will they do to pressurise all sides to abide by the ceasefire and the security protocols, and the recommendation under resolution 1591 to widen the arms embargo? Clearly, the recommendation is not working. What are the Government doing to put pressure on the key nations of Chad, Eritrea and Libya to stop playing an unhelpful role in aspects of the conflict?

The ceasefire and peace talks seem to be making rocky progress. Since July 2005, efforts to push forward the peace process have continued. However, a split within the Sudan Liberation Movement/Army has brought the talks to a standstill. Negotiations with the SLM/A and the Justice and Equality Movement led eventually to the opening up of a joint position on behalf of the rebels. Given that the rebels have demanded the vice-presidency of Sudan and the return of territory that was removed from Darfur and incorporated into northern Sudan in the 1990s, such matters have been brought to an abrupt halt. I wonder what the UK Government are doing to provide capacity to the rebels but, more particularly, what pressure are they putting on the Government of Sudan to get the peace talks under way?

I have received much evidence from Amnesty International of awful human rights abuses, such as rapes and sexual violence against women and girls. I have much evidence of illegal detentions, arrest and intimidation of civilians, forced returns of internally displaced persons and evidence of torture. The Sudanese Organisation Against Torture—the wonderful organisation that we met when the hon. Member for Buckingham and I were last in Sudan—comes forth daily with many lists of people who are being discriminated against and worse. In the west of Darfur, an even worse situation is growing. Again, what are the UK Government doing to put pressure on both the Chadian Government and the Sudanese Government to help resolve the problem?

I shall move on to the wider scene in Sudan. As an all-party group, we have been desperately worried for the past two years that whatever is happening in Darfur can be played out in the east of the country. We met representatives of the Abuja Congress there and we continue to meet them here. They seem to be only a touch away from launching their own conflict, which would be a desperate situation. Matters are made worse because of the closeness of Eritrea and Ethiopia, which are making their own warlike noises. It would be interesting to know what the UK Government are trying to do to bring some sanity into the situation. Under the comprehensive peace agreement, the SLM/A must withdraw from eastern Sudan by 9 January 2006. There is no evidence that that has happened. What will the UK Government do to make that happen? The withdrawal is behind schedule and there is a risk that it could spark a full-scale conflict.

I shall speak positively about the CPA towards the end of my remarks, but if it is to mean anything, it will have to bring peace to Darfur and stop war in the east. It is not only the Government of Sudan who must be brought to task to make sure that that is happening. Pressure must be put on the SLM/A that will result in something better happening. As for the International Crisis Group, it is recommended that the UN should name a special envoy to do what Senator Danforth was doing several years ago. It needs a lead mediator who can speak to all the different parties. What are the UK Government doing to bring that forward?

Andrew George (St. Ives) (LD): The hon. Gentleman is making an excellent case and asking exactly the right questions. Does he wish to comment on the context of the UN mandate? We both went to see Lord Triesman to discuss the issue. Does the hon. Gentleman wish to comment on whether that might be strengthened, and if so, how? Are there sufficient African Union troops in the area to enforce that sort of mandate?

Mr. Drew: The hon. Gentleman is percipient: I was about to mention the African Union and the support that we should be providing, starting with the point that the AU force is still not up to strength. I believe that it was demanding 7,700 peacekeepers; it said that that was how many it needed to be at least partly effective on the ground. What are we doing to help in that regard?

I do not know what has been the outcome of the dispute over the failure of the Government of Sudan to allow in the armoured personnel carriers that the Canadian Government kindly offered. Are they still stuck somewhere in Khartoum, or have they now reached the place that they should be at? It would be interesting to get the definitive answer to that; there are rumours that they have now been released, but it would be good to hear what the Government have to say about that.

How can we further bolster the AU? In the short term, there needs to be a push for support to the western part of Darfur, but the AU force may need to be strengthened further and linked with UN—and, possibly, NATO—forces because of logistical requirements. We might also need to put pressure not only on the Government of Sudan, but on the Government of China, who have not been helpful through the UN Security Council. I would like the Minister to comment on that.

My last point relates to eastern Darfur. It is somewhat bizarre that there are suggestions that Sudan is being nominated for the chairmanship of the AU. Nothing ceases to amaze me, but in this time and place, with AU troops in that country to try to keep the peace there, it is surely not appropriate for the Government of Sudan to be chairing the AU, which is, in a sense, trying to scrutinise what they are doing.

I will finish on a more positive note, before allowing the hon. Member for Buckingham—who is my good friend—to say a few words. The comprehensive peace agreement is a wonderful achievement; no one wants to underestimate that. However, questions arise out of the fact that it appears that only $112 million out of the $4.5 billion that the donors promised has yet to be made available in the pot. That will lead both the Government in Khartoum and the SLM/A in the south seriously to question the will of the wider world to deliver on its promises in respect of the CPA. Although I welcome what the CPA is about overall, the proof will be in the eating, and it will be a bit disappointing if what has happened so far is evidence of an unwillingness on behalf of the western world in particular to put its money where its mouth is.

12.43 pm

John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): I am extremely grateful to the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) for—characteristically generously—giving me this opportunity to contribute to the debate. It was a privilege to go with him to Sudan, including Darfur, in the summer of 2004, and I agree with everything that he has said.

I want specifically to pick up on the point that the hon. Gentleman made about Sudan's prospective chairmanship of the African Union. I cannot think of a single step that would be simultaneously more absurd and better guaranteed to undermine its reputation, and I very much hope that that is avoided.

In Darfur, it is extremely difficult to establish with any precision the numbers of deaths—as the Minister understands, and doubtless will himself proclaim. However, we can confidently say, without fear of exaggerating or of being contradicted, that death is still taking place in Darfur on a daily basis and on a significant scale—death through violence, through disease and through malnutrition, and I want briefly to focus on two points. First, given the capacity and funding constraints experienced by the AU mission and the recognition by the mission itself of the need for a step change in tackling the violence in Darfur, would it not now make sense for the international community to go for a direct transfer to a UN mandate? That would allow for the AU force to be blue-helmeted, would make greater resources available, and would speed up deployment. That is my first and very specific challenge to the Minister.

I will now make my second point, after which I will listen attentively and respectfully to the Minister's reply, and to anything else that might be said. The international community in the form of the United Nations has adopted the responsibility to protect. I do not want to sound pious about this matter. We in this Chamber know very well that there is a pervasive cynicism about politics and politicians. That is a recurrent theme in debates on many different subjects; that cynicism applies to politicians irrespective of whether we are operating on a domestic terrain or discussing international issues. If the responsibility to protect is not to be merely a pious piece of rhetoric designed to make those who have crafted it look and sound good, but is to be translated into practice for the betterment of the human condition in some of the most difficult and ravaged parts of the world, the time is now for that to happen in Darfur.

[John Bercow]

That is simply not happening at present; it is not true to say that we regard it as a great priority to tackle the savagery and the cocktail of barbarity that has been served up there, principally by the Government of Sudan in recent years. There has been what I would describe as a holding operation by the AU—a new institution that is genuinely committed and that is doing its best with pathetic resources and with delivery on the promises of increased resources being very slow.

My anxiety is that we are in danger of becoming desensitised to death on a dramatic scale; it is almost as though the number, range and seriousness of conflicts around the world are causing us to be numbed by the seeming inevitability of it all. I know that we cannot change everything overnight, but we have a duty to act. I would like the Prime Minister, the Foreign Secretary and the Minister to be championing the cause for a UN mandate and for a much greater intensity of activity on a daily basis. That is what I want to hear about from the Minister, and I shall now resume my place in the expectation that I might.

The Minister for Europe (Mr. Douglas Alexander): I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) for securing this important and timely debate. In recent days in some of our newspapers, all-party groups have not received the most benign coverage, but the sort of debate that we have had this morning evidences both the importance of the work that this particular all-party group has undertaken, and the expertise and commitment that Members bring to this area of concern. I share with Members who have spoken profound concerns about the grave situation in Darfur and elsewhere in Sudan, about the problems in neighbouring Chad and the risks that they pose to Sudan, and about the problems in the east of the country and the slow progress towards a peace agreement in Abuja.

My hon. Friend and the hon. Member for Buckingham (John Bercow) raised a number of specific points, and I will endeavour to answer all the questions asked. I therefore hope that I will have Members' forbearance as I seek to make rapid progress in respect of remarks that I know will be of direct interest to some of them, and then in answering each of the specific questions.

The problems under discussion are of huge dimensions with terrible consequences for the people of Sudan. The situation is extremely serious. My ministerial colleagues and I—and, indeed, the British Government—are committed to a Sudan that is peaceful, democratic and prosperous and that respects human rights and the rule of law, a Sudan whose people share equally in their nation's future prosperity and that is an active and constructive member of the international community. That cannot be achieved until Sudan accepts and implements peace. Of course, the most immediate threat to Sudan's security comes from Darfur. We need to ensure also that the comprehensive peace agreement of which my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud spoke is fully implemented. There is a further threat in the east from ongoing conflict; that was also addressed in our debate.

Against the backdrop of this serious situation, progress has been made. It is worth taking stock of some of the main points. The international community has mobilised the largest humanitarian operation in the world in Darfur, feeding and providing for 3.4 million people. The humanitarian situation has improved significantly: the mortality rate is down and malnutrition rates have almost halved since last year. The United Kingdom is the second biggest national donor to Darfur, providing £75 million this year alone.

The African Union monitoring force has established an increasingly effective presence, and has improved security and reduced human rights abuses where it operates. As a result of international pressure, the Government of Sudan have withdrawn their Antonov bombers from Darfur and allowed in 105 Canadian-supplied armoured personnel carriers for the AU mission in Sudan. There is now a peace process—the Abuja talks to which I referred—which offers the possibility of a political settlement to the conflict. The referral of the situation to the International Criminal Court sends a strong signal to the world at large that there will be no impunity for those guilty of grave human rights abuses in that conflict.

Clearly there has not been enough progress, and in some areas there has been a deterioration. The old guard in Khartoum has still not done enough to rein in the forces and their proxies in Darfur, nor has it taken serious steps to punish those guilty of human rights abuses. In Darfur, security has deteriorated. The sheer numbers of people killed or injured through violence are shocking and abhorrent to our Government. The situation is becoming more complex, with the two rebel movements fighting each other. The AU force is still relatively weak and is facing a funding crisis.

I very much regret that AMIS—the African mission in Sudan—has suffered fatalities. I join my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for International Development and my noble Friend Lord Triesman in their condemnation as wholly unacceptable the killing of a Senegalese member of AMIS on 6 January. AMIS was originally conceived of as a smaller, short-term operation. Darfur will need a peace- support operation of increasing complexity for several more years, and the recent assessment mission for AMIS recommended that that would be best done by an international force. In principle, the AU supports handing over AMIS to the UN. That makes sense: it would put the funding and logistics on a surer footing and would allow the AU to focus on the longer-term priority of developing its own peacekeeping capacity.

Perhaps the greatest concern is the recent fighting in Chad; it risks spilling over into Darfur. Both Chadian and Sudanese rebels are active in Darfur. There is a risk of a military build-up by both countries on both sides of their borders. All parties need to exercise restraint, to demonstrate their commitment to peace in Darfur, and to seek a solution through negotiation, not violence.

I now turn to the questions asked by my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud and, first, to the role of the International Criminal Court and the progress made there. On 6 June, the ICC prosecutor, Moreno-Ocampo, announced the start of a formal investigation. The court has since been collecting evidence from various sources. On 13 December, the prosecutor briefed the United Nations Security Council, noting that the office had made good progress in the investigation's first phase, and that the next phase would involve seeking further assistance and co-operation from the Government of Sudan. Also on 13 December, Sudan's Justice Minister said that Sudan would not allow investigators from the ICC into Darfur.

My noble Friend Lord Triesman released a statement highlighting our concern and noting that we expect the Government of Sudan to comply with the wishes of the international community as set out in UN Security Council resolution 1593 and to co-operate fully with the ICC, should it decide to visit Darfur. Our ambassador in Khartoum also raised the matter directly with the vice-president of Sudan on 23 December. We have consistently made it clear that the Sudanese must co-operate with the ICC. The ICC visited Sudan recently, and the Government of national unity set up an intergovernmental committee to receive them.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stroud also raised the issue of Chad. We are obviously concerned about its current instability, and the tensions between it and Sudan. We are calling on both sides to rein in their troops and exercise restraint. Our ambassador in Khartoum raised those points with the Sudanese Foreign Minister on 7 January. Chad is host to 200,000 Darfurian refugees, who are in 10 camps located along the eastern frontier with Darfur. We are working closely with the international community to ensure that all contingencies have been prepared for. This year, the United Kingdom provided £5 million to the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, the World Food Programme and non-governmental organisations delivering life-saving medical assistance and water supplies. Support for the humanitarian response will continue in Chad during 2006 as part of our response to the problems in Darfur.

In relation to the comprehensive peace agreement and the UK Government's support, as part of our substantial development programme, the UK is providing £380,000 to support a number of key national commissions—on the judicial service, on the civil service, on human rights, on land, fiscal and financial monitoring and allocation, and on petroleum. The UK has already provided experts for the Abyei boundary commission and the constitutional review commission. In relation to the International Crisis Group's request for a high-level UN special envoy, I assure hon. Members that we have full confidence in the United Nations Secretary-General's current special representative, Mr. Jan Pronk.

I was asked what information we had on the location of the armoured personnel carriers. All 105 APCs have been delivered and are being deployed across Darfur. During the EU troika visit in October, Lord Triesman urged the Government of Sudan to ensure that equipment such as the Canadian APCs were allowed quickly into Darfur.

On the regional players—an issue that my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud raised—there is an important role for African countries in addressing the problems of Darfur. Of course, the AU is heavily involved, as I have said. Alan Goulty, the United Kingdom's special representative for Darfur, recently visited Tripoli for talks with the Libyan Government, and he plans to travel to Eritrea for talks with its Government shortly. I assure hon. Members that we recognise the importance of the regional players in the conflict.

On support for the southern Government, we are providing them with £2 million for rapid technical assistance. Addressing that new Government's considerable capacity constraints is, of course, a priority for us, so we will provide short-term advice on a flexible and responsive basis to fill the critical needs identified. In relation to the east of Sudan, on 11 January a militia allied to the Sudanese armed forces entered the eastern town of Hamesh Koreb and occupied positions held by the eastern front. The UN mission in Sudan—the UN force responsible for monitoring the comprehensive peace agreement—has sent a monitoring team to the area. Its initial assessment is that the incident was less significant than initial media reports claim. Our embassy in Khartoum is monitoring the situation closely.

The timetable for the withdrawal of the Sudan Liberation Movement/Army from eastern Sudan has been extended for one month by the joint defence board, which may reconsider the time scale once again before the deadline of 9 February. That is provided for under the terms of the comprehensive peace agreement, and we welcome that party's efforts to ensure that the CPA actually works.

On the point raised by the hon. Member for Buckingham of the Sudanese candidacy for the presidency of the African Union, it is of course for the AU member Governments to decide who the president of the AU should be. However, it would be difficult for the AU to maintain its credibility in Darfur, both in terms of its role in the Abuja talks and in relation to AMIS, if one of the parties to the conflict held the presidency. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will understand that I do not wish to say anything further at this stage, not least given the potential for the views of the British Government to become a factor in the discussions under way in the AU, in a way that might not help us to meet his objectives. However, I assure him that I have listened carefully to the points that he made.

Although the Abuja talks that I mentioned are making some progress, there is still a long way to go. In particular, the rebel movements are still holding too rigidly to maximalist positions on issues relating to power sharing and are not engaging fully on issues of security. The Government of Sudan could do more to engage the movements and break the impasse. Africans and non-Africans alike need to keep up the pressure on both sides to negotiate flexibly and with a much greater sense of urgency.

The continued problems in the east are also a concern for security in Sudan. The recent increase in attention paid to them is welcome, as are the recent announcements that the eastern front and the Government of Sudan are to meet under Libyan auspices to explore the possibility of a negotiated solution, possibly as early as today. If international observers are invited, the United Kingdom will of course attend. It has already played an important role, providing technical assistance to the eastern front to help it to prepare for peace talks. The international community needs to co-ordinate its efforts to ensure that there are viable solutions to the humanitarian problems of eastern Sudan as well as to security problems.

[Mr. Douglas Alexander]

The UK will continue to play a leading role on Darfur. We are vocal in pressing the Sudanese Government to provide security to their own people and to support the AU in Darfur. Within the UN and the EU, we have also worked to maintain strong international pressure—

Derek Conway (in the Chair): Order. I am sorry to interrupt the Minister when he has nearly finished, but the clock has beaten us.

Pensioner Incomes (Wellingborough)

1 pm

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): It is a particular pleasure, Mr. Conway, to serve for the first time in a debate under your chairmanship. I thank Mr. Speaker for granting me the opportunity for a debate on what is a very important issue for pensioners in my constituency, the Minister for attending the debate and his Department for its kind inquiries prior to it. I also welcome my hon. Friend the Member for Kettering (Mr. Hollobone), whose constituency neighbours mine and who also has issues and concerns about pensioners.

Wellingborough is a constituency in the east midlands with a mix of urban and rural areas. More than one eighth of the adult population is retired, and many worked in the shoe and boot industry prior to their retirement. The constituency could not be considered a high-income area.

After the general election of 2001, I felt that many politicians of all political parties had become arrogant and out of touch. They were more than happy to preach to people, but were not prepared to listen. So I founded the "Listening to Wellingborough and Rushden" campaign, which aimed to seek the views of local people, groups and organisations and campaign for change on their behalf. I listened to local people at every opportunity—through surveys and public meetings, and when I visited residents. People were crying out for someone to listen to their views and concerns and do something about them.

As part of my listening campaign, I was approached by a Mr. Martin Sterrow, a local pensioner who had never before been involved in any political activity. He had become outraged that year after year the small rise in his state pension had been swallowed up by massive increases in council tax. Mr. Sterrow approached me and his local councillor, Councillor Malcolm Waters, to arrange a public meeting. I was more than happy to do that as part of my listening campaign, but my experience of public meetings had been that very few people bothered to turn up. However, there must have been 100 people at Mr. Sterrow's public meeting, and there was real outrage from the pensioners who attended; some of them were prepared even to go to prison rather than have to pay the enormous increases in their council taxes.

The pensioners were concerned that their pension incomes were in decline in real terms, and made it clear that the listening campaign needed to take on board two issues. The first was the ever-increasing council tax with its double-digit increases year after year. They wanted those increases to be controlled. The second was the lack of a decent state pension, and they were adamant that the link between state pensions and earnings should be restored to give pensioners dignity and respect in their old age.

These people had worked hard all their lives, had not relied on the state and had saved through the years, putting money aside so that they could live comfortably during retirement. However, instead of that, they were being crippled by the amount of tax that they had to pay—first on their pensions, secondly through stealth taxes and thirdly through their council tax.

After the public meeting, Mr. Sterrow agreed to organise a petition asking the Government to restore the link between the state pension and earnings and to change how local authorities were funded to ensure that excessive year-on-year rises in council tax would not swallow up the much smaller percentage rises in the state pension. Mr. Sterrow and one or two other pensioners went from door to door throughout Wellingborough gathering signatures for the petition. They received a huge amount of support from local people and gathered more than 200 signatures. I should like to pay tribute to Mr. Sterrow's work and his raising of a very important issue.

As part of my listening campaign, I organised a second public meeting for concerned residents to voice their views to local borough councillors and county councillors, including the leader of Wellingborough council. My hon. Friend the Member for South Suffolk (Mr. Yeo) was present to accept the petition and take it to Westminster to update the shadow Cabinet on the Wellingborough pensioners' campaign.

That campaign took place in 2002 and 2003 and highlighted the problems local pensioners faced long before the issue of pensioners and council tax became the important national issue that it is today. The listening survey, which regularly goes out to Wellingborough residents, highlighted the issue very early on, when pensions and council tax came top of local concerns. I have to say that I asked for the tallies to be recounted, because at that time I did not believe that pensions and council tax were the top local concern. It turned out that they were.

I am more than aware that the problem is not confined to my constituency, and that pensioners nationwide have been forced into hardship through inflation-busting council tax rises swallowing up very small rises in the state pension. However, Wellingborough has seen the biggest rise in council tax since council tax was brought in. Pensioners in my constituency have been hit the hardest and are crying out for a change in the method of local government funding so that it does not penalise those on fixed incomes. I am assured by Mr. Sterrow that on occasion, the rise in his council tax bill was higher than the rise in his state pension.

The Minister for Pensions Reform (Mr. Stephen Timms): I am listening carefully to the points being made by the hon. Gentleman. I was not clear about the date of that very large council tax increase. Will he say what party controls Wellingborough council? This is a matter of local financial management as well as of Government funding.

Mr. Bone: I should make it clear that at the time, the local council and county council were Labour-controlled. However, I am not trying to make a party-political issue of that, because the county council and borough council were working within the difficulties that they had. Mr. Sterrow produced what I would call a rate bill and showed that in one particular year, the council tax increase was higher than the increase in his pension. That was surprising, although we bear in mind that we have seen the highest council tax increases in the country.

In the Chancellor's 2005 Budget, the Government announced that pensioner households with residents over the age of 65 would receive a one-off £200 payment towards their council tax as long as they did not receive the guaranteed element of pension credit. They would also receive the annual winter fuel payment, and then there would be the pension credit—a hugely complicated system in which pensioners have to fill in numerous forms and give highly personal financial information to Government pen-pushers.

Pensioners are unsure about what they are and are not entitled to; one could not make the system more complicated even if one wanted to. To be administered, the system has to employ thousands of staff, all at a cost to the taxpayer. It now employs snoopers to cold-call pensioners to ask over the telephone or at the doorstep for details of their incomes. That is a most disturbing development. When will the Government understand that many pensioners do not want to tell them about their personal circumstances?

A pensioner recently contacted me because someone from the Government was coming to his house to ask about his income and other circumstances, and I attended the meeting with the pensioner. The Government official turned up on the doorstep and presented an identity card not much bigger than a business card—most pensioners would have had difficulty in reading it. The official then started asking questions about the pensioner's income, savings and medical circumstances, and after all that told him that he was not entitled to any extra money. When I asked him, the official told me that he had made very many visits but that very few pension credits had been signed up—so there is much intrusion for little reward.

That method of going to people's homes to ask them personal questions epitomises this Government's Big Brother obsession. Their need to micro-manage and control everything has hit pensioners the hardest. Pensioners have to go through the indignity of means-testing, filling out a long and complicated form, to claim back what they have spent years putting in. It is, after all, their money—they have contributed to their national insurance stamp for years—and they should get a decent pension as an automatic right.

I did not enter politics 30 years ago so that, in a matter of a few years, 75 per cent. of our pensioners will have to fill out forms to get a decent pension. The pension is their right; pensioners have the right to retire with dignity and to enjoy the last years of their lives without the hassle of Government bureaucracy and intrusion. I have seen elderly pensioners who have paid taxes and national insurance all their working lives, and who continue to pay tax on their pensions, handing over £10 and £20 notes to pay for private operations because they are not able to get them done quickly enough on the NHS.

The Government are failing our pensioners. People have retired, applied for their state pension and given their bank details with the presumption that the payment would automatically be credited each month. In one instance, a man had asked for his pension to be paid into his bank account. He did not look at his account in detail until a year later, when he found that he had received no state pension at all. When he contacted the Pension Service he was told to make a claim, although he could not receive all the pension owed to him since he retired because he had claimed it too late, even though his original claim was made on the day he retired and the Pension Service had misplaced it.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): As the neighbouring Member of Parliament, I want to put on record how much local people appreciate my hon. Friend's interest in, and commitment to, his constituency concerns. On the last point that he made, I had a similar case in my constituency. An error had been made in the calculation of a constituent's pension entitlement and the Pension Service refused to refund all of the money. Will the Minister give us some encouragement that he will examine the rules, to ascertain whether appropriate reimbursement could be made more speedily, and in full, in future?

Mr. Bone: The situation is extremely strange. Where someone has paid into a pension all their life through their taxes, and then, because of an administrative error, they do not receive it, surely the amount should be backdated to them. That is common sense and fair play.

We are talking not about the rich and the better off, but about those who have paid into the state all their working lives, worked hard and saved a little for their retirement. Such people have been failed by this Government. My suggestion is that we give back dignity and respect to our pensioners. They have given so much to this country during their lives and deserve to spend their retirement comfortably, and to have dignity and respect.

We need just one system: one proper, decent state pension for all, regardless of how rich or poor people are. We should give pensioners one decent pension, and should scrap the pension credit, means-testing, the winter fuel allowance and living expenses. One proper, decent pension is needed so that pensioners can decide how to spend their money. It is not up to the Government to dictate how much money should go on what, and when and where it should go on it. Pensioners are not stupid; they know best how to spend their own money.

The Government might claim that my suggestion is just too expensive, but that is just an excuse. It is not because they cannot introduce a proper state pension, but because they will not do so. Savings can be made in hundreds of different areas. There are, for example, the millions of pounds left in the Government's coffers of unclaimed pension credit. So much remains that the Government need to employ snoopers and to spend millions on advertising campaigns. How can the pension credit system be working if so much money is not being claimed? It is not only a lack of awareness that prevents pensioners from applying, but the complex forms and the fact that pensioners are asked to disclose so much personal information. By far the most important reason is that pensioners hate the indignity of means-testing.

Millions of pounds are left in the Government coffers and thousands of staff are employed to administer the state pension, pension credit, winter fuel allowance and pensioners' living expenses. If there were just one system with one set of administrative staff, the financial savings would be huge. The Government might still give the excuse that one comprehensive pension system would be financially unviable, but what about all the money that they waste?

As a cricketer, I must congratulate the Government on reaching a century. Unfortunately, it is not a century of which they should be too proud. By my calculation, since 1997, under this Government, British taxpayers have paid £100 billion to the European Union. If just a fraction of that had been spent on British pensioners rather than on French farmers, we would not be having this debate. Assuming that the Government continue to be too cowardly to stand up for British interests in Europe, there are plenty of other places from which money could pay for a decent income for pensioners. What about the enormous amount of money that the Government waste each year in Britain?

The TaxPayers Alliance is about to publish a report stating that the Government waste £80 billion a year. On what do they waste that? Some £225,000 was spent on a scheme to advise people not to wear ill-fitting slippers. Some £40,000 was spent on coming up with a 46-word definition relating to patients' experience of the national health service. That works out at roughly at £1,000 a word. The Home Office has employed 142 consultants at a cost of £74 million. My favourite example is the £10,000 being spent by the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister on examining whether fire engines should remain red.

Let us have no rot from the Minister that the Government could not afford to pay pensioners a decent pension without means-testing. They choose not to do so, because they want to control everyone and to know everything about everyone. Most importantly, the Government believe that they know best. I urge them to trust our pensioners, to give them a decent pension and to give pensioners and the other people in Wellingborough what they deserve.

1.17 pm

The Minister for Pensions Reform (Mr. Stephen Timms): I welcome the opportunity to air the important matters on which this debate touches. It is refreshing to hear some good old-fashioned Conservative tub thumping from the hon. Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Bone), at a time when his party is moving in the opposite direction.

Over the past couple of decades pensioner incomes have risen almost twice as fast as earnings; between 1996–97 and 2003–04 pensioner incomes increased by about 21 per cent. compared with 13 per cent. for earnings. In the 1980s, the big increase in average pensioner incomes was mainly driven by increases in private pensions. That was excellent for those with an occupational pension, but not everyone was included. The result was that a large minority were left behind by the general improvement in pensioner incomes. Between 1979 and 1997 the income of the most well-off fifth of pensioners grew roughly twice as fast as that of the least well-off fifth.

In 1997, we were left with many pensioners, particularly older women, on desperately low incomes. There were hundreds of thousands of single pensioners in 1997 whose total income, means-tested through income support, was £69 a week. Tackling that dreadful legacy was our No. 1 priority when we were elected. We needed to boost the incomes of the least well-off pensioners. That was done first through the introduction of the minimum income guarantee.

In 2003, that was followed by the successful introduction of pension credit, which focuses help on the least well-off through its guarantee—currently £109 a week for a single pensioner rather than the £69 of just eight years ago. That level is being uprated in line with earnings and will rise to £114 from April. In addition, the pension credit provides a reward for those who have managed to save a modest amount towards their retirement income—income which was deducted pound for pound under the old income support regime.

Currently, some 2.7 million households in the country benefit through pension credit. In Wellingborough, more than 6,000 individuals in some 4,900 households receive pension credit; the average weekly payment is £39. Abolishing pension credit as the hon. Gentleman suggests—his position is rather different from his party's—would leave every one of those 6,000 Wellingborough residents worse off. Pension credit is therefore having an immense impact in Wellingborough and throughout the country, and it is particularly helping women—including the 3,200 women who receive it in Wellingborough—to improve their retirement incomes.

Among the other improvements that have helped are winter fuel payments. This morning, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has been spelling out how the £300 million that he announced in December will be used to improve heating and insulation for pensioners. There have also been above-inflation increases in the basic state pension, the level of which has increased by 8 per cent. in real terms since 1997. Under the Conservative Government, of course, there was no real increase for many years. There are also free television licences for over-75s. The hon. Gentleman wants all those things scrapped, but if he goes to meetings such as those that he described, he will find that those who have benefited from that extra help, including the winter fuel payments, very much appreciate it.

The result of all that has been a dramatic rise in pensioner incomes and, in particular, a proportionately much larger increase in the incomes of the least well-off pensioners. Pension credit and the other measures that we have implemented since 1997 mean that pensioners are £19 a week better off on average than if we had increased the state pension in line with earnings since 1997 and left other things unchanged. The least well-off third of pensioners are £30 a week better off. That is a remarkably effective response to the problem of pensioner poverty that existed in 1997.

I am certainly aware of the concerns that the hon. Gentleman voiced about council taxes, which are felt by many, and particularly by those on low incomes. We have taken action to address those concerns. Less well-off pensioners who face increases in their bills can continue to get help through council tax benefit. In addition this year, households with somebody aged 65 or over who does not receive the guaranteed element of pension credit—pensioner households that pay at least some council tax—are receiving £200.

Of course, central Government do not set the level of council tax, although we have invested substantial amounts to ensure that local authorities have sufficient resources. Since 1997, total grant to local authorities has increased by a third in real terms. We have also added an extra £408 million in formula grant above what is in the published plans for local government, plus £200 million in unfenced specific grants. Given that substantial investment, as well as the scope for efficiency improvements, which I hope that the hon. Gentleman is urging his local authority to make, there is no excuse for excessive council tax rises. In fact, 2005-06 saw the lowest average council tax increase in more than a decade. My understanding is that the hon. Gentleman's local authority is now Conservative controlled—indeed, I can confirm that that is now the case, although he was a little coy about making that point in his speech. However, I hope that he is pressing his authority to improve efficiency in its organisation.

Mr. Bone: I hope that the Minister will make it clear that Wellingborough council, which is now Conservative controlled, is rated as excellent by the Government. I hope also that he will deal with the crux of my comments. I hear what he says about all those freebies, but do the Government object in principle to giving everyone a decent pension and getting rid of all those funny little bits?

Mr. Timms: The point that I am making to the hon. Gentleman is that we have managed to break the historic link between old age and poverty through the policies that I have described. In the past, people in retirement were almost invariably significantly more likely than those in work to be poor relative to others, but that is no longer the case, because of the changes that I described. Andrew Dilnot, the former director of the Institute for Fiscal Studies, has said—there is a good deal of substance to his point—that the virtual eradication of abject pensioner poverty is the most significant of all the major social changes since 1997, and we must certainly not put it into reverse.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned pension credit take-up, but I was disappointed by his rather disparaging comments about the staff of the Pension Service, who work hard to ensure that people can take up the benefit due to them. I can give him the recent example of a pensioner couple in Northamptonshire who were helped during a visit to complete a pension credit application. They received not only pension credit, which, in their case, was worth £106 a week in backdated arrears of more than £1,000, but an increased award of attendance allowance, plus a full council tax rebate. If we are to ensure that people receive the benefit to which they are entitled, we need to work hard. Such visits are extremely effective in helping people to obtain what Parliament has decided is their due.

The Pension Service is working with the public, private and voluntary sectors to ensure that everyone has access to the help to which they are entitled and to the services that they need to stay well and lead independent lives. If a local authority representative is present during those visits, or the person doing the visiting works with the local authority, they can ensure that people receive the help to which they are entitled from the local social services department. There are more than 70 joint teams, in which local service staff, local authority staff and, in some cases, voluntary sector staff work together in a joined-up approach, and we are seeing a great array of benefits and improvements as a result.

The disability and carers' service is taking steps to improve the receipt of disability benefits, too. In some instances, that requires it to obtain information about people's circumstances, and rightly so. That is part and parcel of ensuring that people receive their due and maximise their income in retirement.

The pressing problems of inadequate incomes that faced us in 1997 have been effectively addressed. There is certainly more to do, but we have seen substantial improvements, which have given us a sound foundation on which to build an enduring pensions settlement for the UK—one that can handle the dramatic increases in life expectancy that we have seen over the past 25 years and that seem to be set to continue. The improvements that we have introduced benefit us all, and I hope that that pensions settlement will be based on as broad a consensus as possible between the parties throughout the country.

There is certainly more to be done, which is why we asked Lord Turner and the members of the Pensions Commission to produce their report, which was published last November. In it, they called for a national debate, and we shall undertake a major consultation exercise in the coming months to engage with the public and with everyone who has an interest in the issue. We shall want ideas and proposals from political parties, employers, trade unions, local authorities and everyone with an interest in the future of our pensions system.

The hon. Gentleman argued for an earnings link in the basic state pension, and that is, of course, one of the proposals in the Pensions Commission report, along with a pretty comprehensive package of changes. We shall want to explore those ideas thoroughly in debate in the House and in the country and to examine the commission's proposals for reform in detail. We want to debate them and test them against principles of reform to give people every chance to consider the options and to build the broad consensus that we believe is crucial to securing the long-term confidence that we need. I have asked the commission to continue its involvement in the debate over the next few months, as we move from diagnosis and analysis to proposition and decision. I want the debate to involve every section of our community as we work towards the publication of a White Paper in the spring.

We have seen substantial improvements in pensioner incomes over the past eight years, and particularly large increases in the incomes of those who were the least well-off and who needed help most urgently. I can tell the hon. Gentleman with confidence that that was the right thing to do. In 1997, far too many people had a tiny weekly income of £69. The priority was to increase that. We have done so effectively through pension credit, and it is important that we do not go backwards.

Deferred Pensions

1.30 pm

Dr. Ashok Kumar (Middlesbrough, South and East Cleveland) (Lab): I am grateful to Mr. Speaker for having granted me this debate, which I have been trying to get off the ground for nearly a year, on and off.

The subject is extremely important to my constituents who were formerly factory workers employed by Texon UK, and who are deferred members of an insolvent pension scheme run by their former employer. I know that the Minister is aware of the issue, as there has been much correspondence between me and his office on the matter during the past year.

My constituents were made redundant 10 years ago, when Texon UK embarked on the job-cutting exercise that was a precursor to its going into receivership. Texon, once called United Shoe Machinery, had been a local employer for many years, serving the shoe-making industry. Thankfully, the factory, located on the Skelton industrial estate in the East Cleveland area of my constituency, still operates following a management buy-out, but with a much reduced work force. Nevertheless, 120 jobs are important and I wish the company every success in future.

That, however, will not alter the scale of the problem faced by my constituents. They were unhappy about the redundancies, but they accepted them, because they felt that they had the reassurance of a pension from the company pension scheme when they reached retirement age. However, that was not to be—hence this debate.

I shall focus on two connected issues. My first concern is the financial arrangements made within the company, at the time owned by Texon, and my second what appear to be grave limitations in the new financial assistance scheme for deferred occupational pensioners. The sorry saga began when USM Texon was taken over by a private equity company, Apax, which made significant changes to the company pension scheme. A new USM pension plan was set up and 279 machinery workers were transferred into it. However, a transfer payment to cover these liabilities was made only in September 2000 when a further 318 deferred pensioners and 360 existing pensioners were moved into the new USM plan. That left several hundred people in the old Texon scheme, a number whom were my constituents.

The transfer of this second tranche of members was not made until a few weeks before the company went into receivership in October 2000. Once the company ceased trading it was obvious that the pension scheme would be under threat. The threat became reality when wind-up proceedings were lodged because the scheme had insufficient funds to meet its pension liabilities. At that time the scheme had an estimated deficit of some £30 million. Under winding-up rules, existing pensioners were first in the list for a payout, so 360 old USM pensioners received the bulk of their expected benefits, but the remaining 544 USM members—including those of my constituents who are deferred pensioners—have lost their pensions and any right to contributions they had made to the scheme. The problem was made worse when the Texon scheme went bust in April 2004 with a deficit of £20 million.

My first concern is, therefore, whether the former employers concerned have acted in good faith. As I said, the pension scheme was the subject of a number of financial transactions prior to the company's going into receivership. The original transfer payment made by Apax amounted to £33.1 million—a sum insufficient to meet Apax's obligation under the minimum funding requirement, but one that had been calculated on the basis of a valuation of the scheme's assets made three years previously. I understand that the view among senior actuaries was that if the valuation had been conducted on an up-to-date basis, Apax would have had to put an additional £2.3 million into the scheme. Indeed, the independent trustee appointed to wind up the scheme wrote to ask it to reverse the transfer.

Parts of the trustee's letter, quoted in The Daily Telegraph, said that reversing the transfer would

"Avoid the risk of criticism for making a transfer only a few weeks before the firm went into receivership."

He went on to point out that

"pensioners and deferred members were not asked to consent to the transfer and it seems unfair that they should now suffer a reduction in benefits as a result of a transfer over which they had no control".

Those financial transactions must have had an impact on the overall health of the USM and Texon schemes. I accept that the Minister has no direct responsibility for individual company pension schemes, but as the behaviour of companies managing such schemes can impact on his responsibilities, such as the finances of the financial assistance scheme, I would ask him to talk to his ministerial colleagues in the Department of Trade and Industry about this case. I appreciate that he might want to refer me to the pensions ombudsman and the pensions regulator. However, given the remit of those bodies, that might not produce the results that my constituents seek.

Past referrals have been made to the pensions ombudsman, but I understand that he was unable to investigate the role played by Apax because he has no jurisdiction over a company's shareholders. I understand that a complaint to the pensions regulator also made no progress because, apparently, it can investigate only the actions of trustees. In this case, it decided that they had done nothing illegal, although the regulator said that the complaint contained information that "might be of interest to the DTI."

I understand that a complaint to the DTI was also rebuffed, because it could investigate only complaints made by shareholders, and that complaints about pensions fell outside its remit due to their "unincorporated" status. Some serious joined-up thinking is needed on all these issues.

The second issue I wish to turn to is the way in which the financial assistance scheme will affect my constituents. They have told me that at first they felt that they could rely on it. However, it is apparent that only a few from Skelton will gain any assistance through the scheme, because of the age profile of the workers who were made redundant. In the main, they are good citizens, hard-working men in their 40s and 50s with families. I have known some of them for more than 20 years. They are not people who were within three years of retirement, and who will get 80 per cent. of their pension from the FAS. I do not for a moment disparage the scheme itself. It was a good start, and helped those people who were facing the worst prospects. I applaud the fact that it injected £400 million to assist those who urgently needed such help. However, as things stand, many thousands of people who are in the same circumstances as my constituents will not benefit.

This is a serious issue of faith. Past Governments have stressed the need for people to make independent provision for retirement and have backed occupational schemes heavily. My constituents followed that advice and invested in a company scheme that they saw as in their best interests. They now find themselves cut adrift, having to face a future dependent on what the state can provide. I am aware that there is a comprehensive spending review and that there will be a review of occupational pensions. There will also be a review of how the state relates to a member of a scheme who might need assistance. However, I have been told that that review may not report until 2008. If that is correct, it will further dishearten many of my constituents.

I hope that the Minister will tell me that the review will be expedited. That would mean that my constituents and their trade unions could make submissions and that the finished findings of such a review could be fed into the comprehensive spending review process immediately. The Government need to grasp the problem urgently. We are told that that will be hard, given the financial implications. However, we need to recognise that those affected, such as my constituents, are a numerically defined group. Importantly, as the starting date of the pension protection fund was April last year, they are a closed group that cannot grow.

My affected constituents are of a defined age cohort and will not easily find a job that could give them a reasonable prospect of employment for a period long enough to build matching pension provision. The same demographic consideration would also tell us that mortality will play its part, roughly defining the total time period that the scheme would need to cover. The Government should factor in the costs that would have to be met by the state, in any case.

If we make assumptions about the people affected by such insolvent pension schemes who will need to have recourse to state benefits, another fact emerges. In that equation, the financial transfers between an expanded FAS and the cash that the Department for Work and Pensions would incur could well be neutral, at best. Would there be a cost if the FAS were widened? Of course, but the Government have made bold gestures in the past and can do so again. The Government can seriously explore other funding avenues: receipts from advance corporation tax, perhaps, or, as has been suggested before, the use of dormant assets in unclaimed accounts. I am aware that the Government see the last matter as a long-term issue and are possibly earmarking receipts from that for youth activity. However, the wronged pensioners at Texon UK and other pensioners in the same boat are also a deserving group.

An extension of the FAS to cover those within 10 to 12 years of retirement would bring a lot of joy to my affected constituents. I look forward with hope to the Minister's reply.

1.43 pm

The Minister for Pensions Reform (Mr. Stephen Timms): I begin by congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Middlesbrough, South and East Cleveland

[Mr. Stephen Timms]

(Dr. Kumar) on securing this debate on an important topic of concern to many people in his constituency who are former employees of the company to which he refers. Similar issues face many other people who are former employees of other companies and members of other schemes. I pay tribute to my hon. Friend for the work that he has done and the eloquent case that he has made on behalf of his constituents. I have had many meetings with hon. Members whose constituents have been affected by the wind-up of underfunded pension schemes. I have great sympathy for all those who have lost part or, in some cases, all of their expected pensions in such a way. It is a devastating experience for anybody to endure.

The USM Texon pension scheme and the impact of the company's insolvency on employees in the shoe-making industry has been eloquently described this afternoon by my hon. Friend. I want to address, as far as I am able, the pension issues that he raised. First, he raised concerns about the activities surrounding the USM Texon pension scheme, the behaviour of the employer and some of the financial transactions. Other Members have raised similar concerns about the events in that company. I am advised that both the Occupational Pensions Regulatory Authority, the predecessor to the pensions regulator, and the pensions regulator considered the case and came to the conclusion that the activities surrounding the pension scheme did not break pensions legislation. That is rather a narrow test, of course, but the regulator can take action only if the law has been broken. The Pensions Act 2004 greatly strengthened legislation in that area, but without a breach of legislation or regulations, the regulator is not in a position to act.

The pensions ombudsman is still considering cases arising from the scheme. In particular, a scheme member has complained that the trustees failed to produce a transfer value statement when asked to do so and the pensions ombudsman expects to reach preliminary conclusions on the case quite soon. The outcome of the complaint will have a bearing on a number of other complaints that the ombudsman has received in connection with the scheme about bulk transfer issues, and will be of interest to those who have raised their concerns with my hon. Friend.

I gather that there have also been complaints to the Department of Trade and Industry companies investigation branch, but, since the complaints relate mainly to pensions, it was concluded that they should be taken up elsewhere. I do not think that the DTI can investigate complaints made only by shareholders; in this case, Members have made complaints. With investigations that are under way at the moment, the work of the pensions ombudsman is most relevant to the case that we are considering.

My hon. Friend had a good deal to say about the financial assistance scheme, introduced through the Pensions Act 2004. I am grateful to him for recognising that, for some people, the FAS provides valuable help. Neither the Government nor the taxpayer has a liability in such cases, but we have set up the scheme to help members of underfunded pension schemes who were fewer than three years away from the scheme's normal retirement age on 14 May 2004 and whose scheme had commenced winding up between 1 January 1997 and 5 April 2005—a contained group, as my hon. Friend rightly said—while being sponsored by a principal employer who had experienced insolvency prior to a given date. Hon. Members will know that protection in cases where insolvencies occurred after 5 April 2005 will be provided by the pension protection fund. However, that cannot be the case for insolvencies that occurred before the fund was created and before the PPF levy supporting the fund was raised.

The FAS operational unit opened on 1 September 2004. Work has began on a collecting scheme and member data so that decisions can be made about whether schemes and individuals qualify for FAS. Once that information has been provided, decisions can be made and assistance paid to affected scheme members.

The first qualifying schemes were announced on 25 October 2005. So far, 146 schemes have qualified. The first qualifying members, who happen to be members of the ASW Cardiff pension scheme, are now receiving initial payments from the FAS. Those initial payments—they are 60 per cent. of the expected pension—are payable until the scheme completes wind-up; at that point, full FAS payments of 80 per cent. of the expected pension will commence, together with any arrears due. Work continues on processing data for other schemes, so that we can issue payments to more of those affected as soon as possible.

Scheme trustees have until the end of the notification period on 28 February—the end of next month—to notify the operational unit that they wish their pension schemes to be considered for the FAS. I urge any trustees who have not yet made such a notification already to do so soon.

The USM Texon pension scheme was on the indicative list of schemes potentially eligible for the FAS that was published last February. The trustees have now made a formal application to the scheme. The scheme notification has been accepted, and the operational unit is considering whether the scheme qualifies. That will involve obtaining additional information from the trustees—namely, the date of the employer's insolvency and the name of the principal employer. That minor information has only just been requested, so it is not yet possible to confirm that the USM Texon pension scheme will be eligible for the FAS. I am therefore not able to state which members will qualify for assistance. However, I hope that the matter will be resolved within the next month or so.

My hon. Friend felt that the £400 million provided for the FAS is not adequate, and that more money should be made available to extend assistance to more people. He said that most former employees of USM Texon—at least those in his constituency—are too young. They were more than three years from their scheme pension age in May 2004. Our priority when designing the structure of the FAS was to get help quickly to those who faced the most urgent difficulties. We took the view—I think that my hon. Friend will agree that we were right—that those were the people closest to or already at retirement age, who would be least able to make alternative provisions to replace their lost pensions. However, as with any cash-limited scheme, some people will fall outside the qualifying criteria.

My hon. Friend said that if we were to extend the period from the current three years of scheme pension age to 10 or 12 years it would be very helpful to his constituents. I understand that. As he knows, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor told the Labour party conference in September 2004 that the Government will be reviewing the funding of the scheme, alongside the Government's other spending priorities, in the next spending review. In the meantime, however, funding is fixed for the current spending review period, up to and including 2007–08.

Should it be decided to provide additional funding, my hon. Friend wondered when it would start. It would take effect from the beginning of the financial year 2008–09. He was also concerned about how long it would take. That answer is a little more encouraging: an announcement will be made in the summer of 2007, so the information will be available rather earlier than he feared it might be. Ahead of that review, however, our plans will cover only those who fall within the criteria that I have set out. I cannot offer my hon. Friend any prospect of extending eligibility ahead of the review.

Those who were more than three years from their scheme pension age in 2004 will not yet be at their scheme pension age, so they are not yet in a position to need help. I can understand people wanting to know the outcome of the review as soon as possible, but I can give no expectation of it happening before the summer of 2007.

The position of people outside the current scope of the scheme will be considered as part of the review, alongside the other spending priorities that the Government need to address. I appreciate that such uncertainty will be difficult for many, but Government funding is already allocated, and no additional source of funds is available.

My hon. Friend made some suggestions for obtaining additional funding for the FAS. He suggested using unclaimed assets from banks and other financial institutions or receipts from advance corporation tax to increase scheme funds. On the use of unclaimed assets, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor explained last month in the pre-Budget report that an agreement had been made with banks and building societies that such assets would be used to improve youth and community facilities. Before the election, I was the Minister at the Treasury dealing with that issue. I therefore know that many proposals have been promulgated in various quarters on how to use those unclaimed assets. However, there is much less certainty about how much money is available. Some of the figures that I have seen are significantly greater than the reality is likely to prove. I caution my hon. Friend against seeing funding from that source as being a likely solution.

The Government's view is that if owners and their assets cannot be reunited, the money should be reinvested in the community, particularly in disadvantaged communities, and that that should be done in a sustainable way through a co-ordinated delivery mechanism, with a focus on services that are responsive to the needs of young people; they should also be used to deal with financial education and financial exclusion. That seems logical, given that difficulties with financial literacy and financial education may have led to the assets being mislaid.

The removal of payable tax credits for advance corporation tax—they were effectively a subsidy for the payment of dividends rather than money to be reinvested in the business—has not led to an availability of uncommitted funds. It was part of a package of measures, which included a reduction in the rate of corporation tax. I know that my hon. Friend has been a strong advocate of increasing investment in manufacturing in order to boost the productive capabilities of the economy; and that package was helpful from that point of view. I note that, at the last election, none of the political parties argued for reinstating those credits. Indeed, as I said earlier, the resources secured from that source have been committed elsewhere.

I pay tribute to my hon. Friend for his campaigning and for the committed work that he has carried out on behalf of those of his constituents who have been so hard hit by the collapse of the firm and the pension scheme. We made good progress in setting up the FAS, which ensured that the first payments were made on schedule before Christmas. I know that my hon. Friend and many others are eagerly awaiting the review of the FAS; the outcome is due in the summer of 2007.

Question put and agreed to.

[HUGH BAYLEY in the Chair]

First World War Soldiers (Pardons)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Watson.]

9.30 am

Mr. Keith Simpson (Mid-Norfolk) (Con): It is a pleasure to serve under your chairmanship, Mr. Bayley, in the removed Westminster Hall. The subject that I have been lucky enough to have had selected for debate—that of pardons for British soldiers executed in the first world war—continues to generate great public interest and controversy. It was not only a controversial subject at the time, more than 90 years ago; there has been a continuing campaign that seeks pardons either for individuals or for all the men who were executed while serving in the British Army or the Commonwealth armies during the first world war. It is regarded as a question not only of natural justice, but of humanitarian concern.

Having been interested in the subject for more than 30 years, I have concluded that the debate about pardons for British soldiers executed in the first world war is not a narrow debate about just those men, British military justice and the way in which the British Army performs. There is also a continuing debate about Britain's coming to terms with the first world war. Whatever the evidence at the time and the continuing work of historians, those of us who have been involved in the issue as historians realise that any attempt to influence wider public opinion on the first world war or pardons for British soldiers executed in that war comes up against powerful and popular cultural images, which have helped to define at least public perception. I am thinking of the impact some 30 years ago of the play and then the film "Oh! What a Lovely War" and some 15 years ago of the series "Blackadder Goes Forth". Whatever historians have attempted to say about British generals in the first world war, and there is a case to be made, the image of Stephen Fry playing General Melchett—a bovine man of intense stupidity callously sending tens of thousands of young men to their deaths—is incredibly difficult to overcome.

Let me declare an interest—first, as a military historian. Many years ago, when I had as my father-in-law would say a real job and before I became a Member of Parliament, I researched and wrote a number of books connected with the first world war. In the early 1970s, I was lucky enough to interview several hundred veterans of that war who of course even then were in their 70s and 80s. One question, among many others, that I invariably asked them concerned their attitude towards the men who were executed in the first world war for desertion, cowardice and so on. The survivors of that war had an ambivalent attitude towards those executions. That is borne out by the archives at the Imperial war museum, whether oral or written. It was possible to find large numbers of men who, at the time and in their old age, regarded the executions as wrong, vindictive and not achieving their objective of deterring people from running away, but equally I found large numbers of veterans who were bitter. They might not necessarily condone the fact that ultimately the men were executed, but they were bitter that some men decided to abscond and, as they saw it, did not do their duty and let their muckers down. That is an equally balanced view.

Following that research, I was involved in getting a minor classic on the first world war republished in 1986. I am referring to a book that was originally published anonymously in 1938, "The War the Infantry Knew", an account of the 2nd Battalion the Royal Welch Fusiliers during the first world war based entirely on letters and diaries of officers and those of other ranks. The core part of the book was the diaries of the battalion medical officer, the formidable Captain James Churchill Dunn, Distinguished Service Order, Military Cross and Bar, Distinguished Conduct Medal—that related to his time as a trooper in the yeomanry in the South African war.

I had always imagined that Dr. Dunn was, frankly, a rather tough old bastard. A particular image was given by the contemporary accounts from those who served with him. I am thinking of Siegfried Sassoon, Robert Graves and Private Frank Richards, who was one of the few pre-war regular working-class soldiers to leave a real memoir—it was tarted up by Robert Graves, but "Old Soldiers Never Die" gives a real view from the ranks. I was to discover that Dr. Dunn was probably a more sensitive and perceptive man than I had ever imagined. Interestingly, through his diaries, he gives a number of accounts of his views on morale and discipline and of how his own courage leached away in the course of continuous soldiering and participating in major battles. He served as a regimental medical officer continuously for nearly two years. Robert Graves and Siegfried Sassoon, brave men as they were, flitted in and out of combat, unlike the bulk of the British Army.

Dr. Dunn was one of only two regimental medical officers to give evidence in 1922 to what we now call the shell shock committee. There are virtually no first-hand evidence accounts of the questionnaire surviving. Dr. Dunn's, however, does survive, because it was in his papers. Despite being a sensitive man, he was absolutely convinced of the deterrent value of executing those who wilfully deserted and absconded; he believed in the deterrent effect. I am not suggesting that just because that was the view of one regimental medical officer—a man of considerable experience who was sensitive enough to recognise what battle stress was; he used to withdraw soldiers from the front line to rest them—a case should be based on it against the campaign that seeks pardons for British soldiers executed in the first world war. I am trying to illustrate my background interest in the subject.

When I became a junior Front-Bench defence spokesman in June 1998, my first Front-Bench speaking role, within a few days, was to respond to a statement by the then Minister for the Armed Forces, who is now the Secretary of State for Defence, on the review of pardons for soldiers executed in the first world war. It is interesting that, in the 1970s, a large number of Labour Members then in opposition felt very strongly that the then Conservative Government and previous Labour

[Mr. Keith Simpson]

Governments had been far too secretive about the records relating to the men executed and that the likelihood was that there had been a cover-up.

The Minister of State in 1998 carried out a very comprehensive review. As he said in his statement, he personally examined about one third of the files. He interviewed many people, including historians and relatives, and he concluded in 1998 that there was not a legal case to pardon those who had been found guilty and executed. However, the Government were moved to say that they regretted what had happened. It is interesting that someone whom I suspect before he looked into the matter was predisposed to consider that there was a strong case the other way concluded at the time, after an exhaustive survey, that there was not necessarily such a case.

I am speaking here today because we are now eight years on. I am not saying that just because the Government had a review and said then that there was not a case that there will never be a case. I am not persuaded—it was my considered view then and still is today—that there is a case for retrospective pardon. My view is still based on a reluctance to rewrite history without real evidence. I am not in any way suggesting that those who are advocating pardons for those executed during the first world war are arguing this, but there is a case that such pardons could apply to other periods in history involving the British armed forces. There is strong feeling about the issue in the first world war because it is close and real, and there are still surviving members of families of those who were executed, but there is certainly a case to be argued that we could consider those British soldiers who were executed during active service in, for example, the Peninsular war, to see whether at the time similar criteria could be applied and that they did not know that they were suffering from post-traumatic stress—although they would not have understood at the time what that meant.

I want to draw out the Minister on the point that the evidence at the time was more complicated than some popular historians have made out and that each individual case is different, which creates a major problem. That does not mean that all of us who are involved in this debate are not moved by what must be the trauma of the families who have discovered that a grandfather, a father or an uncle was found guilty of a capital offence and executed. It has moved many members of the public, and I can understand why; it is a natural feeling.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): I congratulate my hon. Friend on securing this important debate. I have followed with huge interest what he has had to say so far. Are there not many different individual reasons why soldiers were executed? I understand that some war memorials have named those who were executed, but in other communities a decision has been taken not to do so. The sensitivity that he brings to the debate is hugely important.

Mr. Simpson: I thank my hon. Friend for those comments. On the whole, all hon. Members who have been involved in this debate have been sensitive, because that is the feeling among the public. His point about communities' reactions—I may come back to this—is understandable. My sense is that in the aftermath of the second world war certainly those families who had knowledge that their husband, father or grandfather had been executed frequently wanted to keep quiet about it. It was the military equivalent in that period of an unwanted pregnancy. It was something that people felt ashamed of and did not want to talk about.

Over the past 15 years, there has been a sustained campaign in this country and in Commonwealth countries for formal pardons for those executed, and since the Government's review of 1998 that campaign has continued. Any belief that the Ministry of Defence had that the review would somehow stop the debate was, as I said at the time, highly unlikely. The purpose of my debate is to enable us to question the Minister about Government policy and whether it has changed, or is likely to change, as a consequence of either new evidence or information, legal proceedings, or sustained lobbying.

The interest of parliamentarians in the issue and the emotions that it arouses could be seen last week when there was a question in the other place and, it would be fair to say, their lordships gave the Minister for Defence Procurement a hard time at the Dispatch Box. It applies not only to this House but to the other place. As much as anything else, that question prompted me to apply for this debate.

Vera Baird (Redcar) (Lab): I echo what the hon. Member for Kettering (Mr. Hollobone) said about the measured way in which the hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Simpson) is presenting the debate; the broad sweep of the historian is present, and I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on securing the debate and on the way in which he is conducting it. Before he moves on to recent events, may I raise the question of the case for an overall pardon, for which there has been strong lobbying? Both hon. Gentlemen have made the point that there may be distinctions to be drawn between individuals. Would there be any real reason why the statutory body, the Criminal Cases Review Commission, as an expert body that regularly refers cases back to the Court of Appeal and, equally, refuses many, should not be asked to look at all the files and to come to a view? Would that be better than the Secretary of State doing so?

Mr. Simpson: I thank the hon. and learned Lady for that intervention. I know that she put that very matter as a written question to the Minister's predecessor a couple of years ago, and got an answer that was not in the affirmative. That question should not so much be put to me, as it is an option. My personal view—I should be interested to hear the Minister's—is that, so far as I know, not only is each case different, but the material relating to each case is different. Some files are very comprehensive, but others consist only of one sheet of paper. I am putting my conclusion before I have developed my arguments, but I have concluded—this may not be the final conclusion of the High Court—that we decide to pardon either everybody or nobody. There are, I suspect, major problems, and I refer the hon. and learned Lady's question—while in no way avoiding it—to the Minister.

Since 1998, we have seen a number of developments, which I should like briefly to take hon. Members through. In November 2000, an important psychological threshold was crossed when relatives of those executed were allowed to participate in the Remembrance day ceremonies at the cenotaph. As my hon. Friend pointed out, many but not all local communities—even in this regard they have been divided—have decided to add to war memorials the names of those who were executed in the first world war. I think that I am right in saying that there are one or two examples of the names of those who were executed already appearing on war memorials in the 1920s and 1930s. I have not had time to check this, but the name of the only Norfolk man to be executed—Private John Abigail of the 8th Norfolk Regiment, who was a volunteer who deserted more than once and who was executed in 1917—appears on the wooden panels of St. Augustine's church in Norwich. Having seen a photograph, I think that that predates the contemporary debate. However, that was an important watershed.

In October 2004, the Irish Government formally submitted to the United Kingdom Government a report seeking a pardon for 26 Irish soldiers who were executed. They were from both the north and the south, Catholic and Protestant—those who served in the demonstrably Protestant 36th Ulster Division and the overwhelming Catholic 16th Irish Division. I shall come back to that, but I understand that the report is lying on the table and that the Ministry of Defence has not yet formulated a considered reply. Obviously, there are contemporary political sensitivities relating to that.

In May 2005, a case was brought before the High Court by the family of Private Harry Farr, seeking a full posthumous pardon. It was brought in the name of his daughter, who is now aged 92, who must be one of the relatively few surviving immediate relatives. That case has been adjourned while the Ministry of Defence considers further submissions by the family. I recognise that I should not get into the weeds of that case because it is, at present, sub judice.

In November 2005, the hon. Member for Thurrock (Andrew Mackinlay)—alas, he is not in his usual place; like Charles II, he is on his travels abroad, with the Foreign Affairs Committee, but his heart is here in this room even as we speak—introduced a new version of his private Member's Bill, which in effect has been introduced and reintroduced since 1993, seeking a pardon for soldiers of the great war. In 2000, the New Zealand Government passed an Act to pardon soldiers of the great war, which related to five New Zealand soldiers who were executed. That was a no-holds-barred, absolute retrospective pardon. In July 2005, the New Zealand Prime Minister presented the relatives of those soldiers with any outstanding medals, decorations and certificates. The New Zealand Government have gone the whole hog. Interestingly, to compare and contrast, in December 2001, the Canadian Government debated the issue and offered a formal apology to 23 Canadians who had been executed, but stopped short of granting statutory pardons.

In three countries—the United Kingdom, New Zealand and Canada—we have three variations: there has been no apology and no pardon directly from the United Kingdom Government, but there has been a motion of regret, which is as near as possible to an apology; in New Zealand, there has been a complete apology and a restitution of all civil rights, if I may put it that way; and the Canadian Government have made an apology, but have not granted a statutory pardon.

Interestingly, there are dogs that have not barked in this case. As far as I understand, no request has yet been received from the South African Government for those who would now be constituted citizens of South Africa who were executed during the first world war. I will not touch on the subject of other Commonwealth citizens who were also executed under military law during the first world war. There are half a dozen in relation to Nigeria and the West Indies, and, of course, several hundred who were in the old Indian army. Several dozen were executed as a consequence of a mutiny in Singapore in 1915. It will muddy the waters if we get on to that area.

A vast amount of popular and academic literature and many TV documentaries have been produced since 1998. In my considered opinion, the two best books, which do not quite present the arguments for and against, but which complement each other, are Catherine Corns's and John Hughes-Wilson's "Blindfold and Alone: British Military Executions in the Great War", which was published in 2001, and Dr. Gerard Oram's "Military Executions During World War I", which was published in 2003 and which has the advantage of comparing and contrasting what happened in the French and the German armies, as well.

Having sketched out the background, let me come to the core of what I wish to address. I want to ask the Minister some specific questions to see what, if anything, has changed since 1998. First, has his Department discovered any new official documents relating to the courts martial and executions of these men? Secondly, have any of the files relating to the 3,000-plus men sentenced to death but reprieved been discovered? I understand that all those files were destroyed at some point in the inter-war period. This is an important issue; the hon. and learned Member for Redcar (Vera Baird) will be aware of it. There would be a control mechanism if we had available the 3,000 files relating to those people found guilty but reprieved. We do not know why they were reprieved. We have only one side of the argument. Thirdly, have any other official documents or has any other contemporary evidence been produced by other Departments or by individual citizens since 1998 that is directly relevant to the central question? Finally, has the Government's legal opinion changed since 1998?

Obviously, a serious challenge to the Government's opinion as stated in 1998 is the High Court case involving Private Harry Farr. I know that this may be difficult for the Minister to answer and he may very well say that it is a hypothetical question, but can he confirm that if a final ruling finds in favour of the family—that there will be some form of pardon, even if it is a conditional pardon—that would effectively set a precedent for all the other cases, or, as the hon. and learned Lady suggested, would the Ministry of Defence have to consider some form of tribunal that would assess each individual case as the case of Private Harry Farr has been assessed?

[Mr. Simpson]

I understand the political sensitivities of this matter, but the MOD has now had just over a year to study the report of the Irish Government covering the cases of the 26 Irish soldiers. A copy of the report was leaked to the Sunday Mirror and there are various extracts from it on the internet. I have to say—this is a personal view and I admit that I have not read the full report—that it struck me less as a legal, historical document than as an emotional polemic aimed at the British Government. Does the Minister intend publicising the report as soon as possible? It has already been partly leaked to the press and it might be helpful if we saw the full report.

Given that a year has now gone by, when is it likely that an answer will be given to the Irish Government about the report? Will the British Government's reply be placed in the public domain? If the British Government were to accede to the request of the Irish Government—if they recognise that the Irish Government have presented a case and the 26 Irish soldiers effectively get some form of pardon—would the British Government's opinion be that that would set a precedent across the board for other national groupings? After all, what about the Scots and the Welsh? Given the Minister's background, it may interest him to know that, of those found guilty and condemned to death during the first world war, 10 per cent. were from England, 10 per cent. were from Ireland, 12 per cent. were from Scotland and 14 per cent. were from Wales. An incredible 22 per cent. were from New Zealand. What do those statistics mean? I suspect, in isolation, not a lot, but one can see the potency behind different groups arguing for their specific cases.

There is a final point connected with Ireland. I recognise that this does not fall directly into the category of those executed in the first world war. Does the Minister know whether any formal request has ever been made by the Irish Government for formal pardons to be given to those 15 Irishmen convicted by British Army tribunals in 1916 and executed following the Easter rising? They were convicted and executed for a rebellion that, as far as I understand from reading the best, most recent account—Professor Charles Townshend's "Easter 1916: The Irish Rebellion"—was fully covered under military law at the time. I realise the sensitivity of the matter, but I think that we are now into this area.

The purpose of my debate, apart from the opportunity to put a series of questions to the Minister, is to allow colleagues who may have different views to contradict what I have said, perhaps to press strongly for a pardon or a partial pardon and to ask similar questions. I am still unpersuaded by the case for a pardon, but I have an open mind. If I could be persuaded, perhaps I would be. There is now an opportunity for the Minister to explain his Department's current position and whether it has changed since 1998, and to ensure that my questions and those of other hon. Members receive due attention.

10 am

Vera Baird (Redcar) (Lab): I repeat the congratulations that I have already offered to the hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Simpson) on having obtained the debate at what he rightly says is an important time, on the manner in which he has expressed his interest in it, and on the measured way in which he set out the position as he sees it. The broad sweep of the historian was very much in evidence, and I hope that the narrow focus of the law will not muck it all up.

I disagree with the hon. Gentleman on only one or two small things. One is his reaction on having the privilege of interviewing first world war soldiers to some of them saying, in effect, "I put up with it; I served well. They ran away, why shouldn't they have suffered punishment?", even if they did not necessarily say that the others should have been executed. One does not necessarily want the state to have that reaction. It is a similar argument to that of those who say that they accept that 60 per cent. of criminals are from poor backgrounds, and that they have had problems with their parents, but that a lot of people have had that and they do not go to the wrong. That is a natural human reaction, but the state has to consider the justice of the case of each individual who was killed. This is an issue of justice. That is why I, as somebody who no doubt perpetrated many injustices in my former career as a lawyer, have an interest in it.

I cannot go any further without speaking of my comrade-in-arms on this issue, my hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock (Andrew Mackinlay), who has a proud history of fighting on the subject. When I looked back—I had only a brief opportunity to do so—to prepare for the debate, I found that it is over a decade since he started to argue this case. He argues it with ferocity and diligence, and with a great deal of strength. He is very sorry not to be here for the debate. He is, as the hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk said, obliged to be on parliamentary duties elsewhere. My hon. Friend and I had a short conversation about the matter and if I had a message to pass on from him it would be that he has not changed his mind. That is pretty manifest in that as recently last December, on Second Reading of the Armed Forces Bill, he again put forward the case for an outright pardon.

Those who were executed were, by and large, executed for offences such as cowardice, desertion and sleeping at their posts. These days, such allegations would always be looked at through the prism of a better understanding of psychiatry and psychology and the impact on people of trauma than could possibly have existed then.

My attention was brought to the issue in 2001, shortly after I was elected to represent Redcar, by a Middlesbrough family who include an elderly lady who is, I think, the great-niece of a man who was shot at dawn for just such an offence. I had the privilege of meeting John Hipkin, who has for a very long time run a campaign called "Shot at Dawn". He is now well into his 70s, but is nevertheless present on every occasion on which he thinks he can have an influence and, like my hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock, he is very loyal to his cause.

I met the woman and came down to London to walk with "Shot at Dawn" in the Armistice day parade on 11 November 2002. I talked to her about why she was still troubled by what seemed like an old injury to a family, most of whom were now dead. She said that, when young, her relative—hon. Members will have to excuse me for not remembering whether it was her aunt, her great-aunt or her mother—had been completely shunned by her contemporaries because her father, or uncle, had been executed as a traitor. The family were in disgrace; they were not to rear their heads and were not entitled to have an opinion or any share in the community on account of that event. It was clear that the relative had passed on to her descendent the recollection of that experience. I cannot possibly bring it to life, but most people with a grain of imagination will be able to work out what it must have been like for her.

The hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk spoke of "Oh! What a Lovely War". One of my earliest visits to London was as a teenager to see the film—I am not so old that I go back to the time of Joan Littlewood's production. It was a notable film and made the point that the first world war was, in a sense, a war of vaudeville patriotism. Patriotism was at a great emotional height then. People encouraged their young men to sign up as an act of gallantry. We have all seen the poster that says "Your Country Needs You." It would have been a great source of pride to people to be able to say, "My son is a soldier" or "My boyfriend is joining up." In that context, one can understand how it must have impacted on families to hear that those people had been shot at dawn, apparently for treacherous offences.

I accept that it is pretty unlikely that all 306 soldiers were simply suffering from trauma. There might well have been wrongdoing and a mixed bag of circumstances, but the fear that there has been injustice persists. Many, many people who heard of the events—I looked at some cuttings overnight—talked about those who had been shot and knew that they were not cowards and that they must have been traumatised.

There is an account of a village—Fulstow, near Louth in Lincolnshire, which is not on my patch—that has finally decided to mark Armistice day. Because Private Charles Kirman was shot at dawn for cowardice and the whole village would not put his name on the war memorial, they would not allow any reference to be made to the first world war in the village hall—which was built in memory of second world war veterans—and would not hold any kind of Armistice day event until it was agreed that his name should go on to the war memorial. Indeed, descendents of his mates who had been killed in action would not support the honouring of the names of their fathers or uncles until Private Kirman's name was honoured too. There are clearly some powerful cases that require a strong examination—and a stronger examination than that which has already been carried out.

I do not speak for "Shot at Dawn". I readily appreciate—the hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk has also made the point—that there are likely to be good and bad cases among this group of men. However, granted the lack of understanding of psychiatric matters; granted the haste in which the cases were held; granted that there was no appeal against verdicts that were brought about in the field at courts martial; and granted that it is asserted repeatedly by the campaign that even the right to appeal to the King for clemency was not an effective right, it is almost inevitable that injustices occurred. It is a painful sense of injustice to relatives and it is not right that we should tolerate them. I do not want to use emotive language, but they are something of a stain on our justice system.

Let me turn to what I know a bit about: the way in which the law generally deals with old cases that it considers to have been unjustly tried. Some years ago, I was involved in the Ashley King case in the Court of Appeal and that set down the parameters. The rule is that even if the law was correctly applied as it stood on the day on which the trial occurred, if the way in which we have moved on, reinterpreted justice and improved on things throws the light of injustice on how the law worked in the old days, we should view those old facts through the better prism of justice that has subsequently evolved. If we were to do that, which is merely the ordinary civil law way of going on, some of the surviving people would be relieved of their pain by understanding what happened. If they were to find that their forebears had behaved in the way alleged, in a way they would not be any worse off, as they have already suffered pain. On the other hand, there will be people who have wrongly suffered that pain and who deserve to have matters put right before their lives end.

I admire, respect and have a huge amount of time for the Secretary of State for Defence, who diligently carried out a review of these cases as well as he possibly could as recently as 1997, which ran into 1998. Of course, that has not stopped the campaign, put an end to the pain or stopped the air of secrecy that surrounds this whole area, and it never will as long as it is done by a member of the Government, however well disposed and well intentioned it is. It is a judicial rather than an Executive function to consider how cases were tried and whether they should be overturned. That is the huge flaw in the way in which the matter has been tackled so far. I wonder whether the right way forward is to see whether the Criminal Cases Review Commission is an appropriate body to deal with these matters.

The CCRC was set up in 1995 to take over from a Home Office department that had been, frankly, discredited because it was intended to look at miscarriages of justice that were alleged still to exist after final appeals had been exhausted, but it was perceived as being part of the Home Office and terribly close to the police and so not at all impartial. It did not refer many cases, and when it did it was many years later. The CCRC is a completely independent, non-departmental public body set up to review such cases. It reviews them on an application basis. When someone says that they are not guilty even though the Court of Appeal says that they are, and even if they have been to the House of Lords and had no satisfaction, the CCRC can take on and consider such cases or reject them; whichever it thinks fit. If it takes on a case and sends it back to the Court of Appeal, the case must be heard by a court to determine whether there was an injustice and whether the verdict should be overturned. It sounds cumbersome, but it produces reasonable justice in the end. I wonder if that is not the right tribunal to consider these cases at first instance.

I value highly what the Secretary of State said about there being scant evidence about what happened in some cases. That point was reflected in what the hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk said. However, there will have been rules about the way in which the courts martial should have been run. There are certain questions to ask in an appellant system. Do the facts justify the outcome? Would there be a psychiatric defence now and can we sense whether that is right? Were the procedures followed properly? Even if they were, were they just enough when we look at them through the prism of justice as it is now? Even in a case in which there is only a little bit of documentation, experts might discern something from it. If the CCRC were to consider all such cases, there might come a tipping point at which it became fairly clear that procedures were not being followed in the way in which campaigners have always alleged that they never were. We might then be in a position to look for a holistic pardon for the entire group.

My guess is that there is a reservation about whether the CCRC has the power to consider the decisions of old courts martial. If it does not, that is not necessarily an insurmountable problem. Perhaps it could consider these cases if someone from this House, or possibly a cross-party group, makes an application for it to do so. If there is a need for a minor change in the law so that it can review such cases, there is an omnibus, Christmas-tree Home Office Bill coming soon that could easily accommodate a short clause, which need not necessarily be controversial, to permit that change.

The hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk talked about the issue being raised in the other place recently. It was raised by my noble Friend Lord Dubs, who talked about New Zealand having passed an Act to permit such convictions to be overturned. Lord Drayson, speaking on behalf of my Government, I suppose, replied,

"the House will recognise that we have looked thoroughly for a legal solution to this matter, and we have not found such a legal solution to provide a pardon."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 9 January 2006; Vol. 677, c. 6.]

It sounds as though the political will is present in the Government to take the issue on a bit more. If there is no legal solution of the type that I have outlined, it is not a matter of major difficulty to bring one about by a short and simple change in the law. I urge the Government to reconsider this matter and to acknowledge the hard work put in by the Secretary of State and that this is a judicial issue, which should be tackled roughly in the way in which I suggest.

Hugh Bayley (in the Chair): I remind hon. Members that we will begin the winding-up speeches at 10.30 am.

10.16 am

Mr. Mike Hancock (Portsmouth, South) (LD): I appreciate that warning, Mr. Bayley.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Simpson) on his consistency on this issue—being present when it is debated and discussed—and on the excellent way in which he presented his point of view, although it is not one that I share. There is an issue that goes beyond what he explained about the traditions of natural justice in this country and what the overwhelming majority of people feel is a realistic approach in today's society. By any means, most of us agree that what happened was an appalling outcome in the circumstances. No stone should be left unturned; if a change in the law is required to give those men pardons, then that is what should happen.

I agree with virtually everything that the hon. and learned Member for Redcar (Vera Baird) said, except her comments about putting this matter to the Criminal Cases Review Commission. The problem is that there would not be consistency of evidence, so some cases would get a thorough going over, some of which might end up with a pardon being granted, but, sadly, that opportunity would not be present in many cases. We know the likely problems from previous examinations and from what the Secretary of State told us in 1998, when he had fastidiously gone through the documentation and considered the cases. I remember conversations we had in his office in which he said what an emotional rollercoaster he was on when he read the cases; he had a picture of his relatives who had served in the first world war on the bookcase in his office. He said, "I read these papers and looked at these pictures and could not fail to be emotionally involved in the situation." He also said that there was such scant information available in some instances that it was impossible to go one way or the other, which would be unfair to the cause and to the majority of the people involved.

Vera Baird: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way; it is good to discuss points as they are raised. I am sure that what he says is the situation, but would any damage follow from the CCRC using its expertise to consider as exhaustively as possible all the cases that it could, and the Government having to make their mind up about whether to grant pardons in the remaining cases? That would be a quick way of getting through the issue and of offering some succour to people before they die.

Mr. Hancock: I would agree entirely with that if the end result was that the Government were willing to consider the cases that could not be given the sort of scrutiny that the CCRC would undoubtedly give them, and that the benefit of the doubt would then be given in those cases by the Government bringing forward a one-clause Bill to grant the pardons.

Twenty-odd years ago, when I was first elected to the House, I met some of the families of the people concerned, whom I met again in 1998. I also recollect members of my family telling me about their experiences in the first world war. One of the family members whom I spoke to some 20 years ago told me about the case of his father. He came from a small market town from which they all went off to war together. He was a 22-year-old with two children and with him went three of his brothers, one of whom had lied about his age and joined the Army at the age of 15, and who was killed within two weeks of being in France. Those were tragic circumstances.

It was a close-knit community and the overwhelming majority of the male population under 30 joined the Army. Those who came back did so with stories of what had happened and about the execution of the person with whom they had grown up, gone to school and gone to war. It was much like the situation in the village in Lincolnshire, but people talked. The family did not tell people what had happened, but all the other men who returned told their families.

The chap who I talked to told me what it was like to go to school with the other boys. I can remember it from after the second world war: I went to school and a boy in my class whose father had won the Victoria cross came into school with the VC in his pocket. The man told me that boys would come to school with the medals that their fathers had received for serving in the first world war and that they all gave him a bad time, talking about his family and him. He explained in graphic detail what it was like for the family and how the stigma stayed with them. His mother had great difficulty facing the local community, but because the family had no means to move away they had to live with it. They lived with it for the rest of their lives.

We have an opportunity. I shall quote what the then Minister for the Armed Forces, the present Secretary of State, said about Armistice day in 1998. By ironic coincidence, he was speaking at 11 minutes past 11, as the hon. Member for Thurrock (Andrew Mackinlay) pointed out to the House at the time. The right hon. Gentleman said:

"For some of our soldiers and their families, however, there has been neither glory nor remembrance. Just over 300 of them died at the hands not of the enemy, but of firing squads from their own side. They were shot at dawn, stigmatised and condemned—a few as cowards, most as deserters. The nature of those deaths and the circumstances surrounding them have long been a matter of contention. Therefore, last May, I said that we would look again at their cases. The review has been a long and complicated process".—[Official Report, 24 July 1998; Vol. 316, c. 1372.]

He went on to say that because there was no compelling legal ability to deal with the problem, the situation would be much as it stands: the Government would regret that it happened, but there would be no chance of relieving the pain. That is why the hon. and learned Member for Redcar was so right to talk not about justice but about the pain that families and others have suffered through the injustice. We cannot put that right but we can by some measure adopt what the New Zealanders did. We should not try to judge each case on its merits, but say that in today's circumstances it would be inconceivable for such situations to have arisen and to have been dealt with in such a way.

I remember my grandfather saying that only enlisted men were shot, never officers. He said that it was a class thing. Officers who did not go to fight were merely sent home. Few of them ever stood any sort of trial and excuses were always found. I do not want to suggest that it was a class thing, but it is something that our generation—mine and yours, Mr. Bayley—can do something about.

None of us could possibly imagine what those young men went through—and many were very young. Some of those who were executed had been in and out of the front line for more than three years. Many had served with distinction; some had been put up for awards at some time during their career. Some, as the hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk said, had been involved in incidents that probably would have meant some punishment from the unit commander or under the regulations of the British Army. However, it is inconceivable that any of us could say hand on heart that we would not have reacted in a similar vein in such circumstances.

Some 20,000 people were convicted of some form of cowardice or desertion, but 300 paid the ultimate price. The circumstances that led to their being executed included the character of the commanding officer or brigade commander who ultimately made the decision, or the way in which the war was going at the time. As the hon. Gentleman said, examples had to be made. All circumstances were different at different times during the war, and those people were certainly in the wrong place at the wrong time. Circumstances compounded to make their situation even worse.

If the House is worth anything to our society in trying to deliver relief for the pain that the families have gone through, we surely have to respond in what most reasonable people in this country believe to be the right way. In my opinion, that can only be through a full pardon as a result of a change in our legal system. We cannot reconsider the cases. The Ministry of Defence and the Secretary of State, to their credit, went everywhere they could to find a way out for us all, but could not do so within the current framework. The matter will be resolved only in the manner suggested by the hon. and learned Lady, with the Government reacting, or by the Minister being courageous enough to give the benefit of the doubt to all 306 and to table legislation that would grant them a pardon. I urge him to do that sooner rather than later.

10.26 am

Bob Russell (Colchester) (LD): I shall be relatively brief, because we need to give the Minister as much time as possible to respond. First, I congratulate the hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Simpson) not only on securing the debate but on the measured and thoughtful way in which he spoke. I do not think that there is another Member in the House who has his breadth and depth of knowledge of historical matters. I also congratulate the hon. and learned Member for Redcar (Vera Baird) and my hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth, South (Mr. Hancock) on their speeches.

We need to recognise that we are on the edge of history; we are on the last page of the last chapter of the first world war. There are 10 or a dozen amazing survivors from that great conflict; I believe that there are no survivors from Germany. In a relatively short time the final combatant will pass on, and it would be fitting if we could close that chapter and the book of those who fought by granting a pardon, at least as far as can be conceived, and following the good examples of the approaches taken by the Irish Republic, Canada and New Zealand.

The debate is of course deficient without the presence and contribution of the hon. Member for Thurrock (Andrew Mackinlay), who, as we have heard, has campaigned for 10 years or more to bring about justice. The early-day motion that he tabled in the first year or two that I was a Member of Parliament—in 1997 or 1998—attracted more signatures than any other early-day motion before or since. I was in the House on 24 July 1998 when the then Minister for the Armed Forces gave his statement and we debated it. It was the most moving debate that I have experienced in my eight or nine years in the House. It was clearly thought through by the then Minister but the conclusion was not the one for which we are still searching. I should point out that the debate will go on until people feel that justice has been done.

Clearly, the 306 people who were shot at dawn included many who it was quickly realised should not have been executed. Lessons were learned, because by the second world war there were no executions—certainly not on the scale and for the purposes for which an example had to be set, as if such an exercise were a sort of decimation, when one in 10 along the line was stabbed to death as in ancient history.

I am grateful to the hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk for drawing attention to "Oh! What a Lovely War" and "Blackadder Goes Forth". That satire really made an impact on people of my generation, because we could see not only the futility of war, but the stupidity of those who were responsible for such actions. As my hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth, South said, not all officers led from the front. Of course, there were many brave officers, but there were those who did not get stuck in as the men at the front did.

I first became aware of the scale of the first world war when, as a scout in 1961, I did my hiker's badge. As a project, I recorded information on village war memorials. I realised quickly that the list of names in respect of the first world war was considerably longer than that for the second world war. Clearly, various lessons had been learned, not least the stupidity of sending men into a barrage of machine gun bullets. Cowardice, courts martial and so on were more measured and understood in the second world war. Medical knowledge was improving all the time and it is now even better than it was in the second world war.

There have been calls for a state funeral for the last person from the great war to pass on. I urge caution because through my Royal British Legion connections I am told that it does not necessarily know all the names of those who took part in the war. In the past six to nine months, one or two names have emerged of which it was not aware. Would the family want a state funeral? If they did agree to it, it is possible that someone else may emerge who had not wished it to be known that he was a survivor and a brave soldier from the first world war.

Will the Minister take serious note of what has been said and realise that, although we have moved on from 1998, the campaign for the pardon has not weakened? As we come to the final page of the final chapter, I urge the Government to find a way in which to give posthumous pardon to those 306 people.

10.33 am

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East) (Con): Twice as many British servicemen were killed in the first world war than in the second world war. What made what happened seem even worse was that the majority of those casualties were inflicted in a condensed geographical area. Whatever one's point of view about the issue in hand today, everyone would agree that no trauma affected the attitude of the British people towards war as much as the experience of world war one. Indeed, many would say that the lessons that were drawn from world war one had a pernicious effect in the 1920s and 1930s in making the country more disinclined than it should have been to take the measures that might have stopped the onset of world war two.

There is no doubt that this morning's debate has touched on great issues of war and courage, and war and injustice. The victor of Burma, Viscount Slim, observed that the same fighting man who could win the Victoria cross under some circumstances could desert his post under others; it all depended on whether his commanding officers knew how to handle the resting of their subordinates. Indeed, the experience of the bravest resistance agents who fell into the hands of the Gestapo in the second world war showed that there are issues of physical endurance that all but the very strongest minds cannot overcome if tried to the limit. Therefore, if people were insufficiently rested and if their psychological traumas failed to be recognised, even the bravest of individuals could have undertaken acts that would at the time of the first world war have been regarded as gross cowardice.

How do we deal with those events of the early 20th century in these years of the early 21st century and for whom are we proposing to undertake any steps that might be considered? Who is all this for? I was asking myself that when preparing for the debate and what I have heard this morning has helped me answer the question. Is it for the people themselves who were the victims? Is it for their families and others who knew them, or is it for the historical record? As the debate has continued, I have become more convinced that it is for the families and others who knew the people concerned. If we do not take that line, we shall get into the difficulties that my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Simpson) so admirably outlined in his excellent contribution. I hesitate to follow his speech with my historical observations, because there are people at the highest reaches of the British armed forces who know what they know about British military history as a result of studying under my hon. Friend when he held his senior historical teaching position at Sandhurst.

The matter of past historical experience brings several examples to mind. Let us consider three of them. I refer first to the case of George Archer-Shee. He was a young lieutenant who was killed early in the first world war, leading his men on a raid. He should not have been there, because half a dozen years before the first world war he had been a naval cadet at Osborne and was wrongly accused of stealing a five shilling postal order from another cadet. That incident became the basis of the famous Terence Rattigan play "The Winslow Boy". George Archer-Shee won justice at that time, partly because his brother was a Member of Parliament and could enlist the services of Sir Edward Carson, one of the greatest barristers of the day, to fight the case, and partly because his father was determined to risk the entire family fortune or whatever it would take to clear the honour of his son's reputation.

However, even though justice was won for George, he lost. His naval career was ruined and, instead of being in the Royal Navy where he would almost certainly have survived the first world war, he immediately returned from abroad when the war was declared, volunteered, went to the western front and was killed early in his career fighting for the country that arguably had not treated him well as a cadet.

The next case concerns the Arctic convoy veterans of world war two with whom some of us have been involved, particularly the hon. Member for Portsmouth, South (Mr. Hancock), in fighting for recognition for a service medal for them, which was not awarded to mark their specific service in world war two. The third case is that of the Chinook pilots who were killed in a crash on the Mull of Kintyre, over which the argument carries on. There is much agreement that an injustice may have been done to those dead pilots.

How do we differentiate between those cases? That brings us back to the question of whether any family members or others close to the people concerned are still alive and feeling the pain of those perceived injustices. If we go further than that—this is where I part company with my Liberal Democrat colleagues, who are urging a collective solution—and say that we must give a collective pardon to everybody irrespective of the facts of the individual cases, I fear that we will open up a Pandora's box. That was hinted at by my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Norfolk when he referred to the events of the Peninsula war and the Easter rising. It is a convenient political cop-out to be able to say that because we would not do something in this day and age, we as parliamentarians and politicians will pass judgment on what was done in a different day and age when different standards pertained.

If individual cases are to be considered, that should be done—if it is to be done at all—on the basis of whether there is any legal mechanism to enable people who have a direct interest in such cases to bring an action. Even then, this is a matter for lawyers and the courts; it is not a matter for politicians and Parliament. In that respect I go some way towards the position of the hon. and learned Member for Redcar (Vera Baird), who made a thoughtful contribution. We also face a problem of boundaries. If we make the wrong decision, we will open up an endless process of historical review, which will not do good service to the cause of political debate in this country.

Let me return to the question of who this is for. If it is for the people who were killed, it can only be so in some spiritual sense that would depend on one's religious viewpoint. If one believes that those people still have some sort of entity or existence, they do so in a dimension where our consideration of their cases makes little difference. If it is for the families, then the only basis on which anything could justifiably be proceeded with would be where there are still a small number of survivors who are directly affected by what happened in the individual case. However, if it is for the historical record, we have to be very careful indeed; we as politicians would be entering into a rewriting of that record, when the historical record ought to be written by historians.

Even in our day and age, there is still not entire agreement on the record of the first world war. A recently published book by a leading historian entitled "Forgotten Victory: The First World War—Myths and Realities" seeks to rehabilitate many of the leading figures of that war who have been so effectively satirised in the years in between. I think that it overstates its case, but those are matters that it is appropriate for historians to debate and settle.

In respect of our debate today, the line can be correctly drawn only at the point at which the people who were directly affected cease to be living in this world and wishing to bring an action. The strongest case that has been made in this debate for any sort of consideration has been the pain, the stigma and the shame that was inflicted on the families of those concerned. I maintain that, once those family members are no longer living, the correct approach is for justice to be done by historians, and that politicians meddle in this sensitive area at their peril.

10.45 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Don Touhig): I congratulate the hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Simpson) on securing this debate on the soldiers who were executed in the first world war. I wish to state at the outset that the Government did not believe that the review that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence carried out in 1998 would end this issue, and this debate has demonstrated that.

The issue has been raised many times in this House and outside. It provokes powerful emotions, and there are strong and principled views on both sides of the debate. It is not solely a moral question, or a point of law, or an exercise in historical investigation. Rather, it is a complex debate with strong moral, legal and historical factors, every one of which is relevant, and every one of which is powerfully argued. I am glad to have had the opportunity to listen to the points raised, and to have this chance to explain the Government's position.

The previous Government considered these cases and decided that they were not able to take any action. The Labour party when in opposition promised a full and open investigation. We honoured that pledge when we came to office in 1997. The then Minister for the Armed Forces, my right hon. Friend the present Secretary of State, immediately set up a review into the whole subject of the executions and the possibility of recommending pardons. The summary of that review is in the Library.

The best view is of course that looking back—the view of "what if?" and "if only"—but we must not forget the circumstances in which the cases were brought. We must be very careful not to blame the members of the courts martial. The officers who conducted the trials were honourably and conscientiously doing their very best to discharge their responsibilities and their duties and to see that justice was done.

The review made a detailed consideration of shell shock—of both the way in which it was understood and treated at the time, and the way in which courts martial dealt with it as a possible defence or mitigation. All the issues were set in their historical context and all the case files held in the country were reviewed. As the hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk said, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State reviewed more than 100 cases himself. The review sought advice from historians, lawyers and medical experts, and of course veterans and the people seeking the pardons played a vital part in the discussions that my right hon. Friend held.

It is important to make it clear how and why pardons are granted. A free pardon excuses a person from all penalties imposed at trial in recognition that that person was technically and morally innocent of the charges against them. A conditional pardon reduces the penalty to a lesser one. In order to make a recommendation to the sovereign for a pardon under the royal prerogative, the Secretary of State would need to be satisfied for a free pardon that each individual was technically and morally innocent of the offence, and for a conditional pardon there would have to be compelling grounds that a lesser sentence than the one imposed was more appropriate.

[Mr. Don Touhig]

The hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk is a distinguished historian, and I am sure that he would agree that anyone who has studied the records and eye-witness accounts, heard or read the poetry, looked at the photographs or talked to those who survived the trenches, will realise that some places came as close to hell on earth as anyone could possibly imagine, and that it was an awful experience for those involved.

That conclusion is borne out by the tremendous weight of evidence—there really is no doubt about it. Unfortunately, we cannot say the same about the evidence that survives from the courts martial that condemned the soldiers to death. There is no doubt that the records are very thin. I have the documents for the Harry Farr case; there are six and a half pages, and they are handwritten. Therefore, there is very little information about what was actually said at his court martial. Those records that have survived are—and were intended to be at the time—a summary rather than a full account of the proceedings and leave many questions unanswered.

At the time of the review, my right hon. Friend wished, as do many others, to treat together all those who were executed. However, in order to consider pardoning a group of people, there needs to be sufficient evidence to meet the test in each individual case. As that level of evidence is lacking in most—perhaps all—of the cases, consideration of a blanket pardon was believed during my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State's review not to be possible. The approach that I described, in which each case is treated individually, was considered to be proper in the context of possible statutory pardons as well as pardons under the royal prerogative.

Since my right hon. Friend's review, the New Zealand Government have passed an Act of Parliament establishing a form of statutory pardon for each of the five members of the New Zealand expeditionary force executed during the first world war. The stated aim of the Act was to remove, as far as practicable, the dishonour that the execution of the five soldiers brought on them and their families. The Act is relevant to our considerations. A number of Members in this House and the other place are pressing the Government to consider a similar Act of Parliament to pardon all those executed to whom we have referred in this debate. That would represent a major step, but it could not be undertaken without careful consideration of its far-reaching implications.

I am aware of the private Member's Bill promoted by my hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock (Andrew Mackinlay), which will be considered on Second Reading on 3 March. The Bill requires pardons to be granted to all those executed, possibly after consideration of each case by an international body of judges that would have to be appointed. However, when my hon. Friend presents his Bill, an important point to consider will be the fact that it does not state exactly what test would be applied in order to make a decision, and that is key to reaching any conclusions on the subject.

At the end of the detailed review of all the issues in 1998, my right hon. Friend concluded that it would not be just or compassionate to put the cases of those who were executed to the pardon test just to see most—quite possibly all—of them fail. He particularly did not wish to take a course of action that, although it might lead to pardons for a few of the men, would leave most without a pardon and thus still condemned.

Paul Farrelly (Newcastle-under-Lyme) (Lab): I am sorry that I could not be here at the beginning of the debate. I have listened to the Minister and the Opposition Front-Bench spokesman, the hon. Member for New Forest, East (Dr. Lewis), and I must say that the tenor of the remarks disturbs me.

My granddad, Tom King, was born in 1899. He was a captain's runner in the first world war, hopping between trenches, and it is amazing that he survived to return; indeed, he joined the Labour party when he did. I know, from the stories that he told me of the horrors that he faced in the trenches, that for him the most disorientating time of all was going on leave, because the Germans knew when he and his fellow soldiers were going and used to shell the trains, so they never knew where they stood. I heard from him how badly affected most, if not all, those young people were. It has been a surprise to me that, since 1997, my Labour Government, and my granddad's Labour party, have not been persuaded to take steps to make pardons possible for some of those soldiers suffering from shell shock.

Mr. Touhig: My very first experience as a councillor, before I came to this House, was of laying a wreath at the cenotaph. I stood next to the secretary of my local Labour party branch. He was one of four brothers who went to the first world war, and the names of three brothers are on the cenotaph. I fully understand the horrors and the consequences, but no one could say that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, when Minister for the Armed Forces, did not carry out the most exhaustive, determined examination of the issues with a desire to do something about the matter. As colleagues have explained, and as I seek to explain, there are difficulties about simply agreeing to a pardon in the way that my hon. Friend strongly advocates.

At the time of the review, my right hon. Friend felt strongly—particularly with respect to the families of the executed and those who still remembered them—that it was simply not right to take no further action, and so he made a statement to the House on 24 July 1998. He said that the House acknowledged and expressed deep regret for the loss of life and remembered all those who endured such terrible conditions, those who died at the hands of the enemy, those who were executed and those who did their awful duty of being part of the firing squads. He said that all those executed should be recognised as victims of a terrible war. The Government then asked that the names of the executed men be added to war memorials and books of remembrance throughout the country. That is public recognition and a sign of the lifting of the stigma of execution from the men and their families, and I am pleased that many communities around the country did precisely what was asked.

The men who were executed are commemorated in the national memorial arboretum, where a very fitting memorial was dedicated in June 2001. They are remembered among their fallen comrades, and the sacrifice of all their lives is honoured and acknowledged.

Although the Government felt that it was not right to put all cases to the pardon test only for most of them to fail, it was always open to individuals, particularly the families of the executed, to petition the sovereign and seek a pardon for a particular serviceman. If such a petition is received it is, of course, considered on its merits. The Secretary of State has to determine whether he can recommend that the sovereign grant a pardon, whether free or conditional, on the basis of the evidence available. That is what happened in the case of Private Harry Farr, who was executed in 1916. The rejection of the petition submitted by his daughter is now the subject of a judicial review. The courts have accepted that there are no arguable grounds to challenge the rejection of a free pardon, but the hearing was adjourned in October following the submission of new legal arguments about the possibility of a conditional pardon. Those points are still being considered.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has asked me to take an overview of our considerations and to report to him directly when considerations are complete. I am sure that hon. Members will accept that it is difficult for me to say much more about the Farr case because of that. However, I emphasise that, as we said in court, there has been no pleasure for the Secretary of State in reaching any of his decisions in relation to the rejection of the petition on Private Farr. As I said, we have not yet reached a further conclusion on the new grounds submitted to us, but the Secretary of State and the Government—all of us—have the greatest sympathy for Private Farr's daughter and her family, who conducted the campaign on his behalf.

Another matter in which hon. Members will have an interest is the response to the report submitted to the Government by the Irish Foreign Minister in October 2004. It seeks pardon for 26 Irish soldiers executed during the first world war. We are considering our response to the Irish Government on that; we will, of course, make it public. Throughout this debate, and over many years, the Government have approached the cases that we are discussing with a sympathetic heart and an open mind—a point made by the hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk when he responded to the statement made in July 1998.

Mr. Hancock: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Touhig: If the hon. Gentleman will forgive me, I am tight for time and there are a couple of points that I would like to make.

We regard the soldiers who were executed as victims, along with millions of others, of a cataclysmic and ghastly war.

The hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk asked me a number of questions, and I shall briefly respond to them. He asked whether any documents had come to light. No new documents have come to light in support of the case from any source whatever. No files have been found of those sentenced to death but reprieved; they would have been routinely destroyed, and we know that some were destroyed during the bombing in the last world war. The Government's legal view on the matter has not changed, but of course we must await the judgment in the Farr case before we can determine a reaction to it. As I said, we are considering the request from the Irish Government, and we will respond to it in due course.

My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Redcar (Vera Baird) made a moving comment about the stigma attached to families. We fully understand that, and it motivates us to try to be reasonable and do something. I do not agree with her that the Criminal Cases Review Commission is the way to deal with the matter; I do not think that that approach would solve the problem for us.

The hon. Member for Portsmouth, South (Mr. Hancock) made it quite clear that he believes, as do a number of colleagues, that a pardon is appropriate; I think that he made those remarks in 1998, too. He was supported in what he said by the hon. Member for Colchester (Bob Russell). The hon. Member for New Forest, East (Dr. Lewis), who spoke for the Opposition, posed a number of important questions that are still to be answered if we are to resolve the matter satisfactorily.

I said at the beginning of my reply that we want to resolve the matter. Many hon. Members have raised points that I want to consider. Like all hon. Members, I can only imagine the horrors that people went through in the trenches in the first world war; like all hon. Members, I recognise the painful consequences for the families concerned; and like all hon. Members, I have a desire to ease the pain and suffering that the families are experiencing. However, that has to be done legally if we are to do it properly, and if it is to mean anything at all.

Grandparents (Access to Grandchildren)

11 am

Mr. Stewart Jackson (Peterborough) (Con): This debate is about families in Britain today, in all their variety and complexity. It is also about human rights and the value that we place on people whose love for their family is unconditional and who have hitherto felt excluded from decisions about their own lives. Family life in this country is not just about the nuclear family; it is about the wider or extended family, as well. Unfortunately family policy and the workings of family law often ignore the role of the extended family, in which grandparents play a vital part, nurturing and protecting children and acting as carers, role models, links to the past of the family and bridges to the future.

There are 13 million grandparents in the United Kingdom, each with an average of 4.4 grandchildren. One in five children is looked after by a grandparent, 60 per cent. of child care is provided by grandparents and three quarters of the UK population has a family of three generations or more. The care undertaken by grandparents would have an equivalent day-care cost of £1 billion, yet grandparents are becoming the proxy victims of family break-up, feuds, separation and divorce. Each year divorce affects 150,000 children, two thirds of whom are under the age of 10. Some 200,000 non-custodial fathers have lost contact with their children. Given that custody is vastly disproportionately awarded to mothers, paternal grandparents are particularly affected, and are estranged from their own grandchildren through no fault of their own. Up to 1 million children are in that position.

The human cost of family breakdown falls on the extended family, too. I pay tribute to the right hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field), who has kept the issue at the top of the political agenda in the context of a study entitled "Britain's Pensioner Parents: the quandary of parenting your grandchildren", which was published in June 2005. I thank him for his continuing support for organisations such as Grandparents Plus, the Grandparents Association and the Family Rights Group. He has also kept the issue alive with early-day motion 601—"Grandparents who act as parents"—which I was privileged to sign with 54 other hon. Members last July.

The case for reform, both financial and legal, is compelling. It is a matter not only of arcane legal issues, but of human rights, natural justice, fairness and equity, as well as economic and practical good sense. It is also about respecting people whose love for their children's children can make estrangement so painful that some of them are suicidal as a result.

Mrs. Nadine Dorries (Mid-Bedfordshire) (Con): My hon. Friend talked about human rights and legal issues. I should like to make a point on behalf of my constituents, Mr. and Mrs. Jennings. At a time in their life when their income is diminished—they are coming up to retirement—they have, through no fault of their own, found themselves sole carers for two very young grandchildren, both under the age of five. To their horror, what Mr. and Mrs. Jennings and other grandparents have found—the right hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) has highlighted the issue—is that in taking on the official role of foster parents, they are not entitled to the same rights as foster parents who are not related to their foster children. They do not have rights to the same income, allowances or benefits as unrelated foster parents. As a result, they find themselves bringing up their grandchildren in greatly diminished circumstances—worse circumstances than if their grandchildren had gone to foster parents who were not members of the family. Does my hon. Friend agree that that issue needs to be addressed and answered by the Minister?

Mr. Jackson: I thank my hon. Friend for her intervention. Later in my speech, I shall make further reference to the points made by the right hon. Member for Birkenhead in his report about the financial burden of being de facto foster parents, often as a result of alcohol or narcotics abuse.

Whatever the intention behind the Children Act 1989, its practical ramifications have led to a de facto presumption against grandparents' access to their own grandchildren. Grandparents have very few legal rights. Section 8 of the Act forces them to go through two legal hurdles to secure legal access to their own flesh and blood. They have no automatic right to apply for a contact order, but must first obtain the permission of the court so to do. That is more difficult if the child is already fostered or adopted, and legally next to impossible if the parents are not married. Can one imagine the heartache of being separated from a grandchild who has been adopted, and, as a result of a prescriptive contact order, being allowed to send that grandchild a Christmas card only if the words "Nanny" or "Grandad" are not written on it? That is the action of a callous state machinery inflicted on people who are as much the victims of family disintegration and breakdown as their grandchildren.

When a child is taken into care, the local authority has a duty to promote contact with the family as long as that is not incompatible with the welfare of the child or children. Section 23(6) of the 1989 Act imposes a responsibility on the local authority in respect of children who are looked after so that the presumption of care lies with family and friends in the first instance, and only then with foster carers and adopters. However, that is clearly not happening in practice. Often social services departments do not regard grandparents as a priority; rightly, they do not wish to be seen to be offending foster parents or adopters. In fact, we are seeing less, not more, parity between non-family and family carers. As of 30 December 2005, foster carers can apply for a residence order or special guardianship order without seeking leave if a child has been living with them for 12 months, but family and friends cannot do that unless they are already registered as foster parents.

According to experienced family law solicitors and data from the Grandparents Association and other helplines, the legal costs of leave to apply for a contact order—not including the contact order itself—can run to between £250 and £1,000. Many grandparents lack the means to meet those obligations and the confidence to cope with the legal system. Some live in relative poverty and therefore forgo the proper legal representation that would assist them in a traumatic and emotional process. Even after going through such a process, there is no guarantee that the contact order will not be breached. The experience in Scotland, whose Parliament has recently debated the Family Law (Scotland) Bill, suggests that parenting agreements and a grandparents charter are fine in principle if one thinks that the only way to overcome the problems is through mediation. However, only legislation—or the amendment of it—is appropriate to safeguard grandparents' rights and bring fairness and equality into this aspect of family law.

Let us consider the financial impact on grandparents who are struggling to fulfil their child care role as foster carers, especially in cases where the parents are absent. Under section 105 of the 1989 Act, a private arrangement for relatives to care for a child can be agreed with the consent of the parents, but invariably attracts no financial support from the local authority. The same applies when a local authority facilitates an informal placement of a child with family members: under regulation 38 of the Fostering Services Regulations 2002, grandparents can be financially unsupported for weeks or months. Even a residence order allowance is discretionary. Only when grandparents or other relatives are assessed as foster carers under section 23(2) of the 1989 Act will they attract a fostering allowance, and even then there is sometimes pressure from the local authority for them to apply for a special guardianship order, after which the financial help will cease.

In his report, the right hon. Member for Birkenhead presents eloquent testimony to the heroic efforts of the decent people in his constituency on the Wirral who have given up the prospect of a relatively comfortable, if not rich, retirement—or indeed a quiet retirement—to care for their grandchildren. The bulk of them receive barely £30 from the state for each grandchild that they look after. That is not taking into account any legal costs such as care orders. Generally, research shows that family carers are poorer—some live in poverty—and older and are more likely to be single parents than "stranger foster carers", which is an emotive term that I do not like, but it is used officially.

Tim Loughton (East Worthing and Shoreham) (Con): I am listening with great interest to what my hon. Friend has to say. Does he agree that despite the best endeavours of all those of us who were involved in the Adoption and Children Act 2002, which brought great changes to adoption and fostering services, still not enough priority is given to extended family members, particularly grandparents, in taking on the role of foster carers or the new role that they have under that Act? Does he not agree that it is preferable that we should look to extended family members to take over the children of a family that has broken down before having to look to foster carers or adoptive parents, who do not have the family connections? The reality now is that such an approach is not taken nearly enough.

Mr. Jackson: I thank my hon. Friend for his timely and helpful intervention. I agree wholeheartedly that anecdotal and empirical evidence shows that despite the good intentions underlying the Children Act 1989, social services, which are quite often under financial or time pressure and do not wish to alienate foster parents because they have difficulty in recruiting foster parents and adoptive parents, choose the path of least resistance, which often excludes extended family members.

What is to be done? I urge the Minister to examine the following modest but important proposals. First, the Government should remove the unnecessary and iniquitous requirement to obtain leave to apply before a contact order may be sought under section 8 of the 1989 Act. Such an action would not require primary legislation and could be enacted by secondary legislation.

Secondly, the Government should re-examine section 17 of the 1989 Act and issue regulations so that all children who cannot live with their parents and are cared for by family and friends should have a right to assessment. That will examine the financial aspects of grandparents' care for their grandchildren. Similarly, section 23 of the 1989 Act needs to be adhered to in practice, not just in theory. Above all, we need consistency across local authorities and other agencies on the issues of payments made under section 17 of the 1989 Act to family carers.

Thirdly, section 10 of the 1989 Act should be amended to provide parity between family and non-family carers—for example, by reducing the residence criterion for the former from three years out of five to one year out of three. That would still screen out unsuitable carers, but would maintain the strong bond between applicants and children.

All of those proposals can be contained within a new set of principles governing placements, which would inform placement decision making by local authorities, and enforce the requirement on courts, local authorities and others to give careful consideration to and to act on the principle that any non-family placement should proceed only if it has been demonstrated that care in the family network would not both promote and safeguard the child's welfare. That would correct the present legal imbalance.

In conclusion, the Government have an opportunity today to offer hope to those whose voices have not been heard—to those who are working for the state by proxy, sustained by selflessness and dedication, whose sole aim is to give their kin the very best start in life, sometimes at the cost of their own health and well-being. I trust that the Minister will grasp this opportunity and justify that hope.

11.15 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Maria Eagle): I congratulate the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Jackson) on obtaining this well timed debate—not that much time passes without a Bill or Act with "children" in the title coming before the House. In that sense such debates are always well timed.

I see the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham (Tim Loughton) in his place. Legislation to deal with contact issues and some aspects of the way in which the courts deal with these matters will be introduced in the House soon. The debate is well timed in that sense, too.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Peterborough on the thoughtful way in which he presented his case. I shall say a little about the present position and try in the time available to me to respond to the points that he made.

[Maria Eagle]

The Government recognise and value the important role that grandparents play in their grandchildren's lives. Whether families are together, divorced or otherwise, grandparents play an essential part in the upbringing of any child lucky enough to have them. No one disputes that. We know that grandparents can make a vital emotional, and sometimes financial, contribution to the lives of their grandchildren.

Many grandparents are already involved in the care of their grandchildren—the hon. Gentleman quoted some statistics—and most children see their grandparents as important figures in their lives and enjoy the time that they spend with them, perhaps because with their grandparents they can get away with a little more than they would with their parents. That in itself can contribute to happy childhoods. Such elements are essential to the children's development and future lives. I want to make it clear that there is no dispute about the grandparents' importance in the lives of their grandchildren.

The hon. Gentleman suggested that the voices of grandparents are not heard. I understand the points that he made about how courts can appear. Many people, not just grandparents, feel that their voices are not heard when they have to deal with the courts. However, the Government do listen to the voices of grandparents and their organised groups—he referred to the Family Rights Group and the Grandparents Association. I have had the benefit of meeting many such groups and I always examine their contributions to the reports that are prepared by various forums in the House, whether as part of pre-legislative scrutiny or by Select Committees.

The Government listen to the organised grandparents' groups, which have made some of the points that the hon. Gentleman made. We have been known to fund grandparents' organisations to produce advice sheets and resource packs for local authorities that are engaged in work force training. The hon. Gentleman mentioned work force issues and the culture and approaches taken by some of the professions that traditionally deal with family breakdown and looked-after children.

I do not accept that the voices of grandparents are not heard by Government. I understand why many grandparents, because of their personal experience and that of others, might feel that their voices are not heard sufficiently or that their being heard has not resulted in all the aims of their various campaigns being achieved, but I do not accept that we do not listen. We do listen, and it is important that we do.

The hon. Gentleman asked about the requirement that grandparents must have the leave of the court to apply for a contact order. He suggested that the balance struck in the Children Act was wrong. I remind the House that at the centre of the 1989 Act—a landmark piece of legislation which remains at the heart of the way in which we deal with issues of safeguarding children and the lives of children—is the paramountcy principle. The interests of the child are paramount when making decisions on often difficult and emotive cases of family breakdown and on what should happen to children who, for various reasons, can no longer live with their parents.

We must always bear that important principle in mind—the interests of the child are paramount. I believe that absolutely. That principle is an important factor in our approach to all such matters and it has implications for the approach taken by the courts. The main implication of the principle is that, as it says on the tin, the needs and interests of the individual child is paramount in each set of circumstances and must remain so. Inevitably, that may conflict with other groups' interests. Fathers' groups have been campaigning—more vocally recently—and suggesting that family courts do not treat them fairly. They say that there should be changes to the way in which the Children Act should work, particularly in respect of the paramountcy principle.

The paramountcy principle must be paramount if it is to live up to its name. The interests of the child must be paramount. Although the principle does not negate the interests of grandparents, the courts must put the interests of the child first and foremost.

Mr. Stewart Jackson: I am grateful to the Minister, who in her reasonable and fair-minded way is answering my speech point by point. However, removing the requirement to seek leave would not necessarily breach the principle of the paramountcy of children's rights and their long-term welfare. It would simply represent a tidying-up exercise and an attempt to return some parity and fairness to a difficult situation that can be traumatic for grandparents.

Maria Eagle: I do not deny that grandparents can be adversely affected by the break-up of their children's families, or that that they can feel distressed and left out if, as a consequence of the break-up, they start to lose access to their grandchildren. The 1989 Act recognises that, even if there is parental opposition, it could be in the interests of a child to maintain contact with their grandparents. No one has a veto. The parent does not have a veto. Subject to the paramountcy principle, the court will take into account the importance of grandparents and other relatives to the lives of children.

Tim Loughton: This issue is a hoary old chestnut, and if the Minister and I come up against each other during consideration of a new children and adoption Bill, we shall deal with the subject in detail. However, will she acknowledge that the paramountcy of the welfare of the child—a principle to which we all adhere—is not compromised by access to non-resident parents and grandparents? In the right circumstances, access to a loving family member, be it grandparent or father, should contribute to a child's welfare. Those ideas are not mutually exclusive. This has been a bone of contention between us before. Does the Minister now acknowledge that that is right?

Maria Eagle: As we discuss these matters in general terms, it is not possible to say whether that is right. In some circumstances, the paramountcy of the child's interest could be compromised by access for grandparents, other relatives or non-resident parents. The role of the court is to take the law as Parliament sets it down and to apply it to individual cases. As an ex-lawyer, I am wary of putting myself in the place of the judge. We lay down the general principles and the courts will in good faith apply them to individual cases as they arise.

The Government are not convinced that the safeguard of requiring leave to apply should be removed. We must do what we can to avoid involving children in unnecessary court proceedings, especially adversarial court proceedings, which can be distressing and bewildering for adults, let alone children. Such proceedings are costly, too. Removing the requirement would immediately bring in four more parties to start court proceedings. I am not saying that that would happen in every case, but it could, and the court must have a way to screen cases if, knowing all the circumstances, it feels that proceedings are unnecessary. Without the court having an initial opportunity to consider whether there would be any likely benefit to the child, it is difficult to understand how it could do that in each individual case.

This is an important matter and we will have an opportunity in the not-too-distant future to explore it in more detail. I suspect that the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham and I will engage in debate in another forum. However, it would not be fair of me to suggest today that the Government are convinced of the need for change.

The hon. Gentleman will remember that during the passage of the Adoption and Children Bill, a commitment was made to consider what changes to guidance and secondary legislation would be necessary to ensure that the application for leave process did not turn into a huge barrier. The process is meant to be not a costly, horrendous and huge barrier, but a safeguard to ensure paramountcy of the child's interests. The Department for Education and Skills is considering the issue, and I expect consideration to be completed sometime this year. I know that that is rather vague.

Mr. Stewart Jackson: I am grateful for the Minister's patience—I know that time is short. May I press her on the two specific issues, which I mentioned at the end of my remarks, relating to the review that she has announced today? Will that review consider section 17 of the Children Act 1989, which deals with the right to assessment and section 23, which provides the presumption in favour of family members?

Maria Eagle: I fear that the hon. Gentleman has misheard me, or perhaps I did not speak clearly enough. The review to which I referred was provided for during the passage of the Adoption and Children Bill in 2002, as the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham will recall. It was to consider whether the perceived barrier that the obligation to apply for leave represents could be minimised as much as possible. Let me make it clear that I am not announcing a review today. There are quite enough ongoing reviews of that area of law without the hon. Member for Peterborough thinking that I am announcing another one. However, we will have further opportunities to consider that issue and others relating to how to make contact work and making it easier.

The new Bill, which will be introduced fairly soon, will cover contact for grandparents. Sometimes the reason why grandparents cannot see their grandchildren is that parents do not comply with the contact order. The new legislation will assist grandparents by giving the courts new and wider powers, rather than just the sledgehammer of imprisonment, to ensure that when the court has ordered contact and it is in the interests of the child—that is what the order means—it goes ahead. The new legislation will be of great benefit to many grandparents who have contact orders to see their grandchildren but cannot do so, particularly when the court is reluctant to resort to imprisonment. It is difficult to argue that imprisonment of the resident parent is in the best interests of the child.

We know that there are difficulties and I hope that the new Bill will address them satisfactorily. I am sure that we shall have a chance to discuss the issues in more detail during the passage of that legislation. We are short of time, so I conclude by congratulating the hon. Member for Peterborough again.

Palestinian Territories (Israeli Policy)

2.30 pm

Sir Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton) (Lab): Mr. Bayley, I should like to thank Mr. Speaker for choosing this subject for debate and for appointing me leader of the Inter-Parliamentary Union delegation to the Palestinian territories—the first ever such delegation—from which this debate arises. I thank my colleagues who were with me on that delegation, and I thank the IPU staff, Mr. Courtenay and his colleagues, for the remarkable care that they took in organising the visit.

I have been for very many years, and from long before he became Prime Minister, a critic of the policies of Ariel Sharon. I think it appropriate for all of us to express our deep sympathy to his family for the ordeal through which Mr. Sharon is going. Nobody, whatever their opposition to his policies, would have wished on him such dreadful suffering as he is now undergoing. It must also be said, however, that whatever the trauma through which Mr. Sharon and his family are going at present, it does not detract from the baleful effect of the policies pursued by the Israeli Government during the period of the second intifada, which began in 2000, and which was triggered by Mr. Sharon's visit to the Haram-esh-Sharif, which my colleagues and I visited when we were in the Palestinian territories.

Those territories are one of the smallest areas in the world, yet that tiny Palestinian territory must be one of the most militarised in the world. There are Israeli troops and checkpoints all over the Palestinian territories; there are more than 600 fixed checkpoints. Between mid-November and 3 January, there were no fewer than 824 flying checkpoints in that territory. My colleagues and I encountered those checkpoints everywhere that we went.

We were involved, through no pro ocation of our own, in several disagreeable incidents relating to the way in which Israeli troops either prevented us from moving, or harangued us, or from preventing us from trying to speak to Palestinians when we were paying our visit. As I pointed out to my honourable colleagues, although those incidents were disagreeable, the fact is that we were going home at the end of our visit, whereas the Palestinians had to live with much worse every day of their lives.

I have visited that area and those territories more times than I can count. Not so long ago, I was able to drive uninterrupted, from Natanya—where recently a terrorist bomb incident took place—right through to Cairo, without any obstruction. When I attended a conference in Ramallah, not many years ago, I was able, at the end of the conference, to hire a Palestinian taxi and drive right through to Aqaba in Jordan, again without being interrupted or prevented in any way whatever. To imagine that that might be possible for anybody, including an overseas visitor, today is absolutely chimerical. It is almost impossible to move about freely in those territories.

The latest information we have is that during the past few weeks, between 13 and 29 main roads in the Palestinian territories have been closed by Israeli troops, and the average number of roads closed in those territories every single day is 20. At every point of the way where one goes, there are the fixed checkpoints and flying checkpoints. Although we were delayed on occasion for 45 minutes simply trying to get into one town or another, the Palestinians can be delayed for hours. Although we were delayed simply while paying a visit, they are delayed or prevented altogether from getting to their jobs and to hospitals, schools and universities. Normal life in those territories is absolutely impossible.

I have visited Bethlehem many times. When we were there, Manger square was empty except for a small celebration of Palestine national day, and the church of the nativity, which used to be so crowded that one could scarcely move in it, had just two groups of visitors. At Christmas, when the number of visitors to Bethlehem used to be enormous, there was only a fraction of the number of visitors who used to go to worship in the church of the nativity. In any case, just as we were there, a new obstruction was erected by the Israeli authorities that makes access to Bethlehem difficult, if not impossible. That town's livelihood is being strangled, because it depends so much on pilgrims and visitors.

Dr. Brian Iddon (Bolton, South-East) (Lab): I met the mayor of Bethlehem just before Christmas in this place, and he told me that the Israelis had built the separation wall through the middle of one of Bethlehem's cemeteries. Will my right hon. Friend join me in condemning that action?

Sir Gerald Kaufman: Certainly. The obstructions, which are obstructions to worship among other things, in Bethlehem and other towns and cities are extraordinary and outrageous. When we were in Hebron, for example, a barrier was such that people within seconds of a mosque had to do a circuitous walk of 25 minutes to go and pray at that mosque; that is, of course, if they were allowed to move at all. The Israelis are making a huge fuss at the moment about ejecting a handful of foreign agitators who are assisting people who have settled illegally in the old city of Hebron. The centre of Hebron, which I used to visit and where I used to buy food and shop for the famous Hebron glass, is now totally deserted. It is a ghost city because of the walls, huts, turnstiles and gates through which people have to go if they are to get into Hebron, and the fact is that they do not get in.

When a group of Palestinians was showing us the situation, we arrived at a junction through which two busloads of illegal Jewish settlers had just passed with no obstruction whatever. We were met by Israeli troops, who pointed their guns at us. When I explained to them who we were and what we were seeking to do, they sought authority from an officer over the telephone and then told us, "You can pass; the Arabs cannot." Of course, we did not proceed.

Huw Irranca-Davies (Ogmore) (Lab): I applaud my right hon. Friend for initiating this important debate. What he says about the suffering in the Palestinian territories is undoubtedly true. I visited Hebron with the Labour middle east council about 18 months ago—I thank the council for that opportunity—and the grotesque realities of what is happening there show the very worst aspects of what he is talking about.

Does my right hon. Friend also appreciate what I believe to be true; that what is happening in Hebron is not indicative of the moderate opinion of the Israeli majority and that, frankly, we should be putting pressure on people to support changes in Israeli politics to ensure that such things do not happen?

Sir Gerald Kaufman: I would like to think that my hon. Friend is right; certainly hundreds of thousands of Israelis, if not many more, would be filled with revulsion at what is going on in the Palestinian territories if they were to see it for themselves. When I first visited the Palestinian territories and for many years afterwards, Israeli tourists would visit the towns and cities; but no Israeli in his or her right mind would go into Palestinian territories now because their lives would be in danger. The only Israelis who see what is going on now are the troops, including reserve troops. I am sure that there are vast numbers of decent Israelis who, if they saw what was going on, would be physically sickened by it.

Frank Cook (Stockton, North) (Lab): The very change in climate to which my right hon. Friend refers—that Israelis could visit those areas at one time but can no longer do so in safety—is surely indicative of the fact that a solution to the problem is running further and further away as a direct result of the measures that have been taken over the years.

Sir Gerald Kaufman: I hope to refer to the point to which my hon. Friend draws our attention before I conclude. It is a fact that access to the towns through checkpoints makes things very difficult for Israelis. I had my doubts about doing so, but we were advised that it would be easier for us to move around the territories in a minibus that had Israeli licence plates. When we approached Tulkarm, however, the troops stopped us at the gates and told us that we could not go any further because we were in a vehicle with Israeli licence plates. They told us that we would have to get out and take taxis, but although one was extremely abusive, they subsequently backed down and allowed us to proceed.

Mr. David Burrowes (Enfield, Southgate) (Con): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Sir Gerald Kaufman: I will readily give way, but there is a very good attendance at this debate and I do not want to take up too much time, because others wish to make a contribution.

Mr. Burrowes: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for his generosity in giving way. I have a particular interest, having returned last Friday from a visit to Israel hosted by the Conservative Friends of Israel. The point that the right hon. Gentleman makes about security barriers and mobility for Israelis and Palestinians is well made. However, those barriers are in place not for the convenience of one side or the other. Indeed, they are inconvenient and, as one nears Jerusalem, they seem grotesque and ugly. Nevertheless, although they have reduced mobility they have also reduced terrorism, perhaps to the tune of 90 per cent. The reality is that 761 Israeli citizens have died as a result of terrorist activities, so the barriers are indeed a safety measure; they give no one any pleasure, but they are necessary because of the situation.

Sir Gerald Kaufman: They have not stopped a number of terrorist attacks on Israeli citizens in their own cities. They did not stop the recent attack on Israeli that killed five people in Natanya. In crude realpolitik terms, I suppose that the Israeli measures could be justified if they worked, but there is no indication that they do. What is more, as my hon. Friend the Member for Stockton, North (Frank Cook) said, the prospect for the future is dread and dire, as I shall try to explain.

Several hon. Members rose—

Sir Gerald Kaufman: I am grateful for hon. Members' interest but, as I say, there is good attendance today, a considerable number of hon. Members wish to speak and I do not want to take up a disproportionate amount of the time. I hope that hon. Members will forgive me if I do not give way, at this point at any rate.

As I was saying, we went to Tulkarm to see the wall. The wall is not a barrier within the old green line. It would be ugly if it were, but it could be justified. However, it goes deep into Palestinian territory. It has divided Jerusalem and locked 55,000 Palestinian Jerusalemites out of Jerusalem. It has cut the west bank in two. Whereas what I personally regard as the melodramatic charade of the removal of the settlers from Gaza has taken place, removing 8,000 settlers, last year there were more than 9,000 illegal settlers in the west bank. Some 450,000 Israeli settlers are illegally settled there and the Israeli Government have no intention of removing them.

In Tulkarm we saw one of the most futile and obscene sights that I have seen even in that territory, which was called the back-to-back procedure. Palestinians wishing to drive goods along were made to unload their goods from the vans. The goods were transferred over a fence to other vans. That was absolutely futile given that the Israeli soldiers who tried to prevent us from talking to the van drivers did not even inspect the goods that were transferred. If there were any bombs or explosives in the goods, they could have continued to be there as they were moved.

Land has been confiscated. We happened by chance to meet a Palestinian who, from a hilltop, showed us one set of olive groves that had been confiscated from him without compensation by the Israelis and another set that was theoretically still owned by him but to which he would not be allowed access to for so long that he would not be able to tend the groves. Eighty per cent. of the wall—or the barrier, fence or whatever one calls it, as it is all those things—is inside Palestinian territory; 10 per cent. of west bank territory is being confiscated by the building of the wall. The checkpoints and the other obstructions mean that the rest of the tiny territory is being split up into tiny, ungovernable cantons.

What is the result? The result is poverty on a scale that is comparable to some of the worst third world poverty in Africa, and made more obscene by the fact that it is minutes away from people living at first world standards in illegal settlements on the basis of subsidies from the Israeli Government. There is poverty, malnutrition and deep discontent. Nobody in this room, in this House or, I hope, in this country would in any way condone terrorist attacks on Israeli citizens. As Israelis themselves have said, the festering hatred that is being built up among Palestinians as a result of the way that they are being treated inevitably breeds terrorists.

The situation is worse than that. The wall locks the Palestinians out, but it also locks the Israelis in. My parents came to this country from eastern European ghettos; the Israelis have now created their own ghetto in the Holy Land, because they dare not move beyond the wall, just as the Palestinians are not allowed to move beyond it.

The Palestinian elections take place next week, and they are extremely important. If Hamas does well, as it may well do, the responsibility for that will lie with the Israeli Government for nourishing the roots of Hamas. The sad thing is that Hamas and Likud and Kadima need each other. Each can point to the other. Israelis can say, "We've got to do what we're doing because Hamas and Islamic Jihad are so dangerous"; Hamas and Islamic Jihad can say, "We've got no alternative because the Israelis are oppressing us." Because of that, we must exert far more pressure on the Israeli Government. The idea of reciprocal measures—the idea that one of the most powerful military organisations in the world is comparable with the rag, tag and bobtail Palestine security forces and that one movement depends on the other—is absurd.

I do not condone any extremism among the Palestinians, nor do I condone the corruption that we all know has existed. Years ago, I pleaded with Mr. Arafat to accept the Camp David proposals. I am not saying that the Palestinians have behaved entirely sensibly and moderately, but the fact is that persecution and oppression breed recalcitrant behaviour, and that is what we are witnessing today.

Some of my hon. Friends and I went to see the Prime Minister about this matter last week. Let us be clear about it; let us set aside the human rights issues that are involved and just look at the fact that until the Palestinian issue is solved, the middle east will be a powderkeg. All extremist movements, as well as good and moderate Arab opinion throughout the region, will not allow settlements to take place until the Palestinians have the right to their own land, which the Israeli Government have, on paper at least, accepted. Our Government have a great deal of influence in the region, and I look to them to take even more action than they have already taken to try to bring a solution to what is one of the most tragic situations in the world.

Hugh Bayley (in the Chair): I must tell hon. Members that, assuming we have no further Divisions, I will start the wind-ups at 3.40 pm, which is in 37 minutes' time. There are 18 Back Benchers in the Chamber, so speakers will have about two minutes each. Members will make themselves more popular with their colleagues if they keep their remarks brief.

3.4 pm

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury) (Con): I shall be extremely brief. I congratulate the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Sir Gerald Kaufman) on making a remarkable and moving speech. Unlike him, I have never had the privilege of visiting either Israel or the occupied territories, but I have often visited other parts of the Arab world.

I wish to say two things. First, I will provide a further piece of evidence in support of the compelling speech I have just heard. Recently, the ambassador of one of the most moderate, decent, reasonable and pro-western Arab countries—I shall not name it—said something to me during a private conversation. It is a country I know extremely well and have visited many times, and where there is total religious freedom. He said to me, "Julian, you cannot imagine the sheer hatred that is overtaking our young people because of what is going on in the occupied territory. This is a sickness that is spreading right across the whole of our region."

My second point is that my father was in almost the last unit to leave Palestine in 1948, before the effective ethnic cleansing took place that pushed the Palestinians into the 26 per cent. of the country that is now nominally theirs. We all know the indescribable background to 1948—the deaths of 6 million Jewish people in the concentration camps and the generations of persecution before that, not least the murder of 300,000 Jews in the Ukraine only a generation or so earlier. However, it cannot be in the interests of anybody, whichever side of the ethnic divide in that part of the world, for this to go on. Men such as Moshe Dayan spoke of how they would act when they had won their victory, and our recent former colleague Winston Churchill said that peace must be our opportunity. When one has won the war, that is the opportunity to show a bit of leniency, to realise that one has to live with the others as neighbours.

Many of us have a long-term interest in that part of the world. I have a large number of friends in the Lebanon and have been there on many occasions—some of them rather uncomfortable. It is in the interests of people on both sides of the divide that we make the peace process work. However, in this case, as the right hon. Gentleman said, the stronger party has to move first.

3.7 pm

Richard Burden (Birmingham, Northfield) (Lab): I, too, congratulate my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Sir Gerald Kaufman) on having secured today's debate and on what has aptly been described as a moving and powerful speech. I do not want to repeat his words, other than to endorse what he said about Ariel Sharon. Whatever criticisms I and others might have of Mr. Sharon's record over the years, none of us would wish on any human being the kind of suffering that he and his family are going through at the moment.

My right hon. Friend gave a powerful account of the impact of closures and movement restrictions, the wall and so on. I shall not repeat that, but would refer hon. Members on both sides of the House to the work of the Open Bethlehem project. That gives a graphic description of what is happening, not only highlighting the impact of the closures, but offering a message of hope about the fact that Bethlehem has to survive and that we all have a responsibility to do all that we can to ensure that it is open to the outside world.

I should like to raise two issues. If I go on for too long on the first, I shall drop the second, because I know that many other hon. Members want to speak. The first is the Palestinian elections next week. I am fortunate in being a member of the team of observers from the UK Parliament going there, and I should like to thank the Foreign Office and the Inter-Parliamentary Union for enabling that delegation to go ahead. I was there last year when the Palestinian presidential elections took place. Some of the lessons of that experience should concern us all in the run-up to next week's elections.

First, democracy is as important for Palestinians as it is for anybody else. They have the same right to exercise democratic choice as anybody else. Last year, I received two impressions of the way in which Palestinians reacted to their elections. One was that they had tremendous pride in the fact that they were breaking the caricatures that too many people paint of them and that they were holding elections. However, the other was a sense that they were not sure that anything was going to change. They seemed to wonder whether, given that they were able to exercise democracy only by the grace and favour of an occupying power, nothing particular would change afterwards. I found that second feeling most prevalent in east Jerusalem. That was partly because of the way in which the people were treated in those elections. It is good to hear that Israel is allowing Palestinians in east Jerusalem to vote next week. However, I have to say that we will all be looking for more co-operation with the democratic process than was seen in East Jerusalem last year.

Last year, the occupying authorities allowed only about 6,000 of the 120,000 Arab East Jerusalemites to vote in the city, the area known as J1. The rest were forced to travel outside to the area known as J2, sometimes having to run the gauntlet of Israeli checkpoints in order to exercise their democratic rights. The voting procedure in the city was chaotic; people were forced to vote in post offices, alongside people trying to post letters. The choice of post offices was not accidental. The image was that the voters were guests in their own city, and that they were absentee voters casting postal votes for an election about somewhere else—the west bank. The voting was on the level, but in the post offices, the slot in the ballot boxes was not on the top of the box but on its side, so that it looked as though voters were posting a letter, not casting a ballot.

We look for a better performance than that next week. I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes, South-West (Dr. Starkey) will say more about Jerusalem if she catches your eye, Mr. Bayley, and I ask hon. Members to pay attention to what she says. Jerusalem is a matter for final status negotiations. In the meantime, it is occupied under international law. Israel has no right to pre-empt international law. The international community and, indeed, all of us have a responsibility to make sure that Palestinian democratic rights are respected next week.

I certainly endorse what my right hon. Friend said about how Hamas came to be as prominent as it is. Partly, it is as a result of the Palestinian Authority's failings—corruption and so on—which are very much to do with the kind of policies that Israel has pursued in recent years. I ask hon. Members to look seriously at the article in The Guardian today by Chris McGreal. If Hamas does well in next week's election, as is likely, it will present everyone in the international community, but particularly in Israel, with some hard choices.

If hon. Members read the article, they will find that there are changes and debates going on in Hamas. That does not alter the fact that it has been responsible for some utterly appalling attacks over the years, and may be responsible for attacks in future. However, if we are to achieve political change among Palestinians, and are to get into a situation in which the broad mass of Palestinians wish to recognise Israel and to live side by side with it—as I believe the majority of Palestinians do—it will involve understanding the changes in political Islam and encouraging the voices of change within it, rather than writing off those involved as an undifferentiated whole, made up of terrorists. The article in The Guardian makes that point well.

My last point about Hamas is that we should not confuse terrorism with refusal to recognise the state of Israel. There are Palestinian groups that recognise the state of Israel that are involved in terrorism, and there are Palestinians who do not recognise the state of Israel who are entirely non-violent. Although I want every Palestinian to recognise the state of Israel, I also want every Israeli to recognise that Palestinians have no fewer rights than they do. If we do not say that it is a precondition for participation in the Israeli political process that every single Israeli political party should recognise that there should be a state of Palestine, it makes absolutely no sense and is unjust to say that every single political party in Palestine should have to recognise the state of Israel to participate in the elections. As I say, I want there to be mutual recognition, but the way to achieve that is to be even-handed, not to load on one side conditions that we would not, and should not, impose on the other.

3.14 pm

Mr. David Gauke (South-West Hertfordshire) (Con): First, I should say that I visited Israel and Jerusalem last week, along with my hon. Friend the Member for Enfield, Southgate (Mr. Burrowes), courtesy of Conservative Friends of Israel.

I wish merely to make two, brief comments. First, let us not doubt the enormous difficulties faced by the Palestinians; the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Sir Gerald Kaufman) made a passionate and moving speech, highlighting that point. However, we must not forget that since the second intifada began, more than 1,000 Israelis have been killed as a consequence of terrorism. Given that Israel's population is a tenth of the size of ours, it is not surprising that that has had an enormous impact on Israeli society. Let us consider the impact that the 7 July bombings had on our country. It was an enormous tragedy and about 50 people died, but it was one instance and relatively small compared with what Israel has had to suffer.

In my visit last week, we travelled up to the Lebanese border. In doing so, we stopped off for a coffee. As we went into a supermarket area of shops, the level of security that was in place was striking. Israelis live with that all the time, because they live constantly with the threat of terrorism. That is not to condone everything that the Israeli Government have done and every action taken by Israelis, but we must bear in mind the extraordinary circumstances in which Israel finds itself and the extraordinary threat of terrorism that it faces.

[Mr. David Gauke]

My second point is about the security barrier. There is no doubt that it is horrendous, ugly and disruptive and places enormous burdens on the Palestinian people. However, it has been effective in reducing the number of deaths. I will give some statistics. In the 34 months from the beginning of the intifada until August 2003, when the first part of the barrier was put in place, there were 73 terrorist attacks in Israel and 293 people were murdered. In the following 11 months—from August 2003 until the end of June 2004—there were three terrorist attacks and 26 people were murdered.

I will give the number of casualties in each year. In 2003, 214 Israelis were killed. In 2004, the figure was 117. In 2005, 45 Israelis were killed. In saying that, I am not supporting every aspect of the security fence and the particular locations in which it is placed—we should acknowledge that the Israeli Supreme Court has forced 30 changes to the position of the fence—but it has saved lives. We met politicians of many persuasions in Israel, but there is widespread support in broad principle for the fence, because it saves Israeli lives. This House should not be too critical of a country that tries its hardest to do precisely that, because it is the responsibility of every Government.

3.17 pm

Dr. Phyllis Starkey (Milton Keynes, South-West) (Lab): I will not repeat points that other hon. Members have made. I commend the opening speech by my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Sir Gerald Kaufman) and that of my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Richard Burden).

I will simply respond to the hon. Member for South-West Hertfordshire (Mr. Gauke) by saying that nobody suggests that Israel does not have a responsibility to protect the security of its citizens. Every sovereign state has such a responsibility. In protecting its citizens, it should remain within international law and should be mindful of the rights of others, particularly the Palestinians.

The impression that I have gained from my travels in the region—both in Israel and in Palestine—is that this Israeli Government's policies take no account of the Palestinians' rights or of their well-being. The Israeli Government respond only to Israeli citizens' security concerns and Israeli interests, whether or not those Israeli citizens are within the international borders of Israel or are illegally expropriating other people's land on the west bank.

I want to discuss the concerted attack on Palestinian institutions and civil society, and the naked attempt in Jerusalem to push out any Palestinian institution, to obstruct any such institution and to alter the demography of east Jerusalem by reducing the number of Arabs and increasing the number of Jews. The concerted attack on institutions in east Jerusalem is longstanding; at its most extreme, Orient house was closed down immediately following the death of Faisal Husseini and all the records that lay within were confiscated. They were the only records of Palestinian property rights in east Jerusalem.

The process continued. At every opportunity, the Israeli Government confiscated the computer hard discs of Palestinian non-governmental organisations and humanitarian organisations. That was done in order to compile a massive register, as far as I can tell, of every Palestinian, how they are related to each other, who they know and with whom they are connected.

In Gaza, the Israelis control who is registered as a Palestinian; so much for Gaza's apparent sovereignty. The economic life of Arab east Jerusalem is being deliberately strangled by the Israelis; they are demolishing houses and making businesses unviable by cutting them off from the hinterland that would otherwise support them. Employment and income levels in east Jerusalem have gone down, but the taxes that the Israelis impose have gone up. That is a deliberate economic attempt to squeeze east Jerusalem Arabs out of their city and alter the demography to the advantage of the Israelis.

My final point is about the family reunification law, introduced through the Knesset. It violates international law and is wholly discriminatory. It bars family reunification for Israelis if they marry a Palestinian woman under 25 or a Palestinian man under 35. An Israeli can marry a person of any other nationality and bring their husband or wife into Israel, but if they marry a Palestinian in those age ranges they may not; they have to go to live with them in the Palestinian territories.

That is a nakedly discriminatory law whose only purpose is to discriminate, primarily against Israeli citizens of Palestinian origin—largely citizens of the Galilee and those towns with Palestinian-Israeli citizens; 20 per cent. of Israeli citizens are Arab citizens—and against Jerusalem Arabs. That law says to such people that if they choose to marry a Palestinian from the west bank, or one who may live in Jerusalem but does not have a Jerusalem ID, they must go to live outside Jerusalem.

As I say, that violates international law. It is being challenged by Israeli human rights groups in the Israeli courts, but our Government should be making it absolutely clear to the Israelis that they must abide by international law, and that that sort of law should never have gone through the Knesset. It should have been blocked. It is a disgrace to Israel and its credentials as a liberal democracy that it ever conceived of such a law, let alone passed it.

3.22 pm

Michael Fabricant (Lichfield) (Con): For 13 years or so, I have been friends with the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Sir Gerald Kaufman), whom I congratulate on securing this debate. We disagree on only two things; the future of the BBC and the subject of this debate.

One of the sadnesses of this type of debate is that it always ends up rather polarised. People always try to apportion blame and assign a monopoly of guilt or virtue to one side or the other. True life, of course, is far more complicated than that.

I am certainly not here to condone the fence per se or its route, but we have to set on record why the fence has been built. Hon. Members on both sides of the Chamber have already spoken about the need and right of a sovereign state to defend its own people. Whether we accept the fence as a good idea or not, it was interesting to hear the right hon. Gentleman say that in Hebron there are walls, huts, gates and turnstiles; he was right. He also talked about the difficulty in moving freely; he was right.

However, in the 1980s, when I worked for the BBC in Belfast, one had to go through precisely the same sort of procedure if one wanted to shop in Royal avenue. The fences, gates, huts and turnstiles were put there not because of some ill-intentioned regime in London, but to protect the citizenry. In fairness, we have to accept that the motivation for erecting the fence was not to try to destroy the Palestinian economy, as has been claimed, but to try to protect Israel's citizenry.

Roger Berry (Kingswood) (Lab): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Michael Fabricant: I shall not, because others have not given way and others want to speak as well.

It is fair to examine and explore the gravity of the offences being committed against the Israeli people at the moment. My hon. Friend the Member for South-West Hertfordshire (Mr. Gauke) has said that more than 1,000 Israelis have been killed; in fact, 1,084 have been killed since the beginning of the Palestinian intifada. In 2005, when there was supposed to be a period of peace, 45 Israelis were killed—of whom only eight were members of the Israeli defence force and 37 were civilians—and 406 were wounded. Twenty-three of the 45 killings were caused in seven suicide attacks. In 2005 alone, there were 199 bomb attacks, 848 mortar attacks, 377 Kassam missile attacks and 1,133 shooting attacks.

Of course, I appreciate that there is anger among young Palestinians and accept that there have been injustices, but apportioning blame against the state of Israel for erecting the fence and not acknowledging that it is there because someone has to move first and say that the attacks will end simply is not being realistic about the middle east, let alone Israel and the occupied territories. Several hon. Members have spoken about the possible illegality of what Israel has done and that claims are being made against the Israeli Supreme Court. That is so, but let us at least recognise that Israel has a Supreme Court, which can and does override the Government and the army, and that Israel has been a democracy since 1948. If only some Arab countries were the same. Thank God that, due to our intervention, Iraq is heading in that direction. I hope that Iraq will be successful in that, too.

I do not defend the route of the fence, and I am sure that there will be cases of injustice. When answering an intervention, the right hon. Gentleman rightly said that the fence has not prevented a number of terrorist attacks. He has spoken about attacks in Natanya, a town that I know well on the Israeli coast. How many more Natanyas would there have been were it not for the fence? I remind hon. Members that resolution 242 said that all land disputes should be settled by a negotiated peace. Bombs, rockets and suicide attacks are not negotiation. Israel has every right—indeed it has a duty—to protect its citizens.

3.28 pm

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North) (Lab): No one participating in the debate disputes the right of Israel to exist and to defend itself. That is not the issue. This shows my age, but I took the view in 1948, when I was quite young, which seems a long time ago, that in all the circumstances it was right for the international community—it was the international community—to bring Israel into existence. Nearly 2,000 years of Jews being demonised, persecuted, tortured and murdered laid the basis for what the Nazis did, which has already been referred to. This was the systematic extermination of 6 million because of their race; it was nothing to do with religion. All of that justified Israel coming into existence, but the price that the Palestinians paid for that should not be forgotten. If we understand why Israel came into existence, surely we have an equal responsibility to understand the Palestinian case. If we were Palestinians living at that time, I doubt whether we would have taken any other attitude than that taken by them.

I mention the long history of anti-Semitism. All of us have a responsibility—especially, perhaps, without being misunderstood, those who take a particularly strong view on the middle east, opposite to Israel, so to speak—to dissociate ourselves in every way possible from some of the poisonous anti-Semitism that we have seen in Europe for centuries and which is now surfacing, surprisingly, in countries such as Egypt, for example, through such documents as the "Protocols of the Elders of Zion", a notorious tsarist forgery that states that the Jews will dominate the world. I do not know when that domination is going to start; maybe in 2020 or 2021. I have not been given the exact date. Moreover, we have seen the sheer obscenity—there is no other way to describe it—of the Iranian President organising a conference on what is described as "holocaust denial". There is a responsibility in that regard.

I want to bring us away from the idea that what happened last year in Gaza was the start of a process whereby Israel intends to withdraw from the occupied territories. I accept nothing of the kind. Whether the removals from Gaza were stage-managed or not, it was never the intention of Sharon or his Government that that withdrawal—which, however unilateral, we all welcome—would start the process of withdrawal from all the occupied territories, something we all want to see.

I have a note from the Library about settler occupation in the west bank from 1972 to 2004. All the settlements are illegal and exist in defiance of the international community; the very community that brought Israel into existence in 1948. In 1972 there were 800 such settlements; by 1990 there were 78,600; by 2000 there were 192,976. At the end of 2004 the figure was 234,487. That demonstrates that over the years, Israel has been determined to build such settlements in defiance of international opinion. That is totally unacceptable.

I endorse everything that my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Sir Gerald Kaufman) said about the daily misery and humiliation that Palestinians face. If Jews were facing that sort of tragedy and being treated in that way, would we not be raising our voice? I hope so. I would be doing so, as would my right hon. Friend and the hon. Member for Lichfield (Michael Fabricant). Have we therefore not a responsibility to raise our voice loudly and clearly about the way in which the Palestinians are being treated? We should make no apology for doing so. I see the hon. Member for Lichfield smiling. He well knows the history of anti-Semitism and he should be concerned about the way in which Palestinians are being treated, as described by my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton and my hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes, South-West (Dr. Starkey). We must be evenly balanced; for heaven's sake, it is no good taking a one-sided attitude.

We know that the quartet exists. I accept that the British Government wish to see a fair solution, though I do not know whether that is the view of every hon. Member. The fair solution is a Palestinian state no less independent and viable than Israel itself. The one country that can put sufficient pressure on Israel is the United States, which has the muscle and the influence. I am dismayed that in the last few years, under President Bush, there has been no wish to use that influence to bring about the right and just solution.

I do not believe that if the issue were to be settled it would mean the end of international terrorism. That would be a very naive view. Bin Laden and his murderous fanatics would find many other reasons, as they do now. It would, however, take so much poison out of the middle east. It would not only be right in itself but would help to stabilise the position in the region. That is why I hope that the British Government will try to persuade the American Government to do what is right.

3.34 pm

Tom Levitt (High Peak) (Lab): For the record, the other members of the delegation to which my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Sir Gerald Kaufman) referred were my hon. Friend the Member for Kingswood (Roger Berry) and me, as well as two colleagues from another place. It was my first time in the middle east; I particularly wanted to go there because I have some general sympathy with the Palestinian cause—although I do not have a lot of knowledge on the subject—and an interest in what the Department for International Development is doing there. I went there and speak today in a personal capacity, not as a representative of DFID.

I thought that occupation was a static process, but what we saw was much more active; the occupation not only moves on but gets worse. Particularly in Hebron, we saw how illegal settlements were being linked together by new security measures. We saw how the economy of that town was being destroyed by the policy of allowing traffic in and out of the city for only six hours a day; we had to leave the town illegally by driving a minibus across fields. The issue was summed up for me when I was shown a Palestinian medical centre in Hebron that had been taken over two weeks earlier by Israeli forces and was now an Israeli army post. Local Palestinians no longer had an available medical centre.

Judging from everything that we saw, I felt that Israeli policy in the Palestinian territories was absolutely clear. First, it was to hold on to economic control of the Jericho valley; secondly, to resettle Gaza settlers in the west bank; thirdly, to protect other settlers and encourage them to come in illegally, settlers not just from Israel but from fundamentalist Christian groups around the world. Fences would immediately be put around those illegal settlements, military posts would be put in to guard them and new roads would be built for them and barred to Palestinians. Settlers will also get to vote in the Israeli elections in March, although many of them never lived in Israel previously. One can imagine which way they are likely to vote.

The next tactic is clearly to take all of Jerusalem, the key city for three of the world's major religions, into Israel and then extend it eastward through the Ma'ale Adumim development, dividing the west bank into two. With 10 per cent. of the west bank already behind the wall, some of the most fertile and economically productive land and most productive water sources have effectively been taken into Israel. That is clearly what is happening. The tactic is being used for economic destruction in the west bank. In Tulkarm, where there is a no-go area of about 100 m alongside the wall, thousands of square yards of greenhouses had been destroyed; not to build the wall, but to maintain that no-go area.

The remaining part of the west bank, which consists of less than 50 per cent. of what should be the west bank under the 1948 agreements, is criss-crossed by roads that act as barriers. When those roads are policed so that Palestinian vehicles may not use them, they are barriers to communication and not agents of it. If one adds to that the 600 permanent roadblocks, one sees not only that those circumstances make the Palestinian economy virtually unworkable, but that they will thwart the Palestinian people's democratic aspirations as well.

Mark Lazarowicz (Edinburgh, North and Leith) (Lab/Co-op): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Tom Levitt: I am going to sit down in just a moment, if my hon. Friend will forgive me.

The next few days will be crucial. If an election in the Palestinian territories does not take place a week from today that can be seen to be credible and that returns a Government capable of doing something—bearing in mind that the entire Palestinian Authority's budget each year is about the same as what the Israelis are spending on building the wall—that election will be of very little value. If anything, it could polarise the issue even more if, as others have said, Hamas takes more than a foothold in the democratic process.

We are in very difficult times. I do not believe that the international community has done enough to ensure that next Wednesday's election will be credible. In the Israeli elections that follow, I hope that the 70 per cent. of Israelis who support withdrawal will vote for it. I hope that we can get something out of the situation, but I came back from my visit to the Palestinian territories much more depressed about it than when I went.

Hugh Bayley (in the Chair): We now have to move on to the winding-up speeches. It is pleasing to see that so many hon. Members have attended the debate, and I apologise to those whom I have not been able to call.

3.40 pm

Mr. Nick Clegg (Sheffield, Hallam) (LD): In keeping with other hon. Members, I will try to make my observations and comments brief. So much has been said about this fraught and difficult issue that is of great value and derived from far greater insight, experience and expertise than I possess. I shall just supplement what has been said with four observations.

First, I visited the region in late November with the hon. Member for Bristol, East (Kerry McCarthy), and went to areas such as the west bank, Jerusalem, Tel Aviv, Ramallah and Hebron when the political drama in Israel was unfolding; the day after I left, Ariel Sharon announced the establishment of his new political party, Kadima. It was obvious to me, as a first-time visitor to the region, that something terrifically significant was happening in Israeli politics. Since then, I have been asking myself a question that has been made more acute by Mr. Sharon's tragic stroke; does Kadima represent a new shift in political trade in Israel, or is it, as is alleged by some, nothing more than a sleight of hand by Sharon's supporters who are trying to pursue an agenda that has not changed over the years, but in a more politically acceptable manner?

I shall state my provisional view as a question, as the answer is dependent on the events of the months to come. However, my hunch is that Kadima is a more significant development in Israeli politics than suggested by some. The notion that the party is merely a Machiavellian sleight of hand, with the same agenda of brutal unilateralism as was pursued before, stretches credulity, not least because the party has gathered around it the centre ground of Israeli political opinion. Kadima seems to have broken a taboo; it has explicitly accepted that a Palestinian state should be established on the basis of land for peace.

I have an overarching question about where that development will take the peace process. Will it still rely on a unilateral decision by Israel about the terms of the negotiated land for peace settlement? We then come back to the age-old question of whether unilateralism works in a region where one side feels so aggrieved by the other.

My second observation, which has been made before, is about Hamas. No doubt other hon. Members have read about the intriguing signs that Hamas has softened its stance on the status and existence of Israel; it has even indicated that it would be prepared to negotiate with Israel. If that is the case, it would appear to be a glimmer of hope in the context of continuing and profound concern about the military and terrorist activities sponsored by Hamas.

However, the response of the international community to what looks like an almost inevitable increase in Hamas representation after the elections on 25 January needs to be delicate, sensitive and intelligent in order to extract the best from those elections; otherwise they may be used merely as an excuse to accelerate a continuing spiral of antagonism. I would be grateful to hear the Government's thinking on the issue; it must be quite advanced given that the election is only a week away. How will they act—both alone and in the context of the European Union—when confronted by a precipitate decline in the political power of an increasingly illegitimate Fatah movement—to be frank, it appears corrupt at times—and the rise of the increasingly popular Hamas movement.

My third and penultimate observation is that when visiting the region with the hon. Member for Bristol, East, I was naturally struck, like many visitors, by the existence of the wall. Yet I had simply not appreciated, until making our visit, that the most insidious and destructive effects on the everyday livelihoods and fortunes of Palestinians in the west bank are, obviously, though the closure regime, but also through various invisible controls. The permits to retain one's home, if one has been studying abroad for two years, are often withdrawn unilaterally. The licences required merely to move from east Jerusalem form a Byzantine, complex system; the permits needed may be yellow, blue or orange. That is in order to visit families or to work in parts of the west bank or east Jerusalem.

I still simply cannot understand why reducing the west bank to a socially and economically dysfunctional state is in Israel's own interest. That is neither a political nor a polemical statement; it is a logical one. You cannot make peace with chaos, nor with grinding poverty. You cannot make peace where people cannot meet their families, nor travel to work where moving even a few metres or kilometres is made impossible. I literally find incredible the suggestion that such a degree of dysfunctionality somehow serves the wider, legitimate security objectives of the Israeli state.

My fourth and final point in this fairly arbitrary list of observations is said with a continued sense of regret; that the EU did not choose to publish, shortly before Christmas, the report drafted by its own diplomats on the ground in east Jerusalem about conditions there. It reminded me just how inconsistent, weak and politically vague the EU's role in the region appears to have been, and for far too long.

There are glimmers of hope. It is encouraging that European Union observers, principally Italian and led by an Italian general, are overseeing the implementation of the Rafah border agreement. By financing projects in the west bank and elsewhere, the EU is doing much extremely good work, not least to develop the capacity of the Palestinian police forces to operate effectively. However, in the absence of clear leadership from Washington on the issue, it is incumbent on the British Government—and, certainly, on all other Governments in the EU—to try to come to a more coherent, collective political view, however difficult that is.

The European Union is the economic giant in the neighbourhood. It has enormous leverage; would that it wished to use it more coherently. I am keen to know whether the Minister agrees with that analysis. What does he feel the British Government could do to develop a more coherent and organised EU role in the region?

3.48 pm

Mr. Keith Simpson (Mid-Norfolk) (Con): I begin by congratulating the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Sir Gerald Kaufman) on his ability to acquire this debate. As he has proved during it and many others held in the House, his knowledge of the area is deep. He speaks with great passion but also with great feeling, and I congratulate him on becoming leader of the IPU delegation to Palestine.

Our debate has produced a number of speeches articulated with enormous passion. All too often, we come to debates in the Chamber or Westminster Hall to find so many people reading out briefs of one kind or another and taking up party positions. Nearly everyone who has spoken did so with great passion. Interestingly, on the whole they had fixed or relatively fixed positions. Let us be quite clear; this is a divisive subject. It is probably only the Minister and, in theory, the Front Bench spokesmen who have to try to straddle it who take an objective view. The people who live in the area, whether they are Israelis or Palestinians, have passionate and deeply held views.

The subject is so divisive that when I was first appointed Conservative Front-Bench spokesman on the middle east, people's first words were not to congratulate me—someone commiserated and said that I could have got Europe—but to ask, "Are you pro-Arab or pro-Israeli?" That is how divisive the subject is. I hope that I am pro-British and that I can take an objective and constructive view.

I will not list the contributions to the debate like a laundry list, but what came through from them was that Britain still has a role to play. We have a responsibility because we were a great power there 80 or 90 years ago and because of some of the things that happened as a direct consequence of successive British Governments, Liberal—when we had Liberal Governments—Conservative, and Labour. We look to the Minister to tell us what the British Government will try to do to resolve the issue.

The right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton rightly sent Mr. Sharon his commiserations. Part of me is filled with gloom, first, because whatever his many faults—Mr. Sharon is not known as "the bulldozer" for nothing—he is a strange combination of a very brutal, hard-nosed soldier and politician with quite a subtle man who, in his fourth decade, could recognise the changes that had to take place. With his incapacity, I wonder what will now happen to Israeli policy.

Secondly, I am filled with gloom by what appears to be the chaos and confusion in the Palestinian territories, the political divisions and the fact that today the EU has suspended £25 million of aid because of financial irregularities in the Palestinian territories. Somebody might say that is indeed an irony coming from the EU. Israelis and Palestinians may frequently be overcome by gloom but if they want to come to a constructive conclusion they have to keep working at it.

My party and the other two political parties represented in the debate believe that Israel has a right to exist, just as there is a right to a Palestinian state. All hon. Members agree on that, but the problem is how to achieve it, because there are vastly different definitions between Israel and Palestine on what each state should consist of, and the overlap is absolutely enormous.

I listened to what the right hon. Gentleman and other hon. Members said. There is no doubt in my mind, given my background, and the mention made of Northern Ireland, that with the best will in the world the most sophisticated counter-insurgency and counter-terror measures never, ever work on their own and frequently can be counter-productive, whether they are put in place by democratic countries such as ours or by the most fiercely totalitarian regimes. There is a danger that while trying to protect your own citizens you will provide recruits for the future.

However, I do not resile from the fact that large numbers of those actively involved in politics in Palestine wish to destroy the state of Israel and kill Israeli citizens, but there has to be a political rather than a military solution.

Finally, I want to ask the Minister two or three brief questions and I hope that he will have time to give an opinion. Can the Minister assure us that the Government are doing everything possible to address some of the issues identified by hon. Members today that are frustrating the peace process? Have the British Government tacitly accepted the de-Palestinisation of east Jerusalem, cited by the UN and, as is likely, by their own consulate in Jerusalem? What discussions have been taking place about Jerusalem's future status? Has thought been given to the implications that that will have for the future of peace negotiations? What are the Government doing to encourage economic regeneration in the west bank? Finally, what is the Minister's assessment of progress made in dismantling settlements built since March 2001?

3.55 pm

The Minister for the Middle East (Dr. Kim Howells): I join other hon. Members in thanking my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Sir Gerald Kaufman) for bringing this issue to the House for discussion. He has been my guide in many areas. I shall be frivolous for a moment and say that he has especially been my guide in cinema and in the American musical over the years, but he has also been my guide on this subject, and the House listens to his words with very great and special respect. I am not quite as old as him, but we were both brought up to believe that there was every possibility that the dream of people living alongside one another in the Holy Land would be realised. Over the years, it has irked my right hon. Friend as much as it has irked all of us in this Chamber to see that that has not happened and that the bitterness has continued.

Let me say before I come on to Palestine that this is a difficult time in Israeli politics. I echo the words of my right hon. Friend and others by saying how saddened I was to hear of Prime Minister Sharon's illness. We wish him a speedy recovery. He certainly turned Israeli politics upside down in his determined efforts to withdraw Israeli settlers and defence forces from Gaza and parts of the west bank. Few people could have predicted just two years ago that Ariel Sharon would have instigated and led so unilateralist a movement, because that is what I think it is. It is a move against the religious right and the expansionists in Israeli politics.

It is possible that Sharon's other, in my view, unilateralist policy—the building of the barrier, the wall, the fence; call it what you will—allowed him, by being seen as strengthening Israel's physical defences, enough political slack in Israel to disengage from Gaza. Disengagement has been the right policy for Israel. Although not part of the road map, it has made an effective contribution and it is important that the parties and the international community continue to build on that opportunity. We must try to understand how we might do that.

On a recent visit to Israel and Palestine, I was encouraged by signs that there are influential elements in Israeli society who understand clearly that what Israel does not need, as the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Clegg) pointed out, is an economic basket-case on its borders. What possible benefit could that bring to anyone? That is why the agreement on movement and access, reached between Israel and the Palestinians on 15 November, was a significant step and should go some way towards ensuring that Israel's disengagement from Gaza at least gives the Palestinian people a chance to mount an economic revival.

The EU, under the UK presidency, launched, with a very short lead time, the EU border assistance mission at the Gaza-Egypt border, enabling the Rafah crossing to open on 25 November. Thousands of Palestinians have since used that crossing. It is vital that the Palestinians and the Egyptians make a success of Rafah and try to replicate its lessons elsewhere; for example, for the Gaza seaport and airport and perhaps for crossing points in the west bank.

However, as we have heard, although some developments since Israeli disengagement have been encouraging and have given us cause for optimism, many other Israelis policies in the occupied territories have not. As my right hon. Friend has told us, restrictions on freedom of movement, and the occasional disproportionate use of force—sometimes very disproportionate—by the Israelis remain real matters for concern. As has been said, the world is particularly concerned about the hardship that the route of the barrier is causing in the west bank and, especially, Jerusalem. That route threatens the possibility of the creation of a two-state solution and has led to the tragic saga of which we have heard so much this afternoon.

According to the United Nations office for the co-ordination of humanitarian affairs, from which I was lucky enough to receive a briefing in Jerusalem, Israel's closure regime is the primary cause of poverty and economic depression in the west bank. Closures restrict Palestinian access to medical personnel; make it difficult for children to travel to school; hinder ordinary Palestinians on their way to work—I saw that on a number of occasions—and impede trade and economic development. We remain extremely concerned about the humanitarian and economic consequences of closures, both internally and on the borders. The imposition of curfews and tight access controls is also, as we have heard, having a very detrimental effect on the quality of life in those Palestinian areas. We continue to call on the Government of Israel to do all that it can to ease movement restrictions.

We have also seconded a senior army officer to lead a team to help UNOCHA, and the mission seeks to work with the IDF to try to reduce the number of obstacles to Palestinian freedom of movement.

Roger Berry: Does my hon. Friend agree that the fact that, in the past five years, the income per head in the Palestinian territories has fallen by 50 per cent. and the number of people living in poverty has risen from 20 per cent. to 61 per cent.—according to DFID figures—suggests that we should act with great urgency to remove the barriers to economic activity and human life?

Dr. Howells: I agree entirely with my hon. Friend. The eastern shore of the Mediterranean should not be a poor part of the world. I have said before that I am not one of those who feel that the situation cannot be remedied, or that there cannot be a viable economy in Gaza and the west bank. Why should there not be? Israel has proved that it can be done, and many projects have taken place in Gaza, some of which I have seen, that demonstrate that it is possible to have a vibrant economy there. I agree that the issue is urgent. Call me old fashioned, but it seems to me that if there is a vibrant economy there, we will see less resentment and fewer problems. That is something that we have to work hard to achieve.

Michael Fabricant: The Minister is very generous in giving way. Does he not also accept, given all the points that he has made, that one cannot just remove the barrier, even though it is causing huge difficulties for Palestinians and subjecting them to a lower economic growth rate? That would result in even more killings in Israel.

Dr. Howells: I would certainly agree that there has been a palpable reduction in the number of deaths and murders by suicide bombers in Israel. There is also a sense inside Israel that people feel safer than they did previously. However, that does not make the route of the barrier right. That is the whole point, and that is why we continue to protest to the Israeli Government.

I am very glad to see that the Israeli courts often agree with us about the route of the barrier, and that non-governmental organisations and Palestinians have been pursuing that route through the Israeli courts to try to stop the incorporation of Palestinian land and the absurd instances that I saw in east Jerusalem of people being prevented from going to their places of work when they lived minutes, away from them, so that they suddenly faced a journey of an hour, if they could get there at all. That is absolutely crazy.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton made an interesting point. I wrote down his comments; he said that "persecution and oppression breed recalcitrant behaviour" and that terrorists are feeding off the festering resentment generated by the detrimental effects on Palestinian lives of repressive Israeli measures in the occupied territories. That is not the Israel that we dreamt of, nor is it the Israel of the people I met when I was last in that country a few months ago. I went to a kibbutz and people communicated to me their regret that this situation had come about.

The point has also been made that Israel has an absolute duty to protect its own citizens. Although that is not an excuse for routing the barrier as it has been, it should be said that the Palestinian Authority must get a grip on security. I heard last week that it had released one of the people who had kidnapped a British aid worker. That will not do. The road map has a number of duties attached to it; one of them is that the Palestinian Authority gets a grip on security in the west bank and Gaza, and it is clearly not doing that.

The Palestinian Authority is not short of money. The Government are giving a lot of money to the Palestinians; they gave it in the past and they will give it in the future. Members know my views about the corruption that was the curse of the Arafat regime. A lot of money was filched off into bank accounts in Zurich and God knows where else, instead of going into rebuilding Palestinian communities. To say that is not in any way to excuse the measures that the Israelis have taken and that my right hon. Friend gave examples of, but we must bear it in mind.

There are duties on both sides. It must be ensured that the immediate answer to people's desperate situations is not thought to be to praise suicide bombers. I believe that mullahs and imams should stand up and say that suicide bombers go straight to hell, but all too often they keep their heads down and do not say such things, and in some places they talk about them as being great heroes; as exceptions. They are not exceptions. They are blowing young Palestinian men and women to pieces with their poison, and they are blowing young Israelis to pieces with their poison as well.

I was glad to hear the hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Simpson) say that we have to straddle both sides. My party colleagues believe that, too. Everybody in this House believes it. We would not be here otherwise. We believe in democracy, and we believe that there is a way out of this situation. The way out is for us to press very hard for the road map. I cannot think of another way out. People tell me, "Well, we must revise it." How many times have these plans been revised? How many times have we heard Israelis and Palestinians say, "You do that; we'll do this"?

I can understand why Sharon and the movement in Israel involving Giladi and others have decided to become unilateralists, but will it result in a two-state solution? Will it result in a viable Palestinian state? It will do so only if both sides understand that murder and oppression feed resentment and terrorism.

That is the conclusion that we must draw. The Government understand that, and we will do our utmost to press all sides—the quartet, the Israelis and the Palestinians—to get together and to find a solution to this most pressing and historic of problems.

Education Funding (Staffordshire)

4.10 pm

Mr. David Kidney (Stafford) (Lab): It is a delight to see you in the Chair, Mr. Bayley. I am also very pleased that my right hon. Friend the Minister for Schools, whom I hold in high regard, is to reply to the debate.

There is great interest in Staffordshire in this debate. The hon. Members for Lichfield (Michael Fabricant) and for Stone (Mr. Cash) are present, as are my hon. Friends the Members for Burton (Mrs. Dean), for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Paul Farrelly) and for Tamworth (Mr. Jenkins). Education funding is an extremely important subject for our constituents.

I bring good news about educational achievement from Staffordshire and from my Stafford constituency. The results achieved by seven-year-old pupils at key stage 1, 11-year-old pupils at key stage 2 and 14-year-old pupils at key stage 3 are above the national average in an area where average household incomes are only about 80 per cent. of the national average. The results of 16-year-old students at key stage 4 are below average, but last year they achieved their best improvement for seven years and their best GCSE results ever.

Inspectors have praised our targeted approach. With better funding, we would be able to target more resources to raise the achievements of looked-after children and children from economically deprived backgrounds—[Interruption.]

Hugh Bayley (in the Chair): Order. May I say to those in the Public Gallery that we can hear what they are saying? I apologise to the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Kidney).

Mr. Kidney: Thank you, Mr. Bayley. I would just like to mention that my hon. Friend the Member for Cannock Chase (Dr. Wright) has also joined us for this debate.

In our area the staying-on rate for 16-year-old students is also above average and our A-level results are at or above the average. If I sound as though I take a propriety interest in our schools, it is because I really care about them. I regularly visit schools in my constituency: last Friday, for example, I was at St. Patrick's Roman Catholic primary school, whose pupils and staff work hard for their enthusiastic new head teacher, Mrs. Goodison, and where there is a warm and positive learning environment. I am also proud of the Stafford collegiate, which brings together all the town's secondary schools, a purposely developed sixth-form centre and the college of further education. The result is a wonderfully broad range of courses for 16-year-old students to choose from, which no doubt helps to explain the good staying-on rate. We are currently working on developing the Government's 14-to-19 agenda, including our ability to offer apprenticeships to 14-year-olds.

My own latest project is an attempt to partner individual secondary schools with individual local employers. That is in addition to the excellent work that the schools and employers have already done with Staffordshire Partnership, but I foresee additional benefits for schools and local businesses from that additional partnership working—for example, more mentors for students in their schools and improved recruitment and retention for employers in their businesses.

Mr. William Cash (Stone) (Con): The hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Kidney) is my successor in that seat, and I am glad to hear such a good report to give of the constituency. My constituency also has some excellent schools, but St. Mildred's in Whiston, St. John's in Alton and Draycott Manor school have all closed. Those closures, which have caused my constituents serious concern, are directly related to the failure of school funding in my constituency.

Mr. Kidney: Staffordshire local education authority sets a very good example in managing surplus places to get the best value for money, and I am sorry to hear of the problems that my honourable neighbour has experienced.

We have done well in Staffordshire, but much more remains to be done. One fifth of 11-year-olds still cannot read and write at the level expected for their age, and more than two fifths of 16-year-old students are not achieving five good A to C-grade GSCE passes.

Mrs. Janet Dean (Burton) (Lab): Will my hon. Friend comment on the response of one head teacher in my constituency to the Government's recent education White Paper? The head teacher supports the Prime Minister's comment about fair funding following the pupil, but suggests:

"If our standards are to be compared with schools in other parts of the country we need that equality of funding."

Mr. Kidney: I hear exactly the same message from head teachers. The view is the same nationally.

There are still weaknesses in rates of achievement that harm students and our economic performance as a nation. That is why we have a new White Paper, "Higher Standards, Better Schools for All".

Paul Farrelly (Newcastle-under-Lyme) (Lab): I am sure that my hon. Friend will make this point later. He is obviously aware of a somewhat controversial White Paper that is all about standards—at least, we hope that the legislation will be. Staffordshire schools already do well, as he says, but does he not agree that they would do much better if there was fair funding? I have in mind the £5,211 per pupil that will go to Kensington and Chelsea in the coming year, 2006–07, as opposed to the £3,381 per pupil that will go to Staffordshire. The difference is nearly £2,000 a head.

Mr. Kidney: I will deal with that directly. We in Staffordshire want to join with the Government and contribute significantly to an overall increase in standards of achievement. If only our education service had something approaching the average level of funding from the Government to pay for that effort. Instead, we consistently receive a level of funding that falls further behind the best-funded local authorities. If Staffordshire received resources that were more like those received by the better-funded authorities, it could have more teachers, support staff, computing back-up, textbooks, tools and equipment, and we could then swiftly raise standards still further.

We in Staffordshire have not simply felt sorry for ourselves; we have tried to overcome the obstacles that the low funding presents. Staffordshire local education authority has consistently added to the funding of the education service from its own resources. Few LEAs are doing that this year. That is surely a sign of Staffordshire's tenacity in doing everything in its own power to raise standards in its schools.

The other positive action that Staffordshire LEA has taken is to support the campaigning organisation F40. Staffordshire is not alone: a number of LEAs languish at the bottom of the league table for central Government funding year after year, and that is why F40 was started.

Michael Fabricant (Lichfield) (Con): Does my hon. Friend—I say that advisedly—at least admit that with the new funding formula Staffordshire is doing a little better than before? It was previously fifth from bottom and is now 18th from bottom out of 149 LEAs, excluding the Isles of Scilly, in England.

Mr. Kidney: I praise the hon. Gentleman for helping in the campaign with the information that he unearths in parliamentary questions and answers. F40 presses for fairer education funding, and I declare a pertinent interest in it, because last year I was elected to chair it. The Minister knows all about F40. The organisation has responded energetically to the Department's various consultations on funding and lobbied for changes that will benefit the poorer LEAs. Some aspects of the changes to funding that the Department made three years ago reflected and addressed concerns that we had raised.

A delegation from F40 met the Minister last year, and I thank her for her willingness to engage with us and to discuss the problems that we believe exist and how they can be resolved. We were pleased by some of the Government's recent decisions on the dedicated schools grant, which is to start from this April. The two-year settlement, with advance notice for schools of the 2007–08 figures, is helpful for planning budgets and spending decisions. Future settlements will be even more helpful, as they will give notice of the next three years' funding.

I warmly welcome the Government's decision to establish the baseline for the dedicated schools grant based on what local authorities were spending in 2005–06. Schools in areas such as Staffordshire, which has a strong recent record of commitment to education, are not now facing an immediate reduction in resources. In fact, Staffordshire schools will have an extra £10 million—an increase of almost 3 per cent.—to spend as a result of that decision. The guaranteed minimum increase in per pupil funding is also welcome, although obviously it builds on the historical levels of funding for local authorities, which I hope I have demonstrated are an unfair base from which to start.

As we look forward beyond the next two years, there are aspects of the current funding system that continue to disadvantage areas such as Staffordshire. The Government rightly adjust funding to reflect the additional challenge that schools face in overcoming deprivation, which affects the ability of pupils to learn. The adjustment is calculated according to where pupils live, whether or not that is also where they go to school.

[Mr. Kidney]

In places where there is considerable cross-border travel to school, the schools that are faced with the challenge of deprivation are not receiving the additional funding given for deprivation. With the advent of local area statistics, it is now possible for schools to know precisely how many pupils they have on roll from the areas that attract the additional funding.

The Government also adjust the funding for additional cost pressures. Staffordshire gets no additional money through that factor and resents the level of funding that goes to those areas that benefit from it. After all, the main expense of any school is teachers' salaries, which are paid according to a national scale. Will the Minister confirm that the Department will continue to reflect on the justification for those adjustments, their levels and their practical application?

Dr. Tony Wright (Cannock Chase) (Lab): I agree that it is right that funding should follow deprivation. One of the problems in Staffordshire is that it has been hard for schools in deprived areas to get the funding they need because of the way in which the county as a whole is funded. Does my hon. Friend agree that as well as increasing across-the-board funding we should ensure that schools in the tougher areas of Staffordshire get more direct funding?

Mr. Kidney: Indeed I do. My hon. Friend does not have to look too far from his constituency to Walsall and Wolverhampton, where the local authorities are getting larger sums for deprivation than his area does, even though teachers in his local schools face similar challenges as a result of deprivation.

The Government also add an amount to the formula for rural factors—for example, an education service in a rural area has extra costs, not least in transport. However, that factor seems to attract much smaller sums than the other two factors that I have mentioned. As long as we have those other factors we should certainly have as significant an amount of funding for rurality.

The Minister knows that the F40 group has devised a system to account for education spending that allows for accurate and instant evaluation of different policy options and spending priorities. There is no longer any excuse for guesstimates and assumptions in the Department's funding system. I thank my right hon. Friend the Minister for Schools for offering to arrange for her officials to meet members of the F40 group to discuss the new system.

My right hon. Friend should also be thanked for drawing together the various additional funds into one standards fund and for ending the requirement for matched funding from LEAs. The recent announcement on personalised learning is an early measure from the White Paper. I hope that the additional resources for the personalisation of learning are soon incorporated in the mainstream formula. The proposal to use prior attainment data can be only a short-term measure; otherwise there will be almost a perverse incentive not to improve standards.

Whichever way one looks at the figures, Staffordshire does badly. The Minister's written answer to the hon. Member for Lichfield on 15 December last year, at column 2200W of Hansard, showed that Staffordshire's funding per pupil under the new dedicated schools grant for 2006–07 will be £3,381. As the hon. Gentleman rightly said, that puts Staffordshire 18th from bottom of the league table of funding for the 150 English LEAs. Staffordshire's funding per pupil is £197 less than the mean of £3,578 and £382 less than the average of £3,763. If we restrict the comparison to the shire counties, of which there are 34, Staffordshire receives £63 per pupil less than the average, which on its own makes a £7.5 million difference to the local authority's funding for its schools.

At LEA level, the Government say that the national settlement for local authorities will provide a 6.8 per cent. increase in 2006–07, but in Staffordshire the increase will be 6.5 per cent. Staffordshire is losing out in every way. If that were the result occasionally, no doubt Staffordshire could ride out the lean years, but the fact is that Staffordshire loses out every year. I looked back to the figure for funding per pupil in Staffordshire in 1997–98 and it was £2,640. That was the total spending per pupil, including all revenue grants. That year, the average was £2,940 for an English authority so Staffordshire was getting £300 less than that.

When presenting a legitimate complaint about the system for distributing the Government's money it is easy to lapse into a completely negative whinge. I note, however, that the Government I support have raised the average funding per pupil from that £2,940 in 1997 to £4,110 this year—an increase of more than £1,100 per pupil. The Minister knows the arguments well. In fairness, she and her Department have engaged constructively in attempts to mitigate the harshness that the Department's formula visits on areas such as Staffordshire. Sadly, although changes have been made with the sincere intent of making the funding system fairer, they have not halted the slide towards greater disparity. In fairness to the Department, the new White Paper makes a welcome commitment to "a system of fair admissions, fair funding and clear accountability."

That quote is from the Prime Minister's foreword to the White Paper.

A system of fair funding for Staffordshire would provide adequate resources compared with other authorities, taking into account the total resources available, to enable us to do better than we are already doing. I regularly meet people engaged in education in my constituency, including local authority staff, teachers, other school staff, governors, parents and, most importantly, students. I detect an appetite to go further to achieve more.

Staffordshire will continue to support the F40 campaign. We will be represented at its conference in Nottingham on 11 March and we will continue to contribute to the debate on school funding, including through the new direct schools grant which has been established from this year. I look forward to an open debate on the future of the dedicated schools grant formula from 2008 onwards. We shall take part in the comprehensive review of education spending that the Department and the Treasury are to conduct shortly. The new formula should ensure that priority is given to a basic entitlement for every child, built on sound evidence on costs.

Will the Minister give a clear signal to Staffordshire's broad and enthusiastic education community that there is official recognition that Staffordshire has performed extraordinarily well with limited resources—I would say unfairly limited resources—and deserves credit for its achievements to date? I ask also that the Government commend Staffordshire's schools and its authority for their performance. We want our schools to do even better in future. While recognising that such improvements cannot be delivered on a shoestring, will the Minister hold out the prospect that Staffordshire will receive fairer funding in the coming years? We support the Government's agenda of higher standards and better schools for all; we just cannot go on delivering more with less.

4.26 pm

The Minister for Schools (Jacqui Smith): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Kidney), not only on securing this debate, but on the persistent and committed way in which he campaigns for increased funding for his authority. I also welcome the commitment shown by the other hon. Members representing Staffordshire constituencies who are here today.

I should like to put on record, as my hon. Friend has asked, my gratitude and respect for the work of teachers and pupils within the authority in Staffordshire, who have been responsible for significant improvements in the quality of education in the county. Those achievements reflect the hard work of teachers and other staff across the county. Staffordshire now has 10 per cent. more teachers than in January 1998 and 80 per cent. more support staff. They are certainly working effectively.

Turning to education funding, it is worth reflecting on the increases in funding for Staffordshire since the Labour Government came to power. Since 1997–98, total revenue funding in Staffordshire has increased in real terms by £1,040 per pupil—almost 40 per cent. In the other important area, school capital, which tends not to be the subject of fair funding representations but which is important for ensuring that the environment within which children are learning is as we would expect it to be, spending on school buildings in Staffordshire has also increased dramatically, from £3.7 million in 1996–97 to more than £29 million this year—a sevenfold increase.

Despite that, there are concerns about the level of funding in Staffordshire, particularly when compared with other areas of the country. My hon. Friend has made representations to me on a number of occasions. I wish to discuss the county's position in what I suppose we might call the funding league tables, and the reasons why Staffordshire does not always have access to some specific grant funding—although I note that my hon. Friend acknowledges the way in which the new funding arrangements will bring together those sources in the school development grant.

Some have argued that levels of funding per pupil should be more or less the same for authorities across the country. That would be the only way to ensure that no authority was below the average. However, I do not believe that there should be a uniform rate of support, and I do not think that my hon. Friend was arguing in favour of that. Let me explain why.

Michael Fabricant: Will the Minister give way?

Jacqui Smith: I will, if the hon. Gentleman realises that I will not necessarily get through everything if I do.

Michael Fabricant: Does not the Minister also accept that there is a problem of transparency? The problem is not just the difference in funding between shire counties, let alone the gamut of education authorities. There is also the problem of people not understanding why the differences occur or how the calculations are made.

Jacqui Smith: I hope to be able to address that when I deal with the reforms that we have made to the distribution method.

Mr. Cash: The issue that seriously teases us is whether there is like for like. That is one of the crucial issues on which I have campaigned for nearly 20 years.

Jacqui Smith: I was about to say that it is because of differences in children and structures that there is differential funding for authorities. Our aim is to give all pupils an equal opportunity in life, and, as my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford acknowledges, pupils from more deprived backgrounds are likely to have additional educational needs and to require additional help if they are to have an equal chance to succeed. That is why the current—or old—formula funding system gives funding additional to the basic entitlement to authorities with a higher number of pupils from deprived backgrounds. Staffordshire has fewer pupils from deprived backgrounds than many other authorities, and that is a key reason for the difference.

However, as my hon. Friend said, although additional educational need is the main reason why Staffordshire receives less funding per pupil, the current formula funding arrangements also give extra funding to sparsely populated authorities such as Staffordshire, which benefits to a certain extent from sparsity funding—I heard his request that it should be a larger portion. There is also extra funding for authorities in high-cost areas. I do not accept the contention that there are similar employment costs in all parts of the country because of the national pay system. The evidence of the differential and higher costs in some parts of the country are the justification for the area cost adjustment, which, as my hon. Friend said, is one of the additions that Staffordshire does not receive under the existing formula.

I understand the concerns of individual schools such as those highlighted by the hon. Member for Stone (Mr. Cash). I hope that he will be reassured by Staffordshire council's latest provisional out-turn figures, which show that net school balances in the county stood at more than £27 million at the end of the financial year 2004–05. There was £7 million more in school balances in Staffordshire at the end of 2004–05 than at the end of 2003–04, which represents an increase of 35 per cent.. The national average increase was 16 per cent.

That deals with the current situation. As my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford said, the Government are making some important changes to school funding arrangements from the beginning of April this year. They are designed to ensure that the money intended for schools in every area of the country reaches them, and to give head teachers and governors stability and certainty about their funding so that they can make better plans. We shall ensure more stability for schools through multi-year budgets. As my hon. Friend knows, the dedicated schools grant is a new ring-fenced grant from the Department for Education and Skills to each local authority. It will cover funding for schools and other provision for pupils.

As my hon. Friend recognised, we consulted widely on the new school funding arrangements, including our proposals for distributing the DSG among authorities, in the spring last year. Schools and authorities in areas such as Staffordshire that spend more than their formula funding allocation told us of their concerns about the proposals. They were worried that, over time, their relative funding levels would be reduced. Staffordshire was one of the authorities that made that case. We listened carefully to those concerns, and in summer last year we consulted on a modified method for distributing the DSG that will put stability at the heart of local authority funding allocations. A majority of the people who responded to the new consultation supported the modified method, and that is what we shall use to distribute the DSG in 2006–07 and 2007–08.

Given the cry for greater transparency, let me describe how the DSG distribution will work. We shall take each authority's existing level of spending on the schools budget as the starting point, give every authority an increase of at least 5 per cent. per pupil over its current spending in each year, and then distribute the remaining grant according to the Government's priorities for education. Our priorities include personalised learning at key stage 3 and in primary schools and the provision of more practical learning options for pupils at key stage 4. That will enable precisely the sort of exciting work in the 14-to-19 age group to which my hon. Friend referred. The priorities also include covering the full-year cost of implementing time for planning, preparation and assessment in primary schools—that is the final stage of our work force reforms under the national agreement—and meeting the cost of increasing entitlement to free early years provision from 33 to 38 weeks.

Although we have earmarked sums for those priorities in every authority's allocation of dedicated schools grant for each year, decisions on the distribution of funding between schools continues to be a matter for local authorities in consultation with their schools forums. As my hon. Friend the Member for Cannock Chase (Dr. Wright) made clear, it is at that level that authorities should take into consideration the challenges of deprivation when distributing resources within a given authority.

What does the school funding settlement mean for Staffordshire schools? The county can expect an increase in dedicated schools grant of 6.5 per cent. on top of current spending per pupil in 2006–07, with a further increase for 2007–08 of 6.4 per cent. per pupil. That is an increase of more than 13 per cent. per pupil over those two years. We have heard what that amounts to in terms of guaranteed funding per pupil. The settlement gives the authority and its schools unprecedented predictability by providing guaranteed per-pupil funding for two years. That should give Staffordshire schools the confidence to plan ahead more effectively than ever before, making sure that their financial planning really supports the school improvements that my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford said they were so keen to ensure.

I believe that we have ensured a good settlement for Staffordshire schools and schools across the country, but as my hon. Friend says, and as I am willing to make clear today, from 2008–09 we are introducing three-year allocations of dedicated schools grant and three-year budgets for schools. Before that, we intend to review the operation of a number of aspects of the new school funding arrangements, including dedicated schools grant distribution. As my hon. Friend conceded, the new distribution arrangements for 2006–07 and 2007–08 already create some benefits for Staffordshire, but we want to review the arrangements in two years' time to make sure that the operation is going as we believe it should. We will want to consider what lessons can be learned from those first two years and will want to work up proposals for the distribution of DSG in the longer term.

Later this term, we will announce the terms of reference for the review and say how we propose to involve all local authorities and other stakeholders, including the F40 group of authorities. My hon. Friend is national chair of that group and works very hard for it.

Mr. Brian Jenkins (Tamworth) (Lab): Is my right hon. Friend saying, and can I tell parents in my constituency, that the young family who move from Sutton Coldfield—that area of high deprivation—to the leafy suburb of Fazeley in Tamworth, Staffordshire, will have exactly the same money spent on their child's education as will be spent on a child in the west midlands? Will the funding now be the same?

Jacqui Smith: No, it will not, for the reasons that I outlined earlier. I do not believe that the amount should be the same from county to county, regardless of levels of deprivation, costs or sparsity, and I do not believe that my hon. Friend honestly believes that either. However, it is of course important that the challenges of deprivation are recognised, not only in national distribution, but in local distribution, too.

I was grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford for bringing a delegation from the F40 group to see me last June. At our meeting, my hon. Friend and his colleagues made a helpful presentation on the funding model that the group supports, which my hon. Friend outlined. My officials recently invited the F40 group to an early meeting with them so that they can consider the F40 model and activity-led funding in some detail.

I thank my hon. Friend and other hon. Members for raising the subject of school funding in Staffordshire. I know that my hon. Friends, at least, recognise that there has been a considerable increase in funding for schools in Staffordshire over the past eight years, although they rightly challenge us to make sure that Staffordshire receives a fair share funding and resources that will enable it to carry on the good work that my hon. Friend outlined. I look forward to my Department's detailed report on the forthcoming meeting with the group, and I have no doubt that Staffordshire and the F40, ably led by my hon. Friend, will continue to make representations on fair funding. I shall continue to listen to them.

Case of Teresa Daniels

4.40 pm

John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): In the time available to me, I should like briefly to summarise the chronological sequence of events in this case, to comment on the trial and appeals process, to describe the mitigating factors and to pose a series of relevant questions to the Minister of State.

On 12 June 1997, Teresa Daniels—hereafter referred to as Terry—was arrested at Las Palmas airport in Tenerife in the company of her companion Antonio Benavides, who was in possession of 3.8 kg of cocaine. On 17 June, five days later, Terry was released on bail. Shortly afterward, she suffered a near-fatal brain haemorrhage, but fortunately, as a result of early and effective medical intervention, she was saved and restored to health.

On 2 September 1997, Terry attended a court hearing that lasted one and a half hours, at which she was asked five questions and then told that she was free to go. More than six months later, on 27 March 1998, Terry Daniels was sentenced to 10 years' imprisonment for drug trafficking—precisely the same sentence as was imposed on her co-defendant Mr. Benavides. He had previous criminal convictions; she did not. As I have mentioned, he had cocaine in his possession at the time of the arrest; she had none.

Terry's lawyer requested that she be given conditional liberty, which was granted to her. After a series of legal skirmishes, the first appeal by Terry's lawyers was heard on 12 November 1999. It was heard on the basis of written pleadings and dismissed in her absence. A copy of the judgment was never sent to her and her sentence of 10 years' imprisonment was confirmed. In January 2000, Terry lodged a second appeal and in February 2000, she travelled to the United Kingdom to have a medical check-up and it transpired that she needed to have a series of operations. In March 2000, in response to correspondence from me, the Spanish ambassador sent me a letter with a report from the Spanish directorate general of penitentiary institutions that stated that Terry had been released on 17 June 1997 "without further admissions".

In May 2002, more than two years later, an international search and arrest warrant was issued, and in June 2003, a formal request for extradition was made. In August 2005, the Home Office—in the person of the Home Secretary, the right hon. Member for Norwich, South (Mr. Clarke)—agreed to her extradition and Terry was extradited in October 2005. Now she is in Topas prison in Salamanca near Madrid.

I said that I wanted to comment on the trial and the appeals process, and I shall do so in two very specific respects. One might be characterised as a comment on form and the other manifestly relates to substance. As far as the form is concerned, no translator was available during the trial. I must emphasise that, because I believe passionately that Terry has been ill treated. Terry did not understand and therefore could not effectively participate in the proceedings. She did not receive a copy of the judgment and, yes, such was the level of misunderstanding and lack of information that she thought that she was a witness at the hearing and not a defendant.

[John Bercow]

On the matter of substance I make the point to the Minister of State that the evidence upon which Terry was convicted and then sentenced was scanty indeed. I do not think that I exaggerate when I say that it consisted overwhelmingly of the interpretation of an entry in her diary which referred to an expected payment. The interpretation put upon it was that she was recording an expectation of payment as a result of engagement in drug trafficking. In fact, as she explained, she was referring to a payment that was to come to her as a result of a personal injury claim. The official translation of the content of the diary was judged to be inadmissible, apparently on the grounds that it was out of time. It seems certain to me that Terry's human rights under the European convention were breached in two respects: by the failure to admit the official translation of the diary, which would have lent weight to her pleading, and by the theft of her diary.

I shall now discuss the mitigating factors in Terry's case, which I genuinely believe should be seriously and thoughtfully taken into account by the Minister. I referred a few moments ago to the reference in the letter that I received from the Spanish ambassador and the accompanying report to the phrase "without further admissions". It was surely not unreasonable of Terry Daniels to believe, when she had sight of that document, that the phrase "without further admissions" suggested that the case had been closed. That certainly was her view: she thought that the case had been dropped.

There are several other mitigating factors. Seven and a half years elapsed between Terry's original conviction and the start of her imprisonment. The Spanish authorities made little effort to detain her until Thames Valley police notified Interpol of her whereabouts. She has suffered from desperately bad health—I referred to her near-fatal brain haemorrhage, and she now suffers regular bouts of depression. In addition, in the course of this appalling, harrowing and seemingly interminable saga, she has lost her father; he died of cancer slightly less than five years ago.

It is inevitable that if Terry stays in prison for any length of time after such protracted delays and despite the real anxieties about the fairness of the trial, she will have a greatly reduced possibility of having a family. She is already in her early 30s and I believe that that is a relevant consideration in this case. In addition, the prison conditions that she is now experiencing are poor. It is difficult for her to communicate as she does not speak Spanish, and many of the people around her do not speak English or do not choose to communicate with her in her mother tongue.

On top of all that Terry endures separation from her remaining family. I ask the Minister to try to put himself in her position and to see the merit of my case That separation is a huge burden. Pat Daniels, her mother, is a magnificent woman, a supportive mother and a hard-working individual, but she could not by any stretch of the imagination be described as a person of means and it costs approximately £1,000 every time she goes to visit her daughter. All in all, the cumulative impact of the nature of the trial, the unsatisfactory character of the appeals process, the ongoing delay, the continued uncertainty and the absence of any obvious light at the end of the tunnel is putting an intolerable strain on Terry.

That leads me to my series of questions and challenges to the Minister. He knows that I hold him in the highest esteem—he is an immensely capable and intelligent Minister—so I hope that he will not take amiss what I am about to say as the prelude to my three questions. I, like many other hon. Members, have conducted a number of Adjournment debates over the years. It is not uncommon—in fact, it might be said to be a regular characteristic—to find substantial parts of ministerial speeches devoted to congratulating the hon. Member who has secured the debate and to repeating a considerable number of the difficult circumstances that the hon. Member has just spent some minutes describing. I say to the right hon. Gentleman that my ego is quite big enough, I do not require it to be inflated any further, and I am certain that he is familiar with the case, upon which there has been a great deal of correspondence. I would therefore be very grateful if he were to focus specifically on the questions that I am now about to ask.

I am immensely grateful to the Foreign Office for the visits by consular staff, and for the advice that they have proffered, but I wish to put the following question to the Minister. First, given that Terry seeks a pardon, will Her Majesty's Government support her request for it? Secondly, without prejudice to the first question and the Government's attitude to it, will the Minister expedite the application for Terry's transfer to the United Kingdom? Thirdly, if the transfer is successful, will the Government allow Terry to serve her sentence, or that part of it that she is still obliged to serve, in a low-security prison on the grounds that, manifestly, she poses no threat to public order or security?

I immensely appreciate my good fortune in being able to bring these matters to the attention of the Minister this afternoon. It is not my responsibility, so I shall not take it upon myself to say whether Terry Daniels is innocent or guilty. For my part, I believe that she is an honourable and decent person. It is, however, my responsibility to judge whether she has a reasonable case with which it is proper to trouble the Minister. I believe that she has.

Terry has been supported throughout her case by Fair Trials Abroad, an admirable organisation to whose distinguished director, Stephen Jakobi, and his indefatigable work on this case I pay the warmest possible tribute. She has been badly treated. I do not want her case to be forgotten. It should not go by the board. Pat Daniels has done her best to champion Terry's cause while trying to work for a living and to hold the family together in some way. Terry is in no position to act for herself, but she knows that this debate has been secured. If she is to have a chance to rebuild her family life, to consider the possibility of being able to start a family herself, and to build a constructive and happy future, I believe that she requires the assistance of the British Government. I am sure that the Minister is not only intelligent and competent, but decent and humane, and I look forward to his reply with interest and anticipation.

4.54 pm

The Minister for Europe (Mr. Douglas Alexander): Unusually, Mr. Bayley, before responding may I seek your guidance on whether, given the slightly late start of this debate, I shall have the full 15 minutes in which to respond to the points raised by the hon. Gentleman? If I shall, I shall direct my remarks in one way, but if we are more constrained by time, not least given the very specific—

Hugh Bayley (in the Chair): I can clarify for the right hon. Gentleman's benefit that the debate will conclude at ten minutes past 5.

Mr. Alexander: I am grateful for that clarification, Mr. Bayley. Given that assurance, hope to be able to answer the specific questions that have been put to me.

I assure the hon. Member for Buckingham (John Bercow) that it is due neither to a desire for obfuscation nor to a desire to adhere to protocol that I congratulate him on his eloquent description of the case that he has raised today. I hope to be able to reply directly to his points. However, it is important—not least on the ground of completeness—that I should take the opportunity to place in context the case that we are discussing in relation to the wider UK-Spain relations, which are relevant to this case, and to place on record our understanding of how we arrived at this point.

Before I discuss relations between the UK and Spain and address the specific points that have been put to me, it is important to note the close ties that the United Kingdom enjoys with Spain. Relations between the two countries are strong and deep. An estimated 677,000 Britons have chosen to make Spain their home: theirs is one of the largest British expatriate communities anywhere in the world. As one would expect, there is close co-operation on issues of justice and home affairs. The UK and Spain work together to improve Europe's response to common challenges such as immigration, and we have agreed fast-track extradition procedures between our two states. There is also extensive and valuable co-operation on health matters.

Let me now give a summary of the case before us today. As I said, the hon. Gentleman spoke eloquently about the background to Ms Daniels' case and the events surrounding her trial, extradition and imprisonment in Spain. As he knows, our consular staff in London and Spain have been following Ms Daniels' case closely and have been providing her and her family with all appropriate consular assistance. I assure the House and the hon. Gentleman that that assistance will continue.

The UK has important international obligations in matters of extradition, which it takes seriously. In Ms Daniels' case, the position at all material times was that she had already been convicted in Spain of serious drugs offences. She has sought unsuccessfully to appeal in Spain against a 10-year sentence. By the time the conviction was made final in January 2000, however, she had left the country. Not surprisingly, Spain's request for extradition followed. Pursuant to it, she was arrested in this country in June 2003. Bow Street magistrates committed her in June 2004, and an ensuing appeal to the High Court was dismissed in January 2005. It then fell to my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary to reach a final decision on Ms Daniels' surrender. In representations made against such an outcome, her UK solicitors relied in part upon the alleged lack of evidence against her. The solicitors contended, for example, that the Spanish evidence was not strong and relied almost entirely on entries in Ms Daniels' personal diaries, which the hon. Gentleman mentioned.

Spain's request for Ms Daniels' extradition as a convicted person withstood judicial challenge here before Bow Street magistrates and the High Court. It is not and cannot be the proper function of the Home Secretary to delve into the safety of a conviction arrived at in the independent courts of another European Union country any more than it would be right, I submit, for Spanish authorities to appear to impugn the integrity of a conviction arrived at in our courts. The Home Secretary considered the whole case fairly and properly in the round, including the representations that were made to him on evidential, health and other grounds, some of which we have heard today. For reasons fully set out in a letter of 23 August 2005 to Ms Daniels' legal representatives, my right hon. Friend concluded that those considerations did not outweigh the case for surrender. It was open to Ms Daniels to apply for judicial review of that decision, but she elected not to do so. Her surrender to Spain was effected on 22 October 2005, in conformity with our international obligations.

The hon. Gentleman asks that the Government consider obtaining clemency for Ms Daniels. The Foreign and Commonwealth Office will consider supporting a prisoner's plea for clemency in certain circumstances. Our policy is outlined in an answer given to my hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, North and Fleetwood (Mrs. Humble) on 2 May 2001. With your permission, Mr. Bayley, I will take this opportunity to outline our policy for the benefit of all hon. Members. The answer given states:

> "Our objective is to support pleas for clemency in deserving cases, while respecting the sovereign right of foreign Governments to sentence prisoners according to their own laws."

It continues:

> "We will . . . consider supporting clemency pleas from British nationals imprisoned overseas in the following cases: in compelling compassionate circumstances, such as where a prisoner is chronically ill or dying (particularly when prison conditions overseas are poor) or when a close family member is chronically ill or dying; where continued incarceration is likely to endanger life or is likely to reduce life expectancy significantly; in cases of minors imprisoned overseas; as a last resort, in cases where we have prima facie evidence of a denial or miscarriage of justice, where we have made representations, but where those representations have failed to secure a remedy. In these cases, our reasons for supporting a plea would not normally be mentioned explicitly in the plea itself.
> We will also take the prisoner's family circumstances into account when considering whether to support a plea for clemency. We will examine all pleas on a case-by-case basis."—[Official Report, House of Commons, 2 May 2001; Vol. 367, c. 629W.]

To answer the hon. Gentleman's first question, we would certainly consider any request from Ms Daniels to support a plea for clemency if those criteria were met. Ms Daniels should make her clemency plea to the Spanish authorities through a lawyer.

Implicit in that question was the possibility of remission. The hon. Gentleman asked whether Ms Daniels could be considered for possible remission of her sentence. There is provision under Spanish law for the early release of prisoners who are terminally ill or dying. I would advise Ms Daniels to investigate the Spanish procedures for granting remission and to obtain local legal advice on whether she could be eligible.

On the second specific question, I understand that Ms Daniels applied on 14 December 2005 to be transferred home to the United Kingdom to serve the rest of her sentence under the 1983 convention on the transfer of sentenced persons. Letters have been sent to the prison governor and Her Majesty's Prison Service transfer section by our consular staff with the information that she wishes to apply for transfer of sentence. As for how long it might take for such a transfer of sentence to the United Kingdom to be effected, prisoner transfers between the United Kingdom and Spain take place under the European convention on the transfer of sentenced persons. Any transfers from Spain to the United Kingdom must be agreed by the Spanish and British authorities as well as the individual involved. The time taken to consider and arrange a transfer varies from case to case, so it is difficult to give a precise answer. Our experience in previous cases suggests it can take two years or longer from application to transfer.

I listened to the specific point made by the hon. Gentleman about the nature of the establishment to which Ms Daniels would be returned in the United Kingdom. I am not clear at this juncture about the exact procedure by which that would be determined, but I or one of my colleagues in the Home Office will write to him about that.

For the record, I should outline the consular assistance that we have provided to Ms Daniels and her family. Consular staff were informed of Ms Daniels's arrival in Spain on 21 October 2005 following her extradition from the UK to Spain to complete her sentence. Our proconsul visited her in Madrid prison on 25 October. Ms Daniels said that she was anxious to be transferred to Las Palmas prison in the Canary islands where she had originally been imprisoned. Our proconsul maintained contact with the prison authorities, checking whether Ms Daniels would be transferred to another prison. We informed her on 7 November that she was to be transferred to Topas prison, Salamanca, near Madrid, and unfortunately not to Las Palmas prison as she had hoped. The honourable Gentleman will understand that it is for the Spanish authorities to place prisoners as they see fit, just as it is for Her Majesty's Prison Service in the United Kingdom to decide where to put detainees.

Ms Daniels saw the prison doctor and the social worker on her arrival at Madrid prison. With Ms Daniels's agreement, our consular staff arranged for copies of her United Kingdom medical records to be made available to the prison authorities in Spain. We also provided a short summary of the records in Spanish. A member of our consular staff again visited Ms Daniels when she was moved to Topas prison on 23 November 2005.

John Bercow: It is my view that there has been a miscarriage of justice, not least because of the character of the trial and appeal process that I described. I am sorry if the Government do not agree or are not prepared to contest the issue with the Spanish authorities. However, does the Minister consider it a relevant factor in the case that such a huge amount of time elapsed between Terry's original sentencing and the start of the sentence?

Mr. Alexander: Let me say with the greatest respect to the hon. Gentleman that I hoped that I had addressed his point earlier. I explained that on the basis of the extradition request—a direct consequence of Ms Daniels being back in the United Kingdom—a number of legal steps were taken between the original sentencing and her incarceration in Spain. If that offers no comfort to the hon. Gentleman, I hope that it at least explains the length of the intervening period when, as I described, proceedings were brought before Bow Street magistrates and then the High Court. Ultimately, there was a decision by the Home Secretary based on the specific points that I have outlined.

John Bercow: May I put on the record the fact that Terry Daniels has never made any secret of her address in Abbotts Way, Wingrave, Aylesbury, Buckinghamshire? There was no problem of finding her, so that, at least, can be cast aside as a consideration in this matter.

Mr. Alexander: I made no such suggestion. I was making it clear that Ms Daniels was involved in a series of legal proceedings here in the United Kingdom. An additional factor that should to be borne in mind is that cases in Spain can take a long time to come to court.

In conclusion, let me say briefly that all of us involved in consular work appreciate that imprisoning any person in a foreign prison places enormous strain on the families involved, as it does on the individual detained. For the welfare of the prisoner and to ease the concerns of family members, consular staff take their duty of care to our prisoners in foreign prisons most seriously.

At this juncture, I too pay tribute to the work of Stephen Jakobi and Fair Trials Abroad. I know of the vital work that he and his organisation have taken on in a number of cases. However, I emphasise that we will maintain a close interest in Ms Daniels' welfare, while continuing to provide her and her family with all appropriate consular assistance.

Question put and agreed to.

Antisocial Behaviour

[Relevant documents: Fifth Report from the Home Affairs Committee, Session 2004–05, HC 80, and the Government's response thereto, Cm 6588.]

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Gillian Merron.]

2.30 pm

Mr. John Denham (Southampton, Itchen) (Lab): I am grateful for the opportunity to lead this debate on the fifth report of the Select Committee on Home Affairs, which was published just before the general election last spring, because it addresses an issue of great concern and because this is the first opportunity to discuss at any length in the Chamber the Government's respect agenda and the proposals that they announced last week.

One criticism of the Government's respect action plan is that not much in it is new, but those who have read the report, which the Committee unanimously supported last year, have said that the Government's proposed action is line with the report's conclusions.

The Committee's overall conclusion is that the necessary legislative powers to tackle most aspects of antisocial behaviour are largely in place, that the challenge is to ensure that they are used effectively in every part of the country and that there is no need for a raft of new initiatives or totally new approaches. In that sense, although some elements of the respect action plan are new, the general approach, which is to get things done properly at local level, seems to be right.

I shall run through some of the main themes that emerged during our work, rather than discuss the detail of the antisocial behaviour powers. One of the most obvious conclusions, and one that might sound strange, although I do not suppose that the hon. Members present will challenge it, is that antisocial behaviour is a genuine problem. Neither politicians nor the media have invented it. That might sound like a banal and obvious thing to say, but a constant note was struck throughout our inquiry by a minority of those giving evidence, who denied that antisocial behaviour is a significant problem. From time to time it was suggested that antisocial behaviour has always been there, that it is no different now and that politicians who talk about antisocial behaviour are simply creating a myth to justify some authoritarian powers.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for giving way on that point. This is, without doubt, an excellent report, particularly the section entitled "Neighbours from hell", which begins at paragraph 54. Sadly, the Prime Minister's respect agenda seems to have painted social housing tenants as either victims or villains, which probably stigmatises millions of people and panders to negative stereotypes. Speaking as someone who spent half their life on a council estate, I feel particularly passionate about that.

Does my right hon. Friend agree that affordable housing tenants and antisocial behaviour do not necessarily go hand in hand in the way that the respect agenda and some parts of the popular press sometimes imply?

Mr. Denham: I entirely agree, with one caveat: all the evidence is that antisocial behaviour and the fear of it are greatest in the most deprived communities in the country. There is inevitably some correlation between some social housing and deprivation, so it would not be entirely surprising if there were more victims of antisocial behaviour in those areas. I totally agree, however, that the stereotype is sometimes that antisocial behaviour is entirely created by tenants. That is entirely wrong.

There are, of course, very different types of antisocial behaviour. The sheer expense of drink, for example, means that much of the city centre binge drinking that goes on is done by people who have relatively well paid jobs, who probably rent or buy houses in the private sector and who may be socially very different from many people living on local authority estates.

The point that my hon. Friend makes is important and touches on a point that may be relevant later in the debate. The Committee concluded that all the necessary powers are in place to deal with antisocial people who live in owner-occupied housing and that no new powers are necessary. It will be interesting to see whether other hon. Members agree.

David Wright (Telford) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that investment in the public realm on estates is incredibly important and that it should be made in partnership with powers to deal with antisocial behaviour? Investment in the public realm might include removing graffiti quickly and designing neighbourhoods to discourage crime and antisocial behaviour, and it is incredibly important. We need a partnership between agencies, local authorities and the police to ensure that we design out crime and invest in and maintain our public realm. People often feel let down by local authorities and will react to the environment in which they live. If the local authority does not care about their neighbourhood, and local agencies do not invest in it, people will perhaps feel inclined to think that antisocial behaviour is acceptable.

Mr. Denham: Yes, of course it is right that local authorities and other agencies need to pay proper attention to creating and maintaining a good environment and to not allowing the idea to gain ground that those out there who are committing vandalism, doing graffiti or whatever are winning in local areas. I shall not go into much detail about that, although when I talk about alcohol and antisocial behaviour I shall certainly mention some design and planning issues that seem to have been neglected in the debate on binge drinking.

As I was saying, there was a strand throughout our inquiry that questioned whether antisocial behaviour exists as a phenomenon. We are convinced that it exists, but we feel that measures of antisocial behaviour do not always grasp the fact—it is known to most of us, as Members of Parliament—that continually suffering due to a string of individually minor events can have a devastating effect on the lives of individuals and families. The description of antisocial behaviour can sometimes be trivialised in parts of the media, just as it is sometimes sensationalised in others.

There is a more serious consequence of the debate on whether antisocial behaviour really exists. The view that it does not exist, that it is not terribly important or that it has always been there, much as it is now, is held by people who were significant witnesses and by significant people who submitted evidence. They come from some of the very agencies that need to be involved in the fight against antisocial behaviour. It would be wrong of me to damn whole professions and say, "They are all like that", but it would also be wrong to pretend that there are not strong strands in social services and the youth service, as well as persistent strands in parts of education in particular, that question the rationale behind the Government's drive against antisocial behaviour. People are not convinced that there is a major problem, and one issue that I want to draw out is the extent to which changing attitudes in those agencies and professions will be critical to Government success in delivering on their respect action plan.

When we wrote our report, we were cautious about assessing whether the Government are making progress on antisocial behaviour. There were welcome early indications from the British crime survey that fear of antisocial behaviour had reduced, and I believe that that trend has continued. I welcome the figures in the respect action plan suggesting that the trend has accelerated in the areas that the Government have targeted over the past year. Perhaps the good news is that we are beginning to learn what works when it comes to dealing with antisocial behaviour, and the challenge is to ensure that best practice spreads to as many different places as possible.

A second theme that ran throughout the inquiry also relates to perceptions of antisocial behaviour. Again, there can be tensions between local communities that suffer from such behaviour and the professional agencies that are engaged in those communities. We argue strongly that a process involving consultation, local decision-making and, perhaps, the new trigger mechanisms that the Government are discussing for the police would enable people living in a local area to define antisocial behaviour problems in that area and the standards by which they want to live. Nothing is more destructive than the tension that arises when the local community says, "This problem is intolerable", only to have somebody from the police, the council or another agency say, "We don't think it's that bad", before driving home to wherever they happen to live. It is therefore important to allow local communities to set standards at local level. When this idea is suggested, however, there is always a fear that local communities will somehow be irrationally punitive, but our experience as members of the Committee, as well as during our inquiry, is that people in local communities often have the most balanced view of which problems are caused by people's unreasonable behaviour and which are caused because there is nothing for the kids to do. A lot of otherwise decent kids are getting into trouble. Getting local communities more involved is an important part of the strategy.

I return to the non-players, as we more or less describe them in recommendation 13 of the report. One challenge for the Government is to ensure that groups such as social services, education, adolescent mental health services and youth services are full players in antisocial behaviour strategies. I do not underestimate the problems, even when the basic argument that antisocial behaviour is a problem has been won.

I recognise that the Government have put money into social services, particularly to deal with support for dysfunctional families, but there is a real issue, which was honestly expressed by the Association of Directors of Social Services. If people are working in a job where the real driver is to avoid a repetition of a Victoria Climbié-type case, having the management strength to divert resources to dealing with dysfunctional families that are causing a nuisance but not threatening a child's life represents a difficult choice for professionals to make. The Government will need to ensure that they have the right mechanisms in place to achieve the setting of those priorities.

Ann Coffey (Stockport) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that there has, over the years, always been a tension in social services departments, which have had to choose between spending money on people who are their responsibility and in their care, and spending it on preventing problems with children and working with families? Does he agree that children's trusts, which are coming on board, as well as the creation of young persons' directorates, provide an opportunity to involve not only social services, but all the agencies locally, in that preventive agenda? There should not be tension or conflict. This is an opportunity to bring together preventive work and spend money on children at the most needy end.

Mr. Denham: I agree with my hon. Friend that this is a huge opportunity, but it will happen only if, at quite a low operational level of individual decision-making managers, individual members of staff have the confidence to say, "We need to be doing the preventive work alongside the work that we do for the most serious cases."

I would like to go a bit beyond the conclusion of our report, although what I have to say is in tune with it. To give another example of a problem, there has been quite a lot of publicity in the past few weeks about whether the massive investment in dealing with truancy has worked. The logic of our report is that although a lot of money has gone into the education system for behavioural improvements and dealing with truancy, the bulk has probably been spent by schools in a short-term way—perhaps on extra classroom assistants, for example, to provide some separate provision for the most disruptive pupils. I suspect that little of that money has been invested jointly with social services money to target the dysfunctional families that those young people come from. The money has been used to buy short-term gain and peace and quiet, but has not contributed to the long-term tackling of fundamental problems.

When I started to draft the report, my feeling was that we would end up calling for a large amount of extra money to go into the system to tackle the problems of dysfunctional families and some longer-term preventive problems. However, the more we went through the report as a Committee, the more we felt that a lot of money has gone to schools and social services through the regeneration budget, the new deal for communities and so on. A lot of money is out there in the places where most of the problem-causing families exist and the challenge is to focus it directly on the people who often give rise to a series of problems. Although I welcome the extra targeted money announced for social services last week, that broad conclusion drives home.

I do not want to minimise the problems facing the Government in making these changes at local level. New institutional arrangements, such as children's trusts, will certainly help. We have highlighted yet again the extent to which fears about data sharing at local level provide a practical obstacle to different agencies working together. It is time for the Government to legislate so that there can be real confidence locally that individual agencies will not run into trouble if they share information from the police and from education and social services. When the problems are caused by the same young children or parents, it is crazy to have the same organisations running around and for nobody to be able to pool the information effectively. Measures are in the pipeline, but we need to go further.

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough) (Con): I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for giving way. Can I confirm something? I hope I correctly understood what he said. He said at the outset that there is already enough legislation to deal with this sort of thing, but did he also say just now that we need not more legislation to bring these people together, but a management and a structure to produce a strategic plan of action to deal with this vast array of penny-packet problems? Are we not getting such a collective strategy from the various agencies?

Mr. Denham: The hon. and learned Gentleman has correctly picked up on a slight contradiction between two things I said. I congratulate him on listening; that is very nice, as one never knows on these occasions whether anyone will be listening at all. He has captured exactly the broad thrust of what I was saying: the main issues are managerial, not legislative. The major powers that are needed for agencies to tackle antisocial behaviour are in place, and the challenge is now largely managerial.

A few legislative issues are worth looking at. One is that, in practice, there is great confusion between the data protection legislation and the various bits of data-sharing legislation. We found a lot of evidence that, when in doubt, agencies at local level decide not to share information, because that seems to be safer than sharing information. That is an area where some change would be useful.

These comments are about the broad approach. It follows from what I have said that we are disappointed that the witnesses and the evidence we received tended to polarise between the enforcers and the preventers. We received large bodies of evidence from people who talked about effective enforcement action against antisocial behaviour, and from organisations that talked about the need for early intervention and prevention. In respect of that, we have made what I hope is the most obvious comment, which is reflected in the respect action plan: successful antisocial strategies will involve prevention and enforcement. If a Committee such as mine were to look into this issue in three years' time, it would be good if more witnesses presented balanced evidence, because we received evidence that tended to be one sided, one way or the other.

Let me make a few points about the overall approach. We could not find any evidence that there is excessive use throughout the country of punitive powers such as antisocial behaviour orders. On the contrary, measured against the incidence of antisocial behaviour, there appears to us to be too little use of them, rather than too much. There is a popular impression that people can hardly step outside their front door these days without having an ASBO slapped on them, but that is completely wrong. [Interruption.] Even in Manchester. I will say a little more about Manchester shortly, because we were very impressed by the evidence its council gave to the Committee. It is important to get this message about such powers across.

If anything, we feel that some measures are used too late in the cycle of offending. It was interesting to discover how many young people who had received ASBOs had quite serious offending histories before the ASBO was issued. Given the purpose of ASBOs, that suggests to us that the ASBO had been left too long and that turning to it earlier might have been better.

We were impressed by the evidence we received from Manchester city council, which made a perfectly reasonable point: housing injunctions and many types of ASBO require the individual to do no more than what a decent, ordinary person would do anyway. Used early enough, ASBOs are preventive rather than prescriptive.

It is clear that if things are left too long, the ASBO might have to go further and, for example, ban somebody from a certain area. Our view is that there are cases for using these powers earlier. That ought to make it possible to use some less severe measures, such as housing injunctions and demoted tenancies, before reaching the point of talking about evicting a family and all that goes with it in terms of rehousing them and making further provision.

Mr. Nick Hurd (Ruislip-Northwood) (Con): I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for giving way, and I congratulate him and the Committee on the report, which addresses what is a significant and relatively recent phenomenon in my constituency.

Recommendation 32 covers ASBO breach rates that run at about 40 per cent. What evidence did the Committee take on the impact of sentencing outcomes? To illustrate my point, I refer to a local example in which a shopkeeper in the village of Harefield had his shop windows kicked in throughout the year. A police officer worked extremely hard to process the ASBO and breach of ASBO procedure, after which a sentencer from outside the community imposed a £100 fine. The criminal immediately contacted the police sergeant and laughed down the telephone. Does the right hon. Gentleman understand local worries about the remoteness and appropriateness of such sentencing?

Mr. Denham: I entirely understand the frustration felt in those circumstances. There is still an educative job to be done with some sections of the ASBO procedure. We heard of places in which good efforts have been made to educate magistrates and others at local level, so that they understand what the history is likely to be before an offender appears in front of them with respect to an ASBO or an ASBO breach. It is still clear to us that there are other parts of the criminal justice system where sentencers do not understand the significance of someone coming forward with such an offence, although I am sure that that is improving month by month.

Such sentencing problems are not new, as there were similar problems when football banning orders were introduced. It took a long time for several magistrates to understand how the law was meant to operate. I am sure that we will get there, but it is important to highlight frustrating cases as examples of what goes wrong.

Ann Coffey: Before my right hon. Friend moves on from housing injunctions, I want to say how effective it has been to publish the number of ASBOs that have been applied for by each local authority. That gives people living in an area a perspective on what their local council is doing.

I notice from the report that the Committee is keen on publishing the number of housing injunctions. In the light of the evidence given to the Committee, does my right hon. Friend consider publishing that information, as well as the number of ASBOs applied for, an effective measure for local residents, which would enable them to see that their councils were using such powers?

Mr. Denham: It is useful to publish that information. I was about to refer to problems at local level, and my local authority, Southampton, has a good record in dealing with antisocial behaviour—it has been highlighted in previous Government reports. In a recent constituency case, the housing department, having decided not to pursue possession orders, took no other measure. I am not a lawyer but, at first sight, it seemed that either a demoted tenancy or a housing injunction would be justifiable, given the evidence presented, even if the possession order was unlikely to succeed. The failure to take such action leaves neighbours feeling badly let down.

We are still some way from the time when there will be an automatic response from front-line agencies in considering the whole range of powers that might be used in a case and in ensuring that they use an effective power. There may still be a tendency for them to say, "We have always tried to evict people like these, but if we cannot evict them we will not do anything." Publishing information about how the powers could be used would be useful.

Alcohol and antisocial behaviour are also covered in the report. We welcome the Government's announcement that measures will be taken to establish, if necessary, statutory local schemes to deal with city centre binge drinking. If the regulatory impact assessment is to be relied on, my view is that the amount that the Government are assuming would be raised by the statutory scheme—perhaps £60,000 to £80,000 per year for a major city—seems pretty small in relation to policing and other costs. None the less, we welcome the Government's acceptance of the principle that the pubs and clubs that give rise to the problem should, if necessary, be forced to pay towards the cost of clearing up and policing. The Committee will want to return to that issue to see how things are working.

The more fundamental point that I want to stress is that we are strongly persuaded as a Committee that the problem with city centre binge drinking is not individual behaviour, but simply the large concentration of drinking establishments, and there being almost no other activity than drinking, in small geographical areas. Such establishments are segregated by age, and if the 25-year-olds do not drink with the 18-year-olds—or the 16-year-olds, if we are honest—and so on, there will be binge drinking, no matter what the enforcement or licensing measures.

Just as it has taken about 15 years to create those alcohol-saturated areas in towns and city centres, we need to accept that it will take 15 or 20 years of planning in the other direction to get back to a more balanced use of city centres. Although the Committee welcomes much of the Licensing Act 2003 and the idea of alcohol disorder zones, our conclusion is that we have planned, or unplanned, our way into the current use of our city centres. We will need positive planning in the other direction if we are to be able to reclaim our city centre streets, but that point did not receive as much emphasis in the Government's overall alcohol disorder strategy as I and the Committee would have liked.

I shall leave my remarks there. I look forward with great interest to the debate and the Minister's response.

2.56 pm

Tony Baldry (Banbury) (Con): As always, the Home Affairs Committee has produced an excellent report.

I hope that I am not alone in rather regretting the layout of this Room. One of the advantages of Westminster Hall was that the seating was laid out in the shape of a horseshoe. When we debated Select Committee reports, particularly when they were unanimous, that layout enabled the House to focus on what united us and on how we could find common ground, rather than on what divided us. This report was unanimous, so by definition there was a lot of common ground.

I do not intend to repeat anything the right hon. Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Denham) said, but will make some brief points of my own. Any hon. Member who is in any way active in their constituency will know that antisocial behaviour takes place and very often creates totally disproportionate distress to those affected. Youngsters going down a street setting mobile wheelie bins on fire might think that quite fun, but it is very frightening and distressing for elderly people.

In the past few days, we have heard a lot about the respect agenda, and understandably the tabloid papers have focused on the punitive measures. As with any system, one clearly requires punitive measures, such as antisocial behaviour orders. However, we also need to have some regard to how we help families that have difficulties with parenting. I am not entirely sure—sometimes there is confusion—about which agency should lead on this issue, particularly in rural or semi-rural areas, where county councils provide social services, and district councils, now through housing associations, provide housing.

If one is to expect county councils and social services to help more with families that the right hon. Gentleman described as dysfunctional—families with difficulties—children's social services have to have a reasonably high priority. We have to recognise that social services budgets in the local government settlement must have a fair allocation. In Oxfordshire, we have a particular problem with the Supporting People budget, which is putting pressure on other areas.

On parenting, when I look back at those two university students, I sometimes think it a miracle that any of us bring up children. Parenting is a difficult thing, so we should be a little less hasty to condemn families who may have problems, because they may have them for all sorts of reasons.

In trying to keep youngsters out of the criminal justice system, we ought to look at pupil referral units and who runs them. I fully understand that head teachers should have the power to exclude pupils, but such pupils then go to the pupil referral units and are not there for much time, or they are meant to work at home. It always strikes me as bizarre that we exclude pupils from school and expect them to go home and behave. Perhaps if head teachers had a greater say over what happens in the pupil referral units, we might get those youngsters out of those units—perhaps into other schools, college or something more constructive. There seems to be a tendency, which is no one's fault, of writing such people off.

There do not seem to be very many schemes for helping mediation in neighbour disputes. As I am sure the hon. and learned Member for Redcar (Vera Baird) will know from her experience at the Bar and as I certainly know from mine, some of the most vitriolic litigation comes from neighbour disputes over small issues. Going through the panoply of law is often not the way to do it, and maybe we should find better ways of resolving neighbour disputes at a local level.

I also have a particular concern. Often, new estates are appallingly designed. I represent one of the fastest-growing parts of the country; Banbury and Bicester are two of the fastest-growing towns. What happens with estate design? Let me describe the process. Planning permission is given for a load of fields to be built on. The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister is now calling in cases where the housing density is not great enough, so the idea of gardens or recreational space goes by the board. The developers set aside land for a pub, a doctors' surgery and shops and the private sector comes and deals with that. Land is set aside for the school and the county council, as the education authority, deals with that. They may, if the area is lucky, set aside land for a community centre, but no community centre will be built as no one has a responsibility to build one. There is no recreational land other than the school playing field, which can be used only when the school is operational.

In one new housing estate in Bicester, for example, there is nowhere for the youngsters to go and play. It is hardly surprising that they get into difficulties. There was quite a lot of vandalism and antisocial behaviour on the estate so the town council asked all the youngsters what they wanted. Not surprisingly, they said, "We'd like somewhere to hang out. We'd just like somewhere we can meet our mates, where we're not hassled by people." The town council then got round to building a simple shelter. Nothing more complicated; it is not rocket science. Of course, understandably, residents who live near the shelter are concerned about litter and noise, but if that estate had been designed with some reference to providing and ensuring some recreational space for young people—

3.2 pm

Sitting suspended for a Division in the House.

3.17 pm

On resuming—

Tony Baldry: When estates are being designed, we cannot assume that if we build lots of houses we will, automatically, overnight, create a community.

We should increasingly think about "i" before "e"—that is, investment and infrastructure before expansion. In the south-east, the Government are certainly investing considerable amounts of money in new towns such as Crawley and Milton Keynes, and in seaside towns, such as Hastings, that need refurbishment. However, if they expect areas such as Banbury, Bicester and Didcot in Oxfordshire to take a large share of new housing, there has also got to be investment in their infrastructure so that they can provide recreational opportunities for young people.

We have been promised—as, I suspect, has every other part of the country—new and more police community support officers. It would be good to have them, and to know that they will become a permanently funded part of the Thames Valley police, or whatever its successor might be. There is some concern on the part of the police authority that, as has happened in the case of many Government projects, police community support officers will have funding for two or three years but that it will soon get lost in the general police authority budget. Then there will be a risk that a choice has to be made between established police constables and community support officers. That would be rather self-defeating.

Many communities, whether they are housing estates in towns such as Bicester and Banbury or villages, want the reassurance of seeing uniformed people out on the streets. I remember in my youth—it was not that long ago—regularly seeing police officers cycling or walking through villages. Indeed, at one stage a sergeant and two constables covered Bloxham, the village in which I live, and several other villages. Of course, policing has changed. However, people who live on housing estates and in villages still want to see that cover. Can we therefore have community support officers as speedily as possible, and can we ensure that they do not get lost somewhere down the line in the police budget?

A parish in my constituency has become confused and believes that it will have to fund community support officers. When the Minister winds up, will he reassure the Chamber that the community support officers will be funded from the grants in aid for police authorities, and that local communities will not be expected to fund them themselves? Otherwise, we could get into an invidious position in which rich parishes would be able to afford community support officers, and poorer parishes, with perhaps fewer high precepts, would not.

[Tony Baldry]

Antisocial behaviour orders and potential breaches of those orders require a magistrates court system that works. I would just like to flag up the bizarre situation in north Oxfordshire, as I have the opportunity to do so. The situation may be untypical, but last week the Crown Prosecution Service abandoned no fewer than three contested trials in the magistrates court on one day, simply because it did not have sufficient prosecutors.

Perversely, the local superintendent of police tells me that the detection rates of the Thames Valley police are increasing faster than the CPS can advise them on whether they should charge people or bring prosecutions. If someone pleads not guilty, there are no prosecutors to try them. Eventually, the magistrates become fed up with cases being adjourned again and again, and in due course under the concept of natural justice dismiss them for want of prosecution.

That is not fair on anyone. It is not fair on the victims, because they may well not receive compensation orders, and it is not fair on the community. Nor is it fair on those who are charged, because there may well be quite a lot of publicity in the local newspaper about the fact that they have been charged, and they never really receive the opportunity to clear their name, if that is what would have happened in a contested trial if they had been found not guilty. The Law Officers who are responsible for the CPS need to ensure that the CPS has adequate numbers of prosecutors to keep up with charging people who are arrested, with giving advice and with bringing prosecutions.

That takes me to my final point. Who in the criminal justice system takes the lead on ASBOs and acceptable behaviour contracts? Is it the police, the local authority, the district council responsible for housing or the probation service? A constituency such as mine, which is semi-rural, is different from cities that have single departments and a single local authority.

It is not that anyone is failing to do their job properly, but I am sometimes worried that there is a lack of overall grip and that no one is saying, "We have issued this number of ASBOs. Why is there is a problem on that estate, and how can we deal with this?" I accept that district councils and the police are working more closely together, but points of concern remain. Where does the probation service step in? Where are the concepts of restorative justice? The geography of all this can become quite complicated, which makes it difficult for communities to know to whom they should turn if things are going wrong. Should they turn to the local authority to let it know that the ASBOs are not working, or should they turn to the police? We need a clearer understanding of who should lead on this, and who is the point of reference.

The Home Affairs Committee has done a good service to the House. If one read the tabloids, one would assume that everything was going wrong. There are difficulties, but communities generally want to tackle them, and we need both prevention and enforcement, and for all the different bits of the machinery of justice and the machinery of government to work well. If that can happen, communities can be more harmonious and can be safer and happier places for people to live in. I suspect that the issues that unite the House are far greater than the issues that may sometimes divide us.

3.24 pm

Mrs. Janet Dean (Burton) (Lab): I am grateful for the opportunity to take part in today's debate.

The Committee's inquiry focused on three areas of antisocial behaviour: the antisocial behaviour of young people, neighbour nuisance and alcohol-related disorder. There are many causes of antisocial behaviour, and we considered whether the current definitions of antisocial behaviour are too wide. We concluded, however, that they should not be changed.

Any persistent antisocial behaviour can be devastating for those affected by it. One issue that we considered is whether much antisocial behaviour by young people is a matter of a lack of tolerance or of intergenerational conflict. We concluded that, for the most part, that simply is not true. Even the most seemingly innocent activity, such as persistently kicking a football at a house wall, can cause distress to the person living in that house. Sometimes the sheer number of young people grouped together can be threatening to older people. There needs to be greater understanding between the generations, but there also needs to be appropriate action to tackle antisocial behaviour in whatever form it takes.

It is also important to remember that antisocial behaviour is not just about young people behaving badly. I share the welcome by the National Children's Bureau for the clear Government statement in the respect action plan that tackling disrespect is not a youth issue any more than antisocial behaviour is. More than half of antisocial behaviour orders are issued to adults. The respect drive will address antisocial adults and families, as well as antisocial young people.

We should also remember that the vast majority of young people behave well and are a credit to their families and communities. The respect action plan points out that young people should be proud of themselves. For example, 45 per cent. of 16 to 24-year-olds participate at least once a month in informal volunteering, which is the highest level for any age group. The action plan recognises that constructive and purposeful activities have enormous benefits for young people. They can encourage and enable children and young people to contribute to their communities and can help to divert them from antisocial behaviour.

In the Green Paper "Youth Matters", the Government set out their commitment to ensure that all young people have access to activities that they find interesting and exciting in their local area. That should include a full range of cultural, art, sport, environmental and community-based activities. It is right that we should increase the opportunities for all our young people, while at the same time targeting disadvantaged young people through more activities such as sport.

We must also continue to tackle the problem of the minority who act antisocially, making the lives of many in our communities a misery. The Committee welcomes the introduction of ASBOs and the development of acceptable behaviour contracts. I have spoken to my local police, and I can say that ABCs, especially if used in conjunction with meetings with the young people and their families, are proving very effective. About 50 have been issued, only seven of which needed to lead on to ASBOs.

There is also clear recognition that there is a need to introduce other measures to prevent the need for ASBOs and to support them if they become necessary. The Committee supports that view, and paragraph 170 of the report states:

"We welcome the introduction of individual support orders (ISOs); these usefully complement the aims of ASBOs in preventing ASB. We note, however, that take-up of these is not matching expectations."

I am therefore glad that the Government response to recommendation 20 states:

"We and the YJB are keen to see ISOs used effectively within local strategies on anti-social behaviour and will be working with YOTs to ensure that this intervention is used to its full potential."

The Committee also welcomes the introduction of parenting orders, stating at paragraph 159:

"We note the observation by Barnardo's that in many cases parents have been seeking help with their children's behaviour for some time, but assistance is rarely given. Whilst funding has been made available for all parenting classes attached to ASBOs, there is more limited provision for parenting classes as an earlier preventative tool."

I am pleased that the Government's respect action plan contains recognition of the need to support families and a commitment to improve parenting provision nationally through children's centres, extended schools and measures to improve the capacity of the work force through the national parenting academy.

As other hon. Members have said, being a parent is probably one of the most difficult jobs, and we need to increase the support that is available in our communities. The development of children's centres and the involvement of organisations such as Home-Start, which works with local families in my constituency, are crucial in helping to support families.

In welcoming parenting orders, the Committee also recognises that a coercive approach is sometimes necessary and can ultimately be of great benefit to the parents concerned. Indeed, I believe that parenting orders can empower parents. We were concerned that parenting orders were not being used sufficiently, and I am pleased that the Government have said that they will legislate to expand their use.

One concern that has been expressed by the British Council of Disabled People is that ASBOs are being issued to young people with disabilities such as Asperger's and Tourette syndrome. I would be grateful if the Minister commented on that. Families of children suffering from those conditions are particularly in need of support, not punishment.

Turning to alcohol-related disorder, the Committee concluded that there is no clear-cut evidence as to whether more flexible licensing hours will make the problem better or worse. It clearly existed before the introduction of the new licensing laws, which caused such great media concern. However, having spoken to the police in my constituency, I know that there has been no change in the number of incidents caused by alcohol abuse since the new licensing laws came in, although such incidents now tend to be more spread out, necessitating a review of shift patterns. It is clear that we should continue to tackle binge drinking and alcohol-related disorder.

The Committee welcomes the introduction of new powers to target individuals, including fixed penalty notices, which have allowed the police to deal better with drunken and disorderly behaviour. We also welcome efforts to tackle the sale of alcohol to those under age. I represent the brewing town of Burton upon Trent, now also known, of course, for its heroic football team. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] I recognise the efforts that the alcohol industry is making to try to tackle alcohol abuse. Measures include voluntary unit labelling on all cans and bottles, and the "Take it Easy" campaign of messages on drink containers, paper cups and also—through Carling's work with the National Union of Students—on-campus cash machines. We need to use many strategies to tackle antisocial behaviour and to ensure that we encourage people to respect each other, their communities and, perhaps most of all, themselves.

3.32 pm

Mr. Richard Benyon (Newbury) (Con): I do not intend to trouble the time keepers much in this debate, as I want to make just a few quick points. Let me say to the hon. Member for Burton (Mrs. Dean) that, as a supporter for 35 years of Reading, which is about to join the premier league, that she should remain optimistic about her local football team. She will undoubtedly enjoy such excitement in the future.

I commend the report, although I say that as a member of the Committee who was not on it when the document was written. I was a lowly parliamentary candidate at the time. The report is interesting and adds much to the debate.

I want to talk about antisocial neighbours—an issue that is covered extensively in the report. Hon. Members will know the experience: our hearts sink when people come to our surgeries and we can tell before they even open their mouth that they have come to talk about antisocial neighbours. That is a deeply depressing part of our work, because as MPs we are unable to do much to address the problem, even though it is the first thing that our constituents think about in the morning, the last thing they think about at night and something that dominates their day in between. Things often start out as a petty problem, but they can become very serious. Only half a mile from where I live, just over the border in the Wokingham constituency, somebody was tragically murdered in the denouement of an antisocial neighbourhood issue.

This is a serious problem, involving immense health and mental health issues that we all have to face. There is no doubt—I agree with the opening remarks of the right hon. Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Denham)—that there is adequate legislation to deal with the problems covered by the report, but many local authorities and registered social landlords are reluctant to use the powers that they have been given by this and previous Governments to address the problem. How many people come to our surgeries with diaries cataloguing years of misery, their ashen faces telling a story? For them, this process has become a way to administer the continuance of a problem rather than a serious attempt to end it. I look forward to hearing from the Minister how the Government will carry forward the important section in the report on that issue.

I am interested by what the report says about mediation in antisocial neighbour issues. We all know from our constituencies that there is mediation and mediation—some is excellent and some not so effective. That is not necessarily because of the form of the mediation service; it can be because there is not equivalent will on both sides of the dispute to resolve the issue.

I commend the fantastic work of a mediation service in my constituency, Resolve, which is part of Mediation UK. I notice from the report that the Peterborough mediation service, from which a representative came and gave evidence, is very similar. It is part of a national organisation with a local perspective, and it does fantastic work. However, I was alarmed to read that only just over half of England and Wales is covered by mediation services. The Government need to address that. The right hon. Member for Southampton, Itchen talked about managing the problem. We need to look at whether effective schemes are working locally, and to show best practice to other local authorities and give leadership on these issues.

Following on from what my hon. Friend the Member for Banbury (Tony Baldry) said, we should encourage local authorities and registered social landlords, through the Government, to consider the suitability of certain families and tenants to live in certain parts of their built estate. Like my hon. Friend, I represent a rural constituency that contains large urban areas. Although we have a good housing association and a well-managed single list with the local authority, I see too many families living in rural communities for whom that must be a rather terrifying experience, because they are used to urban living. Often, such problems can lead to neighbourhood disputes. In a current case, a young family have been put, by a social landlord based miles away, in a block of flats with a lot of middle-aged and elderly residents, which is completely unsuitable. That has led to a serious problem, which I am attempting to deal with.

I shall discuss one other aspect that emerged in the report, which is covered by the departmental response: the lack of data in relation to whether many of the laudable measures that have been introduced in recent years are working. The departmental response and the Minister's evidence to the Committee accept that there is a lack of data on how effective some of the measures being implemented are. I urge the Minister to consider the situation. It seems crazy to bother to introduce legislation without considering its effectiveness and how it is implemented.

When dealing with issues such as neighbours and antisocial behaviour, the partnership approach seems to work best. I pay great tribute to the safer communities partnership in west Berkshire, which seems to be tackling many of these areas, and the police reassurance scheme, for which we have been a pilot project. It is important that registered social landlords, local authorities, police, citizens advice bureaux, mediation services, mental health organisations, GPs and the range of people who deal with such problems on their own, individual basis talk to each other. We want the Government to help to drive that forward.

I again commend the Committee on the report and look forward to the Minister's response.

3.39 pm

Graham Stringer (Manchester, Blackley) (Lab): I start by disagreeing with the hon. Member for Banbury (Tony Baldry), who is just leaving his place, but not on a serious note—I do not want to disturb him too much. I spent much of the first 19 years of my public/political life on Manchester city council in a horseshoe-shaped chamber and in some of the most acrimonious and difficult debates in which I have ever taken part. I have never been one of those people who believes that the shape of the Chamber changes the nature of the debate.

On the serious matter of the report before us, I have read it, and I am in awe of the people who produced it. It is an excellent report and I regret only that I did not read it until this debate was announced. I wish that I had read all the information in it when it was published, because that information punctures a lot of the myths, straightforward lies and misunderstandings about how ASBOs have been operating and what their benefits are. It destroys many of the myths believed by a number of people about the disbenefits.

We recognise the increasing problem of antisocial behaviour in many of our neighbourhoods. It is often associated with the inner city and poor areas, but I note from the hon. Members here today that it is not confined to those; almost every constituency in the country suffers similar antisocial behaviour problems.

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): The area that I am talking about is not particularly well-off. About an hour before this debate started, I was contacted again by a business that had suffered from antisocial behaviour: graffiti, vandalism and a break-in. The person said that the simple answer was not ASBOs but more police on the beat catching criminals and deterring crime. I should like the hon. Gentleman's views on that opinion.

Graham Stringer: The hon. Gentleman makes an interesting point. I was going to come to it later, but I shall come to it now. ASBOs in Manchester and other areas have been successful in dealing with antisocial behaviour, but one of the reasons why ASBOs and the 1998 legislation were necessary was that in some cases the agencies that should have been dealing with antisocial behaviour, including the police, had walked away from some of those problems. They had re-prioritised their work. I shall come back to that point when I get to licensing.

I agree that more police and other agencies should be dealing directly with the problem before the need arises for an antisocial behaviour order. In the present situation, however, those antisocial behaviour orders have protected many thousands of the people whom I represent in north Manchester. I mean thousands; I am not exaggerating. ASBOs have made those people's lives a lot easier, because although some of the antisocial behaviour described is trivial, though annoying—kicking a ball against the wall or playing loud music can make people's lives miserable—some of it is much more intense, frightening and awful than that.

I should have thought that there would be all-party consensus on such issues, but there is not, although there seems to be in this Chamber. There is an alliance between The Economist—I suppose that I understand where it is coming from, given its history—and some lawyers' groups from both the extreme right and the extreme left, characterised by ASBOwatch and others, I would think. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Denham) said, parts of some of the professions believe that their role is to stop ASBOs and to be on the side of the perpetrators rather than the victims. Politically—this is particularly important in Manchester and elsewhere—the Liberal Democrats do not support ASBOs overall.

Martin Horwood (Cheltenham) (LD): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Graham Stringer: I shall in a minute, when I have finished. I hope that I may provoke the hon. Gentleman a bit more before I do.

I look forward to seeing the hon. Member for North Southwark and Bermondsey (Simon Hughes) campaign round the country for the leadership of the Liberal Democrats. He has my wholehearted support. People should know that the would-be leader of the Liberal Democrat party opposed the legislation that gave the police the power to disperse groups of youths; that he opposed fixed penalties for drunkenness; that other spokespeople for his party believe that criminals should have the same freedom as their victims; and that prison is a waste of time when dealing with many such problems. I look forward to the Liberal Democrat leadership race publicity.

Sir John Butterfill (in the Chair): Order. The hon. Gentleman is making a fascinating speech, but he is getting a little away from the subject. We are not debating the policies of the Liberal Democrats.

Graham Stringer: I apologise, Sir John. I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman.

Martin Horwood: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way. I shall pass on his kind comments to my hon. Friend the Member for North Southwark and Bermondsey (Simon Hughes). I am sure that he will be deeply encouraged by the hon. Gentleman's support, although it may not do him much good in the leadership contest. The hon. Gentleman seems to be labouring under a misapprehension. It is Liberal Democrat policy to support the appropriate use of antisocial behaviour orders.

Graham Stringer: I do not want to provoke you, Sir John, but some of the evidence in the Committee's report shows that councils controlled by the Liberal Democrats rarely use antisocial behaviour orders.

I shall go through some of the myths and the answers given in the report, because it is worth putting them on record. The report goes through the arguments against the often-used allegation that antisocial behaviour orders criminalise juveniles, and that they use a lower threshold of evidence than would be required for a criminal conviction. Paragraph 184 makes it clear that that is not the case.

One of the other accusations made against ASBOs is that, because 35 per cent. of them are breached, they are not effective. Martin Lee, an official who works for Manchester city council, has enthusiastically and effectively been responsible for protecting many in my constituency and elsewhere in Manchester. He said in evidence to the Committee that if 35 per cent. of orders are breached, almost two thirds are successful and that, as a result, many people's lives are better.

Although 35 per cent. of orders are breached, the nature of the ASBO means that even if a person goes back to the neighbourhood and makes someone else's life misery, the courts immediately have recourse to the order to take action. Although the ASBO will have been breached, it does not mean that protection is ended; it means that the next level of protection for the community is put in place.

Another accusation is that ASBOs are often brought maliciously. Evidence to the Home Affairs Committee shows that that is limited. Manchester city council gave evidence that, of the 4,500 ASBOs for which it was responsible, only 10 had been brought maliciously. I have heard evidence in my advice bureau that the perpetrators sometimes come forward and get their retaliation in first. It can take time to sort that out, but it is sorted in the end. It is no different from anything else in the criminal justice system—bad people often lie and try to get in first, but it is a relatively small problem.

Those who work in the probation service, social services and other services often say that the problem is caused by a clash of lifestyles or a lack of tolerance shown by the elderly. That is rather insulting to people who suffer such problems, and they deserve the protection that the public services can give.

My hon. Friend the Member for Burton (Mrs. Dean) said that there have been cases in which people with Asperger's or other conditions have had inappropriate ASBOs made against them or in which the wrong conditions have been attributed to people. To deal with the latter point first, such cases are relatively rare. Let us look in detail at one of the examples in the report. A young man had been banned from going into a motor car because he committed offences in motor cars, which meant that he could not get support from elsewhere, a car ride away. That is unfortunate and may have been inappropriate—perhaps the condition should have been more specific—but when it comes to the balance between helping somebody who has made somebody's life miserable and stopping them from doing so, I would vote for stopping the behaviour and delaying the support. Such cases are not always as simple and straightforward as they seem.

People have come to my advice bureau and said that someone with an ASBO had Tourette syndrome. Like any hon. Member would be, I was concerned; it seemed inappropriate. Such cases make the law press and local newspapers, but when I followed the case through there was no medical evidence whatsoever that the young man had Tourette's. When we consider the complaints and criticisms, many are unfounded.

I have two points about the myths and arguments about the subject which are worth dealing with. First, some people have complained that the publicity given to individuals who are in receipt of an ASBO is wrong if young people are named. That criticism, when we sit back and analyse it, is wrong. A 15-year-old in my constituency took a chainsaw to cut down a camera that was trying to provide some surveillance and protection for people, drove a car into another car and set houses on fire. He was a serious problem. At the time that he received the ASBO he was in prison for something even more serious. When he comes out of prison he will be banned from the area. In case that young man breaches his ASBO, people on the estate need to know who he is and what he looks like so that they can report it. I am in favour of naming and shaming. I am in favour of people knowing who has an ASBO so that the community can get proper protection.

It is often said in a well-meaning way that some of the young thugs use an ASBO as a badge of honour and are proud to receive it. It makes them appear tough among their peers and gives them status that they otherwise would not have. There is an element of truth in that. However, if the ASBO is appropriate, I do not see that that is any reason for not making it. If it stops a young person going on to an estate or stops behaviour that has been a problem for someone else, it should be made. The fact that he, or in some cases she, might feel good about it for a short period of time does not mean that it should not be made. I have people with ASBOs coming to my advice surgery and they do not like them at all.

The fact that a minority of people feel that they are suffering should not be taken as an argument against ASBOs, and nor should the argument that the process criminalises young people. As the report clearly shows, and as my right hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Itchen noted, many people with ASBOs are already known to the police and are in the system. Many of the agencies involved should have intervened more effectively earlier in the process. The report's treatment of antisocial behaviour and antisocial behaviour orders, then, is absolutely excellent.

Having served on the Standing Committee that considered what became the Licensing Act 2003, I read the Select Committee's comments on licensing issues with interest. However, I diverge slightly from the Committee on one issue, which goes back to the point on which the hon. Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Bone) intervened. When we discussed the Bill, I asked the Minister for Sport, my right hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Central (Mr. Caborn), who is the Minister responsible for the issue, how many times the police had charged publicans with selling alcohol to people who were inebriated. The figure for the year in which we were discussing the Bill was six. Anyone who goes into the centre of Southampton, Manchester or Birmingham, or even into the centres of relatively small market towns, on a Friday or Saturday or, indeed, on other evenings will find publicans happily selling alcohol to already inebriated young people, many of whom, as my right hon. Friend recognised, are under age. I do not say that there is a total solution to some of the problems of alcohol abuse in city centres, but having police sitting in vans, tooled up in case there is a big problem, is not the right response to the problem of publicans selling alcohol to under-age people who are already drunk. I do not pretend that any of this has an easy solution, but all the powers in the law should be used at an appropriate time. The police have withdrawn from the appropriate level of policing and they should not do so.

There is another point about licensed premises in city centres. My right hon. Friend said that it has taken 15 years for the accretion of licences to come about and he hopes that there will be more diversity in 15 years. However, I do not really agree with him that the closeness of the pubs is the cause of antisocial behaviour. I know that comparing drinking habits between countries is difficult because there are different cultures, but if one goes to a city such as Seattle, one will find huge ranges of drinking establishments in a line that do not cause a problem. There is something in the way that young British people drink that causes the problems, and if we spread those centres out, we may spread the problem. The other side of the police response to drinking—dealing with problems once they have arisen, as opposed to before they have arisen—may well become more difficult.

Mr. Denham: I will not debate the point with my hon. Friend, but if he has time, I would ask him to have a look at the evidence submitted by Professor Rick Hobbs of Durham university and by Chief Constable Green of Nottinghamshire. Drawing on their experience, they were quite specific about planning and other related issues. They were the people who convinced the Committee, and I refer my hon. Friend to their analysis of the situation.

Graham Stringer: I will certainly do that. As I said, I have read the report and some of the evidence provided, but not the evidence that my right hon. Friend mentions. I suspect that what we are talking about is a knee-jerk reaction to the change in the spatial organisation of licensed premises. The argument is, "That is how premises used to be; there was less trouble then, so we should go back to that", but I suspect that that may not be the answer. However, I will certainly read that evidence.

I finish by thanking Martin Lee and the rest of the team in Manchester, which has been so effective on antisocial behaviour orders. Also, it would be wrong of me not to mention Bill Pitt, who was recognised in the honours list this new year. He has been very effective in his pioneering work on the subject in Manchester, but has also moved towards helping towns and cities across the country. He certainly has my congratulations and the thanks of the many constituents of mine whose lives were made better by the intervention of the units working for Manchester City Council.

Mr. James Clappison (Hertsmere) (Con): It is a great pleasure to take part in this debate on the Select Committee's report. First, I congratulate the Chairman of the Committee, the right hon. Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Denham), on his hard work and leadership, and on the depth of interest that he takes in the subject, which is obvious to everybody in the Chamber. I shall briefly follow down the road of what he said in his introductory remarks. His point about looking beyond legislation is extremely important; legislation certainly has its part to play, but it would be a mistake to think that the answer is always enacting package of legislation after package of legislation, without looking to see whether existing legislation is working, or whether other things need to be done. That is a lesson that we should take to heart generally in this place, and certainly when dealing with the subject of antisocial behaviour.

To take just one slightly topical example, it is a fair point that antisocial behaviour orders, which we have had a little debate about this afternoon, play a role, particularly in some areas; but that was not always the case. They were introduced some time ago. From memory, I think that they first came on stream in 1999 or 2000. The relevant legislation was one of the very first pieces passed by the Government. I recollect the Committee that considered it, because I served on it.

The Conservative party did not actually oppose antisocial behaviour orders, but I am not sure that that can be said of those in all quarters of the House. I will not go any further down that road, although it is interesting to ask when, or in what circumstances, the orders became appropriate to some. We warned at the time that care should be taken to make sure that antisocial behaviour orders were practical and would be used. There was a time when uptake was slow; the Minister and other hon. Members could confirm that from their experiences. They were subsequently modified, and are now used much more than they were in the first couple of years after their introduction.

On the same general point, I follow up what was said by the hon. Member for Burton (Mrs. Dean), who referred to parenting orders. They are a very interesting idea, but statistics bear out that they have not been used very much so far. Perhaps it would be worth considering, when there is an opportunity, why that is so, and whether anything further could be done to make sure that they were more widely used.

As the Chamber will have gathered, the issue of alcohol-related disorder occupied quite a bit of time in the Committee's deliberations, and was the subject of much of the evidence that it took. There was a question in the Committee's mind as to the direction in which the Government were going on the issue. It is not that we contradicted the Government, but we wanted to consider whether other things needed to be looked into, beside the measures already being taken. When we heard evidence on the subject, we were struck with the scale of the problem. I have a slight disagreement with the hon. Member for Manchester, Blackley (Graham Stringer) on the issue; his point about publicans selling to people who were inebriated was very good, and I was interested to hear that the number of publicans prosecuted was so small. However, there is a limit to how much effect prosecuting more publicans has. Perhaps there is a case for considering the matter more carefully, but the evidence that the Committee heard about the extent of the consumption of alcohol in town and city centres suggests that there is an element of inevitability about this, given the numbers of people involved.

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough) (Con): Has my hon. Friend heard of the example of a brewer in the west country who has decided unilaterally not to supply bars, restaurants and other outlets that have a history of antisocial behaviour connected to them? The brewer has said simply that he will not supply them with beer. That is already having a marked effect on the owners of those restaurants and bars, who are taking a more proactive stance to control their customers.

Mr. Clappison: My hon. and learned Friend makes an extremely important point. Anyone involved in the commercial side of the drinks industry who takes such a public-spirited stand deserves our plaudits.

I was struck by the evidence that the Committee heard—the Chairman of the Committee referred to it—from Professor Hobbs of Durham university and the chief constable of Nottinghamshire. Professor Hobbs gave us a very important economic analysis of alcohol-related disorder and the growth of the night-time economy since the 1980s. As he made clear, that economy is a very large and growing business. He says:

"This economic boom has been accompanied by a rise in violence and disorder. In every research site across the country . . . it was found that violence and disorder was exacerbated in direct proportion to the number of drinkers coming into the town or city. Further, we were able to trace the spread of violence and disorder that accompanied the development of new drinking circuits adjacent to established drinking routes."

As the right hon. Gentleman said, there is a tradition in England—I do not know the position so well in other parts of the United Kingdom—of young people consuming alcohol on Friday and Saturday nights. I was staggered by some of the evidence that we heard of the scale of drinking today.

The evidence that we took from the chief constable of Nottinghamshire is that drinking in places such as Nottingham and, I suspect, Manchester is on a quite different scale from the drinking of the past. That is not to say that there has not always been a tradition of hard drinking in some of our city centres. There is the film, "Saturday Night and Sunday Morning", for example. There has certainly been drinking in our city centres for 40 or 50 years, but I suspect that it was not on the scale of the drinking of today.

I was staggered when the chief constable, who gave evidence to us about a year ago in the run-up to Christmas, told us that 80,000 to 100,000 young people would be out on the streets on a Friday night in a city the size of Nottingham. Nottingham has a licensed capacity for more than 100,000 people. That is a huge number of young people to have out on the streets. Given the scale of the numbers of people consuming alcohol, there is bound to be disorder.

We know that the problem is not confined to Nottingham or our city centres. That fair point has already been made. This is a major social development throughout the country. The atmosphere in our provincial cities of any size—it is not so apparent in London—changes after about 7 o'clock, particularly on a Friday night but also on a Saturday night. It is quite unusual to find many people over the age of 30 in those city centres after 7 o'clock on a Friday or a Saturday night. Generally, it is groups of young people going from bar to bar simply drinking the evening away. That is the picture in our great provincial cities.

The later it gets in the evening, the more drink has been consumed, the more tense the atmosphere often becomes. We must recognise the fact that this is a social and economic development that has intensified in the past 15 to 20 years, and we need new thinking about how we will address this problem.

[Mr. Clappison]

The Committee was struck by the fact that the Government's response to alcohol-related disorder is currently founded on an assumption that the problem can be defined by, and traced to, irresponsible individuals and individual premises. That sort of thinking certainly has a role to play; that the irresponsible individuals who consume the alcohol and those irresponsible premises that sell the alcohol to them must face the consequences.

I do not disagree with that approach, but this is a very big phenomenon and more than that is required. There needs to be a more wide-ranging response to this problem. There needs to be a recognition of what has taken place, followed by thinking on a much bigger scale than there has been before to address it, including going back to the planning stage—looking at the planning of our city centres—and looking as well at the provisions that need to be made to accommodate such large numbers of people drinking on Friday and Saturday nights, particularly in respect of transport and toilet facilities. In short, what is needed is a much more thorough and wide-ranging approach than there has been before.

That brings me on to the conclusions of the Committee, which I support. I ask the Government to take them into account, particularly paragraph 296, where we say:

"Unless it becomes clear that alcohol-related disorder is being reduced to a really significant extent, we believe that we should ask whether the Government should be so reliant on its emphasis on the role of individuals."

The issue is all the more important in light of the changes introduced by the Licensing Act 2003. It is probably too early to say exactly what the consequences of that will be, but, given the existing situation, there should be very careful monitoring of what is taking place. I hope that the Government will take that to heart, and look carefully at how they are evaluating those changes and what effects they are having on this already significant phenomenon that takes place on weekend evenings in our great cities.

It is tempting to say, "Young people have always enjoyed a drink," but this phenomenon is much bigger than in the past. It is reflected in university life today and, in the way I have described, in our provincial city centres and smaller centres throughout the country. Of course, many people go out and enjoy themselves without causing any trouble at all, and people should have the right to go out for a drink. But a deep-seated phenomenon is taking place, and there needs to be some wide-ranging thinking about it so that we can address the problems that are arising from it.

4.12 pm

Ann Coffey (Stockport) (Lab): This is an excellent and interesting report, and Committee members should be congratulated on it. I was particularly taken with the discussion about attitudes towards ASBOs, and the barriers those attitudes create at local level. I see ASBOs as a preventive measure. It is important to bear in mind that the young people who are subject to them often have multiple problems; usually, they have spent a lot of time out of school or come from dysfunctional families, and they frequently have alcohol and drug-abuse problems. They are an effective preventive measure when they are not breached, and 58 per cent. of them are not breached. How much more effective could they be in preventing such young people from continuing in a lifestyle and in criminality that will inevitably lead them to have further problems?

I agree with Committee members that to talk about enforcement on the one hand and prevention on the other, or about welfare on the one hand and justice on the other, creates barriers between the agencies concerned, which have a tendency to see themselves as being in one camp or another, and that is a pity. With children's trusts in the future and the bringing together of young people's services from across a number of local departments in a local council, there is an opportunity for ensuring that agencies are not at either end of an approach, but that they are part and parcel of achieving the same outcome, which is to give the best possible opportunity to all young people to achieve what they can in life, while at the same time ensuring that the behaviour of a minority does not affect the life chances of other young people.

I should be interested in the Minister's response to the fact that one local community problem concerns expectation. The community has become aware that ASBOs are a method by which to deal with young people who persistently create problems. Occasionally, I call meetings in my constituency, which representatives of local agencies and residents attend. A lot of frustration is expressed by residents about when a particular young person's behaviour will be dealt as it is expected that an ASBO can be applied for immediately and the behaviour controlled.

Such matters may be local to Stockport, but the part of the ASBO that deals with antisocial behaviour is applied for on criminal conviction, which can delay its application. The criminal system can sometimes be subject to delays while cases are deferred and so on, as a result of which the young person who has created the problem can often be on the streets for months displaying antisocial behaviour that is damaging to the neighbourhood. I want more use made of applications for civil ASBOs and interim ASBOs, which are a method of dealing immediately with antisocial behaviour without necessarily connecting to the criminal parts of the young person's behaviour. If the community is to have confidence in ASBOs, it is important that they are seen to be a method of dealing immediately with the problem and are recognised by the community as such. Otherwise, there will be difficulties.

Frustrations could also be better dealt with if the community were represented on the crime and disorder reduction partnerships. At the moment, local agencies with statutory responsibility to deal with crime and disorder are rightly members of the partnerships. However, if the community were also represented, it could be brought to the attention of the partnerships that priorities concerned delays. There would be a better prioritisation of the behaviour that such partnerships dealt with. Antisocial behaviour would be well up the agenda and such representation would be a useful mechanism. I should be grateful for the Minister's comments on that.

May I make a plea? I believe strongly that publication of information locally is important. The ASBO process is a local mechanism and it is important that people know what their local crime and disorder partnership is doing compared with the crime and disorder partnership up the road. The publication of applications for ASBOs encouraged local crime and disorder partnerships to apply for them because that meant accountability, which goes some way towards explaining why their use accelerated after the first two years.

I want local councils to publish the housing injunctions that they have taken out under the Housing Act 1996. They are an easy mechanism for housing authorities and social landlords to use. They have an immediate benefit in that they can stop neighbourhood nuisance dead in its tracks at 2 o'clock in the morning by applying to a court the next day. Such a system is also good for those indulging in the neighbourhood nuisance. It is better that, than that they be evicted in six months' time for persistently playing the radio at 2 o'clock in the morning. At the moment, such figures are not published. Of course, we have access to them locally, but I should like to know, for example, Stockport's performance against Thameside and, more importantly, against Manchester. Will the Minister ask councils to produce the figures?

4.20 pm

Mrs. Ann Cryer (Keighley) (Lab): Like the hon. Member for Newbury (Mr. Benyon), I cannot claim credit for this excellent report. I was not on the Committee when it was produced. I was in Parliament, but I was doing time with the Constitutional Affairs Committee.

The hon. and learned Member for Harborough (Mr. Garnier) told a story about the west country brewer who refused to provide beer to pubs that had both people drinking over the limit and unruly behaviour. I am impressed by that; it is such a good message to send out. I have a famous brewery in my constituency, Timothy Taylor's, and I feel like mentioning that story to it. It might be that it is a very upmarket brewery that does not provide beer to pubs of that type.

I would like to concentrate on antisocial behaviour orders and the Government's current actions. On 30 December, Jennifer, a young single mum in my constituency, was at home when a group of youths, who had been threatening and verbally abusing her over the previous five months, walked into her house while she was there with her young daughter to steal her property. There was no attempt to cover their identity; the thugs were simply relying on the fear that they had generated on the estate to act as a deterrent to Jennifer going to the police.

Why was Jennifer singled out? Perhaps because she works, because she has a car or because she has a child of dual heritage. I am not sure of the reason. We cannot sit back and allow innocent, law-abiding people, who are interested only in getting by, getting on with their lives, bringing up their children in a safe environment and living in harmony with their neighbours, to be subject to persecution and misery of that sort at the hands of a few mindless individuals.

Therefore, I wholeheartedly support the actions that the Government have taken in seeking to address antisocial behaviour. I welcome the respect agenda, which is not a gimmick. It is about the delivery of positive solutions to practical social problems. Anything that concentrates our efforts on supporting people such as Jennifer and on isolating the thugs must be at the forefront of our agenda.

ASBOs are a useful and effective tool, but, as my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Blackley (Graham Stringer) mentioned, we must ensure that they are never allowed to be worn as a badge of honour by those who have them. The gathering of sufficient evidence to secure an ASBO can be a lengthy process and can involve a great deal of co-operation from neighbours and the public in general. It is vital that, once imposed, an order is enforced without hesitation.

If a breach of an ASBO is reported to the police, they must treat it as an emergency. Failure by the police to react quickly to any breach will inevitably result in the loss of credibility of the ASBO and frustration for those who have put their necks on the line by giving evidence to secure it in the first place. The street cred of the offender will increase as he or she flaunts the abuse of the ASBO. For the police, enforcement must be a priority.

Likewise, we must ensure that other strands of our criminal justice system are geared to dealing with the realities of antisocial behaviour. I am told by magistrates in my constituency that the training given to them on ASBOs has been scant. Magistrates—important volunteers who act on behalf of their community—need to be in a position to make informed decisions based on detailed knowledge of the area and on what the practical effects of granting or refusing an ASBO can be.

A visit to any magistrates court in the country would demonstrate how cases of antisocial behaviour are clogging up our courts. Perhaps, therefore, the time has come to consider extending the battle against antisocial behaviour to specialised courts and having specifically trained magistrates consider ASBO applications. Specific training for magistrates, specialised fast-track courts and unquestionable enforcement would all help to avoid terrible incidents, such as that experienced by Jennifer.

However, I would urge caution. I have been told by magistrates in my constituency that ASBOs have sometimes been used as punishment for people suffering from a mental health problem. That cannot be right. We must not allow the tools of a punitive system to be used as an excuse for failures in mental health provision.

How many cases end up in the magistrates court simply because there is nowhere else to go? A visit to New Hall, a women's prison in Wakefield, demonstrates that a high proportion of the inmates are suffering from a mental health problem, as opposed to being criminals.

ASBOs have been used in an attempt to control the antisocial behaviour of mentally ill patients, which can lead only to failure because, owing to the illness, the terms of the ASBO will always be breached. We are setting people up to fail. To threaten them with the last place they should be—prison—causes yet more damage.

Antisocial behaviour cannot be addressed only through punishment. We need the carrot as well as the stick, and I am delighted to say that in Keighley we are adopting that approach in a most innovative way. A multi-agency coalition is working in the Bracken Bank area specifically to address antisocial behaviour through the empowerment of the local community, addressing the needs of young people and restoring hope in individuals as stakeholders in their community. All this is supported by the police.

This scheme is only at the planning stage, but with good will from all, and some financial support from various organisations such as local banks and building societies, as well as practical help from schools, community groups and trade unions, I hope that the people of Bracken Bank will triumph and that their peace of mind will be restored, along with the good name of Bracken Bank and my constituency.

4.26 pm

Martin Horwood (Cheltenham) (LD): I welcome this debate, and I am pleased at the depth in which the Select Committee on Home Affairs has looked into this issue. The report contains many valuable pieces of information and learning.

I represent Cheltenham, which may not have much of a reputation as an antisocial place. We are looking forward to the next round of the FA cup, in which Cheltenham Town will face Newcastle United. We understand the fear that will be coursing through Newcastle at the prospect of facing the mighty Robins at home, and we hope that the Toon Army will behave socially, rather than antisocially, when they come to Whaddon Road.

Cheltenham has had its share of antisocial behaviour problems, and we have a thriving night-time economy. Like the hon. Member for Hertsmere (Mr. Clappison), I witnessed the thousands of young people who were filling the clubs and streets of Cheltenham at 3 am at the weekend. I was stunned at the scale of the activity and fairly surprised at the amount of drinking in which many of those people seemed to be indulging. A description in the local paper, which referred to this as being like Beirut, is typical of the unhelpful exaggeration of the problem, which sometimes happens. There was clearly disorderly behaviour, and I am sure that there are many fights among drunken people on such nights, but that is not typical of young people who go out clubbing in Cheltenham or elsewhere, many of whom behave responsibly and enjoy a good time. We have to be careful not to condemn an entire lifestyle and generation just because of the behaviour of a few idiots.

What worries me far more is what we could call sober antisocial behaviour. Many hon. Members have referred to the instances, which we have all heard about in constituency surgeries, of persistent patterns of harassment, antisocial noise by neighbours, occasional racism and, often, intimidation. I have seen young people throwing rocks at passing cars from an estate in Cheltenham and airguns pointed out of back doors at other people's houses, and I know of instances of airguns being fired. Such antisocial behaviour is the more serious kind, which the Committee sought to investigate and address, yet, all the same, Cheltenham remains a civilized, hospitable place that is generally safe.

We need to try to get to some of the facts, and the report is helpful in that regard. Some facts are alarming. The Committee's reports mentions the snapshot Home Office survey in September 2003, which found 66,000 instances of antisocial behaviour in a single day, equating to 13.5 million per annum, or roughly one every two seconds. Even more alarmingly, it reports that the British crime survey has said that 80 per cent. of problems go unreported, which implies some 50 million or 60 million instances of antisocial behaviour in total.

I agree with the Committee's conclusion that there is a fundamental problem, although it is difficult to tell whether it is increasing or decreasing. If the numbers have gone up during recent years, that probably reflects an increase in revelation rather than an escalation, but we clearly have a problem in our country and it is right that the Government and all parties are seeking solutions to it.

I sound a few notes of caution, however. First, some categories are not terribly helpful. I notice that the Home Office list at the beginning of the report includes "teenagers hanging around" and "people sleeping rough" among instances of antisocial behaviour. Those are not necessarily antisocial activities. One may be a perfectly legitimate, sociable activity and the other the personal problem or tragedy of somebody who is not necessarily seeking to harm or disturb anyone else.

Secondly, many organisations that gave evidence to the Committee highlighted the danger of sucking into the ASB arena people who need help more than they need the judicial process. I take the point made by the hon. Member for Manchester, Blackley (Graham Stringer): some examples cited—children with Tourette's being given ASBOs and so on—may prove on further investigation not to be true. Nevertheless, if any such examples are true, they must give us pause for thought and we should seek ways to prevent them from being repeated.

Shami Chakrabarti of Liberty quotes the example of a boy with Tourette's whose ASBO ordered him to stop swearing. The National Association of Probation Officers mentioned a prostitute whose ASBO prohibited her from carrying condoms within a given area. Unfortunately, her drug clinic was in the restricted area, and one of its services was the provision of free condoms as part of its harm reduction strategy.

The media have referred to such examples. The Belfast Telegraph reported that "Kim Sutton from Bath, who has tried to commit suicide four times, received an Asbo banning her from jumping into rivers, canals or on to railway lines."

Another example said that

"Caroline Shepherd, 27, was given an ASBO in April"

last year

"after neighbours complained about her wearing skimpy underwear when answering her door in Lanarkshire."

Finally,

"retired teacher Jean Smith, 60, is banned from putting bread out to feed the birds at her home in Burntisland and anywhere in Fife."

Such instances—[Interruption.] Such behaviour may be annoying, but it is clearly not appropriate for the judicial process. I accept what the hon. Member for Manchester, Blackley said—some of those cases may prove on further investigation not to be true—but the flexibility of ASBOs runs the risk that they may be interpreted in an arbitrary and sometimes rather peculiar way, and we need to ensure that we guard against that. Barnardo's warned against what it called "continual moral panic". As I said, in terms of alcohol-related antisocial behaviour, there is the risk that an atmosphere of exaggeration may build up the issue to be worse than it really is, and we need to guard against it.

Politicians and the media can choose which aspects of antisocial behaviour policy they want to highlight. There are two essential aspects, one of which is tackling the fundamental cause. The other, which has to act as a backstop, is tackling the behaviour itself if tackling the cause does not succeed. That is the Government's so-called twin-track approach.

Many initiatives on the first track that support individuals and communities are welcome. I point to individual support orders and the "Positive Activities for Young People" programme. My favourite example of a Labour programme, which I am always willing to quote to constituents as something the Government have done right, is Sure Start. I have referred to it as a positive and intelligent way to approach the underlying problems that later lead to antisocial behaviour.

On resuming—

Martin Horwood: The Division bell interrupted me as I was listing Government programmes that I support. I had reached the end of the list, so I shall commend to the Government a few programmes and initiatives that they might like to consider adding to the positive measures to support individuals and communities. Shelter's inclusion project should certainly be considered if it has the positive impact and successful results that it claims for it in its material. Anything the Minister can persuade his ministerial colleagues to do in terms of encouraging sport and community involvement generally would be very welcome.

To give a constituency example, a summer football tournament for young people in Whaddon appears, anecdotally, to have a direct impact on the reduction of antisocial behaviour while it is taking place. As the hon. Member for Banbury (Tony Baldry) said, positive solutions are sometimes as simple as the provision of somewhere for young people to hang out.

Occasionally, however, as a last resort, more punitive solutions have to be sought. Let me make it clear that the Liberal Democrats are not against antisocial behaviour orders; we just feel that they should be used appropriately and be supported by more positive measures. Indeed, Liberal Democrat-controlled Cheltenham has played a pioneering role in exploring the use of ASBOs—18 have been granted—but they should not be a blunt instrument. Cheltenham and other Liberal Democrat councils such as Islington have also pioneered the use of acceptable behaviour contracts, which are, perhaps, a cheaper and more effective option before people reach full ASBO level. We have welcomed those, too.

Other measures, which might be politely called coercive options, include parental control agreements. In addition, we have suggested community justice panels, the idea being that, if both parties agree, before a case comes to court, the community, and possibly the victims, could play a bigger role in deciding on the appropriate punishment for an offender. That would seem to give an important voice to the victims of antisocial behaviour, who have not been mentioned a great deal in this debate.

The Committee highlights the importance, if any of these proposals is to work, of joined-up thinking and partnership at local level. In Cheltenham, the crime and disorder reduction partnership works hard to try to bring all parties together, and to ensure that there is joined-up thinking. Even so, last year the youth service in Cheltenham complained that ASBOs were being imposed without its knowledge and without consultation with the young offenders' schools. The report highlights the need for more work to be done to ensure that everybody is talking to everybody else, so that there is a joined-up approach. Perhaps the appointment of dedicated antisocial behaviour caseworkers would be a way to achieve that.

We must not think of ASBOs as a quick win or an easy solution. They are designed to tackle a complex and difficult problem, and should never be turned into a political football if that can be avoided. Care needs to be taken that they are not applied in an arbitrary or peculiar way, as anecdotal evidence from various organisations suggests may now be the case. Even if there is not a general problem on that front, and ASBOs are addressing the wider problem relatively effectively, a small number of cases of injustice or the arbitrary use of ASBOs should cause us great concern.

In that vein, it is a shame that the Home Secretary was quoted last December as wanting to name and shame councils that were not using enough ASBOs. If we are effectively tackling antisocial behaviour at local level; if councils such as Rochdale have found effective alternatives to ASBOs, such as the Shelter inclusion project; and if we develop community justice panels as an alternative to ASBOs, we will have less antisocial behaviour and fewer ASBOs. That is a solution we should all be seeking.

4.54 pm

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough) (Con): I begin by thanking, on behalf of the official Opposition, the Chairman of the Select Committee and his colleagues, my hon. Friend the Member for Hertsmere (Mr. Clappison) and the hon. Member for Burton (Mrs. Dean), for being party to the report. It has highlighted an important issue that crosses party political boundaries.

Although this afternoon's debate on the report has been useful, the issue is of sufficient importance to have been debated on the Floor of the House. An Adjournment debate would have been okay, but really the issue merits a longer, full-day debate in the House. If I have any regret about this afternoon, it is simply that we are in the wrong Chamber of the House of Commons. Having said that, I am delighted that we have been able to have this debate and equally delighted that so many have been able to participate and speak constructively about this vexing social and criminal problem.

During my intervention on the Select Committee Chairman, I alighted on the theme that comes out of this afternoon's debate: we do not need more legislation in this area of public policy. Indeed, if the electorate and good fortune favour my party in due course, and if I am still alive and on the Home Affairs Front-Bench team—we have a slightly youthful agenda at the minute—I hope we will take pride in introducing no legislation whatever during a parliamentary Session. The Home Department legislates excessively; occasionally, Governments need to stop legislating and start thinking. The right hon. Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Denham) has provided yet another reason to reinforce that argument.

Let me begin by agreeing with the right hon. Gentleman. Not only do we not need more legislation, but—again, as I highlighted in my intervention and he was good enough to agree with me—we need strategic management. Too often in areas of public policy delivery, to use the jargon, all sorts of well-intentioned people run around doing all sorts of well-intentioned things in penny packets, but none of them talk to each other or pre-plan with their official or professional colleagues how best to provide a sensible, acceptable solution across the piece.

I shall give an example from my constituency. Members of Parliament may represent inner-city, less well-off areas, or—like me and my hon. Friends the Members for Newbury (Mr. Benyon) and for Banbury (Tony Baldry), and I dare say to some extent my hon. Friends the Members for Kettering (Mr. Hollobone) and for Hertsmere—areas that are broadly well-off according to the Government's social indices. My constituency and those of my hon. Friends, certainly to grant-making organisations in the European Union, look as if they do not need any money.

However, there are pockets of deprivation and difficult social problems even in relatively prosperous areas such as those. I say that because I, as a Conservative Member of Parliament, understand that there are plenty of difficulties in poor inner-city seats that I do not have to deal with. Equally, however, I hope that Members who have the fortune to represent parts of urban England do not think that because we live in and represent marginally better-off areas than theirs, we do not understand the acutely difficult issues that national Government and local government have to grapple with.

I come back to the example of my constituency. Early in my time as a Member of Parliament, during the 1992–97 Parliament, I became concerned about the increasing incidence of low-level persistent public nuisance on the streets of the suburban part of my constituency, the borough of Oadby and Wigston. I could not understand why that was happening, nor why it was allowed to continue to happen.

I borrowed the library of a local high school and called a conference there. I called together representatives of the police, social services and libraries, head teachers from the area, and church and other faith community representatives, as I think they are called. I asked pretty well everyone interested in the problem to discuss the issue at the conference, and we had a useful discussion for two or three hours. At the end, I suggested another conference within the next six months or year and requested that by the time we met again, each of the representatives in that room should have made official contact with another member of the audience. For example, a policeman would speak to a head teacher, a head teacher would talk to a parson, a parson would talk to a librarian and a librarian to someone at social services. [Interruption.] If I may, I shall resume my exciting story in a few moments.

5 pm

Sitting suspended for a Division in the House.

5.15 pm

On resuming—

Mr. Garnier: I asked the people at the meeting if they would talk to each other officially, and said that we would meet again in six to nine months' time. Sadly, at the resumed meeting at a different venue in the same borough, not one of those people had made the effort to speak officially to the others. That is a pity, because everyone in that room had a shared interest in dealing with the problem. Such situations require strategic management and require people to understand that such matters cannot be dealt with by one agency and not the other. If we have learned anything today, it is that; I do not suppose that you need to learn that lesson, Sir John. If we can do that cheaply and effectively without the need for legislation, we have learned two things.

The definition of antisocial behaviour is almost irrelevant. Rather like an elephant, it is easier to recognise than it is to define, and it may have different definitions in different parts of the country. A football being kicked against someone's front door in a crowded inner-city housing estate might be considerably less tolerable than if it were kicked against a farmhouse or barn door in the middle of nowhere. We need consistent local application of definition and response.

I look with some interest at something that was brought to my attention by Anne Owers, the chief inspector of prisons, and which is mentioned in the report, namely, the Liverpool community justice centre. There one can get multi-agency access to a public disposer of justice. It is not the property of one particular aspect of the public services. From what I read in the report and learned yesterday from Anne Owers, it seems to me to be a sensible, practical way of dealing with matters. It is relatively new, but I have been encouraged by what I heard from Mrs. Owers yesterday and what I read in the report, and I shall make a point of going there as a shadow Minister, if I may, to see what is done there and whether that example can be used elsewhere.

What we need is not necessarily a national strategy, but consistent local application of the powers that are provided under existing legislation and the opportunities that are provided by sensible co-operation, about which many hon. Members spoke this afternoon.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): I want to make a specific point about dispersal zones and their effectiveness in dispersing antisocial behaviour. I participate in the police parliamentary scheme. Recently, when I was on patrol in my constituency the police did their best to disperse up to 30 youths who were behaving in an antisocial manner. The police community support officers who attended that incident were not able to do very much because the trouble was not in a dispersal zone. If it had been, they would have had powers to act. To make effective use of CSOs, may I encourage, through my hon. and learned Friend, the use of dispersal zones?

Mr. Garnier: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's intervention. I am sure that the Minister will take that example on board. We have had a number of different attempts at defining antisocial behaviour, which included references to neighbour disputes and drunkenness. We have all seen and heard examples of foul and abusive language and behaviour; we have heard interesting examples about attempted suicides and brothels; and we all know about crack houses. The hon. Member for Manchester, Blackley (Graham Stringer) is one of my sparring partners in debates on the abuse imposed on my constituents by airlines using Nottingham East Midlands airport, which is of course owned by the Manchester Airport Group, of which he was a director. I am almost inclined to say that perhaps the aircraft that pollute and disturb my constituents at night should also be the subject of antisocial behaviour orders. The point is that it does not matter how many odd or eccentric examples we produce of what antisocial behaviour may be; we are talking about a species of public nuisance. The great joy of the English legal system is that it does not become hidebound to a specific definition.

The courts, the prosecuting agencies and, I hope, Parliament are sufficiently able to cope with definitions that are variable and apt to cope with particular circumstances, so I do not complain if the local people who are concerned about a particular aspect of public nuisance include in an antisocial behaviour order conduct that may in some respects be laughable in another part of the country. That is the whole point about the local application of sensible powers. The lady who feeds pigeons in her garden is creating a public nuisance because the excrement from the pigeons interferes with the quality of life of her neighbours. I do not have a problem with that. I do, however, want there to be a commonsense approach locally, albeit with centrally provided powers to achieve that result. I shall say no more about that, because even a good point repeated does not get any better.

Finally, I introduce into the debate a note of dissent about the Prime Minister's occasional off-the-cuff remarks, which no doubt he would like us to think he has thought about quite carefully, on all sorts of aspects of the respect agenda, as he so tastefully calls it. He spoils his case even before he has opened, or closed, his mouth by calling it the respect agenda, because it looks like a slogan rather than a well-thought-out policy. When one examines it, one finds that it is a slogan and not a well-thought-out policy.

The latest example of that is the instant justice idea that some clever person has put into the mouth of the Prime Minister. It is absurd and it brings the Prime Minister as well as the criminal justice system into disrepute, because it plainly has not been thought through properly. It is plainly likely to break down the confidence that there needs to be between the criminal justice system, the victims and the law-abiding public, even if we ignore, for current purposes, those who perpetrate these acts of public nuisance or antisocial behaviour.

I urge the Government through the Minister, and I urge the Prime Minister, to listen very carefully to what the Minister has to say. I do not know how often he has the opportunity to meet the Prime Minister, but I am sure that the Prime Minister would benefit from the Minister's advice, because this Minister has to deal day by day with the sorts of problems that the Prime Minister seems to create. I say that in a spirit of constructive friendliness, because, as each constituency MP has identified, we all have different sorts of antisocial behaviour with which we must deal, and we all want it to be dealt with. We would all be in a stronger position to deal with the problem if the Prime Minister could simply allow the thinkers to carry on thinking and could wait before he opens his mouth.

I shall leave it there, because I have spoken for far too long, and I would hate to be accused, even in this local environment, of antisocial behaviour.

5.23 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Paul Goggins): I join the chorus of welcome from both sides of the Chamber for the report with which the Home Affairs Committee has provided us. It is an excellent example of proper scrutiny. It does not nit-pick or point score, but takes a serious issue, analyses it properly, advances ideas and engages with the issue. The Government take that sort of contribution extremely seriously.

The report contains a whole range of recommendations that, for the most part, were fully accepted. Some 25 of the recommendations have led to substantial work being done in the Home Office, and we will supply the Select Committee with a full update on all the actions that we have taken so that a substantial contribution is available for the annual report and so on. Probably the most important thing that the Select Committee did was to emphasise the fact that this is a crucial issue. We have all demonstrated that with examples from our constituencies, apart from the analysis of the problem as a national one.

When the hon. Member for Newbury (Mr. Benyon) was speaking, I reflected that he was a new Member of Parliament entering the House with antisocial behaviour as probably the No. 1 issue in his constituency surgeries, correspondence and discussions with the police. When I was elected in 1997, along with a number of my colleagues in this room, it was probably getting to that point. For earlier generations of Members of Parliament, it would not have been the issue that it is today. Its importance has increased, and it was right of the Select Committee to underline the fact that it is a high profile issue that needs an urgent response.

I echo the comments made by my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Blackley (Graham Stringer). Another effective contribution of the report was to slay some of the myths which, if they are not challenged, will perpetuate and grow into further distortions. Many thanks to the Committee for that.

The challenge is to get beyond the sense of powerlessness that was around for so long in this place as well as in our constituencies and to begin to get the powers, resources and partnerships together to change people's lives. That is what it is about. We need to change the lives not only of the perpetrators of antisocial behaviour but, more fundamentally than that, of the victims, who live in their thousands in fear and trepidation about what may happen if antisocial behaviour is not challenged. There has been a danger of the debate polarising. In many instances, it has polarised. That is not helpful. We need all the elements that have been discussed this afternoon: the prevention and early intervention, the mediation and the enforcement, too. We need the enforcement to be carried through and to work. The trick is getting the timing right for the right intervention and the right person at the right time, so that we have the impact that we want.

It is important to share some numbers with hon. Members this afternoon. There have been 6,500 ASBOs made, 13,000 acceptable behaviour contracts, and 800 dispersal orders—I noted the comment about the important role that they can play and police feedback is that they are effective in tackling disorder. There have been 500 crack house closures, which is a tremendously important development. A crack house in a community on an estate can cause absolute mayhem. It is where the drugs are dealt, and so much criminality and antisocial behaviour is connected with them that taking them out is hugely important. In one example the police, working with local communities, have been applauded in the street by residents because of the action that they have taken to close such places down. That work must continue. We are also using the penalty notices for disorder; 170,000 have been used as an effective, early, quick way of stopping people and penalising them for their unacceptable behaviour.

I have given those numbers, but I emphasise that this is not a numbers game. We cannot say that we have tackled antisocial behaviour because we have had so many antisocial behaviour orders. It is an issue of how such matters are tackled locally with local strategies, and we should ensure that local people and their priorities are fed into that. I am pleased that the hon. and learned Member for Harborough (Mr. Garnier) has had the opportunity to find out more about the community justice centre in Liverpool. I encourage him to visit; there is a long line of people going, but it is important that people go and learn. There is a great passion at the centre for justice linked to the community in imaginative ways, not least because punishments should put something back into the community. I would encourage anybody who has not been to the centre to do so.

Connecting justice, whether for antisocial behaviour or other forms of criminality, with the community is an important step that we need to continue to take. We are beginning to see the impact, not only in the numbers, but in perceptions and attitudes towards antisocial behaviour. The Home Office undertook a survey over a two-year period in 2002–03 to 2004–05. The general perception across the country is that antisocial behaviour is at a high level, but over that period, it actually fell from 19 to 16 per cent., which is welcome. In the 10 trailblazer areas and the 50 action areas, where we have been doing the most intensive work on antisocial behaviour because of the level of the problem, the perception that antisocial behaviour was high fell from 25 to 19 per cent. Therefore, the fall in those areas was greater. As we engage and involve communities, they see and feel the difference, and we can measure that. We constantly need to move the gains we have made out from the intensive areas, so that we get through measures such as the national community safety plan and the respect plan. We want there to be that kind of impact throughout the country.

Inevitably, resources have been discussed. I am pleased that Members have welcomed the extra £52 million to support work with parents. In the respect action plan, we have introduced the national parenting academy. There is also £28 million to support the development of a family support network, and there is extra money for the youth offending teams. All of that is important; it will pioneer new work that will make a real difference. However, as several Members have commented, in the end what is important is that we bend and shape the mainstream funding that goes into many of these areas in ways that prevent antisocial behaviour; we must intervene at the right time, and deal appropriately with situations.

I warmly welcome the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Stockport (Ann Coffey) about the reforms of the Children Act 2004, and the development of children's trusts. A more coherent organisation of local services will help to bend and shape those mainstream resources in helpful ways.

My hon. Friend the Member for Burton (Mrs. Dean) mentioned Home-Start. That signals to Members the important role that the voluntary sector can play. Home-Start operates in my constituency; parents help other parents to get through some of the difficult situations they face. That is welcome. Also, the NCH Dundee project has been a trailblazer in terms of interventions with families.

Tony Baldry: One of the difficulties in respect of Home-Start is who funds it. In north Oxfordshire, it has been funded in part by the primary care trust, but the PCT says that it may no longer be able to make a contribution. One of the recurring problems that some of these very worthwhile, voluntary, non-governmental organisation, charitable sector groups face is constancy of funding.

Paul Goggins: The hon. Gentleman draws me into another area of my responsibilities—that of the voluntary sector. I am keen that we develop initiatives such as the Compact, so that we have a proper relationship between public funders and voluntary organisations. We must ensure that there is a dependable source of income so that the contribution that such organisations make can be relied on and people are not always worried about the funding running out. The hon. Gentleman makes an important point.

My hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Blackley spoke about north Manchester; I ought to have an opportunity to say that similar things are happening in south Manchester, which is where my constituency is. He is right that this is not having merely a peripheral impact. It is affecting the lives of thousands of people. If one point in our debate grabbed everyone's attention it was my hon. Friend the Member for Keighley (Mrs. Cryer) talking about Jennifer's experience. That is what this is about—the lives of people being either wrecked or changed for the better. I was grateful to my hon. Friend for mentioning that.

The hon. Member for Cheltenham (Martin Horwood) and my hon. Friend the Member for Burton mentioned difficulties that are sometimes spoken about—to do with Tourette's or Asperger's syndromes, for example. My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary has been concerned about that issue and has paid particular attention to it. If an inappropriate condition is placed within an ASBO it can be reviewed, and if it is inappropriate, it should be reviewed.

We should not be surprised if there are one or two difficulties in the early stages of the development of this new order. However, we can learn about those cases and do something about them, and they should not deflect us from the fact that this has been an overwhelming success. We should not be distracted from recognising that.

Dealing with antisocial behaviour must be part of a wider strategy of dealing with criminality generally and of managing offenders. Civil powers are increasingly being used as a strong complement to criminal prosecutions. Criminal prosecutions are now not the only way to deal with people who cause mischief, trouble and disorder on our streets; we can use civil powers to recover criminal assets. Even if the level of evidence is not great enough to mount a prosecution, we can use it for civil proceedings, if it is sufficient. We can use antisocial behaviour orders, too. The issue is about having a full toolkit with which to tackle criminality and disorder, so that we can manage such people from end to end of the system, as we often say in the jargon, and prevent them from causing trouble.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stockport and others talked about accountability, connection with the community and how we can involve the community more. She talked about crime and disorder reduction partnerships and how they can better engage people. The review of the partnerships is ongoing and deals with many of the issues raised, including accountability, the sharing of data and the streamlining of partnerships, all of which are important. I can tell my right hon. Friend the Chairman of the Select Committee and all its members here that we hope to publish the full assessment of that review very soon—indeed, before the end of this month, I hope. That is another piece of the jigsaw which I am sure will be welcomed by the Committee.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stockport made a sensible suggestion about the collection and dissemination of data relating to housing injunctions. The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister takes the lead on that matter, of course, but we shall draw her suggestion to colleagues' attention, and I am sure that they will be interested in it.

Clearly, alcohol disorder is of concern to us all. The subject has come up in many of the contributions this afternoon. My right hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Denham), welcomed, and has been a keen advocate of, the idea that pubs and clubs should make a financial contribution if a disproportionate amount of disorder is caused in their area. That idea is welcome. Having said that, the scheme is not just about the cash; those pubs and clubs have to get involved in an action plan with local authorities in the area to deal with the problem. That is at least as important as the money raised, because it forces the pubs and clubs to deal with the issue in practice. That is a new power that we hope will make a difference.

It is undeniable that alcohol consumption is changing the character of many of our towns and cities, certainly at night, but we should not just dismiss the issue as a problem. People have a legitimate right to go out and enjoy themselves, and it is important to remember that. Also, there are many jobs involved in the night-time economy, and that is an important consideration. Clearly, these are massive issues that have to be grasped by local authorities, the people who run transport, the police and so on. The industry, too, has to step up to the plate and meet its responsibilities. I am pleased to say to hon. Members that I think that the industry has begun to engage with its responsibilities in a more constructive way in recent months.

I warmly welcome the principles and standards document that the alcohol industry produced. It makes clear to its members the responsible way in which they ought to behave. They should not be selling alcohol to drunks or children. It is not only wrong, but against the law, and they have a responsibility to make sure that they do not do it.

Graham Stringer: Is my hon. Friend as concerned as I am that the police are still taking very little effective action against landlords who sell to under-age drinkers and drunks? What will he do about it?

Paul Goggins: I heard my hon. Friend's comments on the subject earlier, and think that all of us have to pay greater attention to such matters. They are not just morally wrong but against the law, and we all have a responsibility. I expect the police and those who retail alcohol to take those issues more seriously. In discussions with the supermarket chains before Christmas, the Home Secretary and I, along with others, agreed on the objective of eradicating sales of alcohol to children. The supermarkets have voluntarily set out to achieve that over the next year. That is the way to go; we must set standards higher and make sure that the law is properly enforced. I agree with my hon. Friend that the police need to be fully engaged with that. There should be prosecutions, where appropriate.

The new licensing laws have been caricatured as being simply about loosening the controls, but used properly, many of the powers give greater control to revoke and review licences. We intend them to be used correctly.

Over Christmas and the new year we had the third of the alcohol misuse enforcement campaigns. Central to that was the test-purchase arrangements: people going to retail locations and testing whether those places are selling alcohol to children. We will publish those results, and the wider results of the AMEC, in the near future. I am pleased that, anecdotally, it seems that the introduction of the new powers has gone reasonably smoothly. That should not deceive us into thinking that the problem has gone away—it has not. It is still there to be tackled, and we must be vigilant in doing so. We will continue to monitor all of those things carefully.

I must say to the hon. Member for Banbury (Tony Baldry) that it is both unfair and unacceptable that cases do not proceed simply because the prosecution is not available. If people feel that they have been denied justice, that is unacceptable. In general terms, we are constantly pursuing a more effective, efficient system and administration of justice, to ensure that the courts system works properly. I hope that he will be encouraged to know that there are increasing numbers of specialist antisocial behaviour prosecutors.

I must say to my hon. Friend the Member for Keighley that the training of magistrates is not just an important idea—it is mandatory. They should be receiving proper training. We are developing antisocial behaviour courts, so that specialist well-trained magistrates are in a position to deal appropriately with the cases.

Remarks were made about the number of community support officers, which will continue to increase up to the 24,000 that we promised by 2008. We talked about the breach rate. The majority of cases in which ASBOs are put in place are successful. The use of the term "breach" means that an order is being enforced. We should all be encouraged by that. We will continue to work on an evidence base. It will, not least, be informed by my right hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Itchen and the members of the Committee. Once again, I must say how welcome the report is.

Question put and agreed to.

[MR. BILL OLNER in the Chair]

Rail Travel (South-east)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Claire Ward.]

9.30 am

Sandra Gidley (Romsey) (LD): I am pleased to have the opportunity to debate issues relating to rail travel in the south-east. I am a regular user of the services myself and I am a great fan of rail travel. I want to put that on the record because, inevitably, we tend to focus on negative points during these debates. I had thought that more hon. Members would be here today because problems exist throughout the country. The fact that there are not perhaps means that there is more satisfaction with rail services than the press leads us to believe.

I asked for this debate after local issues came to my notice as a result of the retendering of the south-western train franchise. The key issue in the Romsey constituency and in the neighbouring constituency of Eastleigh is the proposed curtailment of the Chandler's Ford service. Unfortunately, my hon. Friend the Member for Eastleigh (Chris Huhne) cannot be with us today owing to a prior commitment, but he would very much liked to have been here.

Other hon. Members have concerns about their services, but I shall leave it to them to raise the details of their localities. I would also like to talk about a few general issues such as the barriers to increased train usage: fares, problems with car parking, capacity and inadequate integration with existing transport networks. The latter includes lack of provision for cyclists and the difficulties of integrating that.

I shall begin with the retendering of the south-western train franchise. Before I come to the local difficulty, I should point out that one positive aspect of that service is the extension of many of the Waterloo to Southampton Central trains so that they travel onwards to Bournemouth and Poole. That will be welcomed by the increasing number of commuters who live beyond Southampton and who have a relatively reduced train service at the moment.

However, as always in these debates, we concentrate on the problems, and the big problem is the plan to truncate the Romsey to Totton passenger rail service, replacing it with a Romsey to Eastleigh shuttle. That plan has certain knock-on effects. To provide some background, I should explain that this rail route is very new. It opened in May 2003 and the justification for opening it at the time was that the area surrounding Chandler's Ford station has the fourth highest population catchment per station in Hampshire. It was a high-profile opening—our local celebrity Charlie Dimmock came along—and everyone was positive about it; many local councillors of all parties had fought for it for some time. The project was so successful that it was shortlisted for a national transport award in 2004. All looked well, particularly because passenger usage exceeded the target set. It seems somewhat perverse to me that we are planning to get rid of something that is exceeding its targets—the world works in strange ways sometimes.

At the moment, 1,500 people a week use the service from Chandler's Ford. Many go to Southampton and beyond, and some travel in the other direction to Romsey. When the system changes, many people using the existing line will have to change trains at least once to make the same journey, which will be a barrier. A public meeting on the matter was held just after Christmas. I did not think many people would attend because there had only been a few days in which to publicise it, and trains do not usually attract quite so much attention as health, but the meeting was packed. It is worth raising with the Minister a number of points made in the meeting.

The train network could lose passengers. It was pointed out that three quarters of the passengers who use the service travel beyond Eastleigh or Romsey, which are the end points of the service mentioned in the franchise document, and simply would not use the train if they had to change at Eastleigh, or could not go directly to Southampton Airport Parkway to catch the fast train to London.

The franchise document suggested that the termination of the service would reduce congestion in the rail network around Southampton. However, the changes imply that the Romsey to Eastleigh shuttle would occupy Eastleigh or Romsey platforms for up to 25 minutes per hour and it would double the number of times that the main line would have to be crossed at Eastleigh. That could have a greater impact on main-line passengers and cause more delays to main-line passengers and freight trains at both stations.

The change would not reduce the number of trains terminating at Southampton, because the Chandler's Ford train currently terminates at Totton. Indeed, it would probably add to the existing problems. The other proposals of the Department for Transport for trains currently terminating at Southampton to continue to Bournemouth would reduce congestion at Southampton far more than the removal of the Chandler's Ford service. One suggestion in the document will address the congestion problem, but those who understand rail movement far more than I do tell me that the change will not positively affect it in any way. It will have a negative effect. It was also pointed out that the First Great Western franchise has included services with far lower passenger numbers than that service. There is, therefore, a precedent for supporting worthwhile services in the refranchising process. Others pointed out that cost savings—if it were a matter of cost—could be achieved by leasing types of train that are more suited to local operation, rather than the high-speed, air-conditioned trains used at the moment.

There has been support from all political quarters for the retention of the rail line. The leader of Hampshire county council, Ken Thornber, wrote a letter to the south-western franchise replacement consultation manager about the matter. It is worth pointing out that

[Sandra Gidley]

Hampshire county council invested a significant amount of money in the station and the opening of the line. Ken Thornber's letter states:

"We know from surveys that prior to the station opening, 41 per cent. of Chandler's Ford's customers previously travelled by car and 35 per cent. by bus. It would be a disastrous blow to public transport in South Hampshire if the service at Chandler's Ford became so unattractive that newly won customers were to abandon the railway and add to the congestion on our local roads."

If the Minister has ever visited the area, he will understand the problems of congestion on our roads. The letter continues:

"Moreover it would send entirely the wrong signals about the relevance of public transport generally in modern society.

Hampshire County Council, as owners of the station—which received funding through local development and from council funds of more than £3 million—has a vested interest in the continuing success of this station. The downgrading of the service which is proposed in the Consultation Document is frankly unacceptable.

The County Council believes that providing good viable alternatives and taking cars off the road wherever possible is a good thing—for commuters, for residents and for the environment and this was the motivation behind our substantial investment in constructing Chandler's Ford station.

If the changes proposed for the Romsey-Totton service do go ahead despite our protests, and those of neighbouring local authorities concerned, the County Council's role in supporting rail initiatives will be difficult to sanction."

The Minister should know there were representatives from Eastleigh borough council, Test Valley borough council and Southampton city council at the meeting, all of which are under different flavours of political control, and all of which are concerned about the future of the route.

Ken Thornber goes on to say:

"Its future relationship and stakeholder role with the rail industry is considered valuable and I would not wish to jeopardise this in the longer term. As it is, we feel profoundly let down over Chandler's Ford, given the commitment we have shown over the project, both in constructing the station and since it opened."

That is not the view of just Hampshire county council. The Hampshire Economic Partnership stated:

"Rail passenger journey times will be extended with a decrease in reliability due to the need to change trains in Eastleigh", which obviously has an impact on how people choose to get to work. It also points out that businesses have relocated to Chandler's Ford because of the new rail service, which serves a large employment area in the vicinity of the new station. Existing employees can travel to Chandler's Ford more easily and there are some quite significant business parks close to the station as well. The Hampshire Economic Partnership concluded:

"Removing the through service will lead to business closures as employees move away due to poor access to transport".

Its assessment has shown that the rail service at Chandler's Ford

"has removed 3,000 car movements per week from local roads".

It makes the points about congestion, as well.

There are further concerns. A recent debate in Westminster Hall highlighted some of the issues relating to the south-east plan and PUSH—the Partnership for Urban South Hampshire. The point made strongly in that debate was that unless the infrastructure was put in place—particularly road and rail infrastructures, and some of the support services—it was difficult to see how the proposed new housing build could be sustainable.

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): I congratulate the hon. Lady on securing an important debate. Some Members may not be here today because they are stuck on trains. The point that she is making about the development of her area and the extra houses and infrastructure is exactly the problem that we face north of the river in Wellingborough. Wellingborough is almost becoming a part of the south-east. A road to the station and 8,000 houses are being built, but the rail service is not being improved, even though it is busy at the moment.

Sandra Gidley: Later, I want to return briefly to the point that often the road and rail networks are not properly integrated and there does not seem to be any great strategic overview. The approach is bitty and fragmented. Clearly, we are not alone in my part of the south-east in having these problems.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): The hon. Lady is talking about the integration of rail and other services. I frequently travel on the midland mainline. It is an excellent service; it was the first to recover after the Hatfield rail disaster. It serves substantial parts of the north-east and Luton. Will she pay tribute to the frequency and reliability of that service, particularly as it integrates very well with Luton airport, which is a major airport serving the south-east, the midlands and wider parts of England?

Sandra Gidley: I would find it difficult to pay tribute to a service that I have not used, but the hon. Gentleman has already done so through his intervention, and his words probably bear more weight that mine in that context.

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): I thought that while the hon. Lady was taking interventions it would be wise for me to speak about the south-east. Canvey Island is in the south-east. She is addressing the important question of capacity and fixed infrastructure, rather than rolling stock, but there is an area where the two coincide. While I have the Minister's attention, I would like to ask whether the hon. Lady knows whether the Government intend to invest in extending platforms so that trains can run with more carriages and capacity can be increased, and also whether she is aware that Canvey Island is one of the largest communities—44,000 people live on it—without a rail service. It would be easy to stick a terminal line from the c2c line on to Canvey Island with a terminus station there, which would help to serve—

Mr. Bill Olner (in the Chair): Order. That is getting beyond the scope of an intervention. The hon. Gentleman may catch my eye later.

Sandra Gidley: I am afraid that I have no intimate knowledge of Canvey Island, but I hope that the Minister will address the points that have been made. On the route that I use most frequently—Waterloo to Southampton Airport Parkway—the train sometimes stops at a station with short platforms and announcements have to be made, so clearly there are many areas where improvements could be made to the existing infrastructure.

I return to PUSH, in the context of which others have raised significant concerns. We must look at where housing growth is planned and ensure that the rail and road infrastructures match that growth. It seems perverse to reduce a service in an area of particularly dense housing. An expansion of Southampton International airport is also proposed, which will require enhanced rail access, not a reduction in services.

All those points are supported on a cross-party basis. I want the Minister to look into the proposal very carefully. I do not pretend to be a complete expert on train movements. I freely admit that I leave that to others. However, will the Minister commit to meeting me and some of the people who know the local rail service like the back of their hands to discuss fully the flaws in what is planned in the franchise document? It is not just a case of people losing a service that they need to access employment and that they have chosen to use to reduce the impact on the environment; there are wider implications.

I want to talk briefly about some of the barriers to train usage, one of which must be cost. Although some routes are regulated, I noticed that there was a large hike at the beginning of the year in the price of fares from local stations into London. Some commuters have told me that that has made them rethink how they can afford to travel to work.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): I congratulate the hon. Lady on securing the debate. She is quite right to say that cost is a barrier to train use. We should also consider the service that people get for the cost that they pay. A constituent of mine, Mr. Lynn Wilson, wrote to me to say that he had a first class ticket to travel from Kettering to London St. Pancras just before Christmas, but he had to stand all the way because the train was overcrowded and there were not sufficient carriages. Does the hon. Lady she share my belief that if commuters pay high prices they at least expect to get a seat?

Sandra Gidley: That is a major concern. Some work done—by the City of London, I think—has shown that overcrowding on trains entering London has increased quite significantly. Clearly, that needs to be addressed. When the Minister sums up, hopefully he will indicate how the problem will be dealt with and what the Government input will be.

One of the most peculiar barriers to rail transport is the ability to find a car parking space at many local stations. An e-mail that I received from one of my constituents stated:

"I know you have experienced the same problems which we (from villages) all face over parking at stations in our area."

He knows that, because I have a blog. At one stage, I went on about the problem at great length—probably at far greater length than was healthy. The e-mail continues:

"Over the years I have tried all of Southampton (Central and Parkway), Winchester, Grateley and even Mottisfont and Romsey, and (in emergency on failing in Winchester) Basingstoke. Often station car parks are full, one ends up in the suburbs beyond the yellow lines, running or walking a long way and becoming hot and late in the process. It is glaringly obvious that more capacity is needed (if village people are ever to get out of our cars) and that one way of providing this is multi-storey car parks. Meanwhile local authorities like Winchester City"—

I do not think it is not fair to pick on Winchester in particular, because all local authorities seem to be as one on the matter—

"reportedly reject increases in capacity, failing to recognise that their railway station belongs as much to their hinterland as to the city itself. I don't think I need to go on—you must be aware of the arguments!"

The point about capacity is true; I have experienced it. At some local stations, unless one arrives before 8 o'clock in the morning, one simply cannot get a car parking space. I remember one occasion when I had an appointment in London later in the day. I drove from Southampton Central to Southampton Airport Parkway to Winchester, and none of those stations had a single car parking space left. Although there are plans to improve parking at Southampton Airport Parkway, the issue crops up at many other stations in the area.

That issue is linked to the notion that one could take the bus instead of driving one's car to the station. Perhaps one could—if the routes were integrated. They are not, however, and that is another barrier to using the network. The lack of integration means that if buses and train times do not co-ordinate, one may have to hang around for up to three quarters of an hour, depending on the route, in order to catch a train. Or, perversely, if one is late and misses the train, one may have to wait for an hour on a cold, dark station at night. Again, no one seems to have a strategic overview. I have to say that Hampshire county council has been willing to listen on occasion when mistakes have been made and services that did coincide were suddenly changed for no apparent reason. However, there seems to be no onus on anybody to address the problem more holistically.

I receive a lot of correspondence about provision for cyclists. Some people would be happy to cycle to the station, take their bike on the train and cycle at the other end. However, train operators on many routes do not allow cycles at certain times of the day. Not all cyclists are lonely people who cycle by themselves, so if one is part of a group it is well nigh impossible to combine any cycling experience with rail travel. The issue is dealt with much better in some continental countries, and I wonder why we cannot crack the problem in this country.

Tom Brake (Carshalton and Wallington) (LD): Is my hon. Friend aware that, according to our research, two thirds of train services coming into London at peak times do not allow cycles? Does she agree that there is an issue with secure cycle places at stations? Many people travel with their bikes, but they do not want to leave them at the station because they are concerned about losing them.

Sandra Gidley: I had not realised that the figure was quite as bad as my hon. Friend suggests, but I am sure that his research is accurate. I speak only about the services from the neck of my woods, but if my experience is replicated, his research would represent an accurate picture. Secure cycle storage provision would go some way to addressing the problem: it would increase the number of people who cycle only at one end of their journey, because they are content to leave their bike at the station.

The other big bugbear for some of my constituents is the lack of disabled access. The Disability Discrimination Act 2005 has come into force, and it seems strange that more effort has not been made to ensure that our stations are fully compliant with its terms. It would be helpful if the Minister in his summing up outlined whether there is a date by which all stations must be compliant and whether there are any mechanisms to help to achieve that. Some of my constituents undertake complex journeys that would be relatively simple if they did not use a wheelchair.

David Taylor: I am pleased to hear the hon. Lady's near-comprehensive list of barriers to increased rail patronage, particularly the point about cycling, given that some stations have a Tie Rack but no bike rack. I should appreciate her response to one point that she has yet to include on her list. Would she care to say a word or two about those people who have concerns about their personal security when using the rail network, particularly at night, because of unstaffed stations and inadequate lighting?

Sandra Gidley: The hon. Gentleman makes a good point. As somebody who uses the rail service late at night, I generally feel relatively secure. However, there are instances on a train when one can feel vulnerable, although that is probably no different from anywhere else. If I know that I am coming back late at night, I choose carefully the station to which I return, ensuring that it is well lit and that I do not have to return to a darkened area to get into my car. Although some of my local stations have been upgraded, I am less keen to use others, precisely because of the problem that the hon. Gentleman raises. If the Minister could mention any planned improvements in that regard, it would be helpful.

I received a briefing from the City of London corporation. It is worth pointing out some of its concerns, because they echo points that I have made. The economic viability of the City of London and its ability to attract the work force that it needs is an important consideration. The corporation says:

"The retendering of the South Western Trains franchise poses important opportunities for both the City and areas such as Hampshire and Surrey to press for the improvements required. The significant number of commuters travelling from Hampshire and Surrey to the City by rail is indicated by figures showing that 16,000 people make their way from Waterloo (being Hampshire and Surrey's terminus) to the City on the Waterloo & City line in the morning peak. The City Corporation has made representations in support of the need to address overcrowding by running additional trains and increasing the number of carriages. With Waterloo forecast to exceed its passenger capacity by 2012, the opportunity to expand platform capacity presented by the vacation of Waterloo International by Eurostar must not be missed."

It would be helpful if the Minister could touch on that final point.

Dr. Andrew Murrison (Westbury) (Con): The City of London corporation is quite right to complain about the lack of direct services to London Waterloo, because it affects my constituents as it affects those of the hon. Lady. Does she share my surprise that the Government have backtracked on the network utilisation strategy and the promises made by the Minister's predecessor about the enhancement of service? I am not sure whether that move relates to the Chandler's Ford to Southampton service, but it certainly relates to the Waterloo to Bristol service, which stops at west Wiltshire towns in my constituency.

Sandra Gidley: Again, I am not familiar with the route that the hon. Gentleman mentions, but the proposals in the franchise document backtrack on the original proposals. Other routes are affected, too. One problem with the train companies is that they sometimes think that the solution is to run fewer trains so that they are not held up so frequently. There is a capacity problem on the rail network, which greater brains than mine do not seem capable of sorting out. The City of London corporation rightly points out that we must sort out some of those general capacity problems. Their resolution would have a knock-on effect on those services to the hon. Gentleman's constituency.

The corporation makes a further point:

"Rail services should be of high quality. Improvements in rolling-stock and a move to designing trains for different types of route should be welcomed."

It talks about accurate, real-time information, which would be useful to passengers, and it also makes a point about improving station environments:

"Improvements need to be made to the system for booking assisted travel to make it simpler and more reliable so that passengers requiring assistance can travel with confidence."

From speaking to some of my constituents who need assistance, I know that when the service works well, it is very good and they have nothing but praise for it. However, the service is patchy, depending on which members of staff people come across on the day.

City businesses consistently rank transport problems, including delays and overcrowding, among their major concerns. A detailed study calculated that transport delays cost City businesses £230 million a year and their employees £100 million in lost leisure time. Reliability of train services must be improved to tackle that.

I started by speaking about a small local difficulty, but clearly there are problems on the network that have a much more widespread impact—a national impact, in fact—and I would appreciate it if the Minister dealt with some of those points when summing up the debate.

10 am

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): I, too, congratulate the hon. Member for Romsey (Sandra Gidley) on securing the debate and on her contribution. I have the privilege of representing Kettering, in Northamptonshire. In case the Minister feels that Kettering is not in the south-east, I should say that it represents the greater south-east, because it is included as one of the growth areas in the housing expansion agenda of the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister. I therefore feel that I have every right to speak in this debate. Also, trains from Kettering travel through genuine south-east towns, such as Bedford and Luton, and many of my constituents suffer problems in relation to those trains.

I thank all those constituents who work on the local railways and on the midland main line in particular, all the staff at Kettering railway station, and all the drivers and crew. Midland Mainline is the franchise operator for the train service through Kettering, and it is fair to say that that is a good service. I have been travelling on the line since 1999. I was a regular commuter for many years before arriving in this place, and it is fair to say that, five or six years ago, the service was horrendous. As a daily commuter, I often arrived home late in the evening because of lack of trains, overcrowding and so on.

David Taylor: I use the same services as the hon. Gentleman. Is he not being a little unfair, in that the period he describes was the immediate aftermath of the Hatfield derailment, which caused chaos on railways throughout the land? Will he acknowledge that Midland Mainline, which serves Leicestershire, has improved in numerous ways, not least in respect of doubling services that serve the midlands and which therefore serve towns in the south-east and the northern south-east, if that is where Kettering is located?

Mr. Hollobone: I am grateful for that intervention, but I do not think I am being unfair. We all understand that, after the Hatfield experience, the railways were not operating as they should have been, but a large part of my travelling experience is pre-Hatfield, when the service was pretty dreadful. Thousands of people who are now my constituents were extremely frustrated at the rail service provided to the town.

I shall raise two issues. One is occasional overcrowding on Midland Mainline services and the other the threat to the rail service from the ODPM's growth agenda. There are far too many instances of overcrowding on train services to and from Kettering, particularly on the service that runs between Kettering and London St. Pancras. Normally, that journey should take about an hour, and it is fair to say that punctuality is pretty good. However, most people would regard it as reasonable that, if they buy a train ticket for a journey of such length, they should be entitled to a seat. Sadly, that is all too often not the case, which is unacceptable.

As I mentioned earlier, Mr. Lynn Wilson wrote to me, detailing his tragic travelling experience on Thursday 20 December, when he purchased a first-class rail ticket for the journey from Kettering to London St. Pancras and had to stand all the way—for an hour. The next station down the line is Wellingborough. Mr. Wilson says:

"The train was very full when I got on, with around a dozen people, men and women of all ages, standing due to lack of seating capacity, including myself.

After the Wellingborough stop the situation was three times worse with people standing the carriage length and by the toilets and exit doors. Just how that conforms with Health & Safety regulations I have no idea, but moving up and down the carriage was practically impossible."

Tom Brake: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that, soon after coming to power in 1997, the Government introduced legislation covering the transport of animals and the space available for them? They have yet to introduce similar legislation on the transport of passengers.

Mr. Bill Olner (in the Chair): I hope that the hon. Gentleman is not referring to people who travel on trains in the south-east as animals.

Tom Brake: Of course not, Mr. Olner.

Mr. Hollobone: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his intervention. Commuters on far too many train services in the south-east sometimes feel as though they are packed into cattle wagons. I had a similar experience on Friday. Travelling back to Kettering after the Adjournment debate in the House, I got the 5.30 pm service from St. Pancras. I travel second class: I choose to do that on my parliamentary allowances so that I can share my constituents' pain when they have to stand all the way. I had to stand for 40 minutes, all the way to Bedford, because there was not one spare seat on the train. That is unacceptable. There were tens of my constituents standing for 40 minutes, which is far too long.

I hope that the Minister takes these points on board when it comes to the renewal of the franchise arrangements, particularly with regard to Midland Mainline. In the 21st century, surely it is possible to devise a system whereby if someone buys a train ticket for an hour-long journey to or from London, they are entitled to a seat all the way.

My final point is about the expansion of Kettering as part of the ODPM's Milton Keynes and south midlands sub-regional growth strategy. The ODPM wants to build 13,100—

Mr. Bill Olner (in the Chair): Order. I have given the hon. Gentleman some leeway, because there is an interconnection with the train services, but this debate is on trains in the south-east. I know where Kettering is geographically, and I have to say, with the best will in the world, that he is straying pretty well off the mark. Also, we are talking about railways, not housing.

Mr. Hollobone: May I endeavour to bring myself back on track, Mr. Olner? Given that there is already overcrowding on some key services, residents in Kettering are concerned about how Midland Mainline will cope when the population of Kettering goes up by about one third within 20 years. There is a genuine concern that local train services simply will not be able to cope with the expansion in the local population. Local residents want an increase in the number of coaches available on the existing service to give them some comfort that, when the population growth comes along, there will be proper train service provision for local people.

Finally, I need to make an apology, Mr. Olner. I am interested in the debate and would very much like to stay for the rest of it, but the Committee considering the Animal Welfare Bill will drag me away at about 10.30 am. I appreciate your indulgence today.

10.10 am

Dr. Andrew Murrison (Westbury) (Con): I congratulate the hon. Member for Romsey (Sandra Gidley) on securing this debate. She and I share an interest in the subject, because what we are largely talking about today is the post-South West Trains franchise that will run from February 2007. In truth, there are no real frontiers when it comes to the franchise in the areas that she and I serve. They are very much interconnected and will suffer, I fear, unless the Minister is prepared to allow some smaller services to continue post-February 2007. He knows that I have corresponded with his office on the matter, and I hope he will meet me and some of my concerned constituents, who are worried about the post-February 2007 franchise.

My particular interest lies with the London Waterloo to Bristol service, which stops at stations in Surrey, Hampshire and Wiltshire before finding its way to Bristol. It is a good example of a direct service that has been well served by the public in the past, and if it were to be enhanced, it would go some small way towards discharging the aspirations laid out in the 10-year transport plan, about which we hear so little these days—I wonder why.

The hon. Lady mentioned the Chandler's Ford to Southampton service, which is in many ways similar to the one about which I am concerned. The closure of those services will reduce the number of people who opt to travel by train rather than take their cars. We talk about multi-modal transport and car parks are very important, but overall, we must reduce the number of people travelling on roads. Trains seem to be the way to do that, but we must make it attractive for people to travel by train.

We cannot just say to people, "Here's a train, but you will have to change several times to get to your destination." They simply will not buy that. We must make trains attractive to people. I fear that, with the refranchising exercise under way, there will not be that ability for train operating companies to make their service attractive to customers. That is a pity, and it will certainly defenestrate, if that were necessary, the 10-year transport plan.

I am particularly upset because the June 2003 network utilisation strategy seemed to be quite promising in the context of the forthcoming refranchising exercise, which is now just around the corner. It certainly looked fairly good for my constituents, and my subsequent meetings with the Minister and his predecessors suggested that the service was going to be enhanced. That was the promise, and we were looking forward to it. Then, all of a sudden, there appeared to be a complete volte-face. We now find that the service is not in the post-February 2007 requirements, and it looks like it may be stopped once again.

The Minister's predecessor, wisely in my view, brought the service back. However, I found it interesting that the passenger usage survey was done shortly after the service restarted. Those are the figures on which the Department for Transport is now relying to make its assessment. That is a pity: methodologically, this is problematic because there is a stop-start service and people will get out of the habit of using it, and figures will be artificially deflated.

I hope that the Minister will look critically at those figures before making a final determination on whether that service should continue. I certainly recommend to him, en passant, the figures produced by the West Wiltshire rail users group, which are different from those compiled by the Department. My spies tell me that it is considering conducting more passenger user surveys on that route. If it is, I welcome that. If the surveys are done properly, they will paint a picture different from the one that I think the Minister has for that service.

That is all I want to say. I hope the Minister agrees to meet me and my constituents to discuss the London Waterloo to Bristol service, which stops at intermediate stations in four counties and is of great importance to much of the public in the south-east and south-west.

10.14 am

Tom Brake (Carshalton and Wallington) (LD): May I start by welcoming this debate, secured by my hon. Friend the Member for Romsey (Sandra Gidley)? She has raised a number of matters that are clearly of great concern to her constituents, as have other hon. Members, and I want to comment briefly on some of those points. First, on overcrowding, which has been raised by a number of hon. Members, it is worth reminding ourselves that the figures that are calculated relate only to London and Edinburgh. There are no statistics on overcrowding outside those two areas. Secondly, overcrowding figures do not take into account the number of people who are left standing on a platform as a very crowded train goes through. That is an area that the Government must consider.

Sandra Gidley: I apologise for intervening as I have had a lot of time in which to speak, but concerns have been raised about the possibility of injury on overcrowded trains. When I tabled a parliamentary question on the matter, the response was to the effect that people get a different sort of injury. It was very vague about whether there are any risks and I am unclear about whether any work has been done on that. Does my hon. Friend have any knowledge on that subject?

Tom Brake: I thank my hon. Friend for that helpful intervention. She may recall that a year or so ago I had a constituency case involving a woman who was travelling on a very overcrowded train and who believes that she suffered a miscarriage as a result. There is evidence to suggest that, although the types of injury may be different, in practice, people on overcrowded trains are suffering injuries. It is difficult to calculate the statistics on that, because people do not often report them, but at the very least, I am sure that my hon. Friend and other hon. Members will have witnessed people having to get off an overcrowded train because they are starting to feel too claustrophobic and cannot continue their journey. That is a significant issue that is not being properly addressed.

My hon. Friend also mentioned disability access, and I want to put on record yet another example of the frustration that commuters feel about that. At Sutton station, which I use regularly, one exit—the one closest to the car park—has never been opened. Commuters are not allowed to use it because there are no staff to open it. That has been going on for many years, and there seems to be no prospect of that exit, or entrance, being opened to allow people, particularly those with disabilities, to get from the car park into the station.

Secure or safe stations have also been mentioned. There are some interesting statistics that show, for instance, that one in five people would make more journeys if they felt safer. I understand—perhaps the Minister can confirm this—that the Government's secure stations initiative is going backwards in terms of the number of stations that have qualified. There has been a recent change to the requirements with which stations have to comply to obtain secure station status. I understand that that has to do with the market research that the operators have to conduct with their customers to ascertain whether people feel safe. That might kick-start the programme so that more stations achieve that status, but the initiative is going backwards at present.

More generally, hon. Members have rightly focused on their constituencies, but it is appropriate to raise some wider issues. I want to consider three key matters: aspects of the south-western franchise; Crossrail, because no debate on rail in the south-east can take place without a brief discussion of that; and South Eastern Trains and the integrated Kent franchise. I hope, Mr. Olner, that you accept that those are all in the common definition of the south-east.

Mr. Bill Olner (in the Chair): We are expecting the Minister to give a comprehensive response, so I hope the hon. Gentleman keeps his eye on the clock.

Tom Brake: I shall do that and keep my remarks to less than 10 minutes so that the Minister has at least 20 minutes, if not more, to respond in detail to all the points that have been raised.

It is proposed that the south-western franchise will last 10 years. Does the Minister believe that that is sufficient time to allow the investment that will be required to deal with some overcrowding issues? He and the Secretary of State have talked at length about double-decker trains, for example. Will a 10-year franchise allow for that investment? I suspect not.

Furthermore, I hope that the Minister says a little about how he sees the balance between fare increases to pay for services and a reducing subsidy. He will no doubt be aware of an article on saver fares that appeared in The Times on 20 January. As hon. Members know, such fares are available on all longer distance routes, but can be used only outside peak hours. There is a price cap on them, but the article said:

"Train companies have persuaded ministers that they will require less subsidy and attract more passengers if they are given more control over fares."

Are the saver fares safe in the Government's hands or, as the report suggests, are they about to be jettisoned to allow the train operating companies to increase fares significantly?

For people who want to turn up and go, there some extremely expensive fares for travelling from A to B—about £200 for return journeys if the tickets are purchased on the day. Does the Minister agree that the price increases are about managing demand on overcrowded trains? That is the view of Christian Wolmar, a well-respected expert in transport matters. As he believes, and this would be fairly easy to quantify, one effect of the high fares is to switch people on to the roads, thereby increasing road congestion.

I want the Minister to respond on a further point, which is significant and pertinent to rail services in the south-east: have the Government considered how they undertake cost-benefit analysis of rail projects and the value of those projects to the economy? In other countries, in Europe in particular, greater weight is given to other factors such as the ability of rail projects to relieve congestion and to regenerate rural areas.

What does the Minister expect the south-western franchise to deliver in respect of overcrowding? What will the Government be seeking? During morning and evening rush hours, the number of people travelling on main commuter lines in and out of London—many of whom are from the south-east—in excess of the recommended train capacity has increased by no less than 53 per cent. since 1996. Overall, according to the latest figures, 2.9 per cent. of people travelling on the main commuter lines in and out of London were in excess of capacity, which is the Government's official definition of overcrowding.

As I have said, those in excess of capacity figures do not take into account the people left stranded on the platform. At peak hours in the morning as I travel in from Wallington—sometimes I get a seat, sometimes I do not—the further down the line we go, the more passengers are left stranded on the platform unable to get on the train. Incidentally, the figure for South West Trains passengers who are travelling in excess of capacity in the morning peak is 6.8 per cent.—one of the highest overall.

The Minister and the Secretary of State have referred to double-decker trains as a possible way to sort out overcrowding problems. It has been reported that Network Rail has been told by the Government that all future engineering projects must take double-decker trains into account. Can the Minister confirm whether that is so? Moreover, apparently there have been informal talks between the Department for Transport, Network Rail and the train operating companies about where the double-decker rolling stock could be used. What preliminary thoughts do he and the Government have on where that stock could be used?

The bids that will be made for the south-western franchise are being developed at the same time as the route utilisation strategy issued by Network Rail that covers services from Waterloo station. Will the Minister explain how those two processes interlink, as it is not immediately clear how that happens? On the one hand, Network Rail has issued a shopping list of what it wants to do; on the other, we have the bidding process for the south-western franchise. I want reassurance that those two processes meet in the middle.

Crossrail is an important transport project that will have a significant impact on rail services in the south-east, London and beyond. We cannot debate rail in the south-east without giving the Minister yet another opportunity, which has been declined on many occasions, to say where the funding for Crossrail will come from. A couple of weeks ago, we debated the instructions to the Select Committee when the matter was raised, but he did not use that opportunity to reply to us.

[Tom Brake]

The project has been kicked into the long grass. The answer is hiding behind Sir Michael Lyons's review, although perhaps the Minister can put on the record the fact that, apparently, Sir Michael Lyons has not been asked specifically to consider Crossrail as part of the review. How are the two matters linked if Sir Michael Lyons has not been asked to look at Crossrail? It is a pity—

Mr. Bill Olner (in the Chair): Order. The Crossrail Bill is going through its legislative process in Parliament, so the debate on Crossrail takes place within those discussions.

Tom Brake: Thank you, Mr. Olner. I shall conclude my remarks on Crossrail by saying that, because it is central to rail in the south-east, we need feedback from the Government on whether it will happen and whether funding will ever be available for the project.

I have an ideological question about South Eastern Trains. I know that the Government do not like ideological questions, but it concerns the reason the Strategic Rail Authority gave for not allowing the South Eastern Trains management team to bid for the integrated Kent franchise. I am about to refer to the SRA, but clearly it and the Government were one in the same thing in this respect. It has been stated that the SRA decided that the South Eastern Trains management team "should not put a bid together, because this might have distracted it from running existing services."

The same is true of all those who are bidding for the integrated Kent franchise. They have all had to use their management teams to spend time and effort on that, as opposed to running existing services in other parts of the country. Therefore, that is a feeble reason for taking such action.

Will the Minister explain why the Government were not willing to allow healthy competition between a publicly run South Eastern Trains, which according to commuters who use the service improved it significantly when it took it over, and the private sector, so that we could make concrete comparisons between the two? It seems that that was an ideological decision taken by the Government. They were not going to allow the public sector to compete in that way, which is extremely regrettable.

I hope, but do not have much confidence, that the Minister will respond to that point, which is of interest. Generally, commuters would have liked a public sector operator to operate a service, so that they could make comparisons with the private sector and see which did things better. That way, the two sectors could learn from each other and we could all benefit.

To conclude, I will listen carefully to the Minister's reply to establish whether there is any prospect that, in the next decade, the issues of overcrowding, undercapacity and unreliability of rail services in the south-east will be addressed. If he can give no such guarantee, the future for commuters in the south-east is extremely bleak.

Stephen Hammond (Wimbledon) (Con): This has been an interesting and important debate. I am aware of your stricture that we should give the Minister 20 minutes in which to respond, Mr. Olner, and I shall try to allow him that much time.

In this debate, we have already covered the wide definition of the south-east, as well as a number of problems that rail travellers in the south-east face, including overcrowding, disability access, fares, security and—perhaps most importantly—capacity. However, we ought to give some context: the railways now carry 30 per cent. more passengers than they did 40 years ago, on a 40 per cent. smaller network. In recent years, billions of pounds have been spent on headline rail projects, such as the west coast main line upgrade and the channel tunnel rail link. Also, the Government promise to spend in excess of £15 billion on Crossrail. The hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Tom Brake) rehearsed some of the arguments on that subject, and we look forward to hearing assurances from the Minister. Also, I understand that the Government talk of spending more money on a London to Edinburgh high-speed link.

Those projects are undoubtedly crucial, but they tend to overshadow their less glamorous relatives—the south-east network and, in particular, the workhorse commuter services. That section of the network delivers 120,000 people into the economic heart of this country every weekday morning. Also, local services around regional centres, such as those mentioned by the hon. Member for Romsey (Sandra Gidley) and my hon. Friend the Member for Westbury (Dr. Murrison), take people into centres such as Bristol, Southampton, Reading, Croydon and Brighton. Those commuters are increasingly packed on to overcrowded trains.

The Minister will be aware that the Office of Rail Regulation has forecast a nationwide 28 per cent. increase in rail usage by 2014. That looks to be a particularly grim experience, given that it is suggested that the increase in capacity in that period will be in the order of 2 per cent.

Many hon. Members touched on the misery of passengers having to pay fare increases that are well above inflation. That would all be very well if the extra money went into improvements but, as it is, punctuality is just about returning to pre-Hatfield levels. It is clear that on some routes—the Minister may wish to comment on this—punctuality is improving only because journey times, and timetables, have been lengthened significantly. That has been confirmed, to the Minister and to many of us, by London TravelWatch.

One of our principal concerns—and the focus of this debate, which was secured by the hon. Member for Romsey—is rail services in the south-east and local services. The Department for Transport said in its consultation document for the new south-western train franchise that such services can be underused and that services nearer to London could make better use of capacity if local services were cut back. That is an interesting argument, but there is also an argument that if the Government persuaded Network Rail and franchisees to run a hub-and-spoke service, those local services, far from being cut back, should be increased.

In the South West Trains franchise area, services under threat include the Reading to Brighton via Winchester service, the Bristol to Salisbury service, the London Waterloo to Plymouth and Paignton services, and, of course, the Chandler's Ford service, which the hon. Member for Romsey mentioned. I am particularly interested in that service, because I was born and raised in Chandler's Ford. I spent the first 11 years of my life there. Then, there was no station. Many of my relatives and friends still live in the hon. Lady's constituency.

Chandler's Ford makes an interesting case study, and it is worth rehearsing some of the hon. Lady's arguments for the Minister. The area has a valuable, local service that is used by 1,500 people a week; 10 or 15 years ago, that would have been impossible. Now, it is proposed that the service be cut. Up to three quarters of those people travel beyond Eastleigh and Romsey, and they would not use the service if they had to change at Eastleigh for Southampton, or if they could not go on to Southampton Parkway to catch onward trains there.

One argument for cutting the service is that it will help to ease congestion in Southampton, but the Chandler's Ford trains terminate at Totton. The problems at Southampton would be much better dealt with if we did not remove the Chandler's Ford service and if trains were allowed to continue on to Bournemouth. Indeed, that is one of the proposals in the Department's document, and I urge the Minister to consider whether that might not be a better way forward than cutting the local service that the hon. Member for Romsey spoke about so eloquently. I look forward to the Minister's response on that point.

If the Government do not support the South Hampshire light rapid transit system, taking the Chandler's Ford to Southampton service off the network will be a double blow. Surely the overall consequences—this is why this case study is so interesting—would be, as elsewhere, increased local car usage, as people would travel to a main-line station or just abandon the rail service. Also, there would be implications for the environment. I look forward to the Minister's response on that case study.

On some of the general points that have been made, the workhorse commuter services, as I described them, get a particularly difficult deal on fares. I asked a question about fares in the House last week. Regulated fares have gone up, on average, by 3.9 per cent.; that is despite the fact that the formula is retail prices index plus one. I note that in December the RPI was at only 2 per cent., so that is an interesting, moot calculation of the formula. Unregulated fares have risen by between 4 and 4.5 per cent., and many fares have risen by more than 8 per cent. One or two fares—this is particularly true of those under the more difficult structure—have trebled because of the abolition of saver tickets. Like the hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington, I hope that the Minister will give some reassurance about saver tickets and the ability to get walk-on fares.

I commend the hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington on his recent report, which says that £10 of commuter spend on railways buys an average of 38 miles of rail traffic. In France, that would get triple that distance. In Slovakia, one would get 350 miles, and in Italy 200 miles. It is interesting that those on the commuter network in the south-east are paying above-average fares for a service that is at best overcrowded and at times completely unacceptable. I shall come back to the issue of overcrowding later.

As was illustrated earlier, the bidding war for franchises has meant that many train operating companies are accepting less subsidy. That would be fine for those paying ticket revenues to the Government if they got increased capacity or punctuality improvements. The Minister will be aware of one service not yet mentioned today: National Express, one of the franchises that took over services in the East Anglia region last year. It connects into the south-east. It is paying the £500 million back to the Government over 10 years out of ticket revenues. Will the Minister comment on representations that he has received from hon. Members, including the right hon. Member for Saffron Walden (Sir Alan Haselhurst), about the problems that the Government are having with that new franchise? The franchisee is saying that there is no money for increased capacity and that there will be no new rolling stock and no extra track capacity. That is particularly important in relation to commuter services in the eastern part of the south-east network, which include services into Cambridge and—perhaps more importantly for the development of the south-east—the fast train to Stansted.

Tom Brake: Is the hon. Gentleman surprised, as I am, that the Government have not considered allowing longer franchises, so that that additional investment can be secured?

Stephen Hammond: I thank the hon. Gentleman for making that point. He will have noted that I have only been in my position in the party for a month. However, I have already had representations from a number of franchise holders about that matter and the benefits that it would secure in rail traffic, particularly in terms of capacity.

Overcrowding, which has been mentioned by a number of hon. Members this morning, is a real feature and has risen dramatically. The number of people travelling on main commuter lines in and out of London, in excess of the recommended capacity, has risen more than 50 per cent. in the past eight years. The Association of Train Operating Companies has warned that the network will not be able to absorb the increase in passenger traffic. The 2 per cent. increase in capacity that is being suggested over a period to 2014 will not cater for the real issues of overcrowding. That has been recognised in the House. My hon. Friend the Member for Basingstoke (Mrs. Miller) asked about that last week in the House and the Secretary of State said:

"Additional capacity needs to be provided."—[Official Report, 17 January 2006; Vol. 441, c. 691.]

I wonder whether the Minister will give us some assurances when we get to the nub of the problem for rail services in the south-east. For instance, we all know that, in terms of capacity, there has been an upgrade to the electrical circuitry. However, much of the new rolling stock that has replaced the old slam-door stock has to run at less than full capacity because the power is not available to run them at full speed. Will the Minister talk a little bit about what further electrical upgrades he would expect from Network Rail?

[Stephen Hammond]

Hon. Members have already mentioned lengthening stations and the improvement to the throat at both Waterloo and Liverpool Street. We should be commissioning more rolling stock, rather than decreasing it. In the short time that I have been asked by the new leader of the Conservative party to consider rail services, it has been explained to me on more than one occasion that the Government have paid, in certain contracts, to decrease the size of trains rather than increase them. I should be interested to hear the Minister reassure us and say that we will see greater commissioning of rail stock.

To finish, I shall mention three things that will be crucial to the south-east and to improving the network services: first, the increase of local hub timetabling in the system to allow more local services; secondly, extending the East London line and upgrading Orbilink; and, thirdly, I think that everybody would be interested to hear some comments from the Minister about the delays to Thameslink and when we might see that work coming through.

I am aware of your strictures, Mr. Olner, and I should like to give the Minister plenty of time to respond so, on that note, I shall conclude.

10.43 am

The Minister of State, Department for Transport (Dr. Stephen Ladyman): The hon. Member for Wimbledon (Stephen Hammond) has indicated that he has just taken up his post and will be studying issues to do with the railway system in the coming weeks. Based on the tone of what he has said, I would advise him to study carefully the actions that were taken between 1979 and 1997, particularly the impact of the rail privatisation process. Those things are not unconnected to the difficulties that we now face on the railways.

Stephen Hammond: Will the Minister give way?

Dr. Ladyman: Let me make a little progress first.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Romsey (Sandra Gidley) on securing this debate and on some of the constructive comments she made. She did at least recognise that there have been significant improvements to rail services in the south-east. I shall deal in detail with some of the points that she raised.

The hon. Lady asked for a meeting with me, but I am not usually the Minister who deals with railway issues, so I am probably not the best Minister for her to meet. However, I will pass her request to the Under-Secretary of State for Transport, my hon. Friend the Member for Halton (Derek Twigg), who normally deals with such matters.

The hon. Member for Westbury (Dr. Murrison) also requested a meeting. I understand that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary is due to write to him in the next day or two, offering that meeting, so he will get his opportunity to put his points directly.

Before I get into the detail of my speech, I shall deal with a number of general themes I detected in the debate, which was slightly wider ranging than I was expecting. My officials and I sat down the other day to try to work out what the scope of this debate would be so that we could prepare for it. We decided that, because the hon. Lady's constituency is in the south-east but is affected by the south-western franchise, we might need a slightly wider scope than one would normally work out for a debate on the south-east. However, in deciding what the scope of the debate would be, we did not get as far as Kettering and Leicestershire. Nevertheless, the debate has been interesting.

It has been interesting to hear some of the comments about capacity and overcrowding, which is a real problem that I will deal with in a moment. However, there was a contradictory theme in the debate, which was that many services around the south-east are running under capacity at the moment, yet everybody is adhering to them and wants them to continue. It does not seem to have occurred to hon. Members that, if they want to deal with problems of overcrowding and capacity issues, they will perhaps have to look at the resources going into services that are under-utilised. Sometimes we have to be prepared to take some difficult decisions and shift resources from under-utilised service into the ones where there are capacity problems.

Some of those difficult decisions have to be faced, although they are never easy and are always unpopular. Of course, Members of Parliament will always do their duty by their constituents and will say in debates that services that are vital to just one or two of their constituents have to continue. However, they should at least recognise that there is a contradiction. If we want resources to go where they can be most beneficial, sometimes we have to take some tough decisions.

I noticed another theme from several hon. Members. I did not hear any hon. Member talking about cutting services. I heard Members talking about fare increases, but I also heard a demand for more investment. The money for the railways can ultimately come from only two sources—fares or the taxpayer. The Government have no money of their own; they have only the taxpayer's money. If we cannot raise the money through fares, the subsidies have to be provided by the taxpayer. Sometimes there are justifications for subsidies, but let us at least recognise that they will have to go on the nation's tax bill, so they have to be introduced carefully and only when they can be thoroughly justified. Sometimes we will have to accept that fare increases will be necessary and will need to be above the level of inflation to get the investment into the railway system, which did not get investment for many years, and which Members from all parties have identified as necessary.

Sandra Gidley: I take the Minister's point, but will he respond to the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Tom Brake), which was that the length of the re-franchises is 10 years, which is not really an incentive to the train company to invest as much as they might, were the franchise to last longer?

Dr. Ladyman: First, the franchise process is not a vehicle for levering investment into the railway system. Secondly, I say to the hon. Lady and the hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Tom Brake) that he raised that matter in respect of the integrated Kent franchise and suggested that the new franchise won by Govia is too short. Of course, a long franchise worked so well last time, did it not? We had to fire Connex halfway through the process. The disaster that was Kent's railways was down to the fact that somebody was given a franchise for far too long, the franchise system did not lever investment or good management into the system and we ended up with a disaster that we had to deal with by throwing somebody out.

I believe that the Government have got it right on the franchise arrangements that have been put in place for Kent. I speak with some passion on this subject, because my constituency is in Kent and there are major benefits in the new franchise for my constituents. I believe that the franchise is long enough to get the investment needed. The company concerned believes that it has the basis for a productive franchise and for delivering certain increases in capacity that I shall talk about in a moment. As far as I am aware, it is not complaining about the length of the franchise at all. We also have the benefit of knowing that the franchise will be terminated early if the company does not meet its very tough punctuality targets. That franchise has been correctly judged. We should learn a few lessons from history and what has happened when we have given long franchises.

Tom Brake: The Minister said that we should learn the lessons of history. Presumably, the Government have learned lessons from the history of the Connex franchise, but he seems unclear about whether franchises are to allow for investment. He said that they were not, but literally in his next sentence said that the new integrated Kent franchise would allow for investment and tackle some of the capacity issues. Are franchises for investment or not?

Dr. Ladyman: My point is that, in accepting a franchise, a company knows the length of that franchise and its objectives on increased capacity, improved service and increased punctuality. The company makes its bid accordingly; it will have made its decision on how much investment can be levered into the system in the franchise period. The Government decide whether that will meet their objectives when they let the franchise. That is exactly what has happened in Kent.

I bring to Members' attention the fact that, after some difficult years, Britain's railways, in the south-east and nationally, have improved considerably. I am not saying that they are yet all we want them to be—of course they are not. No Member of Parliament with a constituency anywhere in the south-east of England, particularly in Kent, would dare suggest that. However, services have improved significantly.

During the last period for which information is available, a moving annual average of 85.7 per cent. of trains arrived on time. Performance levels are increasing all the time. Passenger numbers are growing significantly: 2005 saw the highest number of passenger journeys in 50 years. Last year, 1 billion journeys were made on the national railway network, an increase of 2.5 per cent. on the figure for 2004. Some £87 million a week is being invested and major improvements are being delivered as a result of that major investment.

The growth in demand for rail travel will continue to increase and there will be major problems, particularly in the south-east. However, that investment has given us 2,025 new vehicles that now operate on the network south of the Thames; they replace 1,700 slam-door coaches, at a cost of about £2 billion. My own constituency in Kent has only just seen the back of slam-door trains, which were first introduced in 1950.

In the final six months of last year, slam-door trains were replaced in constituency of the hon. Member for Romsey. She said that trains should be more appropriate for the lines on which they run rather than provide the fully air-conditioned services now used on some of her lines, but a fully air-conditioned modern railway coach is a damn sight better than those old slam-door trains with which many of our constituents were struggling not so long ago.

Some 40 per cent. of our national rolling stock is now new and we are, of course, still investing to try to increase capacity. More seats are to be provided as part of the new Thameslink-Great Northern franchise. Some 10,000 additional seats a day will be provided as part of the timetable and eight-car trains will be used across the peak-hour period. The Greater Western franchise will deliver a redesign of the high-speed train fleet and a new timetable to increase capacity on trains between London and Reading in the morning and evening peak periods, by 20 per cent. and 30 per cent. respectively. That is a significant increase in capacity. The integrated Kent franchise that we have talked about also involves a considerable increase in capacity. Such things are happening not only in the south-east but across the country.

Despite those record levels of investment, we recognise that capacity in the south-east remains an issue and that it will continue to be a problem. That brings me to some of the specific matters raised by the hon. Member for Romsey. She talked about the south-western train refranchising. That franchise is the next to be let in the south-east of England and it will certainly impact on her constituency. The franchise will combine two existing franchises—South West Trains and Island Line—both of which are currently owned by Stagecoach. During the 2004–05 financial year, South West Trains accounted for 15 per cent. of total passenger rail journeys, 11 per cent. of national fare box revenue and 11 per cent. of the 4.6 billion passenger km travelled on the rail network.

South West Trains operates 1,635 trains each week day with a fleet of 333 units, and the rolling stock has already seen considerable investment. The fleet of 91 inner suburban class 455 units is undergoing a major refurbishment programme, while a new fleet of 45 class 444 and 110 class 450 Desiro units have been successfully introduced during the past couple of years.

By contrast, Island Line, which carries more than 1 million passengers a year on 1938 former London underground rolling stock, receives fare box revenue of just £1 million. The new franchise is scheduled to start on 4 February next year, and five companies have pre-qualified to bid to run it.

The South West Trains consultation document that set out the proposed specification was issued on 7 November 2005. Department for Transport officials met with local authorities, passenger groups, regional bodies and industry stakeholders to discuss the proposals. The consultation period closed on 13 January this year, and the Department is considering the responses prior to finalising the specification on which the bidders will be asked to price their bids.

[Dr. Ladyman]

The new timetable introduced in December 2004 has already significantly improved performance; nine out of 10 of the trains now arrive on time, and significantly changing the timetable so soon was not deemed necessary. However, it was considered appropriate to review a number of services to the west of the franchise area. As hon. Members have mentioned, the review considered changes to the services on the Waterloo-Exeter route—specifically those going west of Exeter and to Bristol—the removal of the direct service between Reading and Brighton and a review of services in the Southampton area. I shall make sure that the comments made by Members about those services are passed to the team considering the consultation so that they will be taken into account as the way forward is determined.

The hon. Lady mentioned the Romsey-Totton service in particular. In its south-west mainline route utilisation strategy, Network Rail has identified Southampton as an area that creates significant delay to train operations. That is related to a number of factors, including the use of the station by four different passenger operators, a significant volume of freight traffic and the constraint of a two-track tunnel at the eastern end of the station. The proposed specification attempts to address those problems by improving train movements through Southampton Central station. That package of measures will improve performance, offer better journey opportunities and provide more frequent and faster journeys to south Hampshire and Dorset.

The proposals include the extension of the Waterloo-Southampton service to Bournemouth, the extension of the Waterloo-Poole service to Weymouth to provide a second train each hour, the acceleration of the existing service to Weymouth from Waterloo so that it is 10 minutes faster, and the provision of a regular and improved service between Brighton and Southampton.

To facilitate improvements to the Southampton area, the proposed specification has reduced the Romsey-Totton service so that it operates as a shuttle between Romsey and Eastleigh. The hon. Lady will be aware that the service between Romsey and Totton was introduced in May 2003, with the opening of the new station at Chandler's Ford. The service is currently supported by money from a rail passenger partnership scheme established by the Strategic Rail Authority, but that expires in April 2006. Discussions about continuing to support the service until the end of the franchise are in progress. On the consultation on the limitation of that service in the future, I shall make sure that the hon. Lady's comments are referred to the team considering those proposals.

Mr. Bill Olner (in the Chair): Order.

NHS Structure (Northern Greater Manchester)

11 am

Graham Stringer (Manchester, Blackley) (Lab): Sadly, today is an appropriate time to talk about the delivery of health services in north Manchester, given the information on the front page of The Times this morning about the unfortunate patients who were misdiagnosed by the radiology service in Trafford and north Manchester. I shall mention that briefly later.

North Manchester has some of the worst health statistics in the country, the most startling of which is that a male child born today in north Manchester has a life expectancy of 72.3 years, whereas a similar child born in east Dorset has a life expectancy of 80.8 years. For every 10 years that that boy from north Manchester lives, a boy born in east Dorset can expect to live an extra year.

Those statistics are from an extremely detailed and, in a sense, depressing publication called "Where Wealth means Health" by the Centre for Public Health at John Moores university. The report points out that there has been no real change over the past 10 years in the relative rates of good and bad health as they relate to class. Even though people at the bottom end have become healthier, they are still just as far behind people at the top end.

My constituency is among the top 10 in terms of the number of people claiming incapacity benefit and the level of heart disease, and the number of people suffering from cancer is also among the highest in the country. Consequently, the mortality and morbidity rates are very high. By quoting health statistics from different documents, I could probably fill the whole hour and a half with that depressing story, but I put those statistics to hon. Members simply to show how important it is to deliver health services as effectively and efficiently as possible in a poor area where people suffer from poor health.

Most of my area is covered by the Pennine Acute Hospitals NHS Trust, which consists of one headquarters and four hospitals—North Manchester general and the Bury, Oldham and Rochdale hospitals. It is the second largest trust in the country, employing more than 300 consultants and covering five primary care trust and five local authority areas. It is an unusual trust, and it was conceived and set up within the past four years in answer to a particular problem.

Services were being reconfigured in the wake of improved resources and of the child care problems in Bristol and the report that followed. It was recognised that a concentration of specialists needed to work in one place to ensure that health care standards were right and that services would have to be reconfigured. When the Pennine trust was being set up, however, there was a worry that many of those specialist services would end up in the centre of Manchester. It was thought—incorrectly, as I shall argue later—that the configuration of the hospitals at Oldham, Bury, Rochdale and north Manchester would allow those services to be organised rationally. That, then, is the background in terms of the quality of health and the delivery units for health care.

Like many hon. Members, I have had several meetings with patients, trade unions, doctors and administrators, and I was told that everything was not well in the Pennine trust. However, things really came to a head last summer, when an extraordinary alliance was formed. The consultants passed a vote of no confidence in the whole management team. Although that was initiated by the discussions on the new consultant contracts, the consultants' resolution went much wider. The trade unions passed a similar resolution, which was initiated by a disagreement about car parking charges. Again, however, that was the spark, and the discontent and complaints went much wider.

The strategic health authority responded by asking Professor Alberti and Dr. Joan Durose to look into what was wrong in the Pennine Acute Hospitals NHS Trust. They interviewed about 1,500 people and talked to trade unions, the consultants and the administrators. After two months, on 17 October, they produced a report, which was given to the public on 1 November. It was a rather sad, critical analysis of poor administration, bad communications and low morale, and 25 recommendations were made at the end.

The human resources director and the medical director left, and that could have been it. The administrators—the management—said that they accepted all 25 recommendations, but several of my hon. Friends and I were again approached by medical staff and trade unions at the hospital, and we wanted to find out more. The report wanted the answers to three key questions, and so would any sensible person who looked at it. First, could the trust carry on with the personnel who remained after the human resources director and the medical director had left? Had there been sufficient changes? Had the right decisions been taken or was more needed? It became clear that the trade unions and many medical staff thought there should be greater changes.

Secondly, the Pennine trust is, as I said, the second largest NHS trust in the country. Were greater structural changes needed? Was it too big to be managed? Clearly, it had not been managed, but was one reason for that the fact that it was simply too big? As I said, it covers five local authorities, five PCTs and four hospitals.

Thirdly, there is the common-sense question—the first I was asked by journalists and the first thing that people living in north Manchester and patients want to know: are health services being delivered as effectively as they could be and are patients safe? When consultants say that they have no confidence in the management, we should all worry.

I read several times Professor Alberti and Joan Durose's good, well-balanced report, which does not go further on those points. I also took the trouble, as did other hon. Members, to go and talk to Professor Alberti, the trade unions and administrators all over the system to see whether enough was done with those recommendations, and whether there has been progress in the three months since the report was written. The one person to whom I have not spoken in the past week, since I found out that I had been fortunate enough to come up in the draw and secure this debate, but to whom I would like to speak, is the chief executive of the Pennine trust. Since he was appointed, I have had regular meetings with him and have found him to be a reasonable man to deal with, but my phone calls have not been returned in the past four days, so I do not have the value of his views on what I am going to say. However, I talked to virtually everybody else in the system in that time.

I return to the first point about personnel. Do we have the right balance now? Two senior members of the executive have left. Was that right? That is as far as the report goes. On page 6, Alberti and Durose say:

> "We believe that the Chair and Medical Director have not demonstrated their role as leaders . . . We note that the medical director has now left the Trust."

What conclusion would you, Mr. Olner, or any other reasonable person draw from those two sentences? I draw the conclusion that even though it is not written in black and white, Professor Alberti thought that the chairman should take the same decision as the medical director. I can think of no other way of interpreting that part of the report.

When I talked to the trade unions and the medical staff—I do not want to misrepresent matters and say that this is the formal view of the trade unions, the joint medical committee or any other professional body—I formed the view that they do not believe that it is possible for the trust to improve with the current chairman and chief executive in post. The trade unions and a consultant said to me, in effect, that it is all right for the director of human resources to go, but he was the chief executive's representative on earth. He was head-hunted and appointed by the chief executive, and his actions were under the direct control of the chief executive. It is unlikely that the communications and management style will change.

On the third point, a series of reviews is going on in the health service in north Manchester, as is the case elsewhere in the health service. Children's services are being reviewed, as are maternity and young people's services; major changes in configuration are being considered at the four hospitals; the primary care trust structure is being changed; and cancer services have been reviewed.

Any hon. Member knows that conclusions on the reorganisation of health services are not reached by any process that could be described as an exact science. Usually, everyone is well motivated and people want the best for the service, but the process involves an element of horse trading and the attitude that, "If Salford gets this, Tameside will have to get that." I am concerned that if a public report implies that the chairman and the chief executive of a large trust are not doing their jobs as well as they should, the people in the Pennine acute trust area whom I and other people represent will lose out in those discussions. I know that the Minister for Local Government, my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, East and Saddleworth (Mr. Woolas), is concerned about the debate on whether a linear accelerator should be placed in Hope hospital in Salford or in Oldham. In such a debate, will the same confidence be placed in a management that has been so heavily and publicly criticised?

David Heyes (Ashton-under-Lyne) (Lab): The case was made strongly in terms of priorities that north-east Manchester is at the head of the queue regarding the need for improved cancer services. Does my hon. Friend agree that if there is a lack of confidence in the management and leadership of the trust, questions will be raised about whether it should still be accorded that priority?

Graham Stringer: That is precisely the point that I am making. If difficult decisions are to be made and if there is weak leadership, as the Alberti report says, there is likely to be a different result—not necessarily a happy one for my hon. Friend who, like me, represents many people who need high-quality health care.

I will not go through all the reorganisations that are taking place, but the same is true for the reorganisation of children's services. There has been a ministerial commitment from this Government and the previous Conservative Government that secondary paediatrics will be moved from Booth Hall hospital, which is closing, to North Manchester general hospital. I want to be sure that the top management understand that and are in a position, when difficult decisions have to be made, to ensure that that commitment is honoured.

I did not enjoy making those comments. As I said, I have had no personal difficulties with the chairman or the chief executive of the trust, but I think that the report and the issues speak for themselves. As one administrator said to me, "If somebody wrote a report like that about me, I would want to move quietly on to another part of the health service and leave it." I do not wish either of those people ill, but it is clear that they have failed in this case and need to move on.

The second issue is structure. Again, the Alberti report does not say as a recommendation that structure is a problem, but if one reads the report it does suggest that. It says that the remoteness of the four hospital sites from each other has been a problem in their communication and management, and that the geographical problems have been mirrored by emotional problems. To put it another way, people have been emotionally committed to, say, North Manchester general or the Royal Oldham hospital, but there has been neither the site management at that hospital nor the integrated management throughout the Pennine acute trust to make them believe that those hospitals are part of the same organisation. That has led to demoralisation.

When I have gone to those hospitals, as either a visitor or a Member of Parliament, or when members of staff have come to my advice bureau, I have found that people all believe that their hospital will close in favour of the other three. That is clearly nonsense, but it is a measure of the poor communications and management structure across the five sites. There is a fundamental problem, and it would have been difficult to make the five sites work, even with the best administrators in the world.

It is worth quickly going through the rest of the Government's policies for the delivery of health services in Manchester. PCTs are being organised on the basis of local authority boundaries, which means that there is a proposal to put the three PCTs in Manchester into one; the mental health services have been reorganised into one trust across the city of Manchester; and the local authorities have been given a monitoring role in the health service. It would be sensible to follow that line of argument and move North Manchester general hospital to the city of Manchester, either into Central Manchester and Manchester Children's University Hospitals NHS Trust, with Manchester royal infirmary and the children's hospital, or into a trust of its own. I realise that there would be problems in doing that immediately—although there is some urgency about the matter—as well as administrative difficulties, but I do not believe that the Pennine acute trust will ever work given its current structure.

Mr. Stephen O'Brien (Eddisbury) (Con): I have listened to the hon. Gentleman's argument with great interest and care, and he makes his case extraordinarily well. He mentioned the reconfiguration of PCTs—along county boundaries, for instance—which in almost all cases will make them much larger, yet earlier he made a powerful point about the Pennine acute trust being simply too big—indeed, it is one of the largest trusts. Does he draw the conclusion that, in fact, the bigger and more centralised such organisations become, the less responsive they are to local patient need, and that perhaps there ought to be a review of their restructuring into bigger configurations rather than smaller ones?

Graham Stringer: The hon. Gentleman makes a good point. Size is an issue, but so is complexity. The Pennine trust, on five sites, is the second largest in the country; it is too big and too complex. My guess is that if it was scored for size and complexity, it would score higher than any other in the country.

The hon. Gentleman knows, because I think that in another life he was an accountant—

Mr. O'Brien: Business man.

Graham Stringer: The hon. Gentleman knows that there is always a balance to be struck between economies of scale and complexity. The case that I was making for North Manchester general hospital was for it either to be a stand-alone trust, in which case all the size problems would be solved, or to go into Central Manchester trust. That would be a large trust indeed, but it would be lined up with the PCT and the local authority, in terms of accountability and the normal patterns of travel in the area.

When the Pennine acute trust was set up, patients did not have the choice that the Government have given them in the past few weeks to go to one of four hospitals. I would say to the Under-Secretary of State for Health, my hon. Friend the Member for Don Valley (Caroline Flint), that, given a choice, people in north Manchester are much more likely to go into central or north Manchester than to travel to Oldham, Rochdale or Bury.

I make no point about any of those hospitals, but those are the travel patterns of people in north Manchester. That will make the reconfiguration of services around those four hospitals very difficult. If one set of services was introduced in Rochdale, for instance, and people had the choice of going to Manchester royal infirmary in the centre, where the services were replicated, I have no doubt that 99 out of 100 people in north Manchester would travel in to the centre, not outward. Those are the reasons why the structure is not right.

On safety and the delivery of services, again, Professor Alberti said that patients were not put at risk. However, the report says:

"We looked for clear evidence of systems and processes that would provide assurance to management about clinical quality", but continued that

"our review did not provide us with the time to be confident that clinical governance is robust throughout the Trust . . . There is enough evidence to suggest that careful attention to clinical governance is needed in some areas."

That is worrying.

I do not intend to delay hon. Members by discussing all the people who come to my advice bureau to tell me about the problems they face when they go to hospitals. All hon. Members have such cases because, as anyone who watches "ER" or "Casualty" would know, clinicians are not all saints and hospitals are not all perfect. The real question for the Pennine trust is whether its structure and that of the management mean that services are not delivered as well as they might be.

A lady from the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Heywood and Middleton (Jim Dobbin) came to my advice bureau to say that she desperately wanted the Pennine trust to be broken up, because she had received terrible services in one hospital. She had watched a patient not being fed, who later died, and the conditions were unhygienic. That may be so, but I cannot show a direct relationship between the structure of the trust and the management in that case. There may be, just as there may be a relationship—I do not know—between the tragic cases of those women who, according to The Times today, were diagnosed by a radiologist as being clear of breast cancer when they were not clear. However, where there are problems such as those that the trade unions and consultants exposed in the Alberti report, one has to worry about those processes more intensely than normal.

There is a further stage of concern. A constituent came to my advice bureau and said that, as she was recovering from a gynaecological operation, the surgeon had said to her, "I have had to hack about a bit because the laser that would normally have done the work accurately has been transferred to Oldham." That is a cause for concern. I am still waiting for the chief executive from the Pennine trust to reply to me on that point, but this begins to look like a structural problem.

More directly, talking to consultants, they have told me—there is nothing wrong, and I do not want the Conservatives to get excited—that, quite normally, there are two waiting lists, one active and one clinical. The active waiting list is the one we usually talk about; the clinical is the one for people coming in for return check-ups, such as coloscopies or other invasive treatments. They are two separate lists, but a consultant told me he believed that administrators were interfering between those two lists without consulting clinicians. That is not acceptable and is evidence that people are being treated according to administrators' interference rather than the decisions of clinicians.

Another point was made strongly to me: within the system of waiting lists and timing, there is no administrative system—even though clinicians have asked for it—to determine whether there is only one surgeon in the whole of Greater Manchester capable of carrying out a particular procedure. So, people are left on waiting lists. They are sent to the PCT and then on to the private, independent treatment centre in Trafford, where it is found that the expertise required does not exist there, so they have to come back. That is poor administration.

I come to my final point on the quality of services delivered and, potentially, the safety of patients. There is a nationwide shortage of pathologists, but I was informed that a pathologist was not appointed, although he was medically suitable, because the administrators refused to sign the contract. If there are positives instead of negatives in the pathology laboratory, or negatives instead of positives, people's lives are at risk.

In bringing my remarks to a conclusion, I hope that I have been able to show that the Alberti report amounts to more than its simple conclusions. Underlying the report, there was a view within the health establishment and the strategic health authority in Greater Manchester that more change would be damaging to the service. I understand that view—it is not unreasonable—but we must consider the evidence to weigh up whether more change would give better delivery of services, as opposed to change that can be shown to be in line with the rest of Government policy.

I also believe that there was a view—it would not surprise me if any administrator had this view—that trade unions and consultants, even in an unprecedented, revolutionary partnership, should not be able to sack administrators. I hope that I have shown that while the conclusions of the Alberti report do not suggest moving people on, the detail quite clearly suggests doing just that.

No one in north Manchester is under any illusion: health services have to change and improve. In my constituency, a number of hospitals have closed during the past 20 years. Monsall isolation hospital, Ancoats hospital just outside the constituency and the Northern hospital have all closed, and Booth Hall hospital for children is to close in 2009—a decision taken in the dying days of the last Conservative Government.

People recognise that there is a need to change, but the Government also need to ensure that there is support for those changes. Rearranging children's services, maternity services and cancer services causes people with relatives who have needed that care to worry. If there is no public support for the changes, they will be more difficult to achieve. From a political point of view, as well as from a patient-care point of view, I want people to recognise this Government's commitment to putting resources into the health service and making those resources work. I do not want the public to feel so alienated from the services that they think that those extra resources are wasted or being used in the wrong place.

If the structure of the Pennine Acute Hospitals NHS Trust continues as it is, I worry that it will be an inhibitor to the reorganisation and reconfiguration of those services. I worry that if the management continues as it is, neither consultants nor other staff will give it their support. Having listed some problems that I have been told about, I must say that it is a tribute to all staff that the service has continued at such a high level, but I believe—it is impossible to read the reports without thinking this—that the level could have been higher if the administration and the structures had been different.

[Graham Stringer]

I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will respond positively and consider these issues, which relate to the future and the best configuration of health services for one of the poorest populations in the UK and, indeed, in western Europe.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Bill Olner (in the Chair): Order. There are three Members standing, all in a line. I hope that I can call them all, but the time restriction is that I want to start the Opposition Front-Bench spokesmen's winding-up speeches just before 12 o'clock. If hon. Members can limit their speeches to that time scale, they will all be able to speak.

11.37 am

Jim Dobbin (Heywood and Middleton) (Lab/Co-op): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Blackley (Graham Stringer) on securing what Members of Parliament who are affected by the Pennine Acute Hospitals NHS Trust and the reorganisations that have taken place will feel is an important debate on a sensitive subject. I want to declare an interest: I worked at the Royal Oldham hospital, which is part of the trust, for more than 22 years and I was also a member of a former Rochdale health authority for a number of years, so I know many of the people who are involved in the reorganisation.

I would probably start from a slightly different stance from my hon. Friend. We have discussed the problems that have arisen because of the reorganisation and we each understand where the other is coming from. When a massive reorganisation takes place—I am talking about the creation of the very large trust, with mergers within primary care trusts, and all the other reorganisations that are taking place in the health service—and the same people manage the whole process, it causes huge problems. Some thought must be given to that issue.

When the Pennine Acute Hospitals NHS Trust was set up, I agreed with the move for the reasons that my hon. Friend has given. In other words, there was a fear of marginalisation if it became part of a much larger Manchester trust. My constituency does not have a hospital, but it is surrounded by four of the hospitals that make up the trust: the Royal Oldham hospital, North Manchester hospital, Fairfield general hospital in Bury and Rochdale infirmary. My constituents go to whichever hospital they are geographically close to.

I understand where my hon. Friend is coming from with his concerns about the structure of the trust. My view is that there has basically been a management failure—a management problem—and had that been tackled correctly when the trust was set up, perhaps many of the problems might not have arisen. It is the second largest trust in the country, but its structure suits my constituency and my constituents fairly well in terms of access. However, there have been very serious management problems there. The biggest part of those problems was the lack of communication, and a failure to set up systems on the four sites that could relate to the centre.

We made the point in the early days that that was essential because of the massive change that was taking place. There was no real leadership, and staff on the four sites had no clue about whom they were accountable and responsible to. There was a failure to make the presence at the centre of the four sites felt. I see that as the major problem.

A huge reconfiguration is taking place, which is being managed by one of the primary care trusts. It is being led by my PCT in Heywood and Middleton, which is due to merge with Rochdale. That reconfiguration is itself causing huge problems because of the lack of communication. Once the consultation process starts, there will be big improvements, and we have recently had discussions about that. However, the confusion created by the way in which the acute trust has been managed has caused concern at the public level and serious insecurity problems at the staff level on the four sites. That has led to the meetings that have been described and the votes of no confidence expressed. It is extremely serious.

With my experience in the health services, I have seen many reorganisations, which have led me to think that some groups of professionals are not innocent. There has been some territorial protection in the system, and we are beginning to see some of that emerge in certain hospitals because of the reconfiguration that is taking place. That has not helped, and the message that must go out is that no change is not an option. The consultation process must be improved, and as far as the management of the Pennine acute trust is concerned, I am not sure whether a change of leadership is the best move. However, it must be considered, and the emphasis that the Alberti report put on better communications and stronger links between the centre and the four sites is the way ahead, and that is what I would advocate.

11.43 am

David Heyes (Ashton-under-Lyne) (Lab): I start by congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Blackley (Graham Stringer) on securing this important and timely debate, which is of such significance to my constituents in Oldham as well as to people in north Manchester, Rochdale and Bury. He has given the context and a good overview of the health issues in his constituency. Sadly, those in my constituency are little better in many respects.

It would be wrong to start without putting on record an acknowledgement of the improvements that the Government have brought about across the board in health services in the north-east and Greater Manchester, the area served by the Pennine acute trust. The extra investment put in year on year has had an impact on health prospects and outcomes for the 800,000 people served by the trust. However, the creation of the Pennine acute trust—the shotgun marriage of Bury, Rochdale, Oldham, and North Manchester about four years ago—was not a happy event. The hospitals across the sub-region did not, and still do not, sit comfortably together. The trust, which, as we have heard, is the second largest in the country, just seemed too big, unwieldy, and challenging to manage and lead effectively.

It is often felt that little progress has been made during the past four years to reshape the trust into a more manageable configuration. However, at long last, just over a week ago, we saw the launch of the public consultation exercise, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Heywood and Middleton (Jim Dobbin) referred, on proposals for the reconfiguration of services, including hospital-based services in the north-east and Greater Manchester. The document is entitled "Healthy Futures", but it is remarkably silent on the pretty unhealthy recent past. During the past couple of years, it became increasingly clear that things were not going well at the top of the Pennine acute trust. Relationships between managers, doctors and trade unions were far from healthy, as evidenced last summer by the virtually unanimous vote of no confidence in the trust's top management team, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Blackley referred.

Against that worrying background, and like my hon. Friends, I welcomed the review carried out by Professor Alberti and Dr. Durose. The publication of their report in late October last year was keenly anticipated and, when it came out, the report was frank and hard-hitting. Alberti and Durose found deep-seated and long-established problems, many of which could be traced back to the time when the trust was established. Although they choose their words with care, the report is particularly critical of the top-level leadership at the trust. My hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Blackley has already quoted the passage that states:

"We believe that the Chair and Medical Director have not demonstrated their role as leaders."

The report goes on to say that the chief executive's style of leadership

"has caused difficulties with some parts of the Trust. This style could usefully be modified."

The report homes in on the role of the chair and non-executive directors, saying that they need to exercise

"greater influence on the executive team as a whole".

Tellingly, the report continues:

"Whether the Chair and all the non-executive directors feel able to do this is uncertain but given recent events we believe it will be very difficult."

An important message to emerge from the Alberti-Durose report—I have to acknowledge that generally this matches my own perception—is that the quality of patient care at the trust's hospitals did not suffer too greatly during the difficult period when the trust's senior management came under such serious criticism from the staff. As my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Blackley said, that is not to say that there have been no problems but, to the extent that it is true, it speaks well of the dedication, competence and public service ethos among the middle managers, consultants and medical staff, and backroom and front-line workers at the hospitals—the phrase "lions led by donkeys" comes to mind.

The current position is that the medical director has gone, but the chair, non-executive directors and chief executive are still in post. I hope that they are working to carry through the action plan called for by Alberti and Durose to implement the 25 far-reaching recommendations in their report. Soon, the chair, non-executive directors and chief executive will face the immensely challenging job of carrying through the trust reconfiguration process, which will be determined in the light of the consultation outcomes.

I hope that lessons will have been learned, changes in style effected, leadership issues addressed and communication links put in place, so that we can look forward optimistically. However, it could still be the case that the core problem has simply not been addressed. Even with a dramatic turnaround that sees the adoption of the best management practices and with inspirational leadership, the trust might be just too big, too cumbersome and too unbalanced ever to be capable of delivering the changes necessary to produce the quality of service that our constituents deserve.

Alberti and Durose conclude that "it would be unhelpful at this time to reverse the size and core structure of the Trust."

Their recommendations concentrate instead on strengthening site management and on devolution of operational decisions to divisions, with the chief executive and executive directors cast in the role of arbitrators. I hope that Alberti and Durose turn out to be right in declining to add to the complexities of the reconfiguration process. The public consultation, which is under way, is built on the same premise. The consultation document, the video presentations, the publicity bus that will tour the area—none of that envisages anything other than retaining the present hospital grouping. The option of cutting the size of the trust's geographical area to a more manageable scale is not on the agenda.

The immediate future promises much-needed expansion in community-based care and treatment, with 35 new health centres throughout our area taking on significant areas of work that would previously have required someone to make a hospital visit as an out-patient or in-patient. All that implies a difficult period ahead for our hospitals as they have to adapt to the new environment and carry through the huge organisational changes that are necessary. Based on their track record, it is difficult to be optimistic about the ability of the present leadership to make a success of that.

Paul Rowen (Rochdale) (LD): What does the hon. Gentleman think the solution ought to have been following the publication of Professor Alberti's report?

David Heyes: With respect to the hon. Gentleman, if he had been present earlier, he would have heard my views and those of my hon. Friends about the matter. The lesson for the hon. Gentleman is to try a bit harder to get to the debate.

One question remains unaddressed: given the scale and complexity of the trust, would any hospital management team—no matter how skilled and experienced—be capable of delivering the changes and improvements that our constituents rightly expect?

11.50 am

Mr. David Chaytor (Bury, North) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Blackley (Graham Stringer) on securing the debate. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Minister appreciates the strength of feeling among all local Members about the issues related to the difficulties in the Pennine Acute Hospitals NHS Trust. Labour Members have discussed the matter at length. The four of us present met Professor Alberti to discuss the report, and we met staff representatives throughout the trust to discuss these issues.

[Mr. David Chaytor]

I speak as someone who was born in one of the four major hospitals in the trust. During the past 18 months, I have made 28 visits to those four hospitals in my roles as a Member, as a patient, and as a relative of a patient who needed treatment. I am familiar not only with the hospital in my constituency, Fairfield hospital, but with the other three major hospitals in the trust.

I have carefully considered the issues, especially during the past 18 months, and I do not entirely agree with my hon. Friend's conclusions. We have discussed them together, and I am happy for him to press the argument; however, I do not completely agree with him. He makes an important point about the text of the Alberti report, particularly its hidden meaning when it refers to the way in which the chair and the chief executive should respond to the report. Having said that, from my personal dealings with the chair and the chief executive, I have nothing but praise for the courtesy and efficiency with which they have responded to my requests for information, or, on many occasions, my complaints about certain aspects of the trust's operation during their term of office and mine.

I want to put aside the question about the current leadership and concentrate on the other issue that my hon. Friend raised: the structural issue about the size and location of hospitals in the trust. I do not believe as a matter of principle that a trust of this size is unmanageable, nor that a trust spread across so many hospitals is unmanageable. I accept that the trust is very large. It is the second largest non-teaching hospital trust in the country, but one has to be the largest and another has to be the second largest, so that in itself cannot be an argument for inevitable change.

Many difficulties that have led to disputes between staff and management during the past few months have been due to the size of and inadequate attention to site management on each of the four main sites. That in itself is not an insoluble problem. However, where the trust may have a problem with size is due to the fact that its hospitals carry out too many basic NHS functions, with not enough being devolved to primary care. That problem is being dealt with by the "Healthy Futures" consultation.

We can confidently expect significant devolution to what I understand is to be 35 newly developed and refurbished primary care centres throughout north-east Manchester. I fully support that process of devolution to primary care. When the balance between what is carried out in primary care and what is carried out in secondary care is better achieved as a result of the process, many issues concerning the overall size of the trust may be resolved.

There is great controversy about some aspects of the proposals in the consultation on the reconfiguration within the acute trust and the consultation on the wider issue of children and maternity services throughout Greater Manchester. Now is not the time to get into the merits of that debate, so another Adjournment debate may be needed to explore fully the controversial aspects of those decisions. My hon. Friend was right to say that no one is arguing against change. We all accept that the status quo with the large concentration of acute hospitals within a small geographical area cannot continue. The news from Manchester this morning about cancer care has highlighted the importance of the concentration of specialist expertise in certain specialisms on particular sites. However, the precise location and on which sites services need to be will be debated in great detail during the next few weeks.

My hon. Friend has raised a crucial issue about health care in north-east Manchester, Miss Begg—Mr. Oliver has disappeared. It has implications for health care in the centre of the city, too. I am not convinced that his argument that the Alberti report leads inevitably to a demand for structural change or a taking out of the North Manchester General hospital into the Central Manchester Healthcare NHS Trust is the case. I note that Professor Alberti and Dr. Durose state specifically in their report that they "feel it would be unhelpful at this time to reverse the size and core structure of the Trust."

They said "at this time", and that is an important qualification. Nor do I consider that the problems should lead inevitably to the immediate resignation of the chair or the chief executive, but whether that team can carry through the necessary changes and improvements remains an open question.

Although I do not agree fully with my hon. Friend's conclusions, he has raised an important issue. My hon. Friend the Minister would be well advised to give careful consideration to it and explore all the implications both of the capacity of the current management team and the future configuration of the trust.

11.58 am

Stephen Williams (Bristol, West) (LD): Good morning, Miss Begg. Welcome to the Chair. I congratulate the hon. Member for Manchester, Blackley (Graham Stringer) on securing the debate. He started with a wide-ranging and detailed speech about services in his constituency and throughout Manchester. He described his constituency as an area of social deprivation and drew a contrast between that and Dorset, which was perhaps the most extreme case that he could come up with for differences in life expectancy. Although he drew on an extreme example, such differences in life expectancy can often be found within much narrower areas. I do not claim to know Greater Manchester that well, but I know that it has some extremely prosperous areas as well as extremely poor areas. That is certainly the case in my city of Bristol.

The hon. Gentleman said that his constituency was an area with a high intake of incapacity benefit. Indeed, I read that in a table published yesterday in the newspapers. I empathise with such statistics because, although I represent a prosperous and well-educated city in the south of England, I grew up in the south Wales valleys and I know from childhood and early adult experience about poverty and despair and what effects that they can have on ill health and outcomes. The Minister, whom I often encounter at meetings, often points to the link between ill-health and poverty and the fact that one reinforces the other, and she will perhaps speak about that later. However, despite the Government's squirting billions of pounds into the national health service over the past eight and a half years, many pressing problems still need to be considered, most notably in the Manchester area, and that is the topic of this debate.

Labour Members have referred several times to the Pennine Acute Hospitals NHS Trust, which covers north Manchester, Bury, Oldham and Rochdale. My hon. Friend the Member for Rochdale (Paul Rowen) was telling me this morning about the report produced by Professor George Alberti, and he had intended to speak about it in greater depth, but he was detained further along the corridor in a Committee scrutinising a statutory instrument, so we were unable to hear him make his remarks at length.

Paul Rowen: Does my hon. Friend not agree that Professor Alberti's report, which makes 25 detailed recommendations and is very damning of the Pennine trust's management, leads to the conclusion that the hon. Member for Manchester, Blackley (Graham Stringer) reached in my absence that the trust is perhaps too big to be managed efficiently? As an alternative, the Minister should perhaps look at some form of reconfiguration, given that north Manchester might fit in more sensibly with the other Manchester hospitals.

Stephen Williams: I thank my hon. Friend for his point, which was certainly made earlier. The hon. Member for Manchester, Blackley referred to the trust's size and complexity, and the hon. Member for Eddisbury (Mr. O'Brien), speaking from the Conservative Front Bench, alluded to fact that the size of NHS trusts sometimes contributes to such problems. So those points have been well made.

The NHS is in a time of great change and upheaval as a result of Government reforms. In a letter in The Guardian this morning, the Secretary of State for Health says that she intends "to publish a manual to help managers" understand what is going on in the NHS. She outlines three main challenges. The first is "to deliver improvements for patients", the second is to "implement the government's reform agenda" and the third is to "achieve financial balance". I am sure that we can all agree with the first and third of those objectives, but the second is perhaps contributing to some of the problems.

Just before the Christmas recess, I read a letter from Chris Ham in The Times. As the Minister may know, he worked in the Department of Health, and I believe that he was the director of its strategy unit until June last year. He said that the Government were at risk of unleashing a wave of "creative destruction" on the NHS through their mania for reform and change. That pattern is, of course, reflected throughout the country, not only in Greater Manchester. Representatives from throughout the country will share concerns about the restructuring of primary care trusts, the reorganisation of services, the impact of deficits and—this has perhaps not been mentioned—the impact of central targets on local clinical needs.

The Government often say that part of their solution to these problems is an enthusiasm for the market and the private sector, and that might be an appropriate response in some cases, but the impact of a private treatment centre in Greater Manchester—again, I do not think that this has been mentioned—has been to increase the deficit. The centre serves the 14 existing PCTs in Greater Manchester and has cost them £2 million over six months due to lack of use. The centre's contract allowed for up to 7,000 patients to be treated in a full year, but it has seen just over 1,400 in its first six months.

The NHS structure is going through constant change. The 14 PCTs in Greater Manchester will be reconfigured down to 10 so that they match local authority boundaries. I can tell hon. Members from a west country perspective that we wish that that were the case in our part of the world, where the PCTs have been made bigger so that they cross local authority boundaries, despite representations from all Members Parliament and all local unitary authorities in the former Avon area.

Liberal Democrats believe that local control and accountability of health care is the answer. I repeat the phrase used by the hon. Member for Manchester, Blackley: he referred to the size and complexity of local NHS trusts. When I first became a Member and went around meeting the various NHS organisations in the area, I could desperately have done with some sort of pictogram showing the structure of NHS services in the Greater Bristol area; it is amazingly complex. We need local, democratic control and accountability of our health care system. If there is to be major reform, that is the direction in which we need to go; that would be better than constantly reconstructing unaccountable trusts and management structures.

If democratically accountable local people take an interest in, and set priorities and local targets for, health care, the life chances of people in deprived parts of Greater Manchester, and in other cities and counties, will be transformed.

12.6 pm

Mr. Stephen O'Brien (Eddisbury) (Con): It is a pleasure to be under your chairmanship, Miss Begg, at least for the second innings of this debate. I congratulate the hon. Member for Manchester, Blackley (Graham Stringer) on securing this important and timely debate.

I shall consider the wider causes of some of the difficulties in the Pennine Acute Hospitals NHS Trust, and focus on the concomitant problems with which it has to contend. As the hon. Gentleman rightly said, this debate comes on a day when we read about a seriously unfortunate incident, in which patients in Trafford and north Manchester were mistreated and misdirected as to what might be a problem for them. As a fellow north-western Member of Parliament, I certainly share that concern; no doubt some of my constituents have been treated in those hospitals. The debate also comes a day after the Healthcare Commission's devastating report on the Mid Cheshire Hospitals NHS Trust in light of the serious failings and mismanagement of that trust that followed on from the Barbara Salisbury murder conviction.

In many ways, in a debate of this type there is difficulty in judging what it is appropriate to air in this Parliament, and what a Minister is accountable for. There has to be a certain division between what is going on locally and what a Parliament and Government truly have responsibility for. The hon. Member for Manchester, Blackley outlined that concern effectively and with some sensitivity, given some of the issues that he raised. It may be inappropriate for the Opposition spokesman to indulge too much in responding to some of those issues; that is properly a matter for the Minister, so I shall confine my remarks somewhat and shall deal with some of the underlying structures, rather than the people issues, as is appropriate.

I have certainly read the Alberti and Durose report; the obvious answer is swiftly to monitor the implementation of the 25 action points, and indeed any points that develop as a result of those being put in place. As we have seen, over the past few weeks pressure has been mounting on the Secretary of State, who is overseeing a state of tension, anxiety and even confusion in the NHS; that is because there is continual fiddling with structures, and a harrying of trusts over redesigning them yet again and over whether they should exist, rather than over what they actually do.

The Secretary of State and her Ministers are suffering sustained incoming fire from all quarters—from those on the Conservative Benches, from their own Back Benchers, and certainly from the media, health experts and Select Committees. No doubt there may be gratitude that the Secretary of State for Education and Skills has taken the focus off them in recent weeks. It is important that the accountability of Government is clear, and that structures have real, intended consequences—quite apart from unintended consequences—on local patient service delivery, because that affects the behaviour and the management of the trusts. Even now, with last week's revelations of a cash-flow crisis in the NHS, the Secretary of State and her Ministers have this blind spot for acknowledging the cuts in front-line services that they have made inevitable.

I welcome this debate, which provides an opportunity for us to give the Minister a little insight into some of the problems in the NHS brought about by the need to cut costs, not least, as has been so capably highlighted by the hon. Member for Manchester, Blackley and his three neighbouring colleagues, the hon. Members for Ashton-under-Lyne (David Heyes), for Heywood and Middleton (Jim Dobbin) and for Bury, North (Mr. Chaytor), in respect of the Pennine Acute Hospitals NHS Trust.

In spite of all the grand rhetoric of Ministers, who claim that no patient services will suffer in northern greater Manchester, the proposed scrapping of accident and emergency at the Rochdale infirmary is almost a foregone conclusion in the consultation. I note that the hon. Member for Rochdale (Paul Rowen) is in his place—or almost. Of course, all is done in the name of efficiency; but that is efficiency for Whitehall, not for local patients.

Saving some administrative costs by ever-increasing centralisation, as is happening with the conflation of PCTs, which is encouraged and targeted by the Government, does not even begin to count the real cost to the users or the staff in the NHS. One would argue that that is so, not least in areas of what were described as serious health deprivation, let alone socioeconomic deprivation, in respect of patients and residents in such areas.

The Audit Commission study, "Quicker treatment closer to home" points out that patients are better treated

"by the most appropriate healthcare professional in the most appropriate location."

That is such an obvious truism that it makes one wonder why it took the Audit Commission to state it. The drive of the restructuring plan is to centralise, thus, inevitably, there will be cuts to services.

Paul Rowen: Does the hon. Gentleman not agree that the real reason why we are faced with this centralisation—he mentioned the closure of Rochdale's accident and emergency department—is because of staffing costs, which have gone through the roof, and structures, and that we are not getting the improvements in patient care that we ought to have expected, given the level of resources?

Mr. O'Brien: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for raising that interesting point. He and I debated the subject just over a week ago with some unity, versus the Government Back-Bench representative, on the most recent incarnation of the Granada political programme, "Party People". This was precisely the area that was covered, including the reference to the Pennine Acute Hospitals NHS Trust.

There is no doubt that the question in everybody's mind is, "Where has all the money gone?" No doubt, the Minister will be aware of this sustained attack on her and her colleagues in Government. When each Member of Parliament is looking for the demonstrable improvement in health services at patient level, the thing that comes through most regularly in our advice surgeries, bureaux, or clinics, or whatever we call them, is that there is no feeling that people have recognised the uplift that should have come through from the acknowledged increase in the funds available.

Mr. Chaytor: In response to the hon. Gentleman's question, "Where has all the money gone?", I can assure him that the overwhelming majority of my constituents recognise an immeasurable improvement in the local national health service since 1997. Whether it is in respect of the speed or quality of treatment, there is immeasurable improvement.

May I ask the hon. Gentleman a question? I said earlier that nobody I have heard locally is arguing for the status quo in this reconfiguration. The debate is about the location of sites and choice of specialisms. Is the hon. Gentleman arguing that there should be no reconfiguration in north-east Manchester?

Mr. O'Brien: I am certainly not arguing for that. I am happy to be asked that question and to answer it, albeit that the Government are accountable in this area. It would be highly presumptuous of me to make decisions about an area about which I do not have the closest knowledge. Certainly, at a national level the structural issue is both fair and important. The Government are driving the targets and designing the architecture within which trusts have to operate. It seems to me that the root cause of the problem that led to today's debate is that it was always misconceived—indeed, I remember the warnings that came from Labour Members—that the Pennine Acute Hospitals NHS trust should be configured as it is. I recognise that in all these cases there will not be a uniform view and that it will therefore become a balance of argument and judgment.

My constituency is very different from that of the hon. Member for Bury, North. We have a much sparser population, which is spread over rural, hard-to-reach areas, where there are enormous pockets of social and economic deprivation, despite a perception that it is all rather leafy and wealthy. There seems to be something of a postcode lottery as to whether constituents feel that they have received the funds that have gone into health services. I am not getting the same glowing refrain through my surgery door as the hon. Gentleman apparently is about the NHS and its patient service delivery.

The drive of the restructuring plan put forward today regarding what is going on in northern Greater Manchester, which looks like the centralising of services, would inevitably result in longer response times and make it harder for friends and relatives to visit in-patients, especially when the difficulty of travel through urban communities—it is bad enough in rural areas—is taken into account. Journeys may look geographically simple on a map, but travel times are often longer in urban areas because of congestion and the difficulties of patterns of travel, which the hon. Member for Manchester, Blackley and others mentioned. Clearly, the appropriate location is surely the most accessible one.

I return briefly to Rochdale, which could lose its accident and emergency department and become a locality hospital—

Jim Dobbin: It is not my information that the A and E will close in Rochdale. Eighty per cent. of the cases that would normally go to A and Es will still be treated there. I ask the Minister to clarify that point. There is some political opportunism in this debate.

Mr. O'Brien: This is a fair opportunity to raise such issues, although it may not suit Labour Back Benchers to hear that sometimes it is not all rosy in the garden. Whether it is the whole A and E department or just the emergency and immediate services that are to be affected, we must consider carefully what is intended. That is why it is quite proper to raise these issues of accountability with a Minister present. If it is to become a locality hospital—

Jim Dobbin: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. O'Brien: I am running out of time. Having given everyone an opportunity to intervene, I need to move things on.

The Best for Health website optimistically describes a locality hospital as one that is "larger than a . . . community hospital, but smaller than a . . . general hospital."

On closer inspection, we see that a locality hospital provides outside routine procedures as an urgent care centre—little more than basic first aid—and "out-of-hours services, dental services, mental health services, social care services and voluntary services."

That would not be very reassuring with a serious A and E case. More worryingly, as we watch the Government's attempts to close or make cuts in at least 90 community hospitals out of the 323 in the country, how long would it be before the dispersed locality hospital, if that is what Rochdale is to become, is deemed no longer to be a worthwhile use of resources?

The other main argument put forward by Best for Health for restructuring is the prospective shortage of doctors due to the European working time directive, which comes into force fully in August 2009. Of course, it was the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions, who was then the Minister of State for Health, who in January 2004 after the SIMAP and Jaegar rulings said:

"Complying with the Working Time Directive need be neither costly nor a burden."

We continue to await the findings of the European Employment and Social Policy, Health and Consumer Affairs Council, and hope that it will confirm the decision of UK politicians that on-call time spent not working should not count towards total working time. That would certainly limit the damage and cuts in services. We will do what we can to help the Government win on that point of interpretation.

We want some accountability from the Minister regarding the effect that restructuring is having on the Pennine Acute Hospitals NHS Trust. If the Minister commented on the personnel issues, that would be helpful, because hon. Members are clearly looking for an answer.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Caroline Flint): In the short time available, I shall try to cover the points that hon. Members have made in this Adjournment debate. I start, however, by congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Blackley (Graham Stringer) on securing it.

Some interesting points have been raised, but before I get into them, let me express my concern about the involvement of the two trusts in the anxiety caused to the women who were not properly diagnosed for breast cancer. The Greater Manchester strategic health authority has commissioned an independent review to discover how and why those errors occurred, and I am sure that we all want it to be rigorous, so that the problem does not, as far as possible, arise again.

Several points have been made about health inequalities and reconfiguration. At the heart of the discussion is the issue of what our health service is for. As Minister with responsibility for public health, I suggest that the health service has tended to focus on responding to illness, which is quite understandable, given that people who are ill want treatment and want it to be to the best possible standard. For the past 50 years, the emphasis has more or less been on providing services in hospitals, which is also understandable, given the development of the national health service from where it was 50 years ago, with the needs and priorities that existed then, to where it is today.

What is interesting about this discussion is that we have all experienced a change in how we think about the delivery of health services, whether as patients or members of the public with family members or friends in hospital, or as a result of taking advantage of health services in the community. In another Adjournment debate that I attended, it was suggested, for example, that 40 per cent. of orthopaedic referrals could be handled outside hospital, rather than inside.

Those issues are important because they have an impact on what we think hospitals are for and on how effectively they can deliver, which brings me to the point about health inequalities. It is undoubtedly the case that more people in England are living longer. More people from all social and economic groups are benefiting from the technology used to treat heart disease and cancer, and are getting the right medication and treatment. Although the overall picture is good, however, the reality is that there is still a gap on mortality issues between those who are less well off and those who are better off. We have to look beneath the radar to address what is happening.

As Minister with responsibility for public health, I suggest that one reason for that gap is that there needs to be a better focus on health inequalities within different areas. Regardless of whether a PCT is large or small, or whether the majority of people in a PCT area are relatively affluent and well educated, I would ask whether those who are less affluent and most in need are getting the health service they deserve to meet their needs. That issue must be addressed as part of the PCT reconfiguration.

PCTs, whatever their size, must look at the health outcomes for their communities to ensure that they attend to those most in need. Alongside that is the issue of whether how we provide health services meets the needs of those who most need them. Perhaps they need a different service that will impact in a way that traditional services clearly have not. That is a hugely important debate.

On the financial situation, it is interesting that we are getting better value for money in terms of delivery in some of our poorer neighbourhoods, where the health inequalities are very clear. When we look at the trusts in deficit, we gain some interesting perspectives on those that are most in deficit. Such trusts are in a minority, but some are in more well-off areas with considerably fewer issues of health outcomes linked to deprivation, although I am not saying that they have no health inequalities issues. There are some important questions to be asked about that.

My hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Blackley hit on a number of issues, and was absolutely right to refer to the Alberti and Durose report on the Pennine Acute Hospitals NHS Trust. We have had a reasonable discussion about the issues that have arisen. It is worrying that a clash between consultants and management led to a vote of no confidence by consultants, and it is worrying that the report had to be produced in the first place, but that's life—not everything works as well as we think it should.

There were 25 recommendations in the report, which were aimed at strengthening the organisation in a number of different ways. Linked to that is an important point raised about confidence in leadership. This morning, different views have been expressed about whether the chair and the chief executive should consider their position and about ensuring that the report's recommendations are made to work and kept under review.

A big issue was raised about the lack of communication, which seemed to be one of the issues at the heart of why the five sites were not working together effectively, how people felt about their part in the trust's organisation and the sense of ownership of all the sites. Those are important.

As I said, the report made 25 recommendations. It is important for all concerned that the action plan that I understand has been drawn up should be made to work, and that there should be transparency over how those recommendations are made to work and how the action plan is carried out for the future. Clearly, if the points raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Blackley are not attended to, they will have to be addressed again to ensure that progress is being made, and to find out why if it is not.

My hon. Friend described how the structure of the trust has contributed to the situation. Different views on that issue have been expressed and the report stops short of suggesting that now is the time for restructuring and a break-up of the trust. As one of my hon. Friends said, the report is clear that there is not the best case for doing that now. However, in light of the comments made this morning and the report itself, those issues need to be kept under review. If the recommendations are to be seen to work, they need to take account of the concerns expressed by my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Blackley.

The size of organisations presents a difficult situation. I do not think that there is a perfect size in any situation; part of the problem is addressing how the structure and management of the organisation work and, importantly, what the organisation delivers for people. That is key. Linked to that is a discussion taking place in the Greater Manchester area about how services could be better delivered.

I want to make it clear that the Rochdale hospital issue is not about there not being access to accident and emergency services; it is about a blue-light service not operating. As my hon. Friend the Member for Heywood and Middleton (Jim Dobbin) said, 80 per cent. of people who come to accident and emergency do not need a blue-light service. I have seen for myself the beneficial outcome of walk-in centres and other services that can better meet the needs of those people. They are important because hospitals can then get on with the jobs they specialise in on behalf of the local community.

My hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Blackley made points about safety and choice. The issue of choice is important—speaking for my area, I am sure that many in Doncaster would choose to go to their local hospital—but if an elderly lady's family members lived 50 miles away, she might choose to have an operation closest to them so that they could look after and visit her. So choice is an interesting debate; it is part of the future and involves addressing what people need.

A lot of issues have been raised this morning, and I hope that hon. Members agree that I have had limited time to respond to them, but I have spoken to the Under-Secretary of State for Health, my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Byrne). As the Minister with regional responsibility, he is obviously concerned about the issues. This morning, he asked me to convey the fact that he is willing to look further into them to ensure that the recommendations are carried out to everybody's satisfaction.

St. Bartholomew's Hospital

12.30 pm

Mr. Mark Field (Cities of London and Westminster) (Con): It gives me little pleasure to introduce this Adjournment debate, because a dark cloud hangs over the very existence of one of this country's oldest and most respected hospitals, St. Bartholomew's, known affectionately and universally as Barts.

That cloud was thought by all of us who represent constituencies in central and east London to have passed by when eight years ago, the Government announced their strategic medical review of those diverse areas. It has reappeared, however, and it is seemingly blacker than ever.

Just before Christmas, the Department of Health announced that it had commissioned a fundamental review of the Barts and The London NHS Trust private finance initiative on the grounds of affordability and need. For a decade or more, the departments of this most respected hospital have been consistently undermined by political uncertainty. Today, the anxiety levels have become almost unbearable for staff, local residents and countless others throughout the NHS, because of the imminent demise of Barts as a leading London hospital.

It seems scarcely believable that this wonderful hospital, founded as long ago as 1123, and in receipt of its royal charter from Henry VIII in the 1540s, may soon be no more. Once again, however, that seems to be the case.

I take no pride in confessing that it was my party, the Conservative party, who when last in government sought to implement the Tomlinson report. The report was predicated on user figures that applied in the depths of the early 1990s recession, and manifestly have not been borne out by the evidence of the past decade and a half. It is of great regret that my party put in place some of the reforms that have so adversely affected Barts and upset the residential population of not only the City, but the whole of London and much of the UK.

Ms Diane Abbott (Hackney, North and Stoke Newington) (Lab): I am grateful that the hon. Gentleman has been graceful enough to acknowledge the role of previous Governments in casting a shadow over Barts. Does he agree that as well as serving people throughout London, Barts has a particular place in the hearts of east enders? That is why we fought a tremendous struggle against the Tomlinson proposals and why we are so upset that now, at the very last minute, the project seems to be in danger.

Mr. Field: I entirely endorse the words of the hon. Lady. Although the Homerton university hospital is closer to her constituents, Barts none the less predates it by several centuries. The same applies to the Royal London hospital and other hospitals in Newham and beyond.

Emily Thornberry (Islington, South and Finsbury) (Lab): Is the hon. Gentleman aware that despite my constituency's reputation, it is one of the most deprived constituencies in Britain? Bunhill ward, which I have the pleasure of representing, is one of the poorest wards in

[Emily Thornberry]

Britain. Its coronary heart disease death rate is 60 per cent. higher than would be expected, and it abuts that hospital.

In the Bunhill, Canonbury and Holloway wards, the death rates from lung cancer are 70 per cent. higher than would be expected. We need an expert hospital that plays a central part in the hearts of my constituents. We were hoping to take advantage of our ability to select which hospital we go to—and to select the hospital that has for generations looked after my constituents.

Mr. Field: I thank the hon. Lady for her words of support. I once aspired to represent a part of her constituency when I was a council candidate in Islington some 16 years ago. My candidature was not for as impoverished an area as Bunhill, but in spite of that, the electors were still not going to go for a Conservative candidate.

I hope that this issue is of great interest not only to the Minister but to the Government beyond. It affects me, as a constituency Member of Parliament in the heart of London. As has been rightly said, it affects other parts of the capital, too, because the hospital has a tremendous history.

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): Is my hon. Friend aware that the hospital's patients and staff include my constituents? They are deeply concerned, because in treating cancer and heart disease, the hospital has excellent clinical outcomes. They want to see it go from strength to strength, not damaged.

Mr. Field: I am grateful for those kind words from the Isle of Sheppey and beyond.

This debate is about marshalling the forces among parliamentary colleagues, such as those we have heard from in the past few moments, not only to ensure the survival of this hospital but to create a valuable future for the benefit of all Londoners and the many medical professionals who will gain valuable experience within its portals in the years ahead.

In April 2002, I hosted a similar debate on the future of St. Bartholomew's hospital. That debate took place on the day of an announcement by the Government of significant new expenditure on public health care funded by many of the taxpayers who make up the daytime population of the City of London. I shall quote from Hansard part of a reply given by the then Health Minister, the right hon. Member for Barrow and Furness (Mr. Hutton), who was at that time most complimentary about the capability of Barts and adamant that its future was secure as a centre of medical excellence, especially for cardiac and cancer care:

> "The minor injuries unit continues to operate at St. Barts . . . and will be retained as part of the new development. There is no prospect of its disappearing."—[Official Report, Westminster Hall, 17 April 2002; Vol. 383, c. 238WH.]

Yet here we are less than four years on, and the outlook is much bleaker.

Meg Hillier (Hackney, South and Shoreditch) (Lab/Co-op): I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on securing this important debate. Does he agree that the key question is why the review is happening now, at the eleventh hour, with a cost to the NHS of holding up this development?

Mr. Field: I agree entirely, and the hon. Lady might not appreciate that the Westminster side of my constituency has had a similar problem with the Paddington health campus in relation to St. Mary's, Paddington. Great amounts of money have been spent, as has been well documented, and £100 million will be lost if this private finance initiative project does not go ahead because Skanska has already expended that money, which is ring-fenced from its point of view. As the hon. Lady says, it is inexplicable that a review is taking place at this stage. It makes no sense financially, apart from the other problems to which I referred and shall continue to refer during the rest of my speech.

Barts is internationally renowned for medical excellence. Institutionally, it is equally well-known throughout the nation. I would not mind betting that if we asked people anywhere in the United Kingdom to name a hospital other than their own local general hospital, Barts would be mentioned more than any other. I am afraid to say that it has only been in the 58 years since the nationalised health service came into being that the future of England's oldest hospital has been threatened.

I said at the outset that introducing this debate gives me no pleasure. After five years of representing the Cities of London and Westminster constituency, I am completely at a loss to understand, just as the hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Meg Hillier) was a moment ago, the Government's strategy for the provision of health care in central and east London. Judging from my own postbag and discussions with the many health professionals in my constituency, others share that incomprehension.

In a letter published in the Evening Standard last week, Alistair Wilson, the accident and emergency clinical director of the Barts and The London NHS Trust, put the case on the broken promises to Barts and the London succinctly. He highlighted the crucial capacity offered by the two hospitals during the 7 July bombings last year. One of those bombings took place on the edge of my constituency, by Aldgate tube station. He also wrote about the expectations of what Barts and the London will do when the next terrorist strike occurs—we pray to God that that will not happen any time soon—or indeed during the London Olympics in six years' time.

The nation is united in its support for Barts as a hospital and as a national treasure. Last week, I met Professor Charles Hinds, who spent his entire medical career at Barts, to discuss the critical importance of the PFI project to the future of the hospital. Without PFI, Barts probably has no future as a medical institution. There has already been huge investment in the new breast cancer centre in the west wing of Barts, which was predicated on the fully-fledged PFI taking place. Without the revenue from a cardiac and cancer care centre at Barts, the entire business case for the PFI, and the work of the Royal London in relation to cancer and heart care, seems to fail.

Mr. Andrew Lansley (South Cambridgeshire) (Con): I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way; he has been generous with his time. Does he agree that following a discussion I had last night with five very senior consultants from the Barts and The London NHS Trust, it seems increasingly clear that the demand for cancer and cardiac care and major trauma at the trust is undeniable? The question that the Treasury raised at the last minute concerns the affordability of the scheme. Does he also agree—I hope that the Minister will respond directly to this point—that the worst value-for-money outcome for the NHS would be for the project not to proceed at this stage? Major penalties of up to £100 million would be incurred if the project had not proceeded by 31 January, as intended.

Mr. Field: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. Clearly, there is a financial case, but, none the less, as he has rightly pointed out, even that begins to fall when the facts of the matter are put into place. He also touched on demand. Demand is very prevalent in the parts of London that I represent and that are represented by the three hon. Ladies who have spoken and the hon. Member for Leyton and Wanstead (Harry Cohen), who has not. It is estimated that there will be some 300,000 new residents in the Thames Gateway and a further 100,000 in Tower Hamlets. That is based on the Government's figures for population increase in the east of London. At a time of such planned population increase and with the average age of many local residents rising substantially, the decision to put Barts under threat seems short-sighted in the extreme.

There is no need for us to shake our heads; we need to get together and put the wheels of this PFI back on the rails. I am cheered by the fact that so many Government Members are present today. I understand that they will be making their feelings plain to the Prime Minister in a meeting later tonight with the right hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Frank Dobson), who was the very Minister who announced the saving of Barts in 1998. I am under no illusions. As an Opposition Member of Parliament there is only so much that I can do. Perhaps I can raise the profile of the issue, but, ultimately, it is for Government Back Benchers to have their say. I hope that it will be clear to the Minister that there is a unity of purpose among all of us who represent this vibrant part of the capital.

The operation of the PFI is causing great grief. It may be expensive, but it is the only funding option in town for our hospitals today. The failure of this PFI in health care, alongside the recent breakdown in the major development in St. Mary's hospital, Paddington, may prove the thin end of the wedge. Other contracts, such as the one operating at the Queen Elizabeth hospital in Woolwich, will bring trepidation to those who are relying on the future success of PFI programmes nationwide for their health care.

In my previous debate in 2002, I made the point to the then Minister that we must have an eye on the decades to come rather than simply on the past. I appreciate that one could talk about the historic importance of Barts, going back almost 900 years, but if we look at the future, even in the past four years the Government have developed quite detailed plans to build many more homes in the Thames Gateway, especially for key workers who will be servicing central London day by day. Obviously, we have also won the Olympics bid in the past seven months. Whatever increase finally occurs, the east end of London, as one of the poorest communities in England—it is the poorer areas where the highest rates of heart disease and cancer occur, as the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Emily Thornberry) pointed out—deserves more investment in medical care, not less. It is painful to report the Government's intention to turn their back on the population of the east end of London.

The case for redeveloping Barts and all its services has been made a long time ago and it is now a matter of the Government finding the money and letting that project blossom. Some people may wish to talk up the importance of cardiac and cancer care at Barts, but I want to talk about maintaining the viability of all the hospital's current operations and their importance both locally and nationally.

Four years ago, in the light of the attacks in New York and Washington on 11 September 2001, I challenged a Health Minister on what would happen should a major terrorist incident occur in the City and the important role that Barts and the London would undoubtedly play in the care of the injured. Tragically, such an event came to pass on 7 July last year. I should like to quote again from Alastair Wilson's letter. He said:

> "On 7 July thirty major incident trained doctors and paramedics were transported to the sites of the explosions; trauma teams were assembled from all over the Trust to treat the awful shrapnel injuries and amputations caused by the bombs—we drew on all our expertise, including our cancer and cardiac colleagues from Bart's many of whom work also at the Royal London because of their interest in trauma care".

Those same people now feel desperately let down by a Government who only seven months ago were happy to bathe in the public's approval of our front-line health care professionals by stressing how their investment had led to such capability in the face of those terrible terrorist incidents. Alastair Wilson's words, and those of his colleagues, speak far more eloquently than anything that I can manage about the importance of Barts and the Royal London acting in concert.

After decades of under-investment in local medical infrastructure, I believe that the people who live and work in the City and the east end of London deserve the centres of clinical excellence and medical care that they were promised. We will all continue fighting to ensure that we achieve them in the years ahead.

12.45 pm

Ms Diane Abbott (Hackney, North and Stoke Newington) (Lab): It was eight years ago that the people of the east end and Londoners generally fought a tremendous struggle to save Barts hospital. The proposals then came from a Conservative Government, and we were proud that a Labour Minister for Health was able to announce that he would save Barts. It is therefore with deep sadness that I rise to contemplate yet another threat to the future and viability of Barts and the Royal London.

To remind hon. Members who were not here eight years ago, the argument then, in the light of the Tomlinson review, was that there was too much medical provision in London: it was over-resourced with hospitals and health care, and that that was why Barts had to close. It is sad indeed to have to revisit those arguments. However, as colleagues will remind the Chamber, there are pockets of poverty in inner London as bad as anywhere in Britain.

Taking a slide rule or a tape measure to the number of hospitals within the M25 and arguing that London is overprovided misses other factors, such as the high number of refugees with endemic health problems and the logistical problems in London. It is easy to take a ruler and stretch it across a map from Stoke Newington to the Royal London hospital and ask, "Why do these people need Barts when they can go somewhere else in London?" People should try joining a mother with a push chair and a couple of children on the three buses that it takes to get from parts of my constituency to the Royal London to understand how ludicrous that position is. Eight years ago we fought with Ministers about that slide-rule, accountants' approach to medical care. That approach did not consider the need and the endemic problems—including the understating of the population in London by the census and other statisticians, and the poor housing—yet, on the basis of accountancy rules, said that we had too much health care. However, we are now revisiting the issue.

As I said, Barts is not the closest hospital to my constituency. However, although Homerton hospital has an excellent reputation and is one of the leading hospitals in London, Barts has a special place in the hearts of Londoners, not only because it has been there for so long but because of the high standard of care that Londoners, particularly in the east end, have grown accustomed to receiving there.

Emily Thornberry: Taking the slide-rule approach to consider the future of Barts for a moment, does my hon. Friend appreciate that the current price of the cardiac and cancer care services that Barts provides for the east end and north of London is some £16 million? If Barts were redeveloped under the private finance initiative, that would be £20 million—an additional £4 million. To uncouple Barts from the London PFI would not make a dramatic difference, given the amount of money that we are using in any event. I would suggest that we need not turn our back on the PFI, even under the slide-rule test.

Ms Abbott: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for making that point. Even under the rules of cold-hearted accountants, it does not make sense to decouple the development at Barts from the bigger PFI, which includes the Royal London.

Meg Hillier: Given that north-west London has five hospitals specialising in heart problems, does my hon. Friend agree that it is right that my constituents and hers should also have access to a good heart hospital in the east end?

Ms Abbott: That is right, but I do not want to take the argument forward on the basis of comparison, because that is what got us into trouble in the Tomlinson review. I want to take the argument forward on the basis of need, and the need for the services that Barts produces is real and quantifiable. Barts commands a special affection in the hearts of Londoners. They were promised that it would be saved and that they would have world-class cardiac facilities on that site. I cannot believe that my Government intend to go back on that promise now. If, at the last minute, there is an attempt to decouple the Barts part of the PFI from the general redevelopment of London, that will cost the taxpayer money. Skanska, the approved developer, could walk away with £100 million in compensation. What sense does that make?

I understand from Ministers that they are asking for the review at the last minute because the decision was made four years ago and things have changed in four years. Let me tell them that there are not fewer people; there are not fewer ill people nor are there fewer people suffering from heart disease and cancer in my constituency than there were four years ago. What do they believe has become so much better about health outcomes in the east end that they can justify throwing away £100 million of taxpayers' money on compensation to a developer at the last minute?

Miss Anne Begg (in the Chair): Order. I remind the hon. Lady that this is a half-hour debate and we have to allow the Minister time to reply. She already has less than 10 minutes to do so. If the hon. Lady can wind up her remarks now, I should be most grateful.

Ms Abbott: I would not dream of not allowing the Minister time to reply.

The review of the Barts and The London PFI at this late stage makes no financial sense. It makes no health care sense. It makes no political sense. I can assure the Minister that the issue goes beyond party loyalties, and that all concerned and involved MPs in London will unite to fight the latest threat to Barts.

12.52 pm

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Jane Kennedy): It is a pleasure to be debating this subject. I congratulate the hon. Member for Cities of London and Westminster (Mr. Field) on securing the debate about the future of Barts. I accept that it is a subject of worry not only to his constituents but, as demonstrated by the presence here of his hon. Friends and my hon. Friends, clearly one of great interest to them. I have been following the debate in the local media, too. I acknowledge up front the role played by Barts and the Royal London in the emergency that faced London last year. No one who watched those events without the great sadness and horror that we all shared could have anything other than admiration for the way in which the staff responded in the circumstances.

I also say up front that there are no plans to close St. Bartholomew's hospital. Barts is renowned internationally for its medical and nursing excellence. It was founded in 1123, well before the creation of the NHS. Today, it provides a range of specialities from a 388-bed facility.

Lyn Brown (West Ham) (Lab): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Jane Kennedy: After the interventions that have been made, I have only a few minutes in which to respond to the debate. It is important that I reply to the points that have been made. If my hon. Friend will forgive me, I shall press on.

I have been asked to explain why we are in such a situation. For many years, it has been widely acknowledged that there is a need to develop the facilities that are provided through the hospitals. Much of the estate is old and generally in poor condition. It was not designed to support 21st century health care and it is in need of modernisation. I acknowledge that, and I hope that it will be accepted that the Government acknowledge it, too. Departments at Barts and the Royal London are not co-located for efficiency. The buildings do not lend themselves to the implementation of modern models of care. There is a need for new facilities in that part of London.

A scheme of such a size or complexity has not been undertaken by the NHS before. It provides a total of 1,248 beds across two sites. When complete, it will be Britain's biggest new hospital. Therefore, it is right and proper for us to undertake greater scrutiny when the proposals are of such magnitude. We will soon be publishing a White Paper on the future of health care services in the community. We have been listening to what the public tell us about how they want to move some services from hospitals out into local communities wherever it is safe and economic to do so. People want personalised services that are built around their needs.

Mr. Mark Field rose—

Jane Kennedy: If the hon. Gentleman will forgive me, I will not give way. I listened carefully to what he said, and he will have opportunities after the debate to make further representations to me.

People tell us that they want more services delivered away from hospitals and closer to them in communities. For that reason, the local NHS in this case was asked to commission the independent review that is ongoing of the proposed redevelopment of Bart's. That is not intended to be a long review or to add costs in the way described; I know that fears exist about the implications of it for the overall scheme. We genuinely want to ensure that we have the right balance of services in north-east London before making a commitment that will last for 42 years, which the health service in London will be expected to meet and which will expand cardiac and cancer services. I hope that the hon. Members for Cities of London and Westminster and for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) agree that that is a sensible step to take. Any new proposal must offer the best value for money and be affordable by the health economy.

When the business case was submitted to officials, there were still a number of outstanding commercial issues to resolve. That is not intended as a criticism of the trust or of those engaged in drawing up the bid: it is perfectly normal to have outstanding issues at this stage of the process. However, because a scheme of this size and complexity has never been undertaken in the NHS before, it has taken longer than normal, and longer than we would have wanted, to resolve the outstanding issues satisfactorily and to finalise the review of the business case.

Part of that process has resulted in our request to the strategic health authority further to demonstrate the need to expand cardiac and cancer services at Bart's. North East London SHA has therefore commissioned an urgent review to ensure that the NHS in east London has the right hospital capacity to meet the needs not only of east Londoners, but of those in the City of London, who have an interest too. There have been significant reductions in waiting lists in recent years, and a great deal of money has been expended. It would be reckless to go ahead without that proper scrutiny. I hope that those who are debating with me this afternoon agree that we should all be prepared to accept that hospital and community services will, from time to time, need to change if we are to continue to fulfil patients' needs, improve services and meet patients' aspirations as I have described.

Mr. Lansley: Will the Minister give way?

Jane Kennedy: If the hon. Gentleman will forgive me, I will not. I would welcome representations from him and his hon. Friends after the debate, but in the few moments that I have left now, I want to reiterate that services should not remain static for ever, but should reflect advances in technology and clinical practice. Throughout the transitional phase—the closing phases of this PFI process—staff involved in the scheme and those who have continued to provide health care to patients have worked tirelessly. I have been taking an active interest in the project, and it is important that I, not with ministerial responsibility for the PFI process but with responsibility for London services, acknowledge how tirelessly the staff engaged in the project have been working. I pay tribute to all those who contribute to the excellent work of these hospitals.

I assure the hon. Member for Cities of London and Westminster that officials are working closely with North East London SHA and the trust to arrive quickly at the best solution for the local health economy. I appreciate the anxiety and interest shown by those who have participated in this debate, and by those who wanted to participate and to whom I have been a little mean. The hon. Member for Cities of London and Westminster was far more gracious in giving way than I have been able to be; it would be my normal practice to give way. However, I have listened to what has been said today and I am reading what is being said by staff at the hospital through the pages of the local press. We are working closely with all concerned to resolve the issue as quickly as possible with the best outcome not only for east Londoners, who are close to my heart, but for everyone who has an interest in the services that these hospitals provide.

Asylum and Detention (Government Policy)

1 pm

Harry Cohen (Leyton and Wanstead) (Lab): On the previous debate, as an east London MP, I want to say that I support the case for the redevelopment of Bart's.

Miss Anne Begg (in the Chair): Order. I know how tempting that may be, and obviously there is a lot of interest in the matter, but hon. Members must wait for another debate.

Harry Cohen: Miss Begg, will you thank Mr. Speaker for choosing me to introduce this debate on asylum and detention—with the emphasis on detention? The number of people claiming asylum in the UK and in other industrialised countries is declining. In the UK, the numbers have dropped dramatically—by as much as 61 per cent. over the last two years, according to the UN High Commissioner for Refugees. In spite of that, the number of those who have claimed asylum at some stage and who are detained solely under the powers of the Immigration and Asylum Act 1999 has increased. Given that the number of places to detain such people has tripled under this Government, it is crucial that the House look closely at what is happening and consider seriously what the implications of such a policy may be.

I have asked for this debate because I believe that the detention of people who have sought asylum in the UK remains a hidden plight. The Minister will, I am sure, be aware of the fact that Amnesty International looked at the very issue earlier this year. The organisation reached some incredibly disturbing conclusions, which I believe warrant closer inspection and consideration.

The human cost of detention is far too high. It inflicts untold misery on the individuals concerned and their families. Those held in detention include some of the most vulnerable people who in most societies, including ours, are identified as needing the most support and protection. I am talking about families with young children, torture survivors, pregnant women, the elderly and those with serious medical conditions.

People are detained miles away from their family and friends. They are often held in grim, prison-like establishments. Many are not clear about the circumstances of their detention. They sometimes do not understand why they are being held. Those interviewed by Amnesty International were not told how long they would be detained. There is no maximum time limit for detention, and no automatic judicial scrutiny as to the lawfulness and the necessity of the detention. If the onus were placed on the UK authorities to justify such use of detention, I would not like to hazard a guess as to how many decisions to detain would be questioned and perhaps overturned.

Those interviewed by Amnesty International had all fully complied with reporting restrictions at the time that they were taken into detention. The Minister may argue that those people were detained because there may have been a credible risk of their absconding. Maybe so, but with no meaningful assessment of that risk, how can he be so sure?

There are people languishing in detention, sometimes for as long as two years. That has negative repercussions for individuals, and particularly for their mental health. Detainees say that they were frustrated by the lack of information and by feelings of abandonment and loneliness. Some had self-harmed and attempted suicide. Some complained of the verbal and racial abuse that they suffered. All that points to untold misery, and this is the plight of people who have committed no crime.

The Government have often claimed that detention is pivotal to their strategy to remove asylum seekers whose claims have been dismissed. They have also claimed that detention would be used only as a last resort. However, Amnesty International found that many people were detained at different points of the asylum process. I confirm from my casework that that can be at the beginning, in the middle or at the end of such a case, when the prospect of effecting their forcible removal within a reasonable time is slim. This is not really a last resort, then.

We have no idea how many people are held in detention. Amnesty International believes that twice as many people are detained as are removed each year. It is estimated that 25,000 people were held in detention in 2004. It is unacceptable that we do not know for sure how many people are detained. We do not know how long they are detained for and we have no profile of those held in detention. That gap in general knowledge must be filled.

In April last year, the Government introduced new funding arrangements for legal work on asylum and immigration cases in England and Wales, with the aim of cutting the overall public funding for such work. I realise that that policy area is not necessarily within the Minister's remit, but he must be aware of the effect that it is having on his area of responsibility. The cuts in legal aid have resulted in the withdrawal of established solicitors from that vital area of work, which has created a gap in expertise that is felt most by those held in detention who are at the end of the asylum process. What hope is there for them if they do not get adequate legal representation?

I have referred extensively to Amnesty International, but last July there was a briefing from Save the Children to Members of the House, which made some important points about children held in the detention system. Save the Children said that it was worried about "the negative impact that detention has on children's emotional and physical wellbeing"

and

"the worrying lack of safeguards and child protection ... for these children."

It also said that the processes for taking the welfare of children into account

"in the decision to detain are ineffective."

Save the Children raised concerns about the effectiveness of existing review procedures for ensuring that the detention of children is not prolonged. It pointed out that it is Government policy for the immigration service to give written reasons for detention in all cases, at the time of detention and at intervals thereafter, but the briefing says:

"Evidence from our research suggests that few families are given initial reasons for detention, and there were families who were subject to unnecessary periods of detention because procedures for reviewing the decision to detain were ineffective. The European Human Rights Commissioner also raises these concerns, and HMIP's reports criticised the reviews for not being informed by external social work expertise or by the experience of staff involved in the direct care of children."

The briefing goes on to talk about ministerial authorisation in relation to children who are detained for more than 28 days. Ministers are supposed to authorise such cases every 28 days and every week thereafter. Save the Children says:

"There is no public evidence on the implementation of the ministerial authorisation process or the reviews on which they are supposed to be based. Neither is there any statistical information on how many authorisations have been sought and how many have been granted or declined. It has been expressly criticised by the European Human Rights Commissioner who believes it to be inadequate because it is an administrative decision without any form of hearing."

Save the Children goes on to say that, in 2002, Her Majesty's inspector of prisons recommended that there should be an independent assessment of the welfare, developmental and educational needs of each detained child. Save the Children says that no system for that is in place. I presume that it is still not in place, even now. Perhaps the Minister will confirm that.

Save the Children talks about prolonged detention and the fact that that can happen through an incremental process. It quotes the European Commissioner for Human Rights:

"It is not acceptable ... that such lengthy detention should remain at all times at the discretion of the immigration service, however senior the authority may be."

Finally, it offers another quote from the European Commissioner for Human Rights:

"It is perverse that the burden should lie on the child or his family to take arduous steps to challenge their detention, rather than on the Immigration Service to prove its continuing necessity to an independent authority."

Recently, there was a press conference to launch a document called "A 'Bleak House' for Our Times", which was produced by Legal Action for Women. The document looks into what is happening at the Yarl's Wood centre, and I want to mention some points that were made at that press conference. Concern was expressed on various issues, including the fact that those who are suicidal are placed on a suicide watch that involves their being woken at timed intervals with flash lights, which is likely to remind victims of previous traumas and to cause severe sleep deprivation.

Concern was also expressed at the fact that there is no mechanism to prevent victims of torture from being detained; that the outsourcing of medical care services results in detainees having restricted access to health professionals; that the detention centre manager is obtrusive and often refuses detainees medical attention, in some cases overruling the decision of the nurses and health professionals; that representation, when it is received, is often poor and undermines cases; and that lawyers' charges are too high for the people held in the centre.

Legal Action for Women also said that there is a distinct lack of information about the fast-track scheme and that those who are detained do not know of it. It added that although there is a women's detention centre at Yarl's Wood, 70 per cent. of the staff are male. It went so far as to call for a full public inquiry on the issue of detention.

The right to liberty is one of the most fundamental human rights protected under international law, and it is a serious violation of that right to detain an individual arbitrarily. It should concern us all if, as seems to be the case, there is a real possibility that people are being detained unjustly. For that reason, I urge the Minister to ensure that each decision to detain is seriously considered. Such a decision should not be made lightly, but should be overseen by a court or a similar independent body with the competence to review each decision regularly. Does he agree that that is the only way for us to ensure that we do not detain people arbitrarily and that we treat people humanely, as is our duty under international law?

Will the Minister consider reinstating the provision made in the Immigration and Asylum Act 1999 for two automatic bail hearings for all immigration detainees after seven and 35 days in detention, which would thus ensure that they were protected against prolonged and unnecessary detention? Given that detention should only ever be used as a last resort, will he make it his policy that alternative non-custodial measures, such as reporting, will always be considered before resorting to detention? That should be the policy for all asylum applications, including those considered under the so-called fast-track process. Does he agree?

I find it extraordinary that no comprehensive statistics are made available in the course of a year on the number of people who have sought asylum and who are held in detention. Nor, of course, is there any information on how long those people are held. That cannot be right. In 2003, the Home Affairs Committee noted that the lack of comprehensive data on detention made it difficult to judge whether detention was really being used as a last resort, primarily to support removal, as the Government have claimed.

The Committee recommended that the figures be provided quarterly, but they are still not available. When will they be ready? It has been two years since the Committee made its recommendation. Why, after all this time, are the figures still not available? Can the Minister give us a concrete date for when they will be? Vulnerable people are being held in detention, and the cost for them is particularly high. Can he guarantee that no vulnerable person will be held in detention?

Recently, I employed a bright young woman called Anna Boaden. Unbeknown to me, although it must have been in her CV somewhere, she did her dissertation on the detention of asylum seekers. Her conclusion contains a crucial argument:

"It has become increasingly apparent that detention is no longer being used as an administrative device to facilitate the deportation of failed asylum applicants, just as it is evident that preventing people from absconding is not a primary justification for why increasing numbers of asylum seekers are being detained. Rather, it is becoming a tool of deterrence, a method of warning to would be applicants that Britain is no longer a soft touch. Not only does this message run against the spirit of the Geneva Convention, it is also arbitrarily detaining those who do not fall into the categories that appear in article 5(1)(f) of the European Convention on Human Rights. The process of detaining asylum seekers further excludes them from society, and contradicts non-discrimination policy."

I do not know whether that is true, but if detention is being used as a tool of deterrence in any single case, that is an unsuitable use of detention and is, potentially, against international law. Let us have the information—the data—so it can be tested. If the Government say that that is not the purpose, let us see whether that is so.

In conclusion, depriving people of their liberty is a serious measure and no decision to detain should be taken lightly. The Government themselves said that they would use detention only as a last resort, which signals the seriousness with which such decisions should be taken.

There appear to be no rigorous checks and balances on how detention is administered. It is crucial that that be addressed by the Government—not only to restore faith in the system, but, more importantly, to ensure that they deliver a fair and efficient asylum system. Although it is not unlawful in some circumstances for the Government to detain people who have sought asylum in the UK, it is unlawful for them to detain individuals arbitrarily. I call on the Government to take all the necessary steps to end arbitrary detention.

I look forward to the Minister's response and ask him to focus particularly on the issues of judicial oversight, automatic bail review, the availability of statistics, the use of non-custodial measures and an end to the detention of vulnerable people.

1.18 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Andy Burnham): I should like to begin by thanking you, Miss Begg, for your intervention at the start of the debate. I was worried for a second that I might have to answer questions on St. Bartholomew's private finance initiative, as well as on detention and the immigration service.

On a serious point, I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Leyton and Wanstead (Harry Cohen) on securing this debate. He is right to do so, because it is a matter of important public policy and it is right that there is the fullest possible debate about such serious issues. I agree with him at the start by saying that, by definition, the matter involves some very vulnerable people, which is why it is important that we debate these issues openly and are clear about the policy. I also congratulate Amnesty International on raising public awareness of the issues concerned.

These are difficult issues of public policy, and it is important that we foster an informed public debate about them. I say "informed", because it is important that when conducting this debate, people on both sides of the issues stick to the facts and that the language used is temperate and accurately describes the situation. I am not describing this debate, but in other instances, recently, particularly in relation to events in Scotland, the language used has sometimes veered away from that standard, which does not help the conduct of a rational, sensible debate on immigration.

I am grateful to my hon. Friend for the way in which he has introduced his debate today and for his remarks. I agree and sympathise with many of his points. I suspect that we may have a disagreement on the level of whether or not detention should be used and the extent to which it should be used. There may be a difference between us on that, but I can assure him that I agree with a number of the principles that he outlined.

First, I would want to assure him that a decision is never taken lightly or before a meaningful—I think that was the word he used—assessment. I will explain that in more detail. There should be openness about the statistics, so that people can have clarity about the situation; I would want to agree with him on that point. That people are accommodated in decent conditions, in a humane way—I would agree with him there, too.

I will move on to some of the areas where we may have a difference. The Government's view is that, although regrettable, detention is an integral and important element in maintaining effective immigration control and in tackling abuses of the system. We have made it clear that there is a general assumption in favour of granting temporary admission or release—I want to assure my hon. Friend on that point—but there will be circumstances where detention will be considered.

Such circumstances would be: initially, where a person's identity or the basis of their claim is being established; where there are reasonable grounds for believing that the person will abscond; thirdly, when part of a fast-track asylum procedure, where an individual's application appears to be capable of being decided quickly; or, fourthly, to effect removal. Those are the grounds on which such a decision will be taken, but, as I said to my hon. Friend at the beginning, that would be done only after a serious assessment of the case before the particular immigration officer.

Immigration detention policy and practise in the UK is fully in line with article 5 of the European convention on human rights and associated jurisprudence. Detention is for the shortest possible period and will last no longer than is reasonably necessary in the cases concerned. My hon. Friend raised the point about there being no time limit, but there is the phrase "reasonably necessary". People have to make a judgment, of course. The sort of length of detention to which he referred would be an exceptional circumstance and by no means the average time that people would spend in detention. He is right, and when we come on to the statistics I can say a little more.

Our view is that detention should never be prolonged unduly. The decision on whether detention should be authorised or maintained is made on a case-by-case basis, rightly subject to regular review. No one—I stress—is detained solely because they have made an application for asylum.

I want, too, to give my hon. Friend the assurance that we carefully considered the Amnesty International report, "Seeking asylum is not a crime", and the 21 recommendations made. As he called the debate, I have been through those recommendations again, to satisfy myself that we gave them due consideration and took on board the points made.

The Minister for Immigration, Citizenship and Nationality met representatives of Amnesty to discuss the report last July and he responded formally to the report in September. I hope that that is an assurance that within the Department we have treated the report with the seriousness that it clearly deserves.

As an aside, a tribute to the power and reach of Amnesty International in this country is that I must have signed more letters to MPs about that report than about any other single issue. That is a good thing, which clearly shows that, as I said at the beginning, Amnesty has succeeded in producing a far-reaching public debate. I congratulate it on succeeding in such a positive step.

A number of the recommendations that the report made, we would argue, reflect what we do already or relate to issues on which we have indicated that we share much the same underlying principle. There are other recommendations with which we disagree or simply cannot accept that the matters concerned need to be placed on a statutory footing.

I will give an example. There is the recommendation for a statutory prohibition on the use of Prison Service accommodation to hold certain individuals, which in our view is necessary in individual cases for reasons of security and control. It is not used routinely, but there will be circumstances when it is an appropriate option, perhaps for the protection of the individual concerned. We would not want to rule it out. I will be happy to provide my hon. Friend and other hon. Members with a copy of our full response to the report. I shall write to my hon. Friend with that.

Although detention is not time limited, it is subject to clear and well-understood legal constraints. Domestic and European Court of Human Rights case law provides that it should last for no longer than is reasonably necessary, that it must be used for the purpose authorised and that it must not be prolonged unduly. That is the basis on which detention operates in practice.

As I say, we have no wish to detain people for longer than necessary and we believe that there is every reason to keep detention as short as possible. Detention has to be used efficiently and effectively if it is to support an increased level of removals of failed asylum seekers. We have made it clear on many occasions that we do not consider it appropriate to have a fixed upper limit on the duration of detention; that would go beyond the requirements of article 5 of the European convention on human rights.

A fixed time limit would be arbitrary, thus taking no account of the individual's circumstances. It would serve simply to encourage individuals to frustrate and prolong immigration and asylum processes to reach a point at which they would be released. That would be unacceptable. A time limit might also encourage people to set longer time limits to err on the side of caution; again, that would not be in the interests of the individual concerned. The right thing is to work from the principle that detention should be minimised as much as possible.

All cases are considered carefully on their individual merits, and that will include an assessment of the risk of absconding. However, we do not detain only those individuals who present such a risk; people may be detained as part of a fast-track asylum process in which there may be little or no risk of their absconding. In some cases, individuals may also be detained simply to effect their removal. They may not represent a risk of absconding, but it may be clear that they have no intention of leaving the UK voluntarily. Detention may therefore be necessary to enforce removal.

My hon. Friend went into great detail on the detention of vulnerable people. Naturally, that is an issue of concern. Operational instructions provide clear guidance to immigration service staff about persons normally considered unsuitable for detention; I give my hon. Friend assurances on that. Such persons include victims of torture, pregnant women, those with serious medical conditions, people with mental health problems and elderly people. However, the detention of such individuals cannot be ruled out completely. Officers dealing with such cases must weigh the various factors in favour of and against detention and make a judgment in each case about whether it would be appropriate to authorise it. We have to trust the professionalism of the staff involved at that point. As I said, emotive language can often be used to describe immigration service staff, but we owe them a debt of thanks for the difficult job that they do in enforcing immigration control.

Harry Cohen: I hear what the Minister says, and do not disagree with much of it. However, should there not be better independent oversight? Should such decisions just be left in the hands of immigration staff? They get it wrong sometimes. Should there not be a better independent oversight arrangement?

Andy Burnham: In the short time left, I shall turn directly to that point. My hon. Friend mentioned the system for authorising the detention of children beyond 28 days. As Ministers, we see such reports regularly and in our view, the system is working well. My hon. Friend the Minister of State has met representatives from Save the Children and will meet them again next month.

We take the issue seriously; it is, of course, of great importance. It is right that the situation should be scrutinised regularly at the highest ministerial level. I assure my hon. Friend that the system is working well and will continue.

There has been concern about the availability of statistics on detention. We have done much to improve the accuracy and scope of such published statistics—for example, data on children in detention is now included in them. However, I completely understand my hon. Friend's point about the need to do more. If we want the public debate that I described at the beginning of my remarks, it is crucial that people have access to the full facts.

In particular, we appreciate the desire to have statistics for the number of people detained over a period, rather than the snapshot figures for the end of each quarter that we have at present. Work is going on at the research and statistics sections of the Home Office at the moment so that we can produce a measure that is meaningful and that will give my hon. Friend what he wants.

Addiction Treatment Centres (Weston-super-Mare)

1.30 pm

John Penrose (Weston-super-Mare) (Con): About two to three years ago, I encountered a growing wave of concern in my constituency about the number of drug addicts that my constituents saw in and around the town. On inquiring into the problem in some depth the following year, I decided to launch the Cleaner Weston campaign in the summer of 2004. The aims of that campaign of which I have already provided details to the Minister were threefold. The first and perhaps most crucial aim was to ensure that there was as high as possible standard of addiction treatment and addiction care post treatment for addicts if they were sent to Weston-super-Mare in an attempt to break their habit.

We are lucky in Weston-super-Mare to have a small number of extremely high quality registered addiction treatment centres. They are inspected regularly by the Commission for Social Care Inspection under the terms of the Care Standards Act 2000 and are run by able and dedicated people. The centres are not part of the problem, but part of the solution. However, I discovered that, in addition to the small number of excellent addiction treatment centres, there could be a large unknown number of unregistered centres that provide either treatment or post-treatment care throughout the town.

The difficulty has been in finding out how many centres there are and whether the services that they provide are any good. That difficulty stems entirely from the fact that, so far as I can see, no one is responsible for inspecting the centres, checking that they are doing a good job and that their standards and treatment of care are up to scratch. I suspect therefore that, as with all human endeavour, some of them are extremely well run and provide a high quality of treatment for the addicts in their care, while inevitably some of them might not be as good. The problem in Weston-super-Mare and probably throughout the rest of the country is that, without adequate standards and regular inspection of treatment and care centres against those standards, no one knows whether the addicts are being provided with the care and attention that they desperately need.

I have begun campaigning with the police and the local council for a local accreditation scheme to take into account the registered care treatment centres and also the unregistered treatment centres. I am pleased that, during the past few months, North Somerset council announced plans to introduce a local accreditation scheme in north Somerset for all addiction treatment and care centres in Weston-super-Mare and other parts of the county. I think that I am right in saying that it will be the first such scheme in the country. It is based on the criteria that have been laid out, at least in draft, by the National Treatment Agency for Substance Misuse and the European Association for the Treatment of Addiction.

The crucial point about the new accreditation scheme is that, under the existing rules in the Care Standards Act, registered treatment centres are inspected under a series of criteria laid down originally for residential care homes and nursing homes. They are good and worthwhile standards and I do not mean to decry them, but they are not, and were not intended to be, aimed at the central reason for the addiction treatment centres to exist, which is the quality of addiction treatment or addiction care post treatment that they provide. Clearly, it is important to have standards that are fit for purpose and aimed squarely at such an important and specialised area of care.

A proper addiction accreditation scheme is vital. We are introducing one in north Somerset and I should be surprised if the problems that we are experiencing with the quality of addiction treatment and care centres in Weston are unique to Weston-super-Mare. If the Minister considered other such centres in other parts of the country, I suspect that she would find such problems reflected throughout Great Britain.

Mr. David Burrowes (Enfield, Southgate) (Con): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Weston-super-Mare (John Penrose) on raising such an important subject. I have a particular interest in the area because, as a criminal law solicitor for 11 years, I dealt with many drug addicts who were referred to the units in his constituency that he described.

Does my hon. Friend agree that there is a desperate need for an increased number of quality residential units that provide the level of care that we all wish to see, and that such units should be extended as good practice across the country? So far as exit strategy and aftercare are concerned, I have seen clients who attended units without the right exit strategy, and where there was not a holistic approach to their drug addiction and other needs. Some ended up on the streets of Weston-super-Mare, committing further crimes and going back into the system.

John Penrose: I thank my hon. Friend for that intervention. On his first point, a potentially good example of an accreditation scheme is being introduced in north Somerset, and I hope that the Minister will agree to consider that as a pilot scheme that might be rolled out across the country. I shall return to his second point presently, as I plan to address that issue later.

As I was saying, the quality of addiction treatment is vital. The second issue on which we have been focusing in Weston-super-Mare is whether there is notification to the authorities in north Somerset when people from other parts of Britain who are referred for treatment are sent to the town. If someone who is incredibly vulnerable embarks on a course of treatment in Weston-super-Mare, or anywhere, it is important that the local health service, housing service and police be properly notified of that person's arrival, so that if something goes wrong and the person concerned needs additional support or help, the local services are aware of that person's circumstances and can provide appropriate support.

I am afraid to say, however, that that is not what we have found. Since being elected to Parliament seven or eight months ago, I have been writing letters to referring agencies around the country asking questions under the Freedom of Information Act 2000. Sadly, a large proportion are not informing the north Somerset authorities of the arrival of the addicts that they are sending for treatment in Weston-super-Mare. That is not good for addicts. If something goes wrong, such as a relapse, and if an addict is picked up by the police without the police knowing that that person is in the middle of a care plan provided by a referring agency in some other part of the country, the addict will go to the local magistrates court and will not be treated in the right way. However, if information can be sought from the agency, a much more effective set of sentences and actions can be taken.

It is crucial that that communication loop is properly closed and connected. I am pleased to say that there are examples of excellent referring authorities around the country. Oxfordshire is one example: in the past two and a half years more than 100 people have been sent by Oxfordshire to Weston-super-Mare for treatment, and in almost every case those concerned have managed to inform the local authorities of when people are arriving, where they are going, and when they will be there. So we are not asking for the unusual or the impossible: it is being done and good practice already exists.

However, rather than one Opposition Back-Bench MP writing letters to referring agencies around the country about people who are sent to his constituency, a more effective approach, if possible, would be Government action pointing out that, wherever addicts are being sent for treatment or support, referring agencies owe them a duty of care to keep people in the relevant referral areas informed, and that if they are failing to do that they should resume promptly.

My final point is that made earlier by my hon. Friend the Member for Enfield, Southgate (Mr. Burrowes). When someone is referred to Weston-super-Mare or another place for addiction treatment or care, that referral should be part of a unified care plan. A session in a treatment centre for several months should be only one step on the road to recovery, and one step on the road towards piecing a life back together and enabling someone to re-enter society and rejoin their family—if that is appropriate—and to get themselves another job. Too often, however, we have found from writing to referring agencies that some of them do not know what has happened to a large proportion of referred addicts in Weston-super-Mare. If there is an effective care plan, the agencies should know what has happened after treatment.

The fear is that if the agencies do not know where those people are, either there may have been no effective care plan in the first place and they were shovelled out of the referring agency's area to get the problem off its front doorstep; or, when the addicts arrived for treatment in Weston-super-Mare, they may have failed to complete the course, relapsed, left the course and ended up on a street corner in Weston, possibly looking for their next hit and probably at high risk of an overdose, which is most likely after an attempt to break a habit, at severe risk of ill health and, from the point of view of local residents, likely significantly to increase the local crime statistics. Addicts in relapse, or those who have not got rid of their habit and have a chaotic lifestyle, are incapable of holding down a job. Therefore, the only way in which they can fund their habit is through crime.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): I congratulate my hon. Friend on securing the debate. I know how hard he works on behalf of his constituents, and he is raising an important subject. Is not the transition from prison or a place of rehabilitation into normal society a twilight zone through which too many people too often fall? They are not given the necessary support to resume a normal life, and people who might undergo a gradual transition to a sensible lifestyle are sadly lost at that last point.

John Penrose: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. As part of a complete care package and plan, typically after leaving treatment, most care plans will involve a series of steps through half-way houses, dry houses, education and training and voluntary work as a way of re-entering society as one of its fully functioning members. My hon. Friend is correct to point out that people can fall through the cracks in that process. That is why a properly functioning care plan is vital.

My final point to the Minister is that rather than having a solitary Back-Bench MP such as myself with a particular problem in his constituency writing to local agencies that have referred people for treatment in Weston-super-Mare, a far more effective way of dealing with the problem would be through Government action to remind agencies of the duty of care that they owe to people whom they send for treatment—in Weston or anywhere else. That duty is to ensure that people complete their care programme and that when they leave their treatment in any place, particularly Weston, they are not left to sit on a street corner and make their own way.

Those are the three critical issues, and there is a big opportunity for the nation and the Government to pick up on them. I hope that the Government will consider what is happening in Weston-super-Mare and use it wherever possible—potentially nationally—as a pilot for roll-out. I hope, also, that the Minister has had a chance to study the report that the local police authority published, and which my predecessor, Brian Cotter, referred to the Secretary of State for Home Affairs. It set out several of those points in greater detail. I look forward to the Minister's reply.

1.43 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Caroline Flint): I congratulate the hon. Member for Weston-super-Mare (John Penrose) on securing the debate. It is a matter of concern to him and his constituents, and to myself, too. Drug treatment today has improved on that of a few years ago. The Government have invested unprecedented amounts of money to provide drug treatment and to do exactly what the hon. Gentleman said: to make better sense of the impact of drug addiction on our criminal justice system, so that we do not continue narrowly, but move from arresting people for crimes that are linked to their drug addiction by giving them a community or custodial sentence without any drug treatment, to dealing with the underlying causes of their acquisitive crime, which is usually the area in which drug addicts find themselves.

During the past few years, the Government have linked crime and drug addiction. The link has been important in obtaining a commitment to, a focus on and a prioritisation of that area, through the provision of resources to boost the amount of drug treatment available—whether residential rehabilitation, detox or prescription. The Government have also improved the links between police stations, the courts system and jails. That is why, for example, people are now being tested on arrest in a range of crimes for evidence of class A drugs. So, at the very point of arrest, we can start engaging with people.

The Drugs Act 2005, in whose passage I was pleased to play a part, also makes an assessment in line with the individual's needs mandatory following a positive drugs test. That then follows that person to court, because if they start engaging in their drug problem, it will impact in court upon whether a custodial or community sentence is required. Whether their sentence ends up being community-based or custodial—which is important to the hon. Gentleman's choice of debate today—that seamless approach is needed to ensure that the person is kept on track within a care plan for their drug addiction.

I have seen the information that the hon. Gentleman has sent, and know that it is important for the probation service, which has a role relating to those receiving a drug treatment and testing order—although that term may presently be changed. Basically, as someone on a community-based order involves that service in drug treatment as part of their commitment, a probation service which feels that a residential rehabilitation should form part of that treatment should take ownership for that individual. I was certainly concerned by the evidence that probation services were not informing police or others in the community about someone coming into their area.

John Penrose: One fact of which the Minister may not be aware, but which has developed in Weston-super-Mare in recent months, is that the national probation service has tightened up considerably in response to some of the points that I have been raising. It has withdrawn its patronage from one or two of the addiction, treatment or support places in Weston-super-Mare as a result.

Caroline Flint: I am pleased to hear that. However, it goes to show that even in the context of expanding resources for drug treatment, and despite our development of the drug intervention programme—which provides that end-to-end, seamless approach of supporting people into and through the process of treatment, recognising the issues around housing, employment and so on—we still cannot be complacent. Even with the best will and the best guidance in the world—indeed, the best organisational structure, whether that be the national treatment agency or its regional support—it is not necessarily happening in the best way, as we would hope.

I am indeed aware that there are particular problems in the south-west. Previously, in the Home Office, I visited the south-west a number of times. It is undoubtedly the case that the environment of that region provides a pleasant place to live, often in places by the sea and with buildings suitably located for residential rehabilitation—without somebody else living right next door, for there are all those issues about locating these services. Having said that, its very attraction can also be a problem because one issue, as I understand it, is that when people finish residential rehabilitation treatment they may not always go back to whence they came. That then raises a number of issues with a knock-on effect on services.

That is why we expect drug action teams to ensure that aftercare packages covering issues such as housing and employment are built into care planning when they refer a drug abuser to in-patient detox or residential rehabilitation. That should be part of the process. In some cases, residential rehabilitation providers also offer a secondary care package as part of the care plan. Often, they even provide that back in the community from whence the person first came. So, there are good examples of where that can work well, but it highlights—it is important to raise this today—that we must improve the commissioning of services.

There must also be understanding that in referring an individual to an out-of-area residential rehabilitation service, the ownership of that individual and their success should not end there. That is one reason why I was pleased last year when we reached a point where we could say, with hands on our heart, that we had increased the number of people in treatment. That is now at 160,000, ahead of our target, and we have made progress with retaining them in treatment.

The National Treatment Agency for Substance Misuse launched its new treatment-effectiveness strategy to bear down further on successful outcomes. It is recognised that clinical treatment might be necessary, but there is also the wrap-around provision that will sustain someone through the years ahead. Let us face it: in difficult circumstances, people with any addiction may be vulnerable to relapses. This is not only about the here and now; it is about sustainability.

Mr. Burnett: In relation to the care plan and the ongoing responsibility of the referring agency, I have, unfortunately, come across several instances of people relapsing. That may have to do with the nature of the person or a chaotic lifestyle. We are talking about an ongoing process. Sometimes people relapse and fail; sometimes they succeed. There have been cases of people going to an establishment in Weston-super-Mare but not keeping to the rules. Obviously, they are there voluntarily and can come and go up to a point, but they have failed and been thrown out on to the streets. It is often at that point, when someone has not followed through to the end point for the care plan to kick in and they are left to their own devices, that they end up in the cells.

Caroline Flint: I do not disagree with the hon. Gentleman's point. If a drug action team or social services is paying for a treatment service for an individual, the people who are paying should be clear about what is happening with their investment. Continuity is needed in terms of follow-up and sharing of information. That also applies to providers, whether of treatment or housing, in terms of sounding the alert in the community if someone suddenly decides just to leave in the middle of the night. I cannot wave a magic wand and say that that will never happen. The question is: if someone opts out, for whatever reason, what is the process by which that is communicated? If part of the process for someone is that they have not gone to jail, for example, one would want to know, because it was part of their probation conditions, that they were in that treatment. These are important issues; we need to close some of the gaps. It has been clearly indicated that some commissioners of services, those who are referring people, are working well and some are not.

In the short time available to me, I want to talk about action for the future. First, I hope that I have acknowledged that I take this issue very seriously and I am aware of the complexities. Unregistered residential services in the constituency of the hon. Member for Weston-super-Mare are of particular concern. I understand that New Dawn house, Hope house and Sanctuary Addiction Services have been highlighted in that regard. It is worrying if those services are not offering effective treatment. There seem to be issues at the commissioning end. Perhaps those who commission are sometimes not doing as much work as they should to ascertain the nature of the services. In some instances, it is accommodation, rather than effective treatment, that is provided. Those paying for the service need to know exactly what they are paying for and what they should expect from it. To know that, they have to engage with the treatment provider and should be consulting the NTA and others about information that can give them a better picture of what they can expect for their investment.

I am pleased to say that, despite the problems, it is clear that the different local stakeholders in the hon. Gentleman's area are aware of the problem. The report to which he refers, by Avon and Somerset constabulary, is very helpful. It was put together in conjunction with a number of people in the health sphere who are concerned about the issue. I understand that a number of actions have been considered, the first of which is the development of a system of local accreditation and quality assurance in line with the NTA standards, which will help placing authorities to understand better the risks of placing clients in the areas that we are discussing. I understand that, under that scheme, Sanctuary Addiction Services is working with the local drug action team to improve its clinical care practice to meet required standards. I am interested in that work and how we might consider it in the context of the national picture. I shall discuss that shortly.

Correspondence has been sent to probation areas nationally to set out concerns and to ask, for example, that placements at Hope house stop. I understand that that has already had a significant impact. A letter will be sent to all directors of social services reminding them of their statutory duties in relation to the aftercare of those placed out of area.

Through the NTA regional commissioner's forum, agreement was made with neighbouring local authorities such as Bristol City not to place clients in unregistered care homes. Working with the NTA, the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, the Commission for Social Care Inspection and Supporting People, funding for New Dawn house has been terminated, and New Dawn house is expected to close in July 2006. Operation Jupiter, which was carried out by Avon and Somerset police in partnership with the local drug action team, targeted 20 local houses in multiple occupation associated with high levels of criminal behaviour with very positive results.

The recently submitted draft 2006–07 drug treatment plan signals a clear and continuing commitment to improving local service quality and capacity and to engaging pragmatically to address the problems posed by unregistered care homes. I understand, however, that this is a problem not only for the hon. Gentleman's area; it could be happening in other parts of the country. The work that is being done locally gives us some idea of how we could approach the problem nationally and how we can discuss what other steps the NTA can take, certainly through its regional arms, throughout England.

As I said, the problems identified in Weston-super-Mare are experienced nationally, and to assist the process I have asked the NTA to produce an action plan on how those problems can be addressed nationally and for regular progress reports. I shall seek discussions with my colleagues in the Home Office, as it is jointly responsible for the NTA. The NTA is accountable both to the Home Office and to the Department of Health, and is required to assist us with any criminal justice issues that need further investigation.

Before I conclude, I must say that we are doing a huge amount nationally to improve the effectiveness of residential substance misuse services. There are challenges in referring people to out-of-area services, as well as in not referring people to residential rehabilitation when it is in fact in their best interests. Hon. Members will know that it is often a big problem for local funders to decide whether to keep people in the area or to send them out. That is true in many respects for specialist children's services, for example.

We are trying through the effectiveness strategy to place a renewed emphasis on the whole journey of someone who is trying to find their way out of drug addiction and on how drug treatment systems can support that. I believe that drug action teams have a responsibility to put in place a package of support that covers assessment before someone enters the residential rehabilitation service, the period in the residential care setting and aftercare when they have left the service.

As I said, the aftercare package should include housing and employment and the commissioning drug action team, irrespective of whether the person resumes residence in the area in which they lived before they had treatment or whether they go to a different area. There needs to be a better connection to make sense of the considerable investment in giving the individual another chance.

We need to tackle variations, and several pieces of work are planned to ensure that the quality of that commissioning is improved. That work includes guidance on commissioning residential rehabilitation and in-patient detoxification services and other work to promote good practice and to improve tier 4 commissioning, encouraging the use of local flexibilities in the pooling of community care, and developing regional and sub-regional commissioning mechanisms. A region might explore more creatively what residential services it needs to make sense of the post-residential rehabilitation experience of coming home and the aftercare packages. As I said, work is also being done to improve and to promote the evidence base and consensus on suitable clients for tier 4 provision.

As I have also said, a huge amount of work is being done. We must always ensure that we are not complacent, even though so much progress has been made in identifying drugs as a link to crime, in providing the resources to make a difference, and in understanding that effective treatment can be important for the wider community as well as for the individual.

Question put and agreed to.

Fire Safety Regulations

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Tony Cunningham.]

9.30 am

John McDonnell (Hayes and Harlington) (Lab): On a point of order, Mr. Gale. First, I welcome you to the Chair. Secondly, may I raise with you tne problem that we have this morning and the reasons why my hon. Friend the Member for Hove (Ms Barlow), whose debate this is, is not present? The change of venue from Westminster Hall to this room has somewhat confused hon. Members—indeed, several of us went to Westminster Hall this morning and arrived here out of breath because we had been trying to find the alternative venue. May I suggest through you that hon. Members are again given notice of the change of venue so that we do not have a problem with misunderstandings and with hon. Members going to Westminster Hall, which is no longer available?

Mr. Roger Gale (in the Chair): I hear what the hon. Gentleman says. It is a matter of fact and record, and has been for a considerable time, that sittings are being held in Committee Room 10, not Westminster Hall. That information appears regularly on the Order Paper, and it is up to hon. Members to make sure that they are present and correct when required.

9.31 am

Ms Celia Barlow (Hove) (Lab): Thank you, Mr. Gale. I am here to ask for consideration to be given to the regulations that were put in place after the inquiry into the King's Cross fire. As we know, 31 people were killed in that tragic event. Following the investigation, the regulations were amended. The changes were not completely implemented until after 1991, but during that period action was taken to make the railways far safer.

The rail network is not my favourite organisation at the moment, given that I spent some considerable time on the Brighton to London train this morning. That explains my somewhat dishevelled appearance, for which I apologise to hon. Members. However, I am grateful for the opportunity to raise this important issue on behalf of hon. Members who have expressed concern about proposals to remove essential fire safety regulations.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): I congratulate the hon. Lady on securing the debate. To enable her to get her breath back, may I draw her attention and yours, Mr. Gale, to the debate that took place in this very room yesterday? It was about rail services in the south-east and probably highlighted some of the experiences that she suffered this morning?

Ms Barlow: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his intervention, and I hope that there will be many more in the early part of my speech.

Mr. Roger Gale (in the Chair): Order. There will not be. I appreciate the courtesy that the hon. Member for Kettering (Mr. Hollobone) has shown in seeking to assist the hon. Lady, but I have made it abundantly plain that it is up to hon. Members to be here on time. Although I understand that the hon. Lady needs to get her breath back, and I am sure that everybody will have some sympathy with her, given her experience of the public transport system, I do not propose to entertain any more interventions on the subject.

Ms Barlow: Thank you, Mr. Gale. I stand corrected.

My concerns are shared by many constituents—not my concerns about the slight slowness, on occasion, of trains between Brighton and Hove and London, but the concerns of those who travel through the underground system every day. The concerns raised by my constituents have also been raised by the TUC, the rail unions and the Fire Brigades Union.

As a former firefighter and member of the FBU, the Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, my hon. Friend the Member for Poplar and Canning Town (Jim Fitzpatrick), has a strong interest in and knowledge of these topics. He takes them very seriously and perhaps he will be able to provide reassurances today about the future of fire safety on the underground and on our railways.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): The Minister has a distinguished record in the fire service, but will he not argue that the 1989 regulations are too prescriptive and bureaucratic for the modern world? Is not the key problem the fact that the proposed guidance, which will accompany the fire safety order, will have no legal force? Will that not worry my hon. Friend's constituents in Hove, as well as other travellers in the underground system, particularly those who pass through King's Cross, where the disaster took place and through which I travel several times a week?

Ms Barlow: I agree that there are concerns, although I would not say that they are as desperate as my hon. Friend suggests. In the present climate, however, every rail and underground safety issue is of desperate interest.

Perhaps it would be useful at this point to remind ourselves of the history of the debate. The Fire Precautions (Sub-surface Railway Stations) Regulations 1989, to which I shall simply refer as "the regulations" for the purposes of this debate, were introduced under section 12 of the Fire Precautions Act 1971. The regulations were added on the recommendation of the Fennell report into the 1987 King's Cross fire, which claimed 31 lives.

I was on the BBC TV news desk that day, watching the terrible video rushes as they were fed in by satellite, and assessing the risks to camera crews and reporters at the scene. It is believed that the blaze began when a match was dropped through a wooden escalator—such escalators have, of course, now been banned—in a non-smoking area during the evening rush hour. An accumulation of grease and other debris under the tracks led to a fireball, which scorched up the escalator, trapping many people underground. Years later, one survivor, who ran from the upper concourse, said:

"If Hell existed it was on display that night."

[Ms Barlow]

Following the fire, the Fennell report called for changes, including minimum staffing standards and means of detecting, warning of and fighting fires. It also called for standards of fire-resistant construction, training and other precautions. There was a scandal in 1991, when a report found that only eight of the 26 safety recommendations made after the inquiry had been fully implemented. They were later complied with and provided a cushion of safety around staff, firefighters and customers.

It is important to remember that the regulations apply not only to London underground stations, but to sub-surface stations throughout Britain, including underground systems in Tyne and Wear and several national rail stations with sub-surface stations, such as New Street station in Birmingham.

The regulations were introduced to help to prevent a repeat of the terrible events at King's Cross, and I think that all hon. Members would agree that they have stood the test of time. They set down essential minimum statutory requirements for safety, covering issues such as means of escape, means of fighting fire, means of detection and giving warning, fire-resistant construction, instruction and training, and the keeping of records. Additional precautions covered in the regulations include practicable steps to prevent smoking and minimum staffing requirements, which are almost invariably exceeded in the railway network.

No one doubts the Minister's strong commitment to fire safety. I hope that he will agree that the Government must not replace the current regulations lightly, and that they should do so only if they can guarantee at least the same statutory—I stress, statutory—level of safety for the public, rail staff and emergency services. As I understand it—he will correct me if I am wrong—the Government's view is that the current regulations and the protection that they provide will be adequately replaced by the provisions of the Regulatory Reform (Fire Safety) Order 2005, associated guidance and the proposed Railways and Other Guided Transport Systems (Safety) Regulations. For the purposes of this debate and for my hon. Friends' sake, I shall refer to the legislation simply as "the order".

When the order comes into force, it will cover general fire precautions in different categories of workplace and public place and abolish the use of fire certificates. It will signal a move to a risk assessment-based approach to fire safety—that is one of the key issues. In addition, a series of guides will be produced to assist those preparing risk assessments. Although my hon. Friends, the trade unions and I do not necessarily have difficulty with the principles of the order, we are concerned about the proposition that it will remove the regulations for sub-surface stations. That is a really important point. We feel that sub-surface rail stations are a special case and require an assured minimum standard of protection, which cannot be afforded by risk assessment and guidance alone.

Mr. Hollobone: I have the privilege of being a member of the all-party group on lighting, which discussed that very issue at a meeting earlier this week. Making third-party approval for personal safety equipment mandatory is an important issue for the lighting and security industry, which favours a proper system of accreditation for those conducting the inspections.

Ms Barlow: I thank the hon. Gentleman. The issue was also considered by the Regulatory Reform Committee in July 2004, following representations by my hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington (John McDonnell), who had a strong interest as secretary of the FBU parliamentary group. The Committee also had strong reservations about the Government's proposals. It argued that given the nature of sub-surface railway stations and the substantial number of people who use them every day, there was a strong public interest in ensuring their safety from fire. I am sure that the Minister agrees with that. Importantly, the Committee did not accept the Government's view that the regulations placed a disproportionate burden on the management of sub-surface railway stations. It also argued that it had not been demonstrated that fire safety in such stations would be improved by the removal of the regulations in favour of the risk-based approach contemplated in the order.

David Taylor: Does my hon. Friend agree that the enforcement activity of fire authorities when the new approach is in place will be crucial to the success of the order? Does she hope that the Minister will announce that the Deputy Prime Minister will have powers to direct fire authorities in their enforcement activity to provide information and to report to him on particularly sensitive installations or networks?

Ms Barlow: That is certainly an interesting idea that I hope the Minister will take on board.

The Committee concluded that sub-surface railway stations were indeed a special case and that the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister had not yet made a convincing case for removing the regulations. The Committee recommended that the regulations should remain, but that if they were removed, any guidance issued could include all elements of the protection prescribed in the regulations.

I understand that the Minister's predecessor considered the report following the recommendations, along with representations from other interested parties. Stakeholders were then informed that the Government accepted the need not only for protections to continue, but for them to be clearly seen to continue. The Department advised that it intended to retain the regulations until substantive guidance on fire precautions for sub-surface railway stations had been published. Stakeholders are now being consulted on the guidance. I welcome that move, but it remains my view and that of many others that the guidance and the order will not offer the same level of protection as the regulations. There are a number of compelling reasons for a rethink.

First, it is self-evident that the protections will be lessened, because nowhere does the order specify minimum standards that equate to the current regulations. Furthermore, unlike the regulations, the proposed guidance to accompany the order will have no legal force. There is also concern that the guidance being developed could be too general in respect of transport premises and not specific enough to take account of the unique needs and dangers of sub-surface stations.

Secondly, removing the regulations will change the burden of proof and might make it easier for unscrupulous rail operators to reduce the current standards below those specified in the regulations. Now, the fire authority must be satisfied with a specific requirement at a particular location, or unhappy that the standard is inappropriate, unnecessary or not reasonably practical. However, I believe that under the Government's proposal it will be for the fire authority to show that the rail industry has failed to carry out a sufficient risk assessment.

Thirdly, there is the question of whether the regulations are too prescriptive and bureaucratic. However, the current arrangements are flexible enough to allow rail operators to seek exemptions from the regulations if they can satisfy the fire authority that a minimum standard at a particular location is inappropriate, unnecessary or not reasonably practical. I hope that the Minister will reflect on the fact that the regulations are not necessarily a blunt instrument, as they have been described, that imposes disproportionate requirements on the rail industry.

I note from an answer to a written question tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington that the Department does not keep records of requests for exemptions to regulations and does not require fire and rescue authorities to supply them. Whatever the reasons for that—I will not go into whether it is the correct approach or not—I hope that the Minister will forgive my bluntness in saying that it is difficult to see how we can conclude that the regulations are too prescriptive and bureaucratic if the Department has no record of when requests for exemptions are made or even whether any ever have been made.

Fourthly, I hope that the Minister accepts that the need for minimum standards is arguably greater now than at the time of the King's Cross fire. One reason is that the number of passengers using the railways has increased significantly since then, in line with the Department's policy and for many other, ecological reasons. Also, management of the various systems has unfortunately been fragmented.

Finally, I know that the Minister will agree that the need for the public to have confidence in railway fire safety is greater than ever following the appalling terrorist attacks on London in July. The views of rail workers and those in the emergency services, who performed so honourably, professionally and bravely, need to be taken very seriously indeed. Anyone who was a passenger on the underground on the morning of 7 July, as I and many of my constituents were, must be grateful to the emergency services for their prompt and heroic response, and we must listen to their undoubted expertise. Owing to the implementation of the Fennell report, passengers travel with greater regulatory safety than ever before. I urge the Minister to retain the system.

The Minister has sought to address some of the concerns that I have raised by stating that when the order is introduced its provisions and associated guidance will run concurrently with those of the regulations for six to 12 months. It is argued that that will allow the Department to compare the effectiveness of the new arrangements with the regulations. At the end of that period the need to remove the regulations can be assessed. I welcome that as a sign that the Government take our representations seriously, but I am not sure how that process will be the most effective way of informing the Department's thinking, because it is not clear whether the regulations or the order will take priority during that six to 12-month period. In any event, will there not be a temptation for the rail operators not to act so as to test the new arrangements during that period, thereby leaving the Department none the wiser about the order's effectiveness?

The Government have stated that they will allow more time for business and fire safety experts to get ready for the order, which would probably not be implemented until later this year or even in 2007. I hope that the Minister will use that time to reflect on the arguments for retaining the regulations and positively consider the representations that he receives from hon. Members and stakeholders, as he has been doing.

I am hopeful that a solution can be found that will allay our concerns. Perhaps the basis of such a solution is an acceptance that the regulations should be modified to take into account the need for any changes that has arisen since their introduction, coupled with support for the principle that sub-surface stations are a special case and that that fact needs to be reflected in a statutory approach. I sincerely hope that, at a time when the threats have never been greater, we can all work together to find the right solution and ensure that the terrible events at King's Cross are never repeated.

9.49 am

Mr. Andrew Dismore (Hendon) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hove (Ms Barlow) on making it here today and commiserate with her on her rather rushed introduction; I was pleased that she got into her stride. Her presentation was excellent.

I must declare an interest as the chairman of the Fire Brigades Union parliamentary group. Perhaps more importantly, before coming to this place I was the FBU's solicitor for 17 years. I would like to bring that experience to today's debate, although not by a legal analysis; my hon. Friend gave a good analysis of the regulations, the order and the interrelationship between them, and gave a detailed argument regarding the problems that they cause.

I also bring a more direct experience through my involvement with the inquiry into the King's Cross fire. At that time, I represented the family of the fire officer who was killed at the fire, who was later posthumously awarded the George medal for bravery, other firefighters who were physically and mentally injured by the fire, and railway workers. I sat through most of the 93 days of the public inquiry into the fire held by Sir Desmond Fennell, as I was representing those victims, the FBU, ASLEF and their members. Indeed, I gave evidence to the inquiry on various aspects of fire safety. I remember dealing with my hon. Friend the Minister at that time in his then capacity as an FBU official representing London, so I know that he has a lot of experience of the issues relating to King's Cross.

I visited King's Cross station on the Sunday after the fire, three days later. The sights that I saw then will haunt me for ever. The blackened debris and wreckage and the utter destruction caused by the flashover were indescribable. A flashover is terrible at any time, but particularly so in the circumstances at that station. It is not just the physical things that one sees; the horrible smell stays in one's nostrils for days afterwards and remains in the memory. The smells of fire are appalling, particularly when one knows what happened.

I still get a shiver when I use the Northern line escalator in King's Cross station, which I have to do from time to time as the Northern line serves my constituency, because I know that that is where the fire started; I know the point on the escalator where it started. I still get a shiver when I use the underpass toward St. Pancras, where many people died so tragically and horrifically, including Station Officer Townsley, who tried—in vain, unfortunately—to rescue members of the public who faced such a horrible death, and when I walk past the memorial to the 31 victims who died in one of the underpasses under Euston road.

The statements that I took from firefighters and railway workers after the fire were some of the easiest that I ever took. All I had to do, more or less, was to switch on my dictating machine and let them talk. The tales they told of what happened and what they saw and experienced were some of the most horrific I have heard. When those statements were presented at the inquiry, little cross-examination was necessary because it was all there. Everybody used those statements as the primary evidence of what happened. I never want such a thing to happen again.

That is the stage at which I became a lawyer who campaigned on issues such as fire safety and corporate manslaughter, on which I hope my Government will deliver in the not-too-distant future. The young, campaigning lawyer of 20 years ago has ended up being the now rather more cynical, but still campaigning, Member of Parliament for Hendon you see before you today, Mr. Gale. I never thought that I would see the day when my Government would consider watering down fire safety protection as the regulations will. The recommendations made by Sir Desmond Fennell in his report are still valid, if not more so given the current situation with London Underground.

David Taylor: The fire certification system that has been in place since 1972, I think, has widely been seen by travellers in London and elsewhere as a public safety net in which they broadly have confidence. The order that might replace it would mean that the safety net will have a rather wider mesh through which people might fall. Does my hon. Friend agree that we need more detail on how it will be enforced before there is a switchover? As my hon. Friend the Member for Hove said, running the changes in parallel for six or 12 months is fine, but let us have the detail on how the order will be enforced.

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend makes an important point. The difficulty with guidance notes is that they are not legally enforceable. They do not even have the force of a code of practice, which would be rather more useful than mere guidance notes. I have nothing particular against safety assessments, but they should go hand in hand with the underpinning of the detailed regulations that we are debating. It is not either/or; let us have both. I am concerned that there will be a watering down.

There have been many improvements on the tube since the King's Cross fire. The fact that we now have steel escalators rather than the old wooden ones that caught fire is the most visible and obvious example; which everyone can see. However many other underpinnings are important. The tube is used so much; there are, on average, 3 million passengers a day—far more than at the time of the King's Cross fire—and use is growing. That puts greater pressure on the underground system and staff and means that there are greater safety risks.

A key element of the Fennell report was his criticism of the fragmentation of the management, which was then operating under one company, London Underground Ltd. He also criticised the inability of the management to communicate within itself and the lack of clear lines of responsibility. Through the public-private partnership, of which I was not a great advocate—although I recognise that it is bringing investment to the tube—there is fragmentation within London Underground. Although residual responsibilities lie ultimately, I suppose, with the Mayor of London, several companies are now involved.

For the Northern line, the infrastructure company responsible for the track, tunnels and signalling is Tube Lines; a separate company, Alstom, runs the train maintenance contract; and London Underground has overarching responsibilities. That fragmentation has the potential to create the sort of gaps that the Fennell inquiry identified, and the situation could be made worse if the proposed safety regime is introduced.

We must be sure that there is seamless management of safety. The recent problems on the Northern line in particular with the failure of brake systems that was identified in autumn, are an example of where such gaps arise—obviously not in the context of fire, but with train maintenance. That highlights some of the potential problems with gaps. It is a case not of "Mind the gap between the platform and the train", but of mind the gap within the management. That is one of the key criticisms in the Fennell report, and it is not answered by the proposals.

There was also some criticism of the lack of record keeping. My hon. Friend the Member for Hove identified that as a problem when she so ably opened the debate. We must recognise that one product of the PPP is the huge investment that there will be in the underground to modernise tracks, signalling and stations. Huge, large-scale engineering works will affect the network for years to come. They are welcome and long overdue, but engineering works are hazardous and might give rise to fire risks. That is an inevitable consequence of major engineering works, but, in those circumstances, now is not the time to start downgrading fire protection.

Those engineering works are necessary because of the long-term neglect of the underground over many years and under successive Governments. Until those works are complete, the underground will remain subject to various safety risks or problems, such as the problem with the signalling system that was identified at Camden Town last year. Therefore, until the underground is running properly and modernised, and until we deal with some of the core management problems, we should not start messing around with safety regulations.

I end my remarks by reminding people of what happened on 7 July and the work that the emergency services did then. Their ability to function through the correct levels of staffing, skill and co-ordination enabled them to deal so effectively with the consequences of that day. The Metropolitan Police Commissioner warned us of the inevitability of further terrorist attacks; we must be prepared for the risk of further attacks on the underground. In those circumstances, I ask my hon. Friend the Minister to think again.

Would my hon. Friend the Minister like to be responsible were there to be another terrorist attack and the London underground system was not able to cope because of the effect of the changes that he is proposing? I ask the Government to postpone their move to bring in the new arrangements, at least until the modernisation works to the tube are completed. We can then review safety in the round with a new modernised tube until we have seen some progress towards dealing with the appalling terrorist threat that bedevils our country in general, and our capital city in particular, which is served so well by our transport workers.

10 am

John McDonnell (Hayes and Harlington) (Lab): Let me declare an interest as the chair of the National Union of Rail, Maritime and Transport Workers parliamentary group and the secretary of the Fire Brigades Union parliamentary group, as noted in the Register of Members' Interests. I too congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hove (Ms Barlow) not only on securing the debate, but on her superb detailed exposition of the argument. I shall not go over the ground that she covered, but I just want to make a few comments.

As has been explained by my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon (Mr. Dismore), we all bring to the debate our personal experiences as does the Minister. In my earlier career, I was chief executive of the then Association of London Authorities and on the evening of the King's Cross fire I had a meeting at Camden town hall. Instead of travelling by tube as I usually would do to King's Cross, alighting and going to the town hall, I walked and missed the fire. I would have been on the train at the time. I was attending the social services committee at Camden town hall and that night we had to suspend the committee to enable officers and members to prepare emergency morgues for the bodies coming from King's Cross.

The debate is of personal concern to several hon. Members, especially those who represent London constituencies and had any experience of the King's Cross tragedy. That concern has now been replicated on several occasions by accidents on the tube, of which Chancery Lane is an example. We come to the debate as a result of the King's Cross fire on the basis of a strict precautionary principle: that we do not do anything that undermines or may undermine the safety of the travelling public; that we will not take any measure that may enhance the risk and that we will do everything we possibly can to reduce the risk.

The Fennell inquiry was a model of an inquiry. It took evidence in detail from front-line workers. It arrived at several conclusions, which, on a consensual basis, were accepted by those on all sides of industry—management, front-line workers on the London underground, firefighters and the Fire Brigades Union. On the basis of a precautionary principle and the combined consensual wisdom of the various authorities at the time, the inquiry behoves the Government to have a strong justification for moving forward or moving away from the Fennell recommendations.

Many arguments have been advanced this morning, but when the proposals were brought forward, they were reviewed by the Regulatory Reform Committee. Although I was not a member of that Committee, I spoke at the meeting. It is important to remind ourselves that a Select Committee said to the Government at the time—clearly it did not endorse the introduction of the order—that > "On the evidence presently before us, we are not convinced that the provisions will be adequately carried forward under the general provisions of the draft Order . . . We consider that the provisions . . . should remain in force."

The Minister responded by saying,

> "Having considered the Committee reports, together with other representations received . . . we do accept that there is a need not only for this protection to continue but also that it can be clearly seen to be continued."

The Committee expressed its worries about any change and the Minister responded accordingly. At the time, I thought that we would have a more fundamental review of the order itself. Instead, all we have experienced is delay and the order's reintroduction with virtually no amendment to the original proposals. The debate is taking place today on that basis.

There is confusion about the Government's real intentions. As a result of the delays, some consultation has commenced on guidance but, as has already been said, it will have no legal basis or any firm use whereby it can be used to secure safety on the London underground. Instead of having more detailed consultation of the order and considering a fundamental amendment, all we have had is limited consultation on the guidance. That goes against the spirit of what the Regulatory Reform Committee was arguing for at the time.

The Committee had firm views. At paragraph 126 of its report, it said:

> "In our view the Department has not yet made a convincing case for the revocation" of the existing regulations.

Since then, the Government have not put forward a subsequent case. They have certainly not reported back to the Regulatory Reform Committee with a case that could change the Committee's mind. The first step that the Government should have undertaken—it is not too late to undertake it now—is to have gone back first to the Regulatory Reform Committee to see whether it could be convinced of the need for change. The Committee set out its arguments as to why the order should not go ahead in one of the strongest reports that it has produced. Such matters should be considered by the Government and there should be a proper debate.

As my hon. Friends the Members for Hove and for Hendon have said, time has moved on in respect of the practices of the London underground. More than 700 million people use the underground each year. There has been a 20 per cent. increase in passenger traffic. Management systems are now dramatically different, even within the past two years because of the fragmentation of London Underground's management. The proposals need to be reviewed in the light of the day-to-day practices of the London underground now as against two years ago. As my hon. Friend the Member for Hove said, the Government should go back to all the stakeholders about the detail of the order, not only the guidance.

People are becoming confused by the different orders that have been issued. The latest statement made by the Government on 12 January advised us that they had put back the date of the implementation of the order. I believe that there is an attempt to coincide that with regulations in Scotland, too. We are told that the change is to allow businesses and fire safety experts more time to get ready for the new regulations, not to consult on the detail of them or to secure amendments to them. We are now in a state of absolute confusion about when the regulations will come into effect.

A carry-over period between six and 12 months when both systems will run in tandem will cause even greater confusion. As my hon. Friend the Member for Hove said, it will hardly be a realistic trial of the new order because companies will fail to act on it and will put off any changes until the 12 months are over to avoid the onus being placed on increased investment or any change of practice desired as a result of the new system.

The Government need to give us clarity on where we are going. What is the status of the order? What is the time scale for its introduction? What consultations will take place? In the light of discussions that have taken place so far, we need to step back again and have a more fundamental consultation with the stakeholders. We need to go back to the Regulatory Reform Committee and discuss matters to see whether it would be satisfied with any new proposals coming forward after that consultation. In addition, we must recognise that things have moved on within the industry.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hendon mentioned the fact that, as a result of the Government's significant investment via the public-private partnership—although some of the investment has been diverted—we are now seeing major infrastructure projects on the system. I am not talking about the result of the PPP, as that is a waste of resources. Is now the time to confuse matters with the establishment of new orders, new systems and new regulatory principles in such a sensitive part of the system itself?

This is a special case. My hon. Friend the Member for Hove has it exactly right. As experts will tell us, underground fires and underground risks are so much more difficult and hazardous than they are on the surface, purely because of access and other arrangements. That is a key lesson of Fennell. If the access arrangements and the problems of underground working will be made worse as a result of the current significant investment and works, the last thing that we will want to do is to interfere with existing practices that have served us well over the past 20 years or so.

The Government have delayed again, so it is not too late to think again, to put the matter out to consultation again, to take on board the expert advice or to take into account changes. I dread us introducing such measures as a result of what is almost a stubborn belligerence about not taking other views into account. Sometimes there is almost a sense of bloody-mindedness, and a sense that Governments will not change their mind once the wheels of Government mechanisms start in motion. I just thank God for the Regulatory Reform Committee, which halted that process over a year ago.

I hope that this debate will contribute towards our telling the Government that just because an element of momentum has built up around the order, they do not inevitably have to proceed to make a mistake that we will live to regret, and that some people may not live to regret. The key element is consultation and involvement.

The process involves a step change; there is a change in the onus of responsibility. At the moment, it is clear in law where responsibility lies; we rely on those providing the service to ensure that they meet the regulation requirements. The proposal will mean that the onus shifts to the fire authorities, who will have to prove that the providers are not meeting the requirements. That is a significant principle change and, in practice, will be a dramatic change to what went before. It would undermine the practices of the fire authorities, which will have to cope in that way. In addition, it would undermine the confidence of the travelling public and those who work on the system.

There is an element of trust involved in this issue, too. Why are the Government making the proposals at this point in time, and what pressures are on the Government to move in this way? What reason is there for the haste with which the Government tried to introduce the regulations previously, with, we believe, inadequate consultation? I am at a loss to see why that change in principle needs to take place at this moment.

Finally, I ask the Minister to clarify where we are and where we are going. More importantly, I appeal to the Government to step back from this hazardous measure, which will put lives at risk and undermine the confidence of the travelling public.

10.12 am

Mark Hunter (Cheadle) (LD): I appreciate this opportunity to make a brief contribution. First, I compliment the hon. Member for Hove (Ms Barlow) on securing the debate and thank the hon. Member for Hendon (Mr. Dismore) for rightly reminding us of the appalling tragedy of the King's Cross fire.

I am pleased that the hon. Member for Hove made clear the wider relevance of this debate; I am one of many Members from the Greater Manchester and north-west area who have pressed for an extension to the Metrolink system. As a regular rail user myself, I share concerns about fire safety issues on the railway network.

Like others, I shall be interested to hear the Minister's views on whether the delay, announced a couple of weeks ago, in implementing the Regulatory Reform (Fire Safety) Order 2005 means that the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister will reconsider what many think is at best a discretionary approach to, and at worse a relaxation of, regulations on the facilities concerned. Of course, the proposals come at a time when Members do not need reminding of possible threats in the places concerned.

The regulations made under section 12 of the Fire Precautions Act 1971, which were inspired by the Fennell report, have been a key part of safety on the underground for a number of years, so I would appreciate any assurances that can be given today on those regulations, and indeed on the wider issue of fire safety on the underground and on subterranean railway stations. Also, can we assume from the delay that the Government are in the mood to compromise on the wider issue of fire safety regulations? Will the Minister tell us this morning whether that mood extends to the specific regulations to which I, and others, have referred?

On the new fire safety order, I wholeheartedly agree with the Minister's statement of 12 January that we should not seek to impose new regulations on stakeholders without giving them the necessary time to implement them, so I suppose that the announcement is to be welcomed. However, I should be grateful if the Minister told us why the guidance documents are apparently not yet available.

As I said, I did not intend to make a long contribution. It is obvious that I am not alone in seeking assurances not just on the future of fire safety on the underground, but on the future of the wider regulations.

10.15 am

Mr. Robert Syms (Poole) (Con): I, too, congratulate the hon. Member for Hove (Ms Barlow) on securing this debate, which is a useful opportunity to air a number of issues and concerns felt by hon. Members. We have had a short but good debate.

It is important that we get this matter right. On occasions, I felt that I was more in sympathy with the Minister than some of his own Back-Benchers were; I do not get the impression that the Government are rushing the proposal. They have put the decision off and they seem to be consulting. We do not know exactly what the final package will be, but it seems to me that they have taken a very sensible approach to complex regulations.

Broadly speaking, Her Majesty's Opposition support the review of fire safety regulations. Moving a system to risk assessment is sensible. Clearly, one has to look at the guidance, and some sensible points were made about the force of that guidance in determining how successful the system will be when implemented. Earlier, the matter of the accreditation of inspectors was raised, and that, too, was a sensible point.

I know that the private sector, in particular, has raised the issue of cost. There have been some concerns on that point, so we have to keep an eye on whether there is to be a transfer of resources. The difficulty with such regulations, particularly on subjects such as fire, is that things can be very much set in stone, and there can always be arguments for no change. There is an argument for change, but it is a question of getting it right. This is a useful opportunity for the Minister to stand up and give some assurances.

I noticed earlier in the week that the Government have announced further fire prevention grants—another £11.4 million. Under the Housing Act 1996, we dealt with houses in multiple occupation and aspects of their rating to do with fire. Quite a lot has been happening across the piece in terms of fire prevention and fire reform.

I listened carefully to what the hon. Member for Hendon (Mr. Dismore) said and was interested to hear his comments about the King's Cross disaster. Clearly, if one had to encapsulate the matter and say which one area gave concern, it would be sub-surface regulations. I hope that the Minister can give reassurances on that subject today. When the hon. Gentleman was a young, thrusting, campaigning lawyer, I was perhaps not quite so young, but I was certainly on Wiltshire county council's public protection committee, which dealt with the fire brigade. Our concern, post-King's Cross, was that there were major underground workings underneath Corsham and Box in Wiltshire, where the Ministry of Defence has major stores. Although the principal people dealing with the fire would have been the MOD fire service, the Wiltshire fire brigade would have been asked to support it. The key problem that the chief fire officer found was the issue of command and control underground, because radio equipment does not work as effectively there. So there are certainly special issues to do with sub-surface working and disasters; I hope that the Minister can give some reassurances on that subject.

The hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington (John McDonnell) asked some very challenging questions, in his customary way. He pointed out the Regulatory Reform Committee's concerns about that aspect of the regulations. I hope that, at the end of the debate, we will have a little bit more sketched in about Government proposals on this subject.

We need to know a little more about the time scale—that is one issue that has come out today—and when the order will be implemented. We have already heard that both systems will run in tandem. What will be the cost of that? One hon. Member asked whether it would be fair to run the new system with the old regulations still, effectively, in force. We need to hear a little bit more about time scales. Certainly, if the private sector and public corporations are going to have to take on a larger role, it is right and proper that we should at least give them a reasonable warning and a reasonable opportunity to adjust their working practices to carry out the new regulations. The key issue, which was raised by the hon. Member for Hendon, is management—including line management and joined-up management—particularly when it comes to major organisations, such as the tube.

We need a somewhat clearer view than we have had from the Government over recent weeks. I hope that the Minister is able to reassure us today about the time scale and the sub-surface regulations, about which there is general concern and that he will, perhaps, say a little bit more about the guidance, and the force of the guidance, and how it will effectively underpin the new system that the Government wish to implement.

10.20 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister (Jim Fitzpatrick): Mr. Gale, it is a pleasure to see you in the Chair this morning, sir.

We have had an interesting, useful debate and many points have been raised. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hove (Ms Barlow) on successfully securing this debate, and I congratulate all hon. Members on their contributions. I will try to address as many of the points raised as I can, but it is important to say clearly, from the outset, that we have a fundamental disagreement about the impact of the new orders. I hope to reassure hon. Members that we are not weakening the degree of public protection, but are doing the opposite and strengthening it.

My hon. Friend opened the debate by asking about the use of guidance to demonstrate necessary protections for sub-surface railway stations. I particularly want to set the record straight on that, but if you will allow me, Mr. Gale, I should first like to place two important references on the record.

On the fire safety order, the Regulatory Reform Committee said in its 11th report of the 2003–04 Session:

"We consider that the provisions of the Fire Precautions (Sub-surface Railway Stations) Regulations 1989 constitute necessary protections. On the evidence presently before us, we are not convinced that the provisions will be adequately carried forward under the general provisions of the draft Order and the Railway (Safety Case) Regulations 2000, as amended. We consider that the provisions of the Fire Precautions (Sub-surface Railway Stations) Regulations 1989 should remain in force. We therefore recommend that Schedule 5 to the draft Order be amended to remove the references to the Fire Precautions (Subsurface Railway Stations) Regulations 1989, the Fire Precautions (Sub-surface Railway Stations) (Amendment) Regulations 1991 and the Fire Precautions (Sub-surface Railway Stations) (Amendment) Regulations 1994.

We note that once the Order is in force the Secretary of State may make regulations under article 24 which would revoke the 1989 Regulations. Any decision to keep the 1989 Regulations, as amended, in force beyond the entry into force of the draft Order is therefore by no means irrevocable.

Another solution might be the provision of guidance by the Secretary of State on the operation of fire safety requirements in sub-surface railway stations. We note that London Underground Limited, in its response to the consultation on the proposal, stressed the need for guidance on implementation of the proposed Order. Such guidance could include all the elements of protection prescribed in the 1989 Regulations."

That last point is particularly important in relation to what has been said today and to the comments that I am about to make.

Mr. Dismore: The key difference, of course, is that guidance is not in any way, shape, or form binding, as regulations are. If there were a code of practice, at least that could be taken into account, if that were necessary, before a court if the issue ever arose—I hope that it would not. Will my hon. Friend consider providing at least a code of practice instead of guidance? That would have greater force in supporting the new regime.

Jim Fitzpatrick: My hon. Friend effectively made that point in his contribution, and I shall try to respond to it in due course. I am about to develop my point about why we believe the provision that we have put in place is adequate.

John McDonnell: Just so that we have it clear for the record, and as the Regulatory Reform Committee did not address the difference between guidance and codes of practice in the existing regulations, or their potential use in law, can we clarify that?

Jim Fitzpatrick: I will certainly try to do so in my comments.

We agreed with the Committees involved and made a statement on bringing the Regulatory Reform (Fire Safety) Order 2005 before the House for scrutiny the second time:

"However, to ensure public certainty and confidence, the Department accepts the view expressed by both Committees that if the highly prescriptive 1989 regulations are to be revoked then substantive guidance must be in place so that the protection can clearly be seen to be maintained. Consequently, the regulations will be retained on a temporary basis and only removed once guidance has been produced in consultation with all parties. We have therefore removed reference to the regulations from Schedule 5."

John McDonnell: Just to clarify the process, does that mean that at this point in time the Government's proposals will be going back to the Regulatory Reform Committee for consideration and report?

Jim Fitzpatrick: If my hon. Friends will allow me to develop my answer we will get to an explanation, at least partly, if not in full.

Some confusion seems to have arisen about what was meant by the statement that I have just quoted. It is our view that the fire safety order maintains all necessary protections, particularly when taken with other safety legislation, which will continue to apply. However, it is essential not only that these protections should exist, but that they can clearly be seen to exist. We are producing guidance to do that.

I want to make it absolutely clear that we have no intention of using guidance instead of legislation. We are using guidance to show how the law—the 2005 order—provides, and in our view enhances, the necessary protections currently provided by the Fire Precautions (Sub-surface Railway Stations) Regulations 1989. For example, the 1989 regulations do not cover the protection of firefighters, contractors or modern suppression systems. The new regulations enhance the old regulations. We think that doing that is more straightforward, simpler and more in keeping with all the legislation that we have passed recently than having a choice between the new regulations or upgrading the old ones. I will try to emphasise that later. The law, not the guidance, provides the protections. The guidance will just explain the protections, so that they can be clearly seen.

Mr. Dismore: I am sorry to keep badgering the Minister on this point, but there is a significant difference in law between the effect of guidance as opposed to a code of practice. Whatever he may say about the guidance referring to how the law will be enforced or taken into account, guidance notes do not have legal force. Codes of practice have some legal force. Will he consider ensuring that guidance notes are issued in the form of a code of practice, to give effect to what he has said he wants to achieve?

Jim Fitzpatrick: My hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) also raised the point about the guidance not being statutory. We consulted on making the guidance statutory, but there was no clear majority in favour of that. We consider that statutory guidance that could effectively impose a list of requirements does not fit with the risk-based regime that we are trying to introduce.

John McDonnell: It would be useful if the Minister could comment today, at least in a note, on the views expressed by the individual parties consulted on whether there should be guidance.

Jim Fitzpatrick: I shall be happy to write to my hon. Friend, if I do not cover the point in due course. I shall deal with his question on consultation a few pages further on in my speech.

The secondary point about the Fire and Rescue Services Act 2004 is that it requires a fire and rescue service to have due regard to the national framework that we have set up, which includes producing integrated risk management plans for the protection of the community and encompasses enforcement of fire safety. The 2004 Act also provides powers for the Secretary of State to intervene, where the integrated risk management plan that has been prepared does not come up to scratch.

As I was explaining, we are using the guidance to show how the law and the fire safety order provides, and in our view enhances, the existing provisions. I have said before, and I am happy to repeat now, that we will not remove the 1989 regulations until and unless it can be clearly shown that all necessary protections are continued under the new regime. I will come in a few moments to the points about the timing and how we will demonstrate why running the two systems in tandem will improve on safety.

John McDonnell: I just want to put this matter on the record so we are not confused in any future debates, because this one might run and run. The Minister talked about areas where the existing orders did not apply, or where the Government thought that they did not cover things adequately in terms of the consultation that has taken place. That is why the consultation with the Fire Brigades Union and others has been on the basis of strengthening the existing orders rather than relating things to guidance. The issues could be addressed under the existing system without that being transformed into something based simply on guidance that has no statutory effect.

Jim Fitzpatrick: I hear what my hon. Friend says, but the guidance being drafted will cover other transport premises and facilities as well as sub-surface stations. The stakeholders working with us on that include representatives of the operators, through London Underground, of the enforcers, through the London Fire and Emergency Planning Authority, and—most importantly for my hon. Friends—of the trade unions, through the National Union of Rail, Maritime and Transport Workers. The guidance needs to be, and will be, clear about the protections and how they apply.

In response to the question put by my hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington (John McDonnell) about the thoroughness of the consultation in the previous instance, I should say that the regulatory reform order was developed with stakeholders after a lengthy period. Subsequently, we consulted formally for four months, sending out more than 10,000 consultation documents. We received 257 responses, and the final order was developed on the basis of that consultation. On the guidance, a working party including London Underground, the RMT—

John McDonnell: I should like to be clear for the sake of the record. There is consultation, and there is consultation and listening. The RMT position was set out clearly yet again on 20 January. It clearly stated:

> "The Section 12 regulations lay down fire-safety measures that are simply not specified in the new Fire Safety Order, and RMT, alongside the Fire Brigades Union and Aslef, has been campaigning hard to keep them in place. We hope the government will now use the delay to think again about the wisdom of abolishing specific fire-safety measures in favour of what amounts to a discretionary approach. Relying on employers not to cut corners is simply not good enough, as far too many people—transport workers and passengers—already know only too well."

I would not want the Minister's statement about consultation with the RMT to be construed in any way as meaning that the RMT had supported the Government's approach on this matter.

Jim Fitzpatrick: I was not trying to mislead the Committee in any way. During my last meeting with the RMT only a couple of months ago, we discussed and decided to run the new reform order in tandem with the 1989 sub-surface regulations. The RMT put its points clearly across the table and we responded clearly with the details of why there will be enhanced protection for subcontractors on the underground and for firefighters, who may have to attend emergency incidents; neither group is covered at the moment. We also gave details on the two other issues that I mentioned and several others that we put across the table at the same time.

Mr. Dismore: Nobody is suggesting that the groups to which the Minister has referred—firefighters and others—should not be protected. Personally, I would have no problem if the two regulations ran in parallel and indefinitely. My concern is that once the regime is set up, the original regulations will quickly fall by the wayside and we will be left with the subsequent regime, which in our view will weaken protection for people who work and travel on the underground.

Jim Fitzpatrick: If I make some progress, I shall be able to answer some of the other points made. Looking at the clock, I am sure that we shall have time towards the end of my contribution for colleagues to make further interventions.

On the point about the burden of proof, I believe, with the greatest respect, that my hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington has the position wrong. Under the fire safety order, it is not for the enforcer to prove that the requirements have not been met, but for the person responsible to prove that they have been met. Article 34 of the fire safety order is clear on that; it is what is known as the reversal of the burden of proof, and changes the position established under the Fire Precautions Act 1971.

With regard to the point about flexibility, the enforcer currently has the power to allow a lesser standard if the case is made by the person running the sub-surface railway station concerned. The case that needs to be made is an assessment of the risk, and there is no reason to suppose that a case could be made under the fire safety order if it cannot be made under the 1989 regulations.

In any event, the body that has to be satisfied that the premises are safe under either regime is the local fire and rescue authority, and the lead enforcer for that sector—the London Fire and Emergency Planning Authority—has already confirmed that the fire safety order provides it with adequate powers to ensure safety at least of the level provided now.

John McDonnell: With the greatest respect, there is a role for the Government. My hon. Friend the Member for Hove pointed out clearly that even under the existing system, when there is potential for the use of discretion with exemptions so that the system can operate flexibly on the ground, there is a role for the Government in monitoring how that should operate.

When, to clarify the Government's role in monitoring the existing system, I asked the Minister how many exemptions had been applied for, I got the response that the Government did not know. How can we be confident that the Government will have a leading role in monitoring the new system when the new regulations come in? So far, they have not involved themselves even in the basic monitoring of the existing system.

Jim Fitzpatrick: My hon. Friend is anticipating a later section of my speech, when I shall talk about exemptions.

I was saying that the London Fire and Emergency Planning Authority had already confirmed that it considered that the fire safety order provided it with adequate powers to ensure safety at least at the level provided now. I must add that the LFEPA view remains current following a review that it conducted after the appalling events of 7 July, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Hove referred.

Hon. Members will have noticed that the underground station officer will have to convince the same enforcing authority—the fire and rescue authority—about the adequacy of the fire precautions, regardless of whether the 1989 regulations or the fire safety order are being used. In addition, the lead authority for the enforcement of fire safety in sub-surface stations has already informed us that it expects to serve alteration notices on all sub-surface stations under article 29 of the fire safety order. That means that the station operator will have to tell the enforcer if it proposes to make any changes to the premises or the use of them, or to the services, fixtures, fittings or dangerous substances used or stored. That extra protection will allow the enforcer to consider any changes proposed and the ongoing adequacy of the fire precautions, including the availability of staff to put into effect the emergency plan that the fire safety order requires in respect of action to be taken in the case of fire.

In common with the other requirements of the order, failure to comply with an alterations notice is an offence. The penalties are a fine up to the statutory maximum—currently, £5,000 on summary conviction—up to two years' imprisonment or an unlimited fine or both on conviction or indictment.

John McDonnell: It would be useful if the Minister described the layers of management, the number of companies and the tiers of operation in which that line of communication will have to take effect. As my hon. Friends the Members for Hendon and for Hove have said, times have moved on. With the PPP system and the infraco management systems, we now have an immensely complicated structure and line of communication. Will the Minister describe what that line of communication would look like?

Jim Fitzpatrick: If my hon. Friend will forgive me, I shall write to him on that point as well, rather than go into the detail this morning. I should like to get through the rest of my contribution. I am sure that we can clarify that for him in due course.

I hope that what I have said clarifies the position, but we are always open to further discussions about safety and we are maintaining an open dialogue on the issue with the RMT and hon. Members. I shall take away with me the suggestions made by my hon. Friend the Member for Hove as well as other points made by hon. Members today.

The fire safety order is perhaps the last significant piece of the legislative jigsaw that makes up a much broader reform. When, as a new junior Minister in the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, I was asked to sign the regulatory reform order that involved the technical withdrawal of the Fire Precautions Act 1971, which had been the fire services' bible for some decades, I assure hon. Members that I took—[Interruption.] My hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington is being very flippant.

I took considerable time to make sure that the order would not in any way reduce public safety, but would enhance it, before being persuaded and convinced by the experts to whom I spoke. In the cut and thrust of debate, the suggestion that one is signing a reduction in public safety could be taken as mildly offensive.

John McDonnell: I just want to reassure the Minister that none of us taking part in the debate has in any way impugned his intent. We understand his commitment to safety, particularly bearing in mind his background as a firefighter. What we are concerned about is his judgment, which we believe is incorrect in this instance.

Jim Fitzpatrick: I am not sure whether that was a compliment or not, but I will accept the reassurance offered by my hon. Friend.

The fire safety order underpins the move of the fire and rescue services to prevention-based services, but, in turn, that move underpins the order. I can assure hon. Members that that is a solid foundation. The Fire and Rescue Services Act 2004 created a new statutory duty on fire and rescue authorities to promote fire safety, which places fire prevention at the heart of fire and rescue services activity. That is a cultural change for the service and we are working with the service to achieve it. It has been long in the arrival. In future, the fire and rescue service will be focused on prevention. The Government are committed to helping the fire and rescue service prevent fires: for example, we are introducing a new system of fire and rescue cover based on risk to life. Historically, the system was based on the density of buildings in an area. We are delegating responsibility to the local fire and rescue authority, its elected members, the communities and chief fire officers to ensure that things are decided in the most effective way at a local level.

The fire safety order is a key element in the move to a prevention-based service. It provides prevention-based tools for business and promotes prevention-based enforcement. In turn, the Fire and Rescue Services Act promotes and provides a prevention-based service to enforce the law.

Mr. Dismore: The Minister seems to be suggesting that there is an either/or situation, but that is not the case. If one considers recent developments in health and safety law more generally, one can see the trend, particularly in Europe, towards risk assessments and so forth. Risk assessments are more general and are aimed at prevention, but in certain key industries, such as construction, they are underpinned by basic regulations, which set out the detail. The case that we are putting to the Minister is quite simple: let us have both. Let us have the preventive approach and the more general duties, but, in this particular case, let us also have the underpinning of detailed regulations.

Jim Fitzpatrick: I have been trying to reassure my hon. Friends that we are trying to have the best of both worlds, that we have a solid basis of law and that the guidance is enhancing the protection. I will come on to the points made by Opposition Members about the guidance, its implementation and the delay.

The two regimes are part of one and the same thing and they will benefit our society whether taken together—as they should be—or separately. During the passage of the order, the House was concerned that business and enforcers should have adequate time to familiarise themselves with the new regime and the guidance that will accompany it and that the coming-into-force date should, as far as practicable, be timed to coincide as closely as possible with reform of the fire safety law in Scotland.

The hon. Member for Cheadle (Mark Hunter) asked why the guidance was not yet available. When we took the regulatory reform order through the House, we said that it might not be possible to get the guidance drafted for 1 April 2006—the coming-into-force date. It has turned out that the task of producing a suite of 11 sets of guidance documents could not be completed in that time. If we are to get the application right—and it will be right—we need to ensure that there is adequate time for business and organisations to gain that familiarity. Despite extensive work with stakeholders, it is clear that all the guidance documents will not be ready in time to have a full 12-week gap between publication and coming into force on 1 April 2006, as was hoped.

Mr. Dismore: I am sorry to keep nipping at the Minister's ankles about this, but he is still talking about guidance. It is quite clear that the Government are talking about producing a suite of guidance notes. I return to the basic question about a code of practice. Will he give us a clear answer today? Will he say whether the Government will consider turning the guidance notes into a code of practice, which would have a much greater legal effect?

Jim Fitzpatrick: I am not in a position today to give my hon. Friend that assurance, but I undertake to take his request away and write to him in due course about the point that he has just raised.

John McDonnell: I wonder whether the Minister will help us by enhancing that response. It would be invaluable if he would meet Members to discuss this point in more detail, and possibly meet an element of the stakeholders as well, to talk about the transference of the guidance into a code of practice.

Jim Fitzpatrick: I think that my hon. Friend knows that, when it comes to safety issues, my door is generally open. As I have indicated, I have accepted requests from the RMT for meetings and I have met with the Fire Brigades Union on a number occasions. I think that I have already written this week accepting a request to meet with officers of the Fire Brigades Union parliamentary group and that I have acceded to a request to meet members of the all-party fire safety and rescue group.

John McDonnell: Is that a yes?

Jim Fitzpatrick: I would be slightly hurt if my hon. Friend thought that my door was closed to any request from Members in respect of fire safety, given the changes that are being undertaken, which are fundamental to the fire service and to the way in which we try to protect the public. We want to ensure that we have given the best possible reassurances to ensure that people understand what we are trying to achieve.

In the light of the commitments that we have given to the House and our commitment to ensuring that the reform is properly backed, I announced on 12 January that the coming into force of the substantive provisions of the Regulatory Reform (Fire Safety) Order 2005 should be put back, as was mentioned by the hon. Member for Cheadle. Recently, as he also mentioned, the Scottish authorities announced that more time should be allowed for reform north of the border, and the new rules in Scotland are now expected to come into force in October 2006 at the earliest.

There will be further discussion with colleagues in Scotland and I hope, following that, to announce the revised coming-into-force date very shortly. However, as the point of delaying is to give more time, the publicity campaign to promote the regulatory reform order has started, with seminars taking place around England and Wales between January and March. They have been well attended so far and all sectors of business and the enforcing authorities have been well represented. The feedback from the seminars so far has been positive. Many share the general opinion that more time is needed for stakeholders to familiarise themselves with the new fire safety regime and accompanying guidance. We are agreed that it is important that the guidance is not rushed and that we must get it right.

John McDonnell: I can see that the Minister may be running out of notes. Before he concludes, I would like him to clarify the parliamentary process from here on in. Will the Regulatory Reform Committee be consulted again? Will there be some reference back to it and will there be any engagement with its members, given the significance that they have attached to this matter in the past and their recommendations? In addition, are there any elements that will require a parliamentary process to be employed—using either the affirmative or negative procedure—in relation to the order, which Members may be able to come to a view on? Are there any further elements in the parliamentary process?

Jim Fitzpatrick: I will have to research that and respond to my hon. Friend in due course. My understanding at this point is that we have concluded the parliamentary procedures, but that we have obviously not announced the date for the implementation of the guidance notes. I am advised that the order to change the coming-into-force date will go to the Regulatory Reform Committee, so there will be additional scope. I have given a commitment to my hon. Friend that we can certainly have a meeting. I have done exactly the same to representatives from the RMT. Hopefully, I have demonstrated to their satisfaction that by running the two procedures in tandem, we will be able to demonstrate that improvements and enhancements are being used under the new system that could not have been used under the old system. In that instance, they remain to be convinced. I understand that scepticism; I do not underestimate it or regard it as offensive. I take the point that my hon. Friend made earlier; I was not suggesting that he was being offensive. There is some way to go before we fully convince all partners. We may not get to that point, but I hope that we do.

John McDonnell: Now that the matter will be referred back to the Regulatory Reform Committee, it would be invaluable if the difference between the Government's approach to guidance and that recommended by a number of Members here today in relation to the construction and installation of a code of practice were pointed out to the Committee and addressed by it. A helpful note to the Committee on the Government's arguments would be invaluable.

Jim Fitzpatrick: I am sure that that will form part of the course. Given the nature of the business and the fact that this debate has taken place and even if we were not to produce such documentation, members of the Regulatory Reform Committee may well have done their own research and identified that issues have been raised which it would be appropriate for them to consider, prior to the order being laid before them.

John McDonnell: I apologise to the Minister for continuing to intervene. Will he clarify the timetable? It is an issue that we have all raised. Will he provide an indicative timetable for the process, including if and when matters will be referred back to the Regulatory Reform Committee; whether any further orders will lie before us; whether there will be any conclusion on the points about consultation on guidance and implementation; and when the contiguous six-month and 12-month periods will take place?

Jim Fitzpatrick: We are not in a position today to identify a definitive date. As I mentioned, the Scottish Executive expect the new regulations to come into force in Scotland from 1 October. We have undertaken to try to ensure that the timing is parallel. I cannot give a commitment to that now, but we will make an announcement shortly. The parallel running cannot take place until the guidance notes are produced. I have no problem with hon. Members intervening as they have, given that we have had the opportunity to respond to the serious points that have been made.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hove asked that the necessary regulations be updated from 1989. I have said that we believe we have done more than that: we have not only updated but reinforced them. We are monitoring carefully and listening to representations.

I have given several commitments about taking further representations. I hope that when the new guidance notes are published and implemented, colleagues in the House and the wider community will be reassured that the changes that we are introducing not only in this narrow regard but generally, in respect of the fire community and the public's protection from fire and other risks, will be enhanced by the cultural changes being made through the modernisation process that the fire service is going through as a result of the Bain inquiry and the 2004 Act.

Those modernisation proposals go back to the 1960s and '70s, as hon. Friends on the Government Benches and, I am sure, hon. Members on the Opposition Benches know. I hope that we have offered some assurance this morning, and I am grateful to have had the opportunity to put it on record.

Easington Primary Care Trust

11 am

John Cummings (Easington) (Lab): Easington primary care trust, which is coterminous with the district of Easington local authority boundary and located in the county of Durham in the north-east of England, is responsible for providing primary health care services in 17 GP practices with 56 GPs and for commissioning acute and mental health services for a population of almost 99,000 people, covering an area of 56 square miles.

Easington has some of the worst health experiences, the highest need for health services and the lowest financial allocation in the country. Having said that, the Government must be given credit, because the shortfall in resources is being corrected with a substantial uplift in the three-year allocation, beginning this year. The PCT has complex relationships with partner organisations, but an excellent record of performance against nationally set health service targets. The financial allocation awarded to the PCT for 2006 to 2008 will enable it to achieve improved performance, including implementation of "Standards for Better Health" and performance targets. The allocation will facilitate the development of local services, which will result in a radical difference to residents and enable the PCT, with local partners, to tackle the health inequalities experienced by people in the district of Easington.

At this time of change for PCTs, it is critical that the particular characteristics of Easington are understood in any future configuration. Sir Nigel Crisp visited my constituency in September to open officially the new urgent care centre in Peterlee, and he gave generous praise to Easington PCT for its record of improving the service infrastructure and the health of the local population. A strong locality focus is clearly required to retain the emphasis on tackling the health inequalities that are adversely affecting my constituents if we are to ensure continued health improvement and service development.

The purpose of this debate, for which I am grateful to Mr. Speaker for allocating me time, is to highlight the position of Easington PCT in terms of health experiences, financial allocation and complex relationships with partner organisations. I also intend to draw Ministers' attention to the excellent record of performance against key national targets achieved by the PCT, and to put the case for retaining Easington PCT, at least in the short to medium term, in the reconfigured structure of primary care trusts in the county of Durham and the Tees valley.

The health and disability domain of the index of deprivation 2004 identified areas with high numbers of people who die prematurely, whose quality of life is impaired by poor health or who are disabled. All but one super-output area in the district are ranked in the 20 per cent. most deprived nationally. Easington is the most deprived local authority district in a shire county. Its population suffers lower average incomes, high levels of worklessness and lower educational attainment at age 16.

Easington suffers some of the poorest health and worst deprivation in the country. Life expectancy for men and women in Easington falls below the national average. The PCT area has one of the highest rates of smoking in the region and nationally. It has one of the highest conception rates in girls under the age of 18 in the region. The two major causes of death in Easington are circulatory diseases, including coronary heart disease, and cancer. The death rate for circulatory disease is one of the highest in the northern region, and the population has one of the highest lung cancer rates.

A study undertaken by the Sainsbury centre in 1999 highlighted the fact that the prevalence of mental health problems was greater in Easington than anywhere else in the country outside inner London, and that the need for mental health services in Easington was 30 per cent. higher than the national average.

Easington is the most underfunded PCT in the country, at 86 per cent. of target. Historically, the PCT has been significantly underfunded against its fair share of national funding available to the national health service. I am talking about a shortfall of about £26 million per annum. The January 2005 announcement of allocations to the PCT from 1 April 2006 to 31 March 2008 appreciably addressed the underfunding. Even at that stage, Easington will be 3.5 per cent. below capitation, but it has been promised an additional £43 million.

Mr. Kevan Jones (North Durham) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend on securing the debate and on the work that he has done to ensure that his local PCT receives funding to fight the deprivation that he has outlined. The position is similar in my constituency. Does he agree that one fear that our constituents have about the proposals for a single county-wide PCT is that that money, which has been targeted at the worst deprivation, is likely to be disbursed to more affluent parts of County Durham?

John Cummings: I thank my hon. Friend for his intervention. Only too well do we know that in the past moneys that should have been directed to Easington were subsumed into the old County Durham, and I certainly have similar fears for the future. One reason why Easington PCT has inherited a very low capitation is that each time there has been a change or reconfiguration of boundaries or commissioning arrangements, Easington has lost out because of the complexity of provider relationships and the relative smallness of our population compared with the populations of major urban centres.

In respect of commissioning for acute services, there are relationships with North Tees and Hartlepool NHS Trust, City Hospitals Sunderland NHS Foundation Trust and County Durham and Darlington Acute Hospitals NHS Trust. There are also commissioning relationships with South Tees Hospitals NHS Trust and Newcastle upon Tyne Hospitals NHS Trust for tertiary services. For mental health and substance misuse services, there are partnerships with Tees and North East Yorkshire NHS Trust, South of Tyne and Wearside Mental Health NHS Trust and County Durham and Darlington Priority Services NHS Trust.

Easington PCT is a member of both the County Durham and Darlington and the Tees emergency care networks. It is a member of the Northern Cancer Network, covering the north of Durham, and of the Cancer Care Alliance, covering south Durham and Teesside. Whereas other networks are split in the same way based on patient flows, the PCT is a member of both.

[John Cummings]

In developing local integrated services, particularly for older people, children, people with mental health problems and people with learning disabilities, effective partnerships with Durham county council and Easington district council have been critical. The PCT has strong relationships with the councils in developing services and tackling health inequalities. There is no forum that spans all those areas, so to ensure that the health needs of the residents of Easington district are not marginalised or viewed by the major players as peripheral, Easington needs a strong, locality-focused PCT to prevent regression to former times, when Easington lost out substantially on resource allocation and local service developments.

As regards performance against targets, Easington PCT has strengthened considerably its approach to performance over the past year and has in place robust arrangements to deliver the performance targets, "Standards for Better Health" and financial balance in 2005–06. Easington PCT has an excellent record of recent success. It is working in partnership to develop children's centres across the district, with 11 to be in place by April next year. Two are already open, and two are about to open. An urgent care centre in Peterlee opened in October 2004 on an appointment-only basis; it has been open 24 hours, seven days a week since March 2005. More than 22,000 patients have been seen to date. At Christmas, more patients attended the urgent care centre than the accident and emergency department. Furthermore, 1,254 smokers have successfully quit after four weeks.

With a 52 per cent. success rate, the PCT is the second best performing service in the country. On 31 March 2005, 1,512 patients were waiting for an in-patient appointment, representing a 21 per cent. reduction in the year from April 2004. The PCT has appointed four dentists since April 2005, including a vocational trainee. GPs with specialised interests have been accredited by the Deanery in substance misuse services, and there are plans this year to establish and accredit four new areas—in dermatology, coronary heart disease, emergency care, and sexual health and contraceptive services. A new door-to-door transport scheme funded by the PCT is now available in the district of Easington for people with mobility problems. The scheme can be used only for appointments with hospitals and primary care providers. There have therefore been substantial improvements in service delivery, which are a testament to the valuable work being carried out by Easington PCT.

In shaping up for the future and addressing the proposed changes to PCT boundaries, there seems to be considerable pressure from the centre and at strategic health authority level to accept a single PCT for County Durham. Although I fully understand and support the overall philosophy of delivering primary health care and, indeed, all health services in an efficient and cost-effective manner, with savings from a reduction in management and administration costs being reinvested in front-line services, there is a danger that the improvements in local services and infrastructure that Easington PCT has made to date will be put at risk unless the necessary safeguards on resource allocations are put in place.

There is also the issue of the loss of local accountability, which causes me grave concern. The non-executive directors of Easington PCT are drawn from a range of local people with differing backgrounds and experiences. They have done an excellent job in consulting patient user groups and stakeholders to determine a set of local priorities within the overall NHS Plan. Who will act as champions for Easington's primary health care services in a County Durham-wide PCT, and what assurances will we have that resources earmarked for Easington will not be redirected to other, perhaps less needy areas?

In conclusion, there are six key points that I would like the Minister to note and comment on. First, health experience in Easington is worse overall than in most other areas of England. Secondly, the financial allocation to support interventions to tackle that poor health experience was, until this year, the lowest in the country, with Easington ranking 302 out of 302 PCTs, although that position will improve significantly over the next two years, with an additional £43.6 million on top of the baseline allocation promised by the Department of Health from 1 April 2006 until 31 March 2008. Thirdly, Easington has complex relationships with partner organisations because of patient flows.

Fourthly, Easington has a good record of performance against nationally set health service targets. Given the funding allocation to Easington for the years 2006 to 2008, there is a real opportunity to make a difference to the health experience of the people of Easington. Fifthly, if that funding is diluted or lost to Easington, there is a serious risk that the progress that has been made in recent years will be stopped in its tracks or even reversed. Finally, a unique case can be made for the retention of Easington PCT in the short to medium term, with Easington PCT coming under the umbrella of a merged County Durham PCT at some point in future, but only when the glaring problems of health inequality have been properly addressed. It is critical to ensure that Easington's unique position is fully understood and recognised and that a strong locality focus is maintained to ensure continued progress in improving health and health services in Easington in the future configuration of PCTs in County Durham and the Tees valley.

I am grateful for having had the opportunity to raise these issues, and I await the Minister's comments with great interest.

11.15 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Liam Byrne): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Easington (John Cummings) on securing this debate on the future of Easington PCT. I also express my thanks, as well as those of my right hon. and hon. Friends at the Department of Health, for his counsel and advice since we were appointed last May. He has ensured that Easington's voice has been heard at the highest levels in the debates over the reforms that we have made.

The level of investment in the NHS is rising rapidly, as my hon. Friend said, from £33 billion in 1997–98 to more than £92 billion in 2007–08. That increased investment, along with the hard work of 1.3 million NHS staff, is transforming our hospitals, reducing waiting lists and lowering mortality rates for some of the diseases that afflict my hon. Friend's constituents.

There can be no resting on our laurels, however. Over the weeks to come we shall be explaining how the next phase of health reform needs to take the health service forward. The vast majority of patient contact with the NHS—90 per cent.—takes place in a primary care setting. Having spent seven years reducing waiting lists to record lows, we now face the challenge of strengthening primary and community services as well. We need to meet the needs of patients with long-term conditions far better, which my hon. Friend will welcome because it is such a priority in his constituency. There are still too many people waiting far too long for treatment.

Mr. Roger Gale (In the Chair): Order. I am sorry to interrupt the Minister, but could he address the Chair? He is off microphone and Hansard is finding it difficult to hear.

Mr. Byrne: Of course.

We have debated the need to bring down waiting lists, particularly for diagnostic scans. Too many people, especially in disadvantaged areas such as Easington, cannot find a GP, or when they have a family doctor they cannot get an appointment at a time that suits them. Too many patients are admitted to hospital because the care that they could have received or which they might have preferred to receive at home is not available in the right way at the right time. Patients want far more control over their own care. They want to make choices about where and when to use services and that is exactly what we will address in the forthcoming White Paper.

I was pleased that my hon. Friend rooted so much of his argument in the need to tackle health inequalities. He commented on low life expectancy in his constituency, which is a problem that afflicts many of our poorer communities. As we move into the next phase of health reform we must surely focus on a much broader mission for the NHS and our social care system, which is not just about delivering a service that helps people when they are ill. We must bring the health service much closer to local government, so that together they can get down to the business of transforming health inequalities in some of our poorest communities. I do not think that there can be any community where that mission is more important than in Easington.

Mr. Kevan Jones: I am listening carefully to the Minister, but that is exactly what is happening in the county of Durham. Local PCTs work closely with district councils and others to tackle some of the issues that my hon. Friend the Member for Easington (John Cummings) raised, so why does the Department want to break up what has been a successful partnership in my constituency and his?

Mr. Byrne: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his intervention, as I want to address that point directly in the last third of my remarks.

To add a few facts to the analysis that my hon. Friend the Member for Easington gave, almost 29,000 adults in Easington consider themselves to have a long-term limiting illness. That is 30.8 per cent. of the population, which is the highest in England and Wales. More than 16,000 adults in Easington describe their health as not good. At 17.3 per cent. of the population, that is the second highest figure in England and Wales. Some 11,000 people in Easington would describe themselves as permanently sick or disabled, which is the highest rate in England and Wales. The north-east is classified in the index of multiple deprivation as the most deprived region in the country, and Easington is the most deprived area in the north-east.

Against that background, my hon. Friend has raised three important points. The first is about money: how do we ensure that Easington continues to receive the resources that it needs to tackle deprivation and health inequality? The second is about services: how do we ensure that the boost to resources in Easington delivers world-class health services to his constituents? The third and final point, which was the subject of the intervention from my hon. Friend the Member for North Durham (Mr. Jones), is about structures: how do we ensure a PCT structure that delivers those benefits, working in partnership with local government and other players?

First, I shall talk about money, because money is often the route to so much progress in health. Following the sustained lobbying campaign in which my hon. Friend the Member for Easington played a vital part, Easington PCT is to receive another £43.5 million in funding for the two-year period to 2008. He is therefore entitled to an assurance that, should Easington PCT be merged with any other PCTs, its funding allocation for the period up to 2008 will reach the areas for which it was originally intended.

It will be for strategic health authorities and the newly formed PCTs to manage and to continue to use in the best possible ways the funding available to them in order to deliver Government targets and make service improvements. We expect those organisations to continue to direct funding towards areas of greatest need. The reconfiguration exercise should not be used locally to move resources from high-performing areas to underperforming areas and vice versa.

There are two important policies that will strengthen the process. The first is practice-based commissioning, which places far bigger budgets under the control of local doctors' services, working in local wards. It supports the allocation of resources according to the movement of PCTs towards target "fair share" budgets for practices, based on the health needs of the local population. Further, practices will be able to re-allocate freed-up resources to services that better meet the needs of the patient. That will allow GPs to focus more health services on tackling health inequalities.

The second policy involves retaining the high priority that has been given to tackling health inequalities in 2006 and 2007. That policy is important. We expect PCTs to focus their work on meeting locally agreed delivery plans that make the most progress towards reducing health inequalities by 10 per cent. by 2010—concentrating on life expectancy at birth. The focus on tackling health inequalities will be at the centre of the forthcoming health and social care White Paper.

Secondly, I want to talk about how the money will be turned into services to help my hon. Friend's constituents. Several important initiatives are already under way in his constituency. He mentioned some of them: the two urgent care centres in the district; the young people's centre, which provides a new focus on the treatment of substance misuse and sexual health; and the PCT-run, second most successful quit-smoking programme in England.

In the PCT's business plan for the next three years, there are new ambitions, including the improvement of life chances for children, new access to high-quality services and the creation of more opportunities for good health. The PCT has already made much progress, with some key headline indicators already moving in the right direction.

John Cummings: Is the Minister able to assure me that the three-year plan will be adopted and carried out by any future reconfiguration of primary care trusts in County Durham?

Mr. Byrne: If I may, I shall check the guidance being issued around the consultation process, so that I can give my hon. Friend chapter and verse on how those local delivery plans will be taken forward. I do not want to give him a glib answer now. The matter is of such importance that I shall write to him with as full an answer as possible.

The final point about structures is important to this debate. Primary care trusts need to earn the trust of the people whom they serve every single day. That means that they need to get better every day at securing the best possible services, representing good value, from a growing range and diversity of health care providers. The creation of foundation trusts and the planned introduction of payment by results will mean that the hospital sector gets stronger in relation to primary and community services. That new hospital sector might well tend to suck resources towards it unless it is counterbalanced by an equally strong organisation that buys services for the community and represents patients' interests in designing and locating services.

We need strong PCTs to design, plan and develop better services for patients, to work more closely with local government, and, in some cases, to hold GPs to account for the services that they deliver. As my hon. Friend will know, SHAs were invited to submit reconfiguration proposals to the Department of Health by 15 October last year. An external panel, representing a wide range of stakeholder interests, was established to advise Ministers on whether the proposals for reconfiguration submitted by SHAs adequately engaged local stakeholders and met the criteria set out in "Commissioning a patient-led NHS". Following debate and, where necessary, some reworking by Ministers, we forwarded proposals for the reconfiguration of PCTs, which were fit to go forward for a 14-week consultation period starting on 14 December. With some PCTs, that included a wider range of proposals for reconfiguration than was originally put forward, because our objective was to ensure that the consultation on PCTs covered the broadest and most appropriate range of options for reconfiguration.

My hon. Friend is concerned about the two reconfiguration options that are currently out to consultation in County Durham and Tees valley, both of which propose the merger of Easington with Derwentside, Durham Dales, Sedgefield, and Durham and Chester-le-Street PCTs to form a single organisation for County Durham. Those options are out to consultation until 22 March, and no decisions on the future of any PCT will be taken until those local consultations are complete.

Mr. Jones: Is that not a bit of a sham? Why has Darlington, which was part of the original merger in County Durham, been taken out? Is it because the former Secretary of State for Health, my right hon. Friend the Member for Darlington (Mr. Milburn), has been lobbying hard? If that can be done for Darlington, why can it not be done for Easington and other PCTs in Durham?

Mr. Byrne: Ministers felt that the two options on the table for County Durham would adequately reflect the criteria that were put forward. We felt that those options warranted going out to public consultation. There can be no pre-judgment of that consultation. Ministers will need to be satisfied, when consultation responses come forward and the SHAs finalise their proposals, that there are reassurances on the way in which local delivery plans will be taken forward.

My hon. Friend the Member for North Durham made an important point about the way in which the current structure puts in place a range of successful relationships with local partners—I have seen how that works in my constituency in east Birmingham. Those relationships will be extremely important—particularly those with social care departments. In a health economy in which we seek to put care far closer to home and to give people the opportunity to live in their homes for longer, which is what most people want, the relationship between primary care organisations and local social services departments is absolutely critical. We have talked about the Berlin wall that has separated the NHS and social care departments for many years. We need to start taking that wall down, so if Ministers think that certain reconfiguration options take that process backwards, they cannot be approved. We have asked the SHAs which have proposed options to explain how they will ensure that the range of local partnerships in place will continue.

My hon. Friend the Member for Easington also asked how we can ensure that champions for Easington are intimately involved in the new organisation. That has to be part of the advice that comes back. Unless there is specific advice about how champions for his local health economy are to be kept involved, we cannot be satisfied that any new arrangements will take health and social care forward in his constituency.

In conclusion, I stress that—

It being half-past Eleven o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the sitting lapsed, without Question put.

Healthcare Services (Shropshire)

2.30 pm

Mr. Philip Dunne (Ludlow) (Con): I am extremely grateful for this opportunity to the draw hon. Members' attention to the crisis that is currently engulfing the NHS in Shropshire and I am pleased that hon. Members from all parties are hoping to participate. That crisis is affecting not only Shropshire, but its neighbouring counties, and that is indicative of a systemic problem; one that has only just started to reach the public consciousness. That problem is the chronic mismanagement of the NHS, which stems from a sustained period in which the Government have imposed targets, interfered in clinical priorities and introduced new cost structures, while at the same time seeking to abdicate any responsibility for the financial management of health care at the local level.

The consequence of that crisis, and the reason why I have called this debate, is that all three community hospitals in my constituency—in Bridgnorth, Ludlow and Bishop's Castle—are under imminent threat of closure, along with the community hospital in Whitchurch, in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson), about which I am sure we shall hear more shortly. That could result in the closure of all four community hospitals in Shropshire. Such things are, however, happening all over the country, not only in Shropshire.

I have joined the steering group of Community Hospitals Acting Nationally Together, which is a campaign group that exists to save community hospitals throughout the country. CHANT has evidence that 80 of the 322 community hospitals in England are at risk of closure or are threatened with substantial cuts in services, and I cannot overstate the impact that such closures would have on my constituents. With no hospital in an area of more than 600 square miles, and no hospital near the boundary of my constituency, many of my constituents would have to travel more than 30 miles to reach an acute hospital. The Minister may not know this, but given the lack of public transport infrastructure in much of Shropshire, it could take the best part of a day to make the round trip for an out-patient appointment or to visit a relative.

That is but one of a host of reasons why, on the first Saturday in January, more than 10,000 people marched through sleet and rain in all four of the towns where Shropshire community hospitals are at risk to support the continued provision of services at those hospitals. I addressed crowds of more than 4,000 people in both Bridgnorth and Ludlow that day and I am glad for the Minister's sake that it was me who addressed those crowds, not her, such was the clear strength of feeling. I do not know whether she has ever faced a crowd of that many people who were determined to preserve their hospital, but if she has not, I would be very happy to arrange a meeting—she would get the message soon enough.

To reinforce the point, I delivered two petitions on the Floor of the House last week. They contained more than 22,000 signatures—one third of the electorate in my constituency—in support of our community hospitals. Today, I have announced the results of a survey that I conducted among all the GPs in my constituency, and everyone who responded confirmed their full support for our community hospitals. The League of Friends of Ludlow Hospital has received letters in support of maintaining all existing services at Ludlow community hospital from all nine of the consultants who hold periodic clinics there.

Let me set the funding crisis in Shropshire in context by explaining the scale of the problem that our health care services face under the Government's funding rules for the NHS. Between them, the four NHS trusts in Shropshire and the unitary authority of Telford have a historic debt that is currently estimated at £36 million and are running a collective annual deficit of £25 million. Under the Government's current funding rules for the NHS, that historic debt must be repaid over the next three financial years and the annual deficit must be eliminated in the financial year starting in April. That means that the Government have tasked local health care managers with finding cuts of £37 million from the health care budget for the area of more than £400 million, which represents a cut of nearly 10 per cent. in the amount spent on health care in Shropshire effectively for each of the next three years.

I wish to ask the Minister three main questions. What went wrong? What does it mean to our local communities and, on a more positive note, what can be done? Two decisions affect Shropshire specifically, when the Government have to accept some responsibility over and above the overall impact of their so-called management of the NHS nationally. I refer first to the decision back in 2003 when the two trusts that ran the acute hospitals, the Royal Shrewsbury hospital and the Princess Royal hospital in Telford, were merged into a single NHS trust. At the time, the trusts had debts in the order of £6 million.

I understand from the new chief executive of the combined trust that it is clear from his review of the merger agreements and the drafts, in particular, of the agreements that part of the political price for securing public acceptance of the merger, which was controversial at the time, was for the debts to be assumed by the Government. At the last minute, that did not happen so, in my view, the Government shoulder direct responsibility for at least part of the historic debt, which has now compounded considerably.

Daniel Kawczynski (Shrewsbury and Atcham) (Con): On my hon. Friend's last point, one of my constituents, Mr. Frank Jones, cast the deciding vote to merge the two hospitals. Unfortunately, he died last month, but he had told me how much he was influenced by the promise that the debts would be written off.

Mr. Dunne: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for confirming the historic state of affairs.

David Wright (Telford) (Lab): I opposed the merger at the time that it took place, but I recall a debate in the House when the then Under-Secretary of State at the Department of Health, the Under-Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport, the hon. Member for Tottenham (Mr. Lammy), made it clear in response to my question that no deal was on the table to wipe off the historic debt. I agree with the hon. Member for Ludlow (Mr. Dunne) that there was certainly confusion between what was happening in the health economy in

[David Wright]

Shropshire and what was being said in London, and that it became mixed up in the debate about the merger proposals, which I say again that I opposed at the time.

Mr. Dunne: I am grateful for clarification of the debate in the House. From my understanding, it still stands that, in the penultimate draft of the merger agreement, the debt position was due to have been assumed by the Government.

Mark Pritchard (The Wrekin) (Con): My hon. Friend is generous to give way to so many hon. Members. To be helpful in the context of the comments of the hon. Member for Telford (David Wright), I know that in a letter dated 17 October 2004 the then Under-Secretary of State for Health said that there would be no reduction in services as a result of the merger. Clearly, reductions are on the way.

Mr. Dunne: I am sure that we shall be getting into the implications of the reductions during the debate.

The second issue that I hold at the Government's door is that there has clearly been chronic financial mismanagement within the acute trust since its formation. The scale of the financial difficulties of the trust only became apparent last year. Those directly responsible were finally found out and fired. It transpired that the chief executive of the trust had got his job on or around the time of the merger on the basis of a fake CV. The whole appointment process for senior administration and board positions within the trust was at fault. There was inadequate monitoring of the financial performance and control. Nothing was done about the mounting debt and deficit until they had escalated last year into the present crisis management. The whole sorry saga raises fundamental questions about the Government's failure to impose proper oversight of board appointment decisions, financial monitoring and the governance of NHS trusts.

Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire) (LD): I agree with the hon. Gentleman's accurate and erudite analysis of what has gone wrong. Does he also agree that one reason why we did not spot the problem before is because as parliamentarians we were misled by the management? In other words, to compound the developing financial crisis, there was also a cover-up; a cover-up that has now been terminated by the much more effective and transparent management who have taken over the trust's operations, and for whom I am very thankful.

Mr. Dunne: I am very pleased to see that the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik) has joined this debate, because a number of his constituents use the services of Shropshire hospitals. The issue to which he refers pre-dates my appearance in this place, but I agree with the thrust of what he says. Had Shropshire MPs been aware of the position during the past few years, it is clear more would have been made of it at the time.

Daniel Kawczynski: I wrote to the Secretary of State for Health about the issue of the chief executive with the fake CV. In the Secretary of State's reply, she regretted its occurrence, she apologised and she promised to put in place a better system for checking the CVs of applicants for the position of chief executive. However, in her letter she appeared to take no responsibility for that travesty of justice.

Mr. Dunne: I am grateful to my hon. Friend not only for taking the initiative and posing those questions, but for raising the question of where responsibility lies for management of the NHS. Last week, I received a copy of a letter that had been sent to one of my constituents, not from a Minister but from an official in the Department of Health. The letter made it crystal clear that the Department has abrogated any management responsibility for the provision of services at a local level. The buck certainly does not appear to stop with Ministers.

I should like to address some questions about what the crisis means for health care in Shropshire. If the Government insist on forcing through those cuts, local health care managers have some unenviable decisions to make in the next couple of weeks. Management consultants have been drafted in to help present those choices in purely financial terms, which they set out in a report that was published in November.

Those are the same consultants who were responsible a few years ago for the report on neighbouring Worcestershire which led to the closure of Kidderminster hospital's accident and emergency department and thus to the arrival in this place of the hon. Member for Wyre Forest (Dr. Taylor), who I am delighted to see has joined us for this debate. I am sure that the Minister will have been briefed on the report. It has been the subject of much comment in Shropshire, very little of it positive, since many of the comparisons that the report seeks to draw do not reflect the health care realities on the ground.

Shropshire is very rural. My constituency is the most sparsely populated of all constituencies in the county. The sheer geography and demography of the area inevitably creates higher costs to provide acceptable health care services than the national average, especially in primary and community care.

For several years, Shropshire has not received funding settlements that reflect those cost pressures. Much of the report's analysis ignores rural costs, too. It ignores also the significance of Shropshire hospitals to the residents of mid-Wales, where many thousands rely on the Royal Shrewsbury hospital, in particular.

Lembit Öpik: That is the reason why I am present in this debate. The hon. Gentleman is right to say that we depend on the Royal Shrewsbury hospital more than on any other for our accident and emergency care and substantial services. Does he agree that the debate is about not only the people in Shropshire, but the more than 100,000 people who depend directly on the services of the Royal Shrewsbury hospital and cottage hospitals that he describes? We are looking for a response from the Minister to assure our constituents that their quality of life will not diminish as a result of a debt caused by no fault of the citizens themselves.

Mr. Dunne: I agree completely with the hon. Gentleman. In fact, I should go further: as I said at the outset, the crisis in Shropshire is indicative of a general malaise that is affecting the entire NHS. We have seen reports of deficits of £620 million anticipated for the current year, a figure that the Department of Health acknowledges. The most recent figure I saw was from the Royal College of Nursing, which estimates the deficits at £1.2 billion, a sum that will escalate in the future. The issue will have resonance well beyond this Chamber and our constituencies.

I want to concentrate on what some of the cost-cutting choices would mean to my constituents. I will touch briefly on each of the three community hospitals that I know well. Bridgnorth hospital serves the south-east of Shropshire. It has 25 beds and four theatre beds and employs 110 people. Last year, 700 in-patients, 11,000 out-patients and 13,500 minor injuries were treated at Bridgnorth hospital. After many years of hard-fought campaigning, Shropshire county primary care trust last year started a flagship redevelopment of the hospital to bring all health care services in the area on to a single site. That is very welcome in the community.

Construction is mid-way through on this £6.5 million project. Ironically, it is celebrated by an enormous sign on the hospital wall that proudly proclaims:

"Department of Health: Building for the Future".

Underneath, it says:

"Bridgnorth Hospital Redevelopment, Investing for Improvements to Buildings and Standards".

There are uncomfortable parallels with what happened in Kidderminster immediately after a substantial capital investment under this Government's stewardship. According to the management consultants, closure of the hospital would "save" a mere £600,000 a year. The hospital in Telford is nearly 20 miles from Bridgnorth, which has a population of 11,891. Last week, the petition that I have referred to was signed by 11,871 residents, who objected in the strongest possible terms to the closure of Bridgnorth hospital or a cut in services there.

The community hospital in Ludlow serves most of the district of South Shropshire. It has 72 beds and treats 810 in-patients annually, including those in the mental health ward and the maternity unit. The maternity unit is housed in a building that was originally the town's workhouse. It may even be one of those places often cited, although not by name, by the Secretary of State to justify the modernisation programme. Last year, the hospital treated 11,000 out-patients, including X-ray and physiotherapy patients. Doctors and other health professionals in the town and the surrounding area would like to see services at the hospital maximised to consolidate their activities on the site, as is happening in Bridgnorth. Instead, it is threatened with closure because that would save £1 million, according to the same management consultants' report.

The hospital is one of the largest employers in the town, with some 150 jobs at stake. The Royal Shrewsbury hospital is 25 miles from Ludlow, up a busy and dangerous road. According to the 2001 census, Ludlow has a population of 9,250. Last week, I presented a petition signed by 10,220 residents who were protesting at the threatened closure of Ludlow hospital or a cut in services there. Perhaps some people signed twice, such is their anger. I could hardly blame them.

The community hospital at Bishop's Castle serves the south-west of my constituency and the area across the Welsh border. No savings have been assumed in the management consultants' report since Shropshire county primary care trust has advanced plans to close the hospital anyway, to offer its site to the neighbouring residential home operator and to commission nursing home beds, under the supervision of local doctors, from a redevelopment of the enlarged site. This time last year, there were 24 beds in Bishops Castle hospital; today only 18 are being commissioned. The threat posed by the review is that the number of beds will be reduced further, with the loss of up to 35 skilled staff. I am concerned to ensure that this proposal does not fall victim to the same cost-cutting mantra afflicting other services in the county. I will seek reassurance that the number of PCT-commissioned beds will not fall further and that the contract offered will be a genuine, long-term one so that rehabilitation beds with proper nursing care under doctors' supervision are maintained in Bishop's Castle in the long term.

The precedents are not encouraging. The old cottage hospitals in Broseley and Much Wenlock—both in my constituency—were turned into residential care homes some years ago. Each retained PCT-commissioned beds, but the number of beds the PCT committed to fund has gradually been whittled away over the years so that all remaining beds are once more threatened with termination, at the end of the financial year.

The so-called saving that will come from the closure of the three community hospitals amounts to £1.6 million. In my view, that is not a saving, but a mirage. It is a short-term quick fix with much longer-term and higher cost implications. It completely ignores the cost to the community of having to travel miles to visit their loved ones or an outpatient clinic; these are just some of the challenges posed by distance and rurality to health care outcomes. I have received many letters from constituents detailing the problems that closure of the hospitals would pose to asthmatics, diabetics, pregnant mums and the mentally ill, to mention a few.

People who live in those communities will still get ill, unfortunately. If community hospitals are closed, the acute hospitals will come under intense pressure. Admissions will rise and discharges will slow because the vital rehabilitation role of the community hospitals will have gone. That will reduce productivity in acute hospitals at a time when management consultants require significant improvements in productivity. The acute hospitals do not have the capacity to cope, especially not in winter. They are already operating at above optimal occupancy rates. I have hard evidence of that in an e-mail, dated 19 December 2005, from a senior manager at the acute trust:

"Shrewsbury and Telford Hospital NHS Trust are under acute pressure from emergency admissions and in the night were on the verge of declaring a major incident. I should be grateful therefore if you would consider all possible options before taking the decision to refer a patient for admission. The options will vary in the different areas and as the community hospitals will be endeavouring to accept as many transfers as possible from the Royal Shrewsbury hospital and Princess Royal hospital it would be preferable if you would consider intermediate care and rapid response as a first line although these services also have a limit on how many patients they can care for at any one time."

This e-mail was sent to all GPs in Shropshire.

[Mr. Dunne]

On 5 January, the same manager appealed to GPs throughout Shropshire to suspend the referral of patients, saying that the trust

"are experiencing acute post Christmas break pressures and are currently operating at Level 4 of their Escalation Plan and will therefore potentially be declaring a Major Incident. Please could you once again consider the potential for re-routing patients."

Last week, a district councillor in Ludlow had evidence of acute hospitals begging to offload patients into the community hospital because they could not cope. The Shropshire ambulance service wrote to me to voice its concern about closure.

Mr. Stephen O'Brien (Eddisbury) (Con): I have been following my hon. Friend's argument closely and—before he moves on to the ambulance service—he quoted the expected saving from the threatened closure of the three cottage hospitals in his constituency as £1.6 million. According to my own research that appears somewhat illusory. I could not establish whether that was cited in the Finnamore report as a net figure, after taking into account all consequential ramifications and losses, or whether it was an estimate of the cash-flow saving, which is a year-on-year management issue, rather than one of true patient care delivery.

Mr. Dunne: My hon. Friend makes a characteristically strong point. I posed the same question to the author of that report, and I was assured that it was an estimate of a net saving. However, as I shall go on to say, there are many other ramifications for the acute trusts—including additional costs for the ambulance service—of having to cope with the extra bed-blocking and so on that would arise. The estimate is clearly based on very flimsy data; I shall return to that point presently.

The ambulance service is very concerned about the closure of community hospitals, because closure will place it under additional pressures. A letter to me from the ambulance service says that closure

"may produce an increase in demand and as Shropshire ambulance service resource configuration is finely balanced and matched to available resources, i.e. Acute Trust and Community Hospital facilities, this potential increase in demand may require additional funding".

These factors are not taken into account in the Finnamore report.

Personally, I believe that the costs of patient stays at community hospitals are less than at acute hospitals. When I sought a breakdown of costs for Shropshire hospitals in order to prove that point, I received the following reply last week in the name of the Minister, which I hope that she will not mind my repeating:

"There is no data collected centrally at individual patient per bed level. Data is collected on a finished consultant episode basis and at National Health Service trust level, within which one or more hospitals will operate."

The fact that those data cannot be given does not inspire confidence that such critical decisions for our community hospitals are made on the basis of proper information.

Our community hospitals are vital to deliver key Government health care priorities. In urban areas, care in the community may work without hospitals, but rural Shropshire does not have the pool of nursing talent that is needed to deliver such care. The community hospitals provide a hub around which community nursing services can be delivered. The management consultants' report seeks to reduce the cost of the district nursing skill mix within the Shropshire county primary care trust to the same skill-mix cost as Telford district nurses, who provide what is essentially an urban service. That entirely ignores the extra time and cost involved in serving a widespread rural area. Moreover, the current hiring freeze in Shropshire raises a host of questions about how the services will be provided in the coming years without trained nursing staff coming through the system.

The review has other implications, and I do not have time to go in detail into them all. However, I shall just mention the impact on mental health services in the county. Shropshire performs very well in financial terms. Its mental health team operates without deficit at substantially less than the national average cost of such provision—21 per cent. less, in fact. That is partly because most beds are in Shelton hospital in Shrewsbury, which is one of the last two Victorian asylums left operating in England. Much work has gone into developing advanced plans to replace it with a modern facility, but all of that is now on hold, so Shropshire now looks set to have the unique distinction of operating the very last Victorian asylum in the country.

Lembit Öpik: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman is aware that mid-Wales depends on the facilities in Shropshire for its mental health provision. Does he agree that we are jeopardising not just the welfare of individuals but their families and relatives as well, as a direct result of the under-investment in this absolutely essential service?

Mr. Dunne: The hon. Gentleman anticipates what I am going to say. It is absolutely true that the families of these most vulnerable people are those who will suffer from having to travel such long distances.

That has not stopped health chiefs insisting on finding savings of between £1.2 million and £2.2. million from next year's mental health budget, despite current efficiency. There are advanced plans for closure of the two remaining mental health wards, both at Ludlow and Whitchurch hospitals, placing further pressure on their viability, and presenting the families of existing patients and staff with enormous stress, not to mention the patients themselves, who, as the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire was saying, are some of the most vulnerable people in our community. In my recent survey of the GPs in my constituency, 87 per cent. regarded closure of mental health wards in our community hospitals as short-sighted, given the ageing demographics that apply particularly to Shropshire.

So what can be done? To try to adopt a slightly more positive note for the Minister, I shall set out three areas in which she could help local health chiefs in making such critical decisions. The first would be to acknowledge that the historic debts are a Government responsibility. Returning those debts to the NHS would clearly be the first choice, but a second best would be to provide a substantially longer period for their repayment. A 10-year repayment term would reduce the annual cuts by £8 million.

The second way in which savings could be made without compromising the community hospitals is through prescription charges. I have discussed this with several doctors in my constituency. The recommendation in the management consultants' report gives rise to hope that significant savings could be made from reducing prescription charges, and many of the doctors believe that that could be achieved over time at no cost to health care quality and at relatively little cost to the community. Those savings would dwarf the notional savings from closing community hospitals.

Thirdly, I draw to the Minister's attention the fact that there is no mention of administrative savings in the management consultants' report. Given that the current reconfiguration consultations are under way for both the strategic health authority and primary care trusts in Shropshire, surely any review of health care spending in the county should take account of what savings can be made from those administrative reconfigurations before cuts in patient services are actioned.

I appreciate that I have been given a great deal of time, although there have been some interruptions. I conclude my remarks by saying that the Minister will doubtless give us in her winding-up speech a litany of how much has been invested and how many more doctors and nurses are now working in Shropshire than in 1997. Well before she embarks on that journey, I must tell her that the people of Shropshire will not wear it, especially when they see savage cuts in services or, God forbid, hospital closures.

The Prime Minister, we are led to believe, is looking to his legacy. In Shropshire, he risks being remembered as the axe man who has closed community hospitals, slashed hospital beds and cut off rural communities from local access to health care. I look to the Minister to ride to his rescue, and to offer my constituents and the people of Shropshire concrete evidence that the NHS is indeed safe in his hands.

In closing, I have a simple question for the Minister, to which I, and I suspect the many people in Shropshire who are listening to the debate, would be grateful for an answer in her closing remarks: will she instruct the strategic health authority to rule out the closures of Bridgnorth and Ludlow community hospitals as options for formal consultation? If she did so, she would make many thousands of people in Shropshire sleep easier tonight, and she would absolve the Prime Minister of blame for his legacy to Ludlow.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Roger Gale (in the Chair): Order. I intend to call Front Benchers at half past three. Five Back Benchers are standing, all with a constituency interest. I have no power to curtail speeches, but I do have the power to note if anyone is self-indulgent.

3.3 pm

David Wright (Telford) (Lab): Thank you, Mr. Gale. I will heed your advice.

First, may I congratulate the hon. Member for Ludlow (Mr. Dunne) on securing this very important debate and say how pleased I am that all five Shropshire MPs are present this afternoon to ensure that we have a comprehensive overview of what is happening in health services in Shropshire? It is also important to note that we are joined by hon. Members from the Welsh borders and by the hon. Member for Wyre Forest (Dr. Taylor), who obviously has had some experience in these matters in recent years.

Mr. Stephen O'Brien: And by MPs from Cheshire.

David Wright: Indeed, my apologies. I start by saying that I agree with the hon. Member for Ludlow that Shropshire has a unique rural structure, but it is also important to note that health care services were originally designed very much with that rural status in mind. There is a large hospital in Shrewsbury, as well as smaller community-based hospitals.

The advent of Telford new town in the 1960s placed greater pressures on the health economy in Shropshire; that is just a fact. Telford is now the largest town in Shropshire, and several of its wards exhibit significant deprivation. The community in Telford fought extremely hard throughout the '70s and '80s to secure a district general hospital, and it very much wants to protect it and ensure that it provides comprehensive services for the largest population centre in the county. That throws up significant challenges; that, too, is just a fact.

Because Telford is new and continues to grow, the challenge facing us is how to provide health services for a growing population. Telford is a regional housing growth point. According to the regional planning guidance and the local development framework, between 2001 and 2021 a net increase in housing provision of 20,300 dwellings is envisaged in the Telford and the Wrekin area. That is a significant number of new homes in the county, based in Telford. It is crucial that any design of services acknowledges that point. It is also fair to say, and I think I would get agreement throughout the House, that both Shrewsbury and Telford deserve full, district and general hospital services—the services that they have enjoyed for some years.

In setting the scene for this debate, it is important that we remember that staff are working hard in our hospitals throughout Shropshire and in Telford and the Wrekin; they do an incredible job and I pay tribute to them today. It is important that we manage this debate carefully, so we can sustain their morale and ensure that they continue to provide high-quality services to people at the front line. They deserve our thanks and I am sure that colleagues will join me in passing those on today.

It is also important to say that the two main acute hospitals are meeting six of the seven national targets laid down by the Government. They are meeting their access targets on in-patients and out-patients, 98 per cent. of people visiting accident and emergency are seen within four hours, and they are on-target in terms of beating MRSA. On cancer, they are meeting the 14, 31 and 62-day targets. They are following the Government's agenda on booking and they are signed up for "Agenda for Change". The only area in which they are failing is financial balance.

The hon. Member for Ludlow outlined in some detail a story—it almost sounded like fiction—about the management, and the financial mismanagement, of the health economy in Shropshire in recent years. I am delighted that we have a new chief executive and management team. Tom Taylor is a dynamic individual with whom all Shropshire Members can do business. He takes a constructive approach to what is happening in the local health economy.

It is important to consider some of the conclusions that the strategic review document has come up with. That document was produced on behalf of all the health trusts in the county. It concluded that the primary care trusts spend £20 million less than the national average on general acute and accident and emergency services, and £20 million more than the national average on community services and primary care. That is a real challenge. In examining the wider health economy, we must ensure both that primary care services and community based services are extremely efficient, and that our general acute and accident and emergency services are receiving the funding that they deserve. That is important in the context of the community hospitals debate, which the hon. Gentleman mentioned. I am concerned that if community hospitals close, we will not be able to deal with some of the bed-blocking problems that will arise in the acute sector. I hope we will not pursue that false economy.

The other conclusions of the strategic review of the two acute hospitals are that they are low-cost providers per patient, above-average performers in terms of patient activity, and their commissioners are driving down acute sector income. Interestingly, however, the hospitalisation rate in the county is still rising. Too many people are coming into the acute hospitals and not being dealt with in the community. That is a real challenge for us in terms of primary care.

It is also true to say that the two acute hospitals do not recover all the income for the work that they do. Under payment by results, our local hospitals would gain significantly, but we have a problem because we cannot wait for full implementation of payment by results. We have to sort out the financial issues as they are presented to us now.

The hon. Member for Ludlow went through a series of options produced by Finnamore, the financial consultants, in relation to the health economy in Shropshire and in Telford and the Wrekin. The options referred to a range of issues, including reconfiguration, rationalisation of sites and referral management—there is a raft of proposals. Finnamore produced what it called an abacus of options between lower and upper quartile levels of savings from each of those options. We need to pursue those options, but we have to bear several points in mind. Patient services must come first. There must be a more open dialogue within the county about what is happening in the health service in Shropshire—clearly there has not been the openness with elected representatives, officials and the public that we deserve and that would help us to understand what is happening.

The county must retain two district general hospitals with A and E services. I am delighted to say that, a week last Monday, at a meeting I attended with the Telford and Wrekin senior citizens forum, Tom Taylor, the chief executive of the acute hospital trust, made it clear that he is committed to trying to ensure that we retain those two hospitals with their A and E services. That is crucial. I should particularly like to hear the Minister's comments on that in her winding-up speech.

In any examination of the county's health economy, it is important that there is an understanding of the population trends that I outlined at the beginning of my speech. Telford people should receive the services that they deserve because it is a growing town and the largest population centre in the county.

We should focus on the points made by the hon. Member for Ludlow about options for resolving the financial crisis. I hope that the Minister will say something about historic debt, which we should reconsider. We must have greater brokerage on the time scale for the repayment of debt on which the acute hospital sector and, indeed, the PCT are working.

The hon. Gentleman's point about prescription charges is also important. We must get the maximum level of efficiencies and administration savings out of the system if we are to protect our acute and community hospitals and our primary care services. All five of the Shropshire Members want to achieve that.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Roger Gale (in the Chair): Order. I remind hon. Members again that there are four Members standing and not many minutes left. If Members can confine themselves to four minutes each, everybody will get in.

3.12 pm

Mark Pritchard (The Wrekin) (Con): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow (Mr. Dunne) on securing the debate. I shall have to make my 10-minute speech in four minutes.

I shall address directly some of the comments made by the hon. Member for Telford (David Wright). He talked about sustaining staff morale. I suggest that one of the best ways of doing that is to retain existing services and allow staff to retain their jobs. We know that 280 jobs are under threat, including those of front-line staff such as doctors and nurses. That would, of course, affect front-line patient care. He also said that patient services must come first. Of course, both back-office support and front-line staff such as doctors and nurses are needed to ensure that patients continue to come first.

I do not believe that Health Ministers lie awake at night wondering how they can make life more difficult for patients or our constituents in Shropshire. The Government have introduced many well intentioned reforms to the health service, but unfortunately things have gone badly wrong across the country. There is no doubt that changes are needed to health care provision and the way in which customers, consumers and clients of health care view and receive it.

We have discussed increasing primary care and care in the community, or community care, and about having super-GP surgeries and a beefed up and thriving independent sector. That is fine in principle, but only if those things are in place before services at the acute hospitals are reduced. In my constituency, in which the Princess Royal hospital is located, we do not have super-GP surgeries or a thriving independent sector and—unlike Ludlow—we do not have community hospitals, although some of my Albrighton constituents use the community hospital in Bridgnorth.

It would be easy for Members to say that we should have one or the other, but given the sparsity of the population and the size of Shropshire, which is the largest inland county in England, I think that we need both. One might say that that is unreasonable, but is it? Every week we hear the Prime Minister remind Members from the Dispatch Box that all the money from tax rises has gone to improve health and public services, particularly education and the health service. A lot of my constituents are saying, "Where has all the money gone? We have paid the taxes. We deserve the health services." Now, they are being asked to accept that they will have to pay more taxes over a long period but get fewer health services in return. It is a massive swindle of the taxpayers of Shropshire.

The changes will affect patient care. I should like to ask the Minister some brief questions. Can she guarantee that the accident and emergency unit at the Princess Royal hospital will remain consultant-led, not nurse-led? The hon. Member for Telford supported the principle of an accident and emergency unit and referred to the comments of the trust's chief executive that one will be retained at the Princess Royal, but nowhere has it been said that there is a cast iron guarantee that that unit will be consultant-led. It is no good people in the most densely populated part of the county—Telford and Wrekin—only having a nurse to patch them up, when for very serious incidents people have to be rushed by blue-light ambulance down to Shrewsbury. In extremis that will cost lives. If someone has a heart attack in Shifnal, Newport or Wellington in my constituency, by the time they get to Shrewsbury they may well be dead. That is hardly patient care.

Will the Government consider a debate on whether the two hospital trusts should de-merge? Has it worked? If it has not, let us have a mature debate about it. Let us de-merge the hospital trusts. It is a large county as hon. Members have said. We are a large county and we deserve a full district general hospital in both Telford and Shrewsbury and the other hospitals too.

Finally, can the Minister give a guarantee that there will be no land disposals at the Princess Royal hospital that would jeopardise plans for the new Severn hospice or the mental health unit that may well be placed on the site of the hospital? In conclusion, the Government's plans to rationalise, which is a euphemism for cutting services at the Princess Royal, are flawed. They will cost lives. I humbly ask the Government to rethink in the interests of patients and, indeed, their own interests, given that Telford is now a marginal seat.

3.18 pm

Daniel Kawczynski (Shrewsbury and Atcham) (Con): I feel extremely passionately about this issue, but the length of the debate has obviously forced me to shorten my speech. The Minister will know that I always treat Ministers with respect and courtesy, but I find it very difficult to do so today because of the way the situation is developing in Shrewsbury. We have excellent clinical efficiency at the Royal Shrewsbury hospital. Last week I brought Tom Taylor, the chief executive, to a meeting with the Secretary of State, who was delighted and surprised that the Royal Shrewsbury hospital had met the target of 62 days for cancer treatment because, as she admitted, it is an extremely difficult target to meet.

Our problem is the hospital's £36 million debt, to which my hon. Friends have referred. I believe—I put this point as strongly as I can to the Minister—that a former chief executive got the job with a fake CV. The finance director covered up the losses, and he has had to go as well. Where are the checks and balances, if such a major hospital can be run by people who have fake CVs, and people who cover up debts? It is truly astounding. Surely the Minister must take some responsibility for the situation at the Royal Shrewsbury hospital. We would benefit to the tune of £15.3 million every year if we had foundation trust status—and the only thing preventing us from securing that status is our debts. I lay the blame for those on the Government.

I should like to raise two more points. Some specialist nurses came to see me at my surgery on Saturday. I shall not reveal what type of specialist nurses they are, for fear of revealing their identities. Many people who work for the NHS and come to speak to MPs are petrified of telling us about their experiences, because of the culture in which, if someone dares to criticise the Government, the Government will come down on them like a ton of bricks and they will lose their jobs.

The nurses who came to see me said, "Look, we're being paid on band 6 for our job, but if we go 15 miles down the road to Wolverhampton the same job is band 7." Therefore, they would be paid an extra £5,000 a year if they made a 15-mile journey every day, left the Royal Shrewsbury hospital and went to work in Wolverhampton. That is a huge threat to us in Shrewsbury, because if those people can be paid £5,000 a year more for doing the same job in Wolverhampton, they are likely to be poached, leave the Royal Shrewsbury hospital and go to Wolverhampton. That is all part and parcel of the regionalisation of health care provision.

In Shrewsbury a cancer clinical review is under way, and the talk is that although we are brilliant at cancer provision in Shrewsbury, the services could be moved to Stoke or Wolverhampton because the Government want larger catchment areas for those services. That is a tremendous threat, and I should like the Minister to look into it. I shall, of course, fight any proposals to move cancer services away from the Royal Shrewsbury hospital to Stoke and Wolverhampton. As the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik) knows, it is not just my constituents who use the hospital. People all the way to Aberystwyth, on the Irish sea, come across the border to use it.

I want to keep my remarks within the time that you specified, Mr. Gale, so this will be my final point; it is for members of the public as well as hon. Members. I have just been visited by representatives of the Parkinson's Disease Society and other organisations. There are two neurologists in our two hospitals, for the whole of Shropshire—an area covering 750,000 people, if mid-Wales is included. In Germany an area of that size would have 20 neurologists, and in France it would have nine. I should like the Minister to take that point on board. Shropshire cannot survive long term with two neurologists to cover such a large area.

3.22 pm

Mr. Owen Paterson (North Shropshire) (Con): I congratulate my fellow Shropshire MP, my hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow (Mr. Dunne), on landing this debate. It is of great importance and real relevance to all our constituents.

[Mr. Owen Paterson]

Before Christmas I went to a public meeting in Whitchurch, the town where I was born. There were 500 in the hall and at least 100 outside, standing in the cold. We had a petition, which my hon. Friend and I handed in last week, with 10,000 signatures—and it is growing, so I have not put it behind the Speaker's Chair. We had a march, with more than 2,000 people, on a freezing cold Saturday morning. That is an expression of feeling about the importance of primary care to my constituents, which cannot be ignored. We had representatives from Market Drayton, Wem, Ellesmere and Audlem, over the border in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Eddisbury (Mr. O'Brien).

Those people are not just nimbys who want to hang on to their services. They have a real case. To bring the subject down to earth, I shall outline the example of Mrs. Schofield. She had a near fatal accident and was in an acute hospital for three months. She said:

"If I had had to stay in my acute bed for a further three months, this would have cost double the amount for my bed alone and added to the hospital waiting lists; I cannot see how, on this basis, closing our Community Hospital will save money. The local hospitals in this area i.e ... The Royal Shrewsbury and The Princess Royal ... will end up with dozens of 'bed blockers' because once the small community hospitals have been closed there will be nowhere to send the patients for rehabilitation."

Rehabilitation is vital. Mrs. Schofield had four months more rehabilitation in Whitchurch community hospital, and as she said:

"I could not physically have undertaken this journey"— to Shrewsbury—

"as my muscles were weak from four months inactivity."

That is a quick glimpse of the sort of service that those primary care hospitals offer. They take the pressure off the district general hospitals about which other hon. Members have spoken so eloquently.

That is flagged up in the famous Finnamore report, which states:

"An alternative approach to the community hospitals has been discussed that maximises the utilisation of community hospitals."

But, incredibly, it then says:

"The financial implication of this approach has not been modelled at this stage but this could be carried out at the detailed option development stage."

May we have a cast-iron guarantee that there will be a real study of the value of the community hospitals? My hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow flushed out the fact that the Minister does not have a clue what the comparative costs of running primary care and acute care are. Will she take up my suggestion, which was proposed by doctors whom I met over Christmas, that social services should run the hospitals? We know that the PCTs will not be able to be providers and that there is already 93 per cent., and sometimes 99 per cent., bed occupancy in Whitchurch. If there was better liaison with social services and better co-ordination, the needs of someone who has had a fall, or who wants a lift, a commode or another piece of equipment could be met more efficiently by the community hospitals.

I hope that the Minister gets the message. It is absolutely out of the question to consider the option of saving £800,000 a year, which is a completely bogus figure in my opinion. It is politically a non-starter, and I would like the Minister to say today that she accepts that.

The Minister knows about my patch. She kindly met doctors from Ellesmere and Wem in July, who told her that with better primary care centres they could reduce referrals to the expensive acute hospitals, where costs are running up, by 20 per cent. The doctors gave her a telling example: diabetes will double in the next 20 to 30 years, and whereas 75 per cent. of diabetics in Shropshire are treated by GPs, in Birmingham 75 per cent. of diabetics are treated in district general hospitals. It is impossible to imagine the impact on the two main acute hospitals if the ratio for treating diabetes, let alone any other ailment, were the same as that in Birmingham.

As for the financial position, we touched on savings, which were flagged up in the report and show possible productivity gains of £10 million; the possible figure for prescribing is £10 million, for referral management £2.5 million, and for reconfiguration £2.1 million. My deal is that for enhanced primary care, and an absolute guarantee not to touch the community hospitals, I would go along with any sensible efficiency savings within the two main acute sites, so long as they did not reduce services. To my constituents it would not matter which of those sites provided the services, because in either case it is a 15-mile drive.

I was alarmed by a report in The Sun by George Pascoe-Watson, under the headline "Blitz on NHS big spenders". It stated:

"Hit squads of money men will be ordered into overspending hospitals."

I believe that it referred to a letter from the Secretary of State last night to me and to other hon. Members stating that KPMG are to be brought in, "driving large-scale financial turnarounds". Like the hon. Member for Telford (David Wright) and my hon. Friend the Member for The Wrekin (Mark Pritchard), I admire Tom Taylor, who has come in to an appalling mess, which was the result of thoroughly bad mismanagement. It is laughable that we had a chief executive who had faked getting a first at Nottingham university. We may not like what we hear from Tom Taylor, but he tells it to us as it is, because he has had time to get a grip on the problems. The last thing we want now is a lot of expensive busybodies from KPMG muddling around with yet more meetings. If anybody understands how to sort out the mess it is Tom Taylor and his team.

I want to know how long the busybodies will be in, how much they will cost and who is going to pay for them. I very much hope that it will not be the trust. I hope that it will come out of central funds, run by the Minister.

In my last two minutes I want to ask the Minister about mental health in Shelton. How far advanced are the plans to redevelop the second to last Victorian asylum?

Finally, the picture is not all gloom. There is a world-class hospital in my constituency at Gobowen, which is in the top tier for cleanliness and already has three-star status. There were only two MRSA cases per 10,000 patients at the Robert Jones and Agnes Hunt hospital, which is going for foundation status. However, one of the brakes on gaining that status is the fact that it needs clarification of the tariff for work done to put right mistakes made in other orthopaedic hospitals. Only four orthopaedic hospitals in the country can do that work, and my local hospital needs to know the details. May I bring the chairman and the chief executive to see the relevant Minister to discuss this matter so that they can push on and get foundation status? I invite the Minister to come to Shropshire at any time, and we will show her the value of primary care, and how to take pressure off the expensive acute hospitals.

Mr. Roger Gale (in the Chair): Briefly, please, Dr. Taylor.

3.29 pm

Dr. Richard Taylor (Wyre Forest) (Ind): I shall briefly make two points in support of the 20,000 people in south Shropshire who used to use Kidderminster hospital but who no longer do so, and who will now be subject to the double whammy of losing their minor injuries units and community hospitals.

First, may I ask the Minister about the credentials and experience of Finnamore consultants? For Worcestershire they have suggested some quite ridiculous changes, which the acute trust immediately threw out and will not include in its paper. Their suggestions for community hospitals are completely ridiculous: they are not common sense, they do not make economic sense and they do not fit in with Government guidelines on keeping the NHS local, which are well worth referring to.

The only other thing that I shall say in the brief time available to me is how pleased I was to hear that the hon. Members representing the acute hospitals in Shrewsbury and Telford did not try to paint a picture suggesting that we should protect acute services at the cost of closing community hospitals—something that was tried in Worcestershire.

I should also like to tell the hon. Members for Telford (David Wright) and for Shrewsbury and Atcham (Daniel Kawczynski) about an article by Andy Black, the well-known hospital management consultant, which appeared in the British Medical Journal in January 2004. In it, he said:

"If the price of moving the complex emergency to an appropriate centre of expertise is that this patient is accompanied by another nine or 10 patients who are not complex acute cases then another set of problems is launched."

Wyre Forest has seen those problems, which have been very difficult. There has been loss of access and loss of quality.

Finally, I commend the independent reconfiguration panel, which can be brought in to advise on such matters, and which will act as an independent impartial adjudicator.

3.31 pm

Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire) (LD): I, too, congratulate the hon. Member for Ludlow (Mr. Dunne) on securing this debate. I express my solidarity with those who have raised concerns on a cross-party basis, or on a non-party basis in the case of the hon. Member for Wyre Forest (Dr. Taylor), who is, indeed, a champion of the people. Those concerns are shared in Shropshire and across the border in mid-Wales.

On 13 April 1998, the Royal Shrewsbury hospital saved my life. I had a very serious paragliding accident, in which I fell about 30 m, broke my back in 12 places and smashed my ribs, sternum and jaw. It was a 64-mile journey to the Royal Shrewsbury, partly by car, but primarily by ambulance, and there is no doubt that the hospital's quick, expedient and highly professional service prevented me from dying that day. As a result, I am forever in its debt. It so happens that it was me who had that experience, but thousands of other individuals in Shropshire could have a similar one. I am sure that such people would testify to the benefits and importance of community hospitals. Indeed, it was Llanidloes hospital that initially stabilised my condition so that I could travel the remaining 48 miles in the ambulance to Shrewsbury.

Hon. Members are therefore completely right to talk about the essential nature of what could be described as a hub-and-spokes infrastructure. The district general hospitals provide certain facilities—they have been accurately described, so I do not need to repeat them—while the community hospitals play an essential supporting role. It is little wonder, then, that so many thousands of people marched—once again, on a cross-party basis—to defend the facilities in Shropshire, and I pay tribute to the hon. Member for Ludlow for working with Matthew Green and Labour representatives on those marches to show that this is not a party political issue, but a people political issue. In that sense, the Minister can be in no doubt that no one is trying to score points off the Government—[Interruption.] To be precise, I am not trying to score points off the Government. People are, however, working hard in the interests of those whom we all represent.

On the specifics, there is no question but that there was a cover-up. Members of Parliament and others were misled about the financial circumstances in the trust and in Shropshire, to such an extent that one would not need parliamentary privilege to say so. Indeed, it was a scandal, and the individuals concerned would not dare to sue anyone who condemned them unreservedly for playing roulette with the services in the area. As has been said, Tom Taylor has already secured the trust and recognition of hon. Members from all parties in a way that his predecessor did not. I have a slight difference of opinion about who is to blame for that, but the Minister will be delighted to know that I do not blame her. It would be difficult for her to keep such a detailed eye on various appointments throughout the country that she or, indeed, many of the rest of us, would spot a fake CV or someone who was utterly hell bent on getting a job through false means.

However, as the body politic, it is our responsibility to make sure that the citizens who evidently were not responsible for the debt problems do not end up being the victims of those debts. Others have already described the consequences of the debts and I hope that the Minister will take seriously our worries that, in Tom Taylor's efforts to resolve the enormous eight-figure debt, he is not forced to compromise the services that have so eloquently been described by others today.

Will the Minister respond to the suggestions either to write off the debt or to renegotiate the repayment period for the reasons that have been given? Secondly, will she comment on the hub-and-spokes arrangement that is so important in rural areas and which has done so much good for individuals? I wish to highlight the importance of recognising that it is cheaper to put people into a community hospital bed to recuperate than it is to force them to go to a district general hospital because of the lack of community hospital spaces. Moreover, maternity units themselves are highly treasured by the communities and, once again, ease a further burden on the district general hospitals.

In non-technical language, community hospitals do lots of bits that do not have to go to the big hospitals. That is one reason why they are cheaper, why they are loved by local people and why I believe that they aid convalescence, especially for the elderly. They find it easier and less stressful to be in the more homely environment of a community hospital where their relatives and friends can visit them more easily than being transported many tens of miles on occasion to a hospital that, by its nature, will tend to be a less personal and slightly more sterile environment in which to recover.

My third and final point concerns the various alternatives to save money, one of which is productivity savings. The hon. Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson) estimates that £10 million could be saved. I consider that perhaps £7.5 million could be saved, but let us recognise that we are to some extent splitting hairs on the detail because, if the Minister cannot provide us with an assurance that the Government will be amenable to helping us resolve such a crushing debt problem in other ways, services will necessarily need to be cut. It is not Tom Taylor's fault. His only crime is to be honest with the public and the politicians. It is not the public's fault. Their only crime is to live in an area that has had its health services mishandled to some extent and, by virtue of rurality, they pay more for health services because there is no other way in rural areas.

As we hear the Minister's response, we will be listening to see if she is willing to debate the facilities with us. There is no downside for the hon. Lady in working with us on a cross-party basis. There is an enormous downside for the local population if she does not. I think that she can show that the Government are serious about the promises that they have made repeatedly on the Floor of the House to work in the interests of the public and to ensure that the significant investments that they have made in the health service are actually used to enhance it, a situation that is the antithesis of what faces Shropshire at the moment.

In thanking the Minister in advance for acceding to every request that we make today, I also invite her to visit the facilities that we are discussing. She would perhaps be whinged at a little bit, but she would also be praised a lot for being willing to go and see what we are discussing. She could be a heroine and if she takes that route, we will be the first to sing her praises.

3.40 pm

Mr. Stephen O'Brien (Eddisbury) (Con): First, let me add my congratulations to my hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow (Mr. Dunne), who secured this important debate. All four of my Shropshire hon. Friends, as well as the hon. Member for Telford (David Wright)—together they represent all the constituencies in Shropshire—have championed and campaigned for their constituents and local health services without fear or favour. I should declare that I am a patron of CHANT, which was referred to earlier.

As we heard in the outstandingly powerful speech made by my hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow, there are four trusts responsible for health care in Shropshire, under the umbrella of the Shropshire and Staffordshire strategic health authority: the Shrewsbury and Telford Hospital NHS Trust, covering the two hospitals; Shropshire County primary care trust; Telford and Wrekin PCT; and the Robert Jones and Agnes Hunt Orthopaedic and District Hospital NHS Trust, Oswestry's world-famous orthopaedic hospital.

Shropshire's financial problems, which arose across those four trusts, consist of a £36 million accumulated debt, which, by Government edict, must be paid off over the next three years. That will necessitate instalments of £12 million per annum, and a current annual running loss of £25 million. That will be £18 million from the Shrewsbury and Telford Hospital NHS Trust—today announced as being one of the 18 that needs urgent intervention, alongside my local PCT in west Cheshire—and £7 million from the Shropshire County PCT, which the Government requires to be in balance by April 2007. On those figures, the trust needs to find £37 million a year after current spending.

Finnamore Management Consultants, already rightly doubted in an interesting contribution by the hon. Member for Wyre Forest (Dr. Taylor), has put together a report on how to achieve those savings from a current total budget of £400 million. Its findings would amount to a cut in Shropshire's health funding of an eye-watering 10 per cent. in each of the next three years. Whatever the Minister says, not one Member of this House—let alone one citizen of Shropshire, south Cheshire in my constituency or mid-Wales—will believe that a cut of that size will not lead directly to deep, harsh cuts in patient services.

So why is it the Government's fault and liability that the beleaguered patients of Shropshire have to suffer that bill and lost patient and health services? As we heard, the chief executive of the Shrewsbury and Telford Hospital NHS Trust was sacked for incompetence, and was subsequently found to be a fraud. The financial director has gone, too, as he was complicit, and the Labour crony chairman has also chosen to resign. That, to start with, is pretty damning evidence when looking for where liability lies. That is all the more important as it is in that trust that the vast bulk of the deficits were allowed to balloon.

The two PCTs are running at a deficit of £2 million, the Robert Jones and Agnes Hunt Orthopaedic and District Hospital NHS Trust is running at a deficit of £5 million, but the Shrewsbury and Telford Hospital NHS Trust is running at a deficit of £29 million. The largest debt in Shropshire comes from the trust that was administered by a fraud. In substance, the position is not changed by the Government's new payment-by-results regime, which shifts £15 million per annum of the acute trust's annual running costs to the PCTs.

Who, it is fair to ask, designed the structure? Who set up the processes and the standards for the appointment of the key people at the top of the very organisation that incurred the debt, people who have now all gone? Who set the targets by which those people were judged and had to manage? The answer to all those questions is clear: we need look no further than the Department of Health, the Minister and her predecessors under this Government. In addition, in the light of the confused expectations that the historical debt would be assumed by central Government, why should the people of Shropshire and the dedicated front-line staff—doctors, nurses and many others, including some of the managers—have to pick up the tab of Government and Whitehall failings?

The Government must own up to their serious failings in respect of the people of Shropshire, and they must recognise that the contingency fund is there as a Government self-insurance policy—albeit that it uses taxpayers' money, centrally—to fund its contingent liabilities. This is a contingency, as it would be in any walk of life. There has been a manifest failure of Government policy, and of the processes ensuring the provision of adequately managed patient services for the people of Shropshire, my constituents in south-west Cheshire, and people across the border in Wales, notwithstanding the incredible confusion that devolution throws up.

There is a clear line of responsibility, but this Government seek instead to duck their liability, and to pressure the local trusts and force them to look in on themselves. Thus to save £37 million per annum, Finnamore has suggested various cuts. One is to close or to threaten the community hospitals at Bishop's Castle, Ludlow, Bridgnorth and Whitchurch. Whitchurch serves hundreds if not thousands of my constituents in Marbury, Malpas, Tushingham, Cholmondeley and the whole southern district of Eddisbury.

Will the Minister say whether she is aware of the enormous public outcry and the outrage at the idea of closing those hospitals? Using the very apt analogy of the hub and spoke that the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik) just used, has the Minister noticed that the whole wheel comes off if one takes away the spokes?

Given the petitions of more than 10,000 names being presented to the Secretary of State, crowded public meetings and huge marches—I pay tribute to my colleagues and others for their campaigning—this simply does not make political sense. Nor does it make financial sense. It saves only a notional and, as we have heard, largely illusory £2.4 million a year of the total amount required, despite an estimated net figure, but excluding the intended consequences, let alone the unintended ones that we can all predict and which were very ably outlined earlier in this important debate. That will put even more pressure on the already hard-pressed acute trust.

The proposal certainly does not make medical sense. The long-term rehabilitation and mental health units lost will exacerbate, not reduce, the problem. As we know, because of the misdirection and the mismanagement engendered by this Government, their agencies, their quangos and other creatures, 80 of the 322 community hospitals in this country are under threat of closure so that trusts throughout England can meet their financial deficits. That is a direct hit on patient services, and is laid firmly at the Government's door.

So far as Shropshire is concerned, if the Minister feels that she cannot, without the Chancellor's sanction, access the contingent fund to meet the Government's own liabilities—I have outlined the chain of causation—at the very least will she now stand up and undertake to extend the payback period to 10 years? In the best-case scenario, £25 million of annual savings can be attained without closing these valuable community hospitals.

Increasing efficiency to improve performance to the upper quartile level in the Robert Jones and Agnes Hunt trust and in the acute trust will yield savings of about £5 million in the former and up to £7.5 million in the latter. An additional £2.5 million could be saved by improving efficiency in the operating theatres of the acute trust. Further, a reduction in over-prescribing, in the light of a survey of GPs in Shropshire who recognise the extent of this inefficiency, would lead to a saving of approximately £10 million a year. I am very grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow for conducting that survey.

There is the £25 million. The Government could then write off the £12 million in historic debt for which they are responsible, and the job would be done. Patient services and community hospitals would be saved, thanks to the support of all the Shropshire MPs of all parties. There just may be a chance of making good the ills of the Government's own making without inflicting real cuts on the front-line patient services for the people of Shropshire, all of whom have been so ably represented in the Chamber today in this crucial and urgent debate. We just have to hope that the Minister has both listened and learned.

3.48 pm

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Ms Rosie Winterton): I, too, congratulate the hon. Member for Ludlow (Mr. Dunne) on securing the debate. All contributions from hon. Members on both sides of the House have illustrated how important health is to our constituents and how important it is to have a good national health service. That, frankly, is why the Government make the national health service such a high priority.

My hon. Friend the Member for Telford (David Wright) paid tribute to the hard work and dedication of NHS staff in the local area. I certainly add my thanks to those staff for their hard work. I totally reject the allegation made by the hon. Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham (Daniel Kawczynski) that we would go around attacking people if they complained about conditions. Indeed, the introduction of the whistleblowers charter has indicated our view that that attitude is not the right one at all. The hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik) brought his own experiences to the debate to illustrate the importance of our health services.

I certainly recognise that the health community in Shropshire faces a challenging financial situation; there is no doubt about that. I am not going to reel off figures on doctors and nurses as the hon. Member for Ludlow said I might, but I point out that the increases in funding in recent years have meant that the two PCTs—Shropshire County and Telford and Wrekin—are receiving record levels of resources.

This year, Shropshire County primary care trust has been allocated £276 million, a cash increase of £23 million on the previous year. That kind of increase has been made available locally and will continue, to reach something like 19 per cent. over the two years within the local area. I think that Telford and Wrekin's percentage increase was the eleventh largest in the country.

That is some of the background to the new investment. I hope hon. Members accept that; the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire was kind enough to acknowledge it. However, there is still a grave difficulty with the financial challenges faced locally. One of the major factors in the financial position is the Shrewsbury and Telford Hospital NHS Trust, whose end-of-financial-year deficit could be something like £29 million.

As the hon. Member for Eddisbury (Mr. O'Brien) said, there has been poor financial governance at that trust. That view was backed up by the external auditors' investigation and the strategic health authority's own independent report, published on 27 October last year, that made 35 recommendations, all of which were accepted by the SHA and the trust. I am glad to see that the trust has put together an action plan to meet the recommendations. As many hon. Members said, a new management team is in place. It was heartening to hear hon. Members praise the new chief executive, who has taken over in what are obviously difficult circumstances.

Beyond that financial report, as hon. Members have said, a current review is taking place that has been commissioned jointly by Shrewsbury and Telford Hospital NHS Trust, the Robert Jones and Agnes Hunt Orthopaedic and District Hospital NHS Trust, Shropshire County PCT and Telford and Wrekin PCT. Hon. Members have talked about local interest in the services, and that indicates the importance of the decisions being taken at local level.

It is important that people should be consulted about the options available and able to make their views known without some idea that, as some hon. Members have in a sense suggested, we from Whitehall and Westminster then overrule them. The whole principle is to make sure that transparent decisions are made at local level and that the priorities reflect the needs of the local community. In its initial work, to which many hon. Members have referred, Finnamore advanced a series of options for the future of health services in the county. The purpose of the report was to look at the baseline provision of services in the area, consider the options for long-term provision of quality services and financial balance, and look at the implications for each organisation and consider acute service provision, as well as community services. The work is being developed further. Some of the options may not be practical, but they have been included in the report for pre-consultation, to which hon. Members are responding. However, beyond that, the options can then be further developed with key stakeholders.

Any proposals for change will be subject to a 12-week formal public consultation; then, if there are significant changes, there is a statutory duty for organisations to consult the local overview and scrutiny committee. The hon. Member for Wyre Forest (Dr. Taylor) referred to the fact that the matter can still go to an independent reconfiguration review panel. There is a system in place for looking at the options.

Dr. Taylor: Will the Minister give way?

Ms Rosie Winterton: I really want to finish, if the hon. Gentleman does not mind.

Because these things may come before the Secretary of State, it is difficult for me to respond to all the comments about hospitals, but I can refer to a couple of matters. For example, my hon. Friend the Member for Telford and the hon. Member for The Wrekin (Mark Pritchard) said that the chief executive of the PCT has, as I understand it, said publicly that he would like the accident and emergency departments at both hospitals to be retained. If that suggestion went forward, it would go through the public consultation process. My hon. Friend has had a long-standing dialogue with the chief executive on that matter.

The hon. Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson) mentioned community hospitals being handed over, perhaps, to local authority control. Under "Commissioning a Patient-Led NHS", we will make it possible for local authorities, acute trusts or the voluntary sector to manage community hospitals. However, I have to emphasise again that that would be a local decision. I understand, from the strategic health authority, that the current review is considering that as a possible option.

I should like briefly to move on to the historic deficit and the idea that the Government should meet it. I hope that hon. Members will understand that there has been massive, increased investment in the NHS, but we need local NHS bodies to ensure that they are dealing with some of the financial problems that they are facing. Simply to hand money over means that somewhere else in the NHS has to find it; there is no other place that it can come from. It is important to be honest when we are discussing that matter. That money would have to come from other areas.

Hon. Members talked about the period of paying back. The SHA has to consider the local health economy and look at ways to meet the financial balances. In some instances they can be extended, but that would be an SHA decision.

Finally, the turnaround teams that hon. Members have mentioned will be important in helping local trusts to manage some of the problems. I have visited places where teams have been working with staff and managers and I should like to reassure hon. Members that that should not be seen as a threat; that arrangement is to give assistance to sort out some of the problems about which hon. Members have talked.

Mr. Roger Gale (in the Chair): Order. This is not an easy room in which to work. Will hon. Members who are leaving please do so quietly?

Traffic Congestion (Manchester, Withington)

4 pm

Mr. John Leech (Manchester, Withington) (LD): I thank Mr. Speaker for giving me the opportunity to raise the important issue of traffic congestion in my constituency. I also thank the Minister's office for contacting my office before the debate, so that the Minister could get a feel of what I wanted to say and respond to the issues that I shall raise. I accept that some of my points will be outside her area of responsibility, but I ask her to pass on my comments on issues beyond the subject of traffic.

For the benefit of the Minister, it is worth my explaining briefly the geography of Manchester, Withington—I could not tell the Minister the geography of her constituency, and I doubt whether she could tell me the geography of mine. The River Mersey forms a boundary to the south of Withington. That means that commuter traffic coming through my constituency towards central Manchester is channelled along a number of heavily congested roads throughout the constituency. One of those is Princess road, some stretches of which are also known as Princess parkway. It runs from the M56 all the way into the city centre. I have never seen this proved, but I am told that it is the busiest road outside the M25.

All the main routes through my constituency to Manchester are heavily congested with cars, which has resulted in significant displacement of traffic from those major routes on to the more minor roads, such as Parrs Wood road in Didsbury. That has had a major effect on the safety of those roads, including for pedestrians and schoolchildren, because the roads simply were not designed to take the level of traffic that they now do.

The problem is not confined to north to south routes, from the constituency to the city centre; there is also a major problem with traffic flow across the constituency. Many people not only live in south Manchester but work there, and they travel from east to west, to places such as Salford Quays, Stockport or Cheadle. That has resulted in a major strain on traffic flow, especially from Didsbury to Chorlton along Wilmslow road and Barlow Moor road. That has created gridlock through the district centre of Chorlton.

The congestion has had a knock-on effect on the reliability of bus services, as they struggle to stick to timetables. That has dented public confidence in bus services in the constituency, so people have stopped using buses. It has also had a worrying effect on Chorlton district centre. Shop owners complain about losing business as shoppers actively avoid going through the district centre because of the congestion. That has quickened the decline of local shops, which are being replaced by evening trade businesses, such as bars, restaurants and takeaways, because traffic congestion does not have the same impact at night, and they can make money.

It would be easy for me to argue that poor public transport and lack of investment is responsible for too many cars being on our roads, and all the congestion. The situation is not as straightforward as that, however. Deregulation of buses has certainly had a negative effect by creating more congestion, as gaps in the bus network have to be filled by people using cars, but it is also true that deregulation has increased bus services in parts of the constituency—for instance, the Wilmslow road corridor, where people can get a bus every 10 seconds. That is an example of deregulation working. Unfortunately, the bus companies are not prepared to run decent bus services across the constituency, because it is far more cost-effective just to pile all their buses on to the routes that make them money. They expect to receive significant subsidies from the Greater Manchester passenger transport authority before running services east to west, and the PTA just does not have the funds available.

I shall give a couple of examples of deregulation clearly not working. The No. 46/47 circular service that runs through my constituency and into the city centre was profitable during the day, but in the end the bus company decided to cut the evening part of the service because it was not making any money. Of course, the knock-on effect of that is that people using the bus service in the morning to get across the constituency cannot get the bus back, so they have to make alternative arrangements for both journeys, which makes the bus less profitable in the morning as well. That has had an impact on passenger numbers, and the knock-on effect is that more people use cars.

The other example is the No. 86 bus service, which ran from one of the most deprived estates in the whole of my constituency, through Chorlton and into the city centre. The section of the service from the estate to the centre of Chorlton was not profitable, because congestion meant that it was not running to time, so fewer people used it. That meant that over time the bus company just decided to reduce the level of service and run the vast majority of the services from the bus station, which meant that the few people who still wanted to use the bus from Arrowfield road—from the estate—lost confidence in the bus service. Rather than arriving every five or six minutes, the buses were supposed to arrive every 20 minutes; in fact, it was every half an hour, if people were lucky.

Moving on from buses, I do not think that I could discuss congestion in my constituency without briefly mentioning the delays to phase 3 of Metrolink. In the past few years, lots of people have moved to Manchester, Withington because they genuinely believe that they are moving to an area where they will be close to a Metrolink station in the near future. Indeed, developers have been actively promoting property for sale on that basis. However, due to the recent uncertainty about funding and how long it is likely to be before we see Metrolink running through the constituency, one particular developer, as an alternative to promoting Metrolink as a reason to buy a property, is now offering a free car as part of the package when someone buys a flat in that development. Clearly, that will increase congestion.

My final point on the causes of congestion is about overdevelopment in south Manchester. I accept that that is not within the Minister's area of responsibility, but my constituency has become a victim of its own success. People quite rightly want to live in south Manchester, because it is a great place to live and work. As the Member of Parliament for the area, I do not think that you would expect me to say anything else, Mr. Gale, but it really is a great place to live.

[Mr. John Leech]

Unfortunately, because it has become so popular, every developer wants to build a block of flats on a postage stamp of land.

Both the Government and the local council must bear some of the responsibility. For example, the council, in its wisdom, decided to sell a piece of land on Beech road, a heavily congested local road with serious parking problems. The council decided to sell off a car park and allow an additional block of flats to be built on a road that was already suffering from congestion and traffic problems. Similarly, the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister recently approved the council's decision to redevelop an old school playing field and build yet more houses and flats.

The problem is not just about the council selling off land, and the situation is not just the council's fault. It is also about developers taking advantage of weak planning laws that do not really protect local communities. In the Parrs Wood area of my constituency, a new entertainment complex was built a few years ago. That new development was undertaken in an already congested area, without first devising any sort of plan to deal with the traffic implications. When the council finally brought forward a scheme, we were told by the traffic officers that they could not come up with a scheme that solved the problem, but that the one that they had come up with was about as near as they could get. So it was a half-baked measure that annoyed all the local residents and did not deal with the traffic problem. More recently, just across the road from that same development, two further blocks of flats have been approved. The council's traffic office has already said that it cannot deal with the congestion problem in that area, yet two further blocks of flats and houses have been approved there, and they will cause extra traffic.

Those developments have been approved despite massive opposition locally. The planners argued that there was no justification for refusal, because the extra traffic would not significantly increase the amount of traffic already on the road. If traffic is at a standstill, however, any increase in traffic is unacceptable.

Mark Hunter (Cheadle) (LD): I thank my hon. Friend for giving way, and I apologise for not being in my place when he started his speech. Does he accept that the knock-on effect of traffic congestion in surrounding constituencies such as my own also has a negative impact on the traffic problems suffered by constituents in his constituency of Manchester, Withington? Does he further accept that the completion of the A555 relief road, which heavily impacts on the neighbouring Cheadle and Hazel Grove constituencies, would help residents not only in those areas but in his area?

Mr. Leech: I agree with my hon. Friend, and it would have been useful if that link road had been completed one or two months ago when I was spending time travelling to Cheadle during the recent by-election there. I am not sure whether my hon. Friend heard my remarks about a number of people who live in south Manchester and travel to Stockport and Cheadle and back again. The relief road would have a significant impact on the traffic that goes along the residential streets between Cheadle and Didsbury.

What is the solution? That is the million dollar question. The response to traffic congestion in my constituency has been the QBC—the quality bus corridor. In theory, it is a good idea: encouraging bus companies to improve services and local people to use them by improving bus reliability and prioritising buses along Wilmslow road and Barlow Moor road. Unfortunately, the QBC alterations have resulted in more congestion on minor roads, where cars have been forced on to alternative routes. At Chorlton Cross, for instance, cars have been banned from turning right on to Barlow Moor road from Wilbraham road, to make it easier for buses to turn right. That has resulted in additional traffic on High lane, as cars use it as the alternative route.

There has been no significant increase in bus services along the QBC route; in fact, later this week, the No. 46/47 Sunday service will be discontinued. The reality is that there is little incentive for bus companies to run services more frequently and to provide new routes, when those routes will never be as profitable as the north to south routes on the Wilmslow road corridor.

People and passenger transport authorities throughout the country require and support a level of regulatory control, so that transport authorities can decide what bus services will be provided. The current system of subsidised services is inadequate for the provision of a comprehensive bus network. In order to get more people on to buses, we must consider how to make bus travel more attractive.

I do not always agree with Brian Souter, the head of Stagecoach, but he rightly points out that we should consider bus park-and-ride schemes, which were very successful in my constituency during the Christmas period. However, outside that period there is not one single scheme. We must consider permanent park-and-ride schemes, so that people park outside Manchester and take the bus into the centre.

The Government must also acknowledge that the best solution for south Manchester is Metrolink. Although the start-up costs can be high, time and again such a scheme has proved to be the most successful way of bringing about a significant modal shift away from the car. The fact that people move to be near to the Metrolink is testament to that, and the success of the Altrincham to Bury line proves it.

Unfortunately, I have serious reservations about current Government policy, in that it will not deliver Metrolink through to Chorlton and out to Didsbury without a commitment to road-user pricing. I seek further assurance from the Minister that additional Government money would not be dependent on road-user pricing. Manchester cannot go down that route until a decent network is in place to begin with.

Finally, tighter regulation of buses and the investment of more money in Metrolink would help the situation but not completely solve the problem. The Government must accept that unless steps are taken to deal with the problem of overdevelopment and its effect on congestion, the problem will remain. Councils need to be given more powers to tackle areas of congestion, and I propose that local authorities should be given the option to introduce congestion zones in their development plans. Where congestion zones are set up, a developer would have to demonstrate that a proposed development would not significantly increase traffic congestion, either through increased volume of traffic or as a result of additional traffic measures required to facilitate the development.

I trust that the Minister will pass on my comments to the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister on that point, and I look forward to her response.

4.16 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Ms Karen Buck): I congratulate the hon. Member for Manchester, Withington (Mr. Leech) on securing the debate and on making some important points, a number of which I agree with, as I hope I shall make clear in my contribution. I shall raise with the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister any issues that he has flagged up today that do not fall within the remit of the Department for Transport.

My Department worked closely with Greater Manchester in the development of the Greater Manchester integrated transport strategy. The hon. Gentleman may be aware that his constituency is in one of four priority corridor partnerships, which are being developed through work on the strategy with the transport innovation fund and through the local transport plan process.

Since 1997, we have more than doubled spending on transport infrastructure and invested substantially in public transport to provide greater choice. Greater Manchester has received a total transport allocation of £823 million during this period and we need to ensure that this substantial investment is converted into real improvements that deliver real value for money. For 2006–07, Greater Manchester received total block funding of £68.62 million in the local transport capital settlement, with an additional £7.358 million for major schemes and £3.5 million through the transport infrastructure fund. That included £6.744 million for the south-east Manchester multi-modal study. That investment reflects our recognition of the important role played by the Greater Manchester authorities. We will work closely with them in supporting improvements in services for all those who live and work in Greater Manchester.

As the hon. Gentleman has said, in Manchester and in many towns and cities throughout the country, congestion is a growing problem. It is important that in developing strategies, whether they relate to public transport or the management of roads, we must consider not just the situation in 2006, but that of 10, 15 or 20 years in the future. The reliability of journeys in the context of increasingly congested roads is a growing problem. Manchester city suffers the second highest average delay time for drivers in the whole of the UK—second only to London.

It is a complex problem, varying from place to place, and with time of day. Although it is important that we increase capacity on some roads, we cannot solve the problem of congestion by simply building more and more roads. There is not the space to do it, especially in urban areas such as Manchester.

Mr. Leech: The Minister makes a valid point; in certain areas it is impossible to build extra roads, and I would not advocate the building of extra roads through my constituency. The difficulty with the current infrastructure is that money may be spent on the quality bus corridor, but it is physically impossible to implement a scheme and create a lane in which buses can travel at reasonable speed without bringing everything else to a standstill. Houses would have to be knocked down to put in extra lanes so that buses could run freely. Money has been spent on the quality bus corridor but it has been pretty ineffective because there is not the space to provide the sort of scheme that is necessary.

Ms Buck: Without wishing to comment on the specific problem in that area, I accept that that can be the case. We are working in a very constrained space in Manchester as in other urban environments. That is why we need to look at these policies in the round.

We are looking at a range of measures to tackle the problem, including the introduction of new congestion targets for urban areas, including Manchester, and for strategic roads. The targets are about improving journey time reliability and managing the impact of growing demand. There are a number of different approaches. One is the investment in technology to improve road management, particularly on the strategic roads where we are investing £2 billion over the next three years. Technology can help to tackle congestion by increasing capacity during the times of day that it is most needed.

The Traffic Management Act 2004 has given local authorities powers to keep traffic flowing and to co-ordinate roadworks to minimise disruption on local roads. Since November, local authorities who have decriminalised parking powers, such as Manchester city council, have also been given powers to enforce bus lanes. That should give them a further incentive to provide bus priorities and ensure that they are working effectively.

As a medium to longer-term solution, we have started a debate on road pricing. We have established the transport innovation fund to develop and pioneer smarter, innovative, transport strategies. In order to support work on scheme development by local transport authorities, we have earmarked £18 million during the period 2005–06 to 2007–08. That is £3 million in the current year, £5 million next year and £10 million in the third.

We very much welcome the recent bid for TIF development funding from the Greater Manchester authorities and the recognition in Greater Manchester that bold approaches will be needed to tackle the future impacts of traffic congestion on the well-being of the city. They have been awarded £1.25 million funding over three years to support the development of an innovative package to tackle congestion in the conurbation through a combination of hard-edged demand management and investment in public transport.

In any package of measures to tackle congestion, improved public transport is absolutely essential. As the hon. Member for Manchester, Withington emphasised, buses are the most used public transport option. They make up nearly two thirds of all public transport journeys in England.

Mark Hunter: I am sure that the Minister recognises that although the continued investment in bus services, and quality bus corridors in particular, is more than useful, the magnitude of the problem in Manchester requires seismic change if we are to get people out of their cars and on to public transport. To many of us coming from and representing constituencies in that area, that means investment in the Metrolink expansion. I wondered whether the Minister, in her response to my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Withington (Mr. Leech), was going to say something more about the funding for Metrolink, on which so many of these solutions depend.

Ms Buck: I will comment briefly on Metrolink, but let me concentrate for a moment on buses. Compared with rail and light rail, buses are a flexible, low-cost option. They can contribute to tackling congestion, especially in conjunction with policies to restrain car use. We recognise that some conurbations such as Greater Manchester and others are experiencing difficulties with bus services. There are issues of bus quality; standards of reliability, frequency and cleanliness are not always met by some providers. I accept completely that we need to get that right.

We have no plans to return to the regulatory regime of the 1980s. Current options available to local authorities include voluntary and statutory partnerships, and there are a number of examples of good partnership working across the country. However, if local authorities are prepared to propose a comprehensive system for managing traffic demand, such as road pricing, we are prepared to consider introducing further measures to control bus services.

The current statutory framework for bus services gives local authorities a number of options to suit their local circumstances. One option is quality partnerships. Those cover both the provision of facilities by the local authority, such as bus priority measures, and improved standards of service by the bus operators. In a PTE area such as Manchester, the involvement of the city or borough authorities that manage the highways is crucial to the success of a quality partnership. Their participation is essential if traffic regulation orders are needed.

The quality bus corridor, which both hon. Gentlemen mentioned, is the main thrust behind the Greater Manchester bus strategy, as improvements in bus journey times have been recognised. I understand that there is a commitment to address quality bus corridor enforcement in 2006. On the Chorlton and Didsbury bus corridor, there has been some local opposition to the scheme, which is part of the south Manchester scheme being rolled out across that part of the conurbation.

In recognition of recent newspaper coverage and some of the residential concerns that were raised with local councillors, Manchester city council has undertaken a full review of the scheme by a team independent of those involved in the design. The report of that study has been presented to Councillor Neil Swannick, who is the executive member for highways and transportation. The scheme has addressed a wide range of transport issues including improving pedestrian facilities, defining parking and loading bays, reducing the impact of congestion and introducing the bus lane. Those using sustainable modes of transport will be better served as a result.

Generally, non-statutory partnership agreements between operators and local authorities have proved successful in many areas, but there is room for improvement in bus services in other places. We are therefore discussing with bus operators and local authority representatives a range of options to make bus services more effective within the partnership framework.

A more radical option is the quality contracts scheme, which can be approved only if it is the only practicable way of implementing bus strategy policies and is economic, efficient, effective and in the public interest. We recognise that those are exacting tests, but they are not impossible to meet. A guidance document was published in February last year for English local authorities. The range of measures, including legislation and other options being considered as part of a broader package of demand-met management measures, will give PTEs such as Greater Manchester a range of tools with which to ensure that their bus services in particular, as one strand of the public transport model, are developed effectively and complement other measures that may be necessary to deal with demand management.

The Department and I recognise that buses are not the sole means of public transport to be promoted, and I echo the commitment of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to work with the Greater Manchester authority to ensure that light rail will continue to be a major part of the solution for Manchester, particularly for congestion. We recognise the achievements of Metrolink—which has played an important role in supporting Manchester's economic success, carrying more than 19 million passengers a year—and that it suffers from overcrowding. We have recently approved a scheme to renew and enhance the capacity of existing tram lines, and have committed £520 million of public sector funds to Greater Manchester, subject to the development of a satisfactory plan for the areas covered by Metrolink phase 3. We will continue to work with Manchester on the proposals for tram extensions, which could be a major part of the solution for Manchester as part of the overall package of transport improvements, which includes other measures recognised by the Greater Manchester transport authorities, such as better buses and trains and better management of traffic levels.

I hope that I have gone some way toward reassuring the hon. Member for Manchester, Withington that we recognise the seriousness of the issues that he has raised today, and that past, present and future investment, together with the innovative thinking that is going on at a national level, which we are encouraging local and passenger transport authorities to develop with the support of the innovation fund, give us a real opportunity to make what the hon. Member for Cheadle (Mark Hunter) rightly described as a seismic change.

We need a change in thinking and investment. We need investment to be supported by choices that are sometimes difficult and involve brave political leadership to ensure that demand management plays its part alongside investment in additional public transport. We are working closely with a range of stakeholders nationally and regionally to address the problems that the hon. Member for Manchester, Withington outlined and will continue to do so.

Process Industries (Tees Valley)

4.30 pm

Mr. Iain Wright (Hartlepool) (Lab): It is a real honour to secure an Adjournment debate on what I believe is a quality industry and one that is becoming increasingly so, especially in the area in which my constituency is located. I am also extremely pleased that my hon. Friend the Member for Stockton, South (Ms Taylor) and my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Redcar (Vera Baird) have joined me to discuss the important process industries on Teesside. I intend to cut short my speech to allow them to make contributions if they so wish.

I want to do two things today. First, I wish to showcase the growing significance of the process industries to the regeneration of the Tees valley and the wider north-east and United Kingdom economy. Secondly, I wish to raise with my right hon. Friend the Minister several matters that the process industries on Teesside fear may hinder their ability to succeed and grow, and provide further prosperity in my constituency and elsewhere.

I outlined in a previous Adjournment debate how the north-east economy is still in the process of recovering from the seismic shocks of the decline of its heavy manufacturing base. A failure to innovate and an abandonment of the region and of manufacturing industry by central Government in the 1980s led to the rapid decline of much of what had made Teesside and the north-east prosperous since the Victorian era. It led to mass structural unemployment in the region. Between 1981 and 1997, some 110,000 jobs were lost in manufacturing—90,000 of them in the Tees valley. That has contributed to the fact that the Tees valley economy now lags significantly behind the UK economy. As a sub-region, we have to grow much faster to catch up with the rest of the country.

Yet, amid such a depressing tale, there is much to be positive about. Despite the massive knocks that the area received in the 1980s and 1990s, we still have a resilient manufacturing industry, of which firms such as Corus are a leading part. What has struck me recently is how, in a quiet way, a modern manufacturing sector has emerged from the Tees valley that is leading the world. The process industries are by far the single biggest wealth-generating industrial sector in the north-east, and certainly in the Tees valley. The sector employs directly about 14,000 people in the Tees valley, with an estimated 140,000 indirect jobs in the sub-region that are reliant on the process industries. Some 60 per cent. of the contribution to the regional economy made by the north-east process industries comes from the Tees valley and, bearing in mind the importance of the sector to the regional economy, some 15 per cent. of the entire north-east gross domestic product is derived from process industries in the Tees valley.

The area has a range of firms that specialise in chemicals, pharmaceuticals, biotechnology and renewable energy. Firms such as Huntsman Petrochemicals provide high-quality chemicals and polyurethanes. Hart Biologicals in my constituency, led by Alby Pattison, is at the cutting edge of clinical diagnostic tools for hospital pathology laboratories. Firms such as Petroplus manufacture petrochemicals and push the boundaries of the future application of biodiesel. Those firms are providing high-quality, well-paid jobs to the people of the Tees valley. In the process, they are producing high value-added goods that improve our quality of life and help to redress the environmental damage that has occurred over the past century, and which can be exported throughout the world, improving the wealth of this country.

The nature of the industry means that innovation has to be a constant part of life. Research and development is a major part of process industries and I hope that the Government continue to ensure that an appropriate environment is provided for in that sector. Thankfully, I think that that is happening. The Centre for Process Innovation has been established in the Tees valley, with the support of the regional development agency, One NorthEast, as a major UK national resource that is designed to stimulate innovation within the chemistry process sector. The CPI employs 50 researchers and has close links with universities and businesses to ensure that the process industry has the best chance of succeeding. After only 18 months in operation, it has developed innovation projects that are worth £36 million for the Tees valley.

New processes that are being developed include the continuous oscillatory baffle reactor. I am sure that that is the first time that that phrase has been used in Parliament, so I am proud of having said it. I have no idea what it does, so "baffle" is an appropriate word, but I know that the process quickens chemical reactions and makes industries on Teesside more efficient, and therefore more able to retain our competitive advantage over the rest of the world.

The area of innovation about which I am the most excited is the development of renewable energy. Long-established skills in the region from the chemicals and oil industries make the Tees valley the best possible area to develop cutting-edge technology. Teesside is leading the way in the use of hydrogen to help to produce environmentally friendly energy, either through fuel cells producing lighting or as a substitute for petrol. Biomass technology is also being developed. SembCorp Utilities is building a £60 million power station on the River Tees, which will use surplus timber from forests and recycled wood to generate carbon-neutral electricity, and Biofuels Corporation, with One NorthEast funding, is building a new facility at Seal sands on the Tees estuary to produce alternative fuel from rape seed oil.

I have no doubt that with appropriate Government support the Tees valley will become in the next few years the most developed area for green energy not just in the UK, but in the world. I passionately hope that that status will produce well paid green jobs for the Tees valley, bringing the same prosperity to my area that Aberdeen saw from oil in the 1970s and 1980s, or that Teesside itself saw from heavy manufacturing in Victorian times.

Despite all that good news, the sector hid its light under a bushel somewhat until recently. There appeared to be reticence about promoting the good work being undertaken. Thank goodness that is no longer the case. About 200 companies in the sector in the Tees valley have come together to form the north-east process industries cluster—NEPIC. Under the chairmanship of Bob Coxon and with Dr. Stan Higgins as chief executive, that group is promoting the sector and pursuing initiatives such as raising investment in overseas trade, productivity improvement, raising skill levels and closing the GDP gap between the north-east and the rest of the UK. Those activities are designed to ensure the sector's continuing development and worldwide status.

I was lucky enough to attend the annual dinner of the north-east process industries cluster group last Friday in the constituency of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister. Some 420 people from the process industries attended the event. There was a positive buzz and a great deal of confidence about the future of the industry on Teesside, and a recognition that what is being done is world class and will make a growing contribution to the continuing economic renaissance of the Tees valley.

Despite that, there are concerns that may hinder the process industry's progress. In winding up, will my right hon. Friend the Minister respond to those concerns, to ensure that the sector has the maximum opportunity to grow? The key concern relates to energy pricing. To me, that seems ironic given that a key pillar of the future of the process industries is indigenous energy regeneration. Many companies have seen gas and electricity prices double in the past 12 months. I understand that one company in the process industry on Teesside has seen its energy costs increase by £12 million, putting part of its business operations into loss and thereby questioning its continuing viability. The firm has some 500 employees in Hartlepool and is a vital concern to me and to the economy of my constituency.

Energy costs have resulted in the closure of plants such as that owned by Terra Nitrogen in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Stockton, South, which is next door to mine. That plant employed a large number of people from Hartlepool, who have written to me to express their concern. I am worried about the domino effect of Terra's closure. The firm supplied basic raw materials to a large number of other companies in the Tees valley and elsewhere. Those companies now rely on foreign supplies and tell me that if we experience a bad spell of weather, meaning that North sea tankers are unable to supply, a number of Teesside plants will shut down and might not reopen. The situation is unsustainable and detrimental to the prospects of development for the process industries on Teesside. Firms on Teesside hope to see a concerted effort by the Government to achieve forward price stability and equitable energy pricing with competitors in Europe. I urge my right hon. Friend to do what he can to ensure that companies in Teesside are competing on a level playing field with overseas firms.

Another concern is skills. The demographic profile of the process industry is not encouraging. Although the legacy of the old ICI plants at Billingham and Wilton provides an unprecedented degree of experience, it means that the average age of scientists and engineers is over 50. The industry has been unable to underpin its recent growth with an appropriate number of trainees.

The news is not all bad. I recently had the pleasure of meeting Leanne Hart, a constituent of mine working for AMEC who is the chair of the north-east and Yorkshire young persons network. The aims of that network are to share good practice, promote skills in the industry and act as ambassadors for the sector. Despite her good work, and that of others, we still need to improve the attractiveness of modern apprenticeships. As a country, we also need to do more to help to steer young people contemplating university into science and engineering courses. Will my right hon. Friend respond to that point?

Most crucially, to address the gap, I urge the establishment of a process industries national skills academy. Given that the Tees valley is the premier area for process industries in the UK, I ask that such an academy be based in the north-east, and of course I add that Hartlepool has a wide and attractive range of business premises where it could be located.

My third and final point, which companies have raised with me, is the impact of European legislation, particularly the registration, evaluation and authorisation of chemicals, known as REACH. Firms are concerned that the cost of implementing REACH will far outweigh the benefits. It is having a particular impact on a leading company in my constituency, Oxford Chemicals, led by Dr. Richard Smith. I have been told that the UK authorities are particularly zealous in ensuring compliance with REACH, in contrast, perhaps, with some of our European neighbours. I should be grateful if the Minister explained how he and his Department are working with the European Union to ensure a level playing field for our companies.

The process industries in the Tees valley are examples of how the UK is leading the global economy. Such products will become increasingly important in modern life, and the fact that Teesside is leading the way should produce enormous and sorely needed benefits to prosperity for our region. To fly to its maximum height, however, the sector requires Government assistance and facilitation, and I hope that my right hon. Friend will set out in his reply how that assistance will be provided.

4.41 pm

Ms Dari Taylor (Stockton, South) (Lab): It is a great pleasure to follow my hon. Friend the Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Wright), and I congratulate him on securing the debate, which is both timely and valued.

I wish to talk for a few moments about the north-east process industries cluster, which is an important group for us in the north-east. It employs in excess of 300,000 people, and produces more than 25 per cent. of the region's gross domestic product, which in effect is more than £8 billion of the United Kingdom's GDP. Those figures show just how important that group of industries is. As my hon. Friend stated, it is a crucial part of the regeneration of the Tees valley, most significantly in my constituency. Like him, I should like to hear how the Minister proposes to support the continued development of the process industries cluster in the north-east.

Critically, the group not only employs well, but pays well. The Tees valley has the biggest petrochemical industry in the UK and the second biggest in Europe, and that is crucially valuable to us. Development and investment in that industry in the area demonstrate a growth in confidence, and the spiralling effect of that investment is seen across the whole of industry in the Tees valley.

Teesport is an incredibly valuable port—the second biggest in the UK. It is in the constituency of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Redcar (Vera Baird), although its headquarters is in Middlesbrough. It is another very valuable piece of the whole kit of developing and delivering a new industrial structure for the north-east. I would greatly appreciate it if my right hon. Friend the Minister acknowledged that leaving Teesport out of the development of a national port strategy is profoundly wrong and very damaging for the north-east.

In only three years, more than £1 billion has been invested in the process industries cluster, and we have seen what that investment has achieved: the creation of 1,600 jobs. This is powerful and it needs to be appreciated. We need to acknowledge the risks that are being taken by the industrialists who deliver such things.

I have so much more to say, but my hon. Friend the Member for Hartlepool has said it for us. There are concerns about energy and the age profile of our skilled engineers, which is over 50—I personally think that that is a golden age, but I understand that we must have a younger profile for industry development—and REACH is problematic, not because it is a regulatory document, but because in Britain we will put it together in terms of dots and commas and we are not confident that people in Europe will.

We have a growing, vibrant, new tomorrow for the 21st century. We want that to be supported. I hope that the Minister, who is hearing the plea from all of us, will accept our statements. With a little support, we will move into the 21st century as we ended the 19th, and as we went through much of the 20th century—with a vibrant region.

4.45 pm

Vera Baird (Redcar) (Lab): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Wright) for allowing me to express my support for the north-east process industry. I congratulate him on securing this debate and thank him for his generosity in being prepared to share it.

I attended the north-east process industries cluster—NEPIC—in London on 17 November, to which both my colleagues referred, which was launched by the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and the Secretary to the Treasury, my right hon. Friend the Government Chief Whip. That body is intended to support the whole process industry, a major base of which is the Teesside chemical industry, and a large part of which, although by no means all of it, is based at the Wilton International complex in Redcar. I was pleased when NEPIC decided that it was going to put its headquarters at Wilton International as well. I have to tell my hon. Friend the Member for Hartlepool that I am sure that we have one of those battle zones in Redcar, if he has one in Hartlepool, and I am sure that we are working it very hard.

Setting up NEPIC was an excellent move, because it merged the Teesside chemical initiative, which had been the Teesside chemical representative group, with the pharmaceutical groups and other related groups from further north in the county, around Tyneside and Northumberland, thereby potentially generating good links between industries that obviously have a commonality and providing them with an opportunity to help each other. I hope that that is a precursor of better links, generally, between Teesside and Tyneside, which have not always given each other the mutual support that they should.

I want to speak briefly about a key partner for NEPIC in its endeavour to bring us a golden future. A major instrument of its future success is Teesport, which was mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Stockton, South (Ms Taylor), and which has recently been taken over by a consortium of investors called Endeavour Ports. It is the second largest port by volume and is—it goes without saying—in Redcar, where all good things are. Its new owners will support and continue the effort that has been commenced to establish and develop a deep sea container terminal at Teesport.

NEPIC estimates that between £8 billion and £10 billion of investment should be pumped into the process industries in the north-east in the next 10 years. Teesport is crucial. It handles 65 per cent. of the chemical and pharmaceutical sectors' goods for export, which is more than £5 billion of the total investment, and NEPIC fears that it could be threatened if it does not develop as we hope it will.

One NorthEast and ourselves had campaigned for the Government to halt expansion at ports in the south—Felixstowe, Harwich and Shellhaven, on the Thames—and instead allow investment to flow into Teesside. The fear was that if Shellhaven, Felixstowe and Harwich all developed, or if most of them did, it would be difficult to persuade shipping lines to move to Teesport with their container cargo. Two of the three consents have now been granted; none the less Teesport, with its new ownership, has resolved to move as fast as it can to apply for a harbour revision order to develop the deep sea container port.

Teesport is renewed in its confidence, because it has recently obtained an Asda import centre, through which a large proportion—90 per cent., I think—of all Asda's clothing line will be imported into the UK through Teesport. That indicates that it is practical to make shipping lines reroute to Teesport, because of the calibre of its facilities, the labour available and so on. Presumably, those shipping lines already appreciate that the climate-friendly elements of a shorter distribution network to the north-east, north-west and Scotland also stand them in good stead.

The whole community backs the development of Teesport, and I understand that the conservation bodies are not likely to cause any difficulties. All the politicians back the development of Teesport, too.

The way in which the process industry does business these days is changing. The industries are more and more specialised, and goods are shipped out not by tanker but by container—a large percentage of them through Teesport, so it is crucial that it should develop.

The chief executive officer of north-east process industries cluster, Professor Higgins, has said:

> "Teesport, of any European port, is the best located for the expansion of Europe. If we are going to take goods to and from Poland, Lithuania, Russia, we would take it though the Baltic or take it across to Rotterdam and drive it across Europe. Which is the best located port for those areas? Teesport."

I hope that the Government appreciate the strategic advantage for the port and for the process industries. It is the view of One NorthEast that the successful development of Teesport as a deep sea container terminal is also of national significance.

[Vera Baird]

If it is feasible for him to do so, I should be pleased if my right hon. Friend would undertake to do his best to ensure that there are no obstacles in the way of the development so that our golden future in the Tees valley will not be held back.

4.50 pm

The Minister for Industry and the Regions (Alun Michael): I will answer as fully as I can within the limited time available. I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Wright) for inspiring the debate and being assiduous, as ever, in promoting the interests of his constituency. I am pleased that he endorsed the excellent work of the north-east process industries cluster, which I shall try to avoid referring to by its acronym. It is an unexpected pleasure to have the presence of the well-known parliamentary songbird my hon. Friend the Member for Stockton, South (Ms Taylor) and my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Redcar (Vera Baird). I shall try to cover briefly some of the most important points, but as many issues were mentioned I will also write to my hon. Friends and expand on some of those matters.

I wholeheartedly agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Hartlepool about the important role that the process industry in Tees valley plays in our wider economy now and will play in the future. My hon. Friend's remarks are a testament to the fact that it is not a sunset industry; the sector itself is grasping the opportunities of increasing skills, of taking its place in the knowledge-based economy and of making genuine strides in commercialising new technologies and ways of working.

My hon. Friend rightly said that the industry has responded to the need to operate in a cleaner environment and to avoid the damage that was done in the past. Times have changed; this country can be very proud indeed of our success in getting the REACH proposals agreed in December during the British presidency. The initiative started in the previous British presidency in the late 1990s and came to fulfilment during our latest presidency.

The reason why we should be so proud of REACH is that it was amended from a very bureaucratic set of proposals by the Commission as a result of the UK-Hungarian suggestion of a one substance, one registration proposal. Initially, it had no other supporters, and the new member state worked very closely with us.

I pay tribute to the Chemical Industries Association, especially Judith Hackett, who is about to move on from her role, for the way in which it engaged with environmental campaigners, animal rights organisations and a variety of industries from Ford to Marks and Spencer, the chemical industry itself and downstream users, in putting forward practical proposals. That is why I am slightly surprised by the reference to excessive administration. The proposals were agreed as recently as December, so the company in Hartlepool may have sounded a note of unjustified pessimism.

I believe it was in this room that I introduced the regulations on paint, and Opposition Members—there were Opposition Members present on that occasion—said that they would put fresh burdens on British industry. They had to change their stance when scribbled notes from the industry representatives down at the end of the room pointed out that consistent regulations would be applied across Europe, and that the UK industry, which was already operating to high environmental and health protection standards, would benefit from similar burdens being placed on their competitors in other countries.

I should point out that REACH will replace more than 40 pieces of legislation, and one regulation means better regulation; it will help to reduce the overall bureaucratic burden. As a result of our initiatives, much has been done to streamline REACH and make it more cost-effective. I will happily lay out some of the other benefits of the proposal for my hon. Friend.

My hon. Friend also referred to the importance of skills development within the industry, and I agree with him on that. Service industries in particular have to operate on improving their processes and increasing skills. On Monday I went to see another process industry, a printing plant. I was really impressed by how specific manufacturers and producers in the industry are working to squeeze every last benefit from the improvement of skills, and how they are engaging the work force in how the processes are undertaken. That is why the employer-led sector skills council and the regional skills partnership are so important in starting to deliver; they cover so much of the work force.

I agree with my hon. Friend about the importance of supporting young people in modern apprenticeships. One of the challenges for a region such as the north-east is encouraging young people to be ambitious about their skills and qualifications and, in many cases, about the entrepreneurship that they can bring to bear, either individually by setting up their own business, or as entrepreneurs within large industries such as the process industry. I would be happy to talk to my hon. Friend about that, because the issue of how we get that message across in the north-east is important to young people in the constituencies of my hon. Friends the Members for Hartlepool and for Stockton, South, and my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Redcar.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hartlepool rightly referred to the impact of energy prices, and we certainly understand the tough conditions that high energy users are experiencing. He will be aware that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has, at the request of the Prime Minister, promoted an energy review that looks to the long term. We are carefully looking into the surprising prices spike, and the impression that perhaps not all supplies were as readily available in the UK as they should have been towards the end of last year.

My hon. Friend will also be aware that steps taken by Government mean that supplies will be increased considerably in the coming year, what with the new terminals, and what is happening in Pembrokeshire. Also, a variety of other approaches that have been a long time in preparation are coming to fulfilment; that will help us to deal with the faster than expected decrease in availability of North sea gas, other pressures on the energy industry, and the knock-on effect on industry. So steps are being taken to help industry to compete.

My hon. Friends have referred to the development in Teesport. I should point out that PD Teesport has sought a screening and scoping opinion from the Department for Transport, and the Department has responded. The next stage in the process will be a formal harbour revision order application to the Department. If one or more objection is received, an inquiry has to be set up. It would not be appropriate for the Government to speculate on the merits of the application before it is received, nor once it is under consideration. However, I assure my hon. Friends that careful consideration would be given, and the importance of the port and location of Teesport is fully recognised by the Government.

The work of the cluster arises from the merger in 2005 of the pharmaceutical and speciality cluster and the Teesside chemical initiative. The new and inclusive organisation will co-ordinate intellectual, business and financial support mechanisms for some of the major corporations in chemicals, pharmaceuticals and biotechnology in the region. That is of enormous significance. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Hartlepool and his colleagues about the importance of that development, which builds on the sector's many decades of commitment to the region.

My hon. Friend rightly said that the sector had weathered many booms and busts, and that some industries had survived and others had not. The process industry represents 25 per cent. of the whole economy of the north-east; that demonstrates its importance. So I understand why my hon. Friends are so keen to make sure that the Government understand and respond to its interests.

It being Five o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the sitting lapsed, without Question put.

Westminster Hall

Thursday 26 January 2006

[ANN WINTERTON in the Chair]

Health Services (Developing Countries)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Coaker.]

2.30 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for International Development (Mr. Gareth Thomas): I am grateful to Mr. Speaker for allowing this debate on strengthening health services in developing countries.

Achieving better health is vital if the poor are to break out of the cycle of poverty. We know also that better health is central to the achievement of the millennium development goals. Three of those eight goals—maternal health, child mortality, and AIDS and communicable diseases—are directly influenced by the provision of better health services.

The truth is that progress is slow, and without an accelerated effort those millennium development goals will not be met in much of Africa during this century. I am sorry to say that there remains a massive health divide between developed and developing countries. Life expectancy at birth in the United Kingdom is 70 years; in Malawi it is only 35 years. Similar divisions exist also within countries, where child mortality in the poorest groups is typically double that among the richest.

The global health statistics remain stark. Eleven million children still die each year from preventable or readily treated diseases such as measles, malaria, diarrhoea or pneumonia, and half of them are malnourished. We know also that 500,000 women die in childbirth, and 99 per cent. of them are from developing countries.

Despite recent progress with increasing access to antiretroviral treatment, AIDS remains largely unchecked, and some 25 years into the epidemic, 5 million people are newly infected with HIV every year, adding to the 40 million people already infected. About 20 million people have died as a result of the epidemic. Sadly, 120 million women still have no access to reproductive health.

Malaria, tuberculosis and other communicable diseases remain a major concern, but developing countries face a double burden of disease. Chronic diseases are linked also to lifestyle choices such as diet, smoking and exercise. Those are becoming increasingly important. For example, it has been estimated that tobacco use will have been the likely cause of 10 million deaths every year by 2020.

Better health clearly depends on progress in many areas, including economic growth.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): The Minister mentioned malaria. The World Health Organisation has made it fairly clear that using monotherapies over a long period can build up resistance, which makes them much less effective. Have the Government taken that into account in their investment in tackling malaria in its various forms?

Mr. Thomas: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that intervention. It allows me to confirm the substance of his question, and to point to the £10 million being committed over the next five years to the Medicines for Malaria Venture, one of the bodies looking at resistance to malarial drugs. It is considering the new drugs that are available and what we can do collectively to spread best practice in treating the disease.

As I said, economic growth is important to better health. Education, particularly of women, is equally important. Access to safe water and sanitation, dealing with social exclusion and challenging gender inequality, too, will contribute to better health. However, accessible and high-quality health services are particularly important in places with a high burden of communicable diseases, where health conditions affect mothers and children and where people have limited access to basic care. Investment in those high-quality services will make the most profound difference.

We know from World Bank research that we could reduce child mortality by up to two thirds and maternal mortality by up to three quarters if we could deliver near universal access to a range of available, proven and affordable health interventions and commodities.

The continuing health divide is a threat to us all in a globalised world. A communicable disease respects no international boundaries, as AIDS and severe acute respiratory syndrome have shown most recently. Following the temporary withdrawal of the polio vaccination in Nigeria back in 2004, the virus spread rapidly to 18 previously polio-free countries as far away as Yemen and Indonesia. Today, people are rightly concerned about the rapid spread of avian influenza to Europe and its potential to trigger a human pandemic that could kill many thousands of people.

The threats of unchecked population growth have largely fallen off the international agenda, but inevitably they, too, remain a concern for those of us who are considering the need for better health services. We believe that by 2050 the global population will rise to 9 billion from 6.5 billion today.

Ms Sally Keeble (Northampton, North) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend accept that although there might not be the same threat of population explosion, the need for reproductive health services continues because of the need to protect people against HIV/AIDS and to ensure that there is proper birth spacing, so that women can recover from births, be healthy, look after their children and protect their health, too? Does he therefore agree that although the immediate threat might have gone, the need for the services is as great as ever?

Mr. Thomas: My hon. Friend is right. We need substantially to improve access to services to promote maternal health for the reasons that she outlined. The support that is being given to women for proper birth spacing, for example, is not as good as we would like it to be, and it is nothing like the support that is given in the developed world. Part of our effort to increase the quality of basic health services in developing countries must be directed to better maternal health.

[Mr. Thomas]

The continuing rapid population growth will make it harder to invest in key social sectors such as health and education, so we also need to continue to focus on that. A newcomer to international health may sensibly conclude that it should be straightforward to strengthen basic health services. After all, we have long known about these health problems, and we have proven, effective and often low-cost interventions for most of them. We know that health workers, often with only limited training, can deliver many of those interventions outside a formal health setting, but we also know that they remain massively underused, particularly by the people who are most in need.

The truth is that health systems in developing countries face many challenges. They often face severe and long-term underfunding, and in some cases they have to deal with a deteriorating infrastructure, unreliable or inadequate supplies of essential drugs, as my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) said, weak institutions and governance, and increasing shortages of trained health workers, particularly in the rural under-served areas, a point that was brought home graphically to me when I visited Malawi with the Minister of State, Department of Health, my hon. Friend the Member for Doncaster, Central (Ms Winterton).

David Taylor: Will the Minister pay tribute to a charity in Leicestershire, staffed at least in part by people from North-West Leicestershire, called Inter Care, which collects surplus medicines and matches them to specific requests from partner health units in Africa? He talked about rural areas. Many rural clinics have the staff to deliver essential basic health care, but cannot afford or obtain essential medicines and basic equipment, while medicines that are of perfect quality but are unwanted are being destroyed in Britain. The charity recycles medicines to a number of English-speaking countries in Africa. Is that not the sort of initiative that can help the main thrust of what our Government are doing?

Mr. Thomas: I pay tribute to the work of Inter Care. My hon. Friend's intervention proves that non-governmental organisations can play a role when the capacity of Governments to provide those health services is not what we would wish for. However, we have to continue to work towards a situation in which the work of an organisation such as Inter Care is not necessary and we have developed health services to such an extent that we do not need to recycle the drugs not needed in developed countries.

Where health services are available, the poor often cannot overcome the financial barriers posed by user fees. AIDS, which has reached every country on the planet, is undermining efforts to improve health and reversing the development gains of recent years. There are a number of critical barriers to progress to which we need to direct our attention if we want basic health services in developing countries to improve substantially.

We have to start with finance. The World Health Organisation estimates that it would cost only approximately £20 per person to provide an essential package of services to deal with the major causes of ill health. Ministries of Health in many low-income countries typically spend less than £5 per head; that is a pretty daunting gap. When we consider that much of that spend benefits the better-off urban populations, that too little is spent on primary care and that, by contrast, the UK NHS budget is nearer £1,300 per head, we get some sense of the scale of the financial challenge.

We need a step change in funding from domestic budgets and international assistance. We need to train and hire staff to ensure a constant supply of life-saving drugs and to enable health workers to reach unserved communities—in short, we need to provide the fuel that keeps a health service running. We also know that aid needs to be longer term and more predictable, rather than in the form of the multitude of short-term projects that we often see.

Ideally, that long-term, predictable assistance should be provided in Government budgets. When services are provided, too many of the poor are precluded from using them because of prohibitive costs, which can push families into crippling debt and intractable poverty. When the Government in Uganda removed formal user fees, attendance at health facilities doubled from 6 million to 12 million over a 12-month period. UK budget support to Uganda has helped the Government there to fund their priorities within that national health plan.

Achievements as a result of that budget support include a doubling of the budget for essential drugs, the recruitment of an additional 2,700 primary care workers, the doubling of doctors' salaries and the construction of 482 health centres. As a result of that investment, national immunisation coverage increased from 41 per cent. of the Ugandan people in 1999 to 89 per cent. in 2005—a huge step change. Although it is too early to demonstrate improved health outcomes in Uganda, more people are clearly able to access better-resourced services.

Sadly, many developing countries do not prioritise health in their national development plans and budgets. There are a few exceptions, such as Sri Lanka and Kerala state in India, which have demonstrated a significant commitment to expanding access to services and to equity and accountability. They have achieved some impressive outcomes. For example, child mortality in Kerala is now 19 per 1,000 people, while the figure is 138 per 1,000 people in Madhya Pradesh.

Our second challenge is to deal with the mounting crisis in staffing health services. Trained health workers are in short supply in many low-income countries. Poor conditions of service and poor prospects have led many to leave the health service to work in other countries or sectors where pastures appear greener. We need to expand training opportunities and find imaginative solutions to retain staff and encourage deployment to under-served areas—rural areas, in particular.

The expansion of our own health service and an ageing population have contributed to the trouble by attracting many nurses to the UK. However, we are working closely with the Department of Health to address that. Many countries are revisiting the use of mid-level workers and training them to provide services that have traditionally been provided only by doctors or senior nurses. In Mozambique, for example, there are now nurse obstetricians while, in Malawi, there are clinical officer anaesthetists. The problem of recruiting health workers from developing countries faces only the United Kingdom, but Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development countries in general. By 2015, the United States alone will need an additional 1 million health workers and will inevitably try to import them from other countries. Many countries in Europe face the same challenges. It is undoubtedly a global issue that will require global solutions.

We need to work with all providers of health care in developing countries, such as in the public sector and in the third sector that was highlighted by my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire. The information and commodities that can improve health are usually delivered through a range of formal, as well as informal, providers. Faith-based organisations, for example, have a long history of providing services in under-served areas. Non-governmental organisations have a strong presence in many countries, particularly in sub-Saharan Africa and in much of Asia.

The private sector is also a major provider of services in many countries. However, it is often unregulated, separate from the mainstream and works outside the Government plans. Many services are provided informally in small shops that stock a few key medicines and by traditional practitioners. While Ministries of Health in developing countries must provide the overall framework to achieve better health for the population as well as monitoring progress, often they cannot be the main service provider. There is a need to exploit all the opportunities that exist in developing countries to deliver services.

One obvious example is the social marketing through NGOs that has long provided most of the world's contraceptives and is now an important provider of insecticide-treated nets. The private sector is being increasingly drawn in by Governments as a partner as a result of contracting out the delivery of district-level services, leading to a doubling of the use of health services in Cambodia and to the franchising of reproductive health services in Pakistan.

Ms Keeble: Does my hon. Friend recognise the important role played by the private sector in occupational health services? For example, Anglo American has tested all its staff for HIV/AIDS and provided services not only to its employees, but to families and communities.

Mr. Thomas: I join my hon. Friend in paying tribute to the work of Anglo American. Several large multinational corporations in South Africa have set an example for the private sector in testing provisional antiretrovirals in respect of their work force and the communities that they serve more broadly, helping to deal with HIV/AIDS. We need more private companies to be willing to follow that lead, but Anglo American has certainly done an important, helpful job.

Another barrier is the weak voice of civil society and the poor accountability of health service providers to the people whom they are trying to serve. Sadly, no Government of a developing country have fallen because of their failure to provide health services, yet often when we talk to the poor in developing countries it is their health and the catastrophic expenditure that they will have to face when dealing with serious illness in their families that are of major importance to them. We need to support civil society to demand more of Governments on health care and to be more willing to hold them to account.

We also need to deal with weak performance management. With a few exceptions, efforts to monitor performance and demonstrate the results of investment in health have been inadequate and ineffective. More effective information systems will be vital if we are to help to match resources to the delivery of results, and to continue to argue for mobilising additional resources in the pursuit of better health services. There are many challenges and debates on how we can best channel aid. In settings where the health system is very dysfunctional, there are particular attractions in using targeted approaches to deal with the major diseases, and there have been some impressive gains in past years as a result of such approaches. For example, smallpox was eradicated in 1997, and polio is expected to follow in a few years.

David Taylor: It is possible for even a small organisation to have a significant and disproportionate impact on health care. An organisation in Leicestershire provides support to about 2.5 million people in rural communities in Cameroon, Ghana, Malawi, Tanzania, Uganda and Zambia. So it is not just the size of the organisation that counts, because an organisation can lever in and catalyse activity in its own region and country.

Mr. Thomas: My hon. Friend is right that NGOs, regardless of their size, can make a huge contribution in addressing the gaps in health care provision in developing countries. I pay tribute to those British and international NGOs based in his area that are working in sub-Saharan Africa and elsewhere.

One of the most significant targeted investments in recent years has been on AIDS, TB and malaria—three key poverty diseases. There have also been significant reductions in child mortality in very poor countries such as Tanzania, Malawi and Mozambique, again through approaches that deliberately target the major childhood diseases.

However, we need to recognise the limits of focusing on single issues, and we need to ensure that it is not done to the detriment of efforts to strengthen the broader health system. We might prevent deaths from measles through targeted vaccination programmes, but the child that benefits from that programme may then succumb to malaria because there is no constant supply of an effective medicine. The same health worker who delivers AIDS education could deliver malaria treatment, vaccination programmes or maternity care programmes. Those health workers need to be enabled to deliver the full health package. We have learned in recent years that if we are to have a lasting impact, we need to address the problems affecting the whole health sector, rather than just specific parts of it.

The UK has a long and distinguished history in international health work which goes back as far as the 19th century and the establishment of the School of Tropical Medicine in Liverpool. We remain at the forefront of international health policy, maintaining a substantial investment in health in poor countries. In recent years, many new global partnerships have emerged, such as the Global Alliance for Vaccines and Immunisation and the Global Fund to Fight AIDS, Tuberculosis and Malaria, which are partly based on British expertise. They have helped to raise the profile of, and rejuvenate efforts against, particular diseases, and they have helped to raise significant additional resources for health at a time when overall aid declined globally. Also, the private sector has become more engaged with health and philanthropic foundations—notably the Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation—which provide more funding for health than many UN agencies.

Health probably has a higher international profile than ever before. It has been the subject of discussions in the UN General Assembly, and of course last year at the G8 summit and during our presidency. It is one of the obvious recipients for some of the extra $50 billion of aid that was agreed at Gleneagles. We have to ensure that those additional funds are spent on the right things and target those most in need. As I said, that aid needs to be long-term and predictable. Only then will countries have the confidence to scale up their health services and invest in the necessary training, and only then will they have confidence that they can recruit and pay for additional staff at the same time as revitalising their health infrastructure. Only when there is that long-term, predictable aid will Finance Ministers and Health Ministers have the confidence and ambition that we want them to have for health care spending in their country.

It is important that we find the right balance between targeted investment through specific funds and long-term investment in systems building. We must ensure that targeted approaches, such as the Global Fund, complement the broader effort to develop health systems, rather than undermine it or divert resources from it.

As hon. Members know, our aid budget is committed to rise to 0.7 per cent. of gross national income by 2013. In the interim period, we are still looking for innovative ways to front-load investment in health and education. One powerful example is the international finance facility for immunisations, which will provide an additional £4 billion to the global immunisation efforts over the next 10 years and will, we believe, save some 5 million lives in the process. A larger international finance facility is under development and is expected to channel significant support to health and education. With our European allies, we are exploring a number of innovative approaches to increase aid. We are also considering how we can stimulate investment by the pharmaceutical industry in a new generation of drugs and vaccines, through advanced market commitments.

In 2005, G8 leaders committed themselves to trying to secure universal access to AIDS prevention treatment and care by 2010, which is an ambitious goal that will require rapid attention to the systems-wide constraints. In post-conflict and fragile states, we will face particular challenges in building even basic health systems from scratch.

We are trying to work with other donors to simplify the international system for health and AIDS. Too many agencies—be they UN, World Bank, or the various global funds or bilateral donors—are working in developing countries, often with unclear and overlapping mandates. Many of those agencies deal with specific disease areas, without engaging with the broader health system on which they all depend. They operate in a competitive global funding environment in which country-level needs are often only poorly articulated. With OECD colleagues, we need to try to hold those various agencies to account for their performance in providing more and, crucially, better aid. We have to support countries' efforts to achieve the universal access to AIDS services that they want, as well as making progress on the child and maternal health MDGs.

The UK makes a substantial investment in health, through a wide range of instruments. When we are satisfied with a country's policy environment and governance standards, we provide direct support to its budget to implement its poverty reduction plan. However, in other settings, where we do not have confidence in the policy environment and the commitment of leaders to reform, we work with a variety of partners to support country-led efforts to address the whole sector plan, through pooled funding. In fragile states, for example, we employ project approaches implemented by a range of partners, particularly NGOs and private sector organisations.

Of course, we work closely with other Departments, such as the Department of Health and the Foreign Office. Our country efforts are complemented by a substantial research agenda, our current priorities being AIDS and other communicable diseases, reproductive health, maternal and child health, future concerns—about tobacco, for example—and some things that are more neglected internationally, such as mental health.

We are supporting a number of public-private partnerships that aim to increase access to health services or seek to fund research on future generations of vaccines, such as the international AIDS vaccine initiative, or the Medicines for Malaria Venture. Better health has to be at the core of the international development agenda as we look forward to the next 12 months.

Sadly, progress has stalled or been reversed in many countries. Without a major effort, many of them will not meet the millennium development goals on health for years to come. The commitments that were made last year hold out the possibility of making much more substantial progress on health once again. I look forward to hearing hon. Members' comments on how we might make the progress that I think we all want.

2.59 pm

Mark Simmonds (Boston and Skegness) (Con): May I say how pleased I am to be under your watchful eye in this important debate, Lady Winterton? I congratulate the Minister on applying for this debate on an important area of international development policy, and Mr. Speaker on granting it.

The Minister mentioned the Government's policy of spending 0.7 per cent. of our gross national income on development aid, which he knows we support. We support the millennium development goals, including the three that are specifically relevant to the debate this afternoon, which the Minister outlined in his introductory remarks. We also support the Global Fund to Fight AIDS, TB and malaria, although we are disappointed that other countries and private organisations do not, perhaps, share the UK Government's enthusiasm, and ours, for that fund, or accord it as much importance as we do.

We also share the aspirations that were set out at G8 on the international finance facility for immunisation, which could make a significant impact on health care provision in the developing world. There have been past successes with regard to health in a global context. Smallpox is a good example, and we all hope that polio will be eradicated shortly.

It is only fair to put it on the record that since 1997, the Department for International Development has provided £1.5 billion for strengthening heath care systems in developing countries, which is worth while and admirable, and we support it. The UK was the prime mover in setting up the high-level forum on the millennium development goals on health in Geneva in January 2004, at which developing and donor countries discussed concrete actions to increase health service capacity to meet development goals. Again, we applaud that.

We welcome the G8 Africa communiqué, which said that people should have access to basic health care and encouraged countries to drop user fees, but recognised that that decision can be made only by the Governments of developing countries. I shall say more about that later.

I should like to sum up the current situation. We must prioritise the provision of basic health care services in the developing world. As the Minister rightly said, one third of the world's poorest people—about 2 billion of them—do not have access to essential health care services and medicine. Sadly, that enormous problem cannot be solved in a short time.

The disease crisis in the poorest countries is staggering. The approximate numbers of deaths per year are as follows: malaria, 1 million; TB, 2 million; HIV/AIDS, 3 million. Infection and death rates for those three diseases are continuing to grow. Approximately every minute, a woman dies as a result of pregnancy and childbirth.

3.2 pm

Sitting suspended for a Division in the House.

3.17 pm

On resuming—

Mark Simmonds: I was speaking about the number of women in the developing world who die as a result of pregnancy and childbirth; it is one every minute, or 529,000 a year. As the Minister said, 99 per cent. of those deaths occur in developing countries. The World Health Organisation estimates that more than 10.5 million lives a year could be saved by 2015 by expanding health care intervention for infectious diseases, maternal and child health, and non-communicable diseases.

Sadly, some recent initiatives have failed to meet their targets, and I would argue that the "3 by 5" initiative failed significantly. It was stated yesterday morning at International Development questions that of the 40 million people with HIV/AIDS in sub-Saharan Africa, only 550,000 are taking retroviral drugs and receiving retroviral treatment, rather than the 3 million anticipated in the target. That is a significant disappointment. The G8 aspirations on HIV/AIDS seem a long way adrift. Initiatives such as "3 by 5" require strong health care systems to be put in place to ensure that antiretroviral drugs can be delivered. The lack of such systems is often the main reason why targets have not been met.

Like the health care burden, the economic burden of epidemics such as TB, malaria and HIV is enormous. Those diseases are crippling economies, devastating key sectors of workers and reducing investment that could be used to stimulate economies and alleviate poverty. The World Bank estimates that TB costs the average patient three or four months of lost earnings. Malaria slows economic growth in Africa by about 1.3 per cent. a year. When the prevalence of HIV/AIDS reaches 8 per cent., the cost in growth for sub-Saharan Africa will be about 1 per cent. a year.

Good health care systems would go a long way to meeting many of the millennium development goals, including improving maternal health and child health, and meeting targets on disease. Good health care systems would also contribute to the achievement of other millennium development goals, such as access to education, as fewer children would be required to drop out of school to care for sick or dying relatives, or to care for siblings because both parents had died. There will also be more teachers. It is a staggering statistic, but in 1999 in sub-Saharan Africa nearly 1 million children lost their teachers to HIV/AIDS.

The links between pandemic diseases and national security must not be overlooked. The Minister has recently been to Malawi. He will therefore be aware that because of HIV/AIDS, troop strength in Malawi has fallen to 50 per cent. of the minimum capacity needed to guarantee state security. In Mozambique, police recruits cannot be trained fast enough to replace those who are dying of AIDS. Strong health care systems are essential to ensure that law and order can be maintained. I saw that for myself in Mozambique last year.

We are greatly concerned about some specific problems with regard to the provision of health care in the developing world. Of course I understand that the Minister cannot give answers on those problems today. Of course I understand that the issues are immensely complex and that the Minister, the Secretary of State and the Department for International Development alone cannot solve the problems. There must be international consensus and co-operation to reverse the trends, particularly in many parts of Africa.

The first issue is health care fees in the developing world. The British Medical Association has calculated that abolishing user fees for health care facilities could prevent approximately 233,000 child deaths annually across 20 African countries. User fees are in place across most sub-Saharan African countries. Initially, they were introduced to tackle severe underfunding, but clear evidence now demonstrates that such fees do not generate much revenue, significantly deter people from seeking access to health care, are unlikely to improve efficiency and disproportionately affect poor people who require health care most. Will the Minister explain what steps the Government are taking to encourage developing countries to abolish their fees? I am aware that there have been successes, but further work needs to be done to ensure that basic health care will be free at the point of delivery for all those who require it.

The second issue is drug availability. The Department for International Development needs to do more to encourage the pharmaceutical industry to allow the manufacture of generic drugs for use in the developing world. The former director general of the World Health Organisation's HIV programme suggested the designation of a humanitarian corridor within which leading drug manufacturers would allow rivals to produce drugs at low prices for modest royalties. Does the Department support that suggestion? If not, why not, and if so, what is it is doing to encourage the proposal?

There is also great concern about the number of medicines being developed to tackle diseases that predominantly affect poor people. The drugs for neglected diseases initiative has estimated that less than 1 per cent. of new drugs coming on to the market are related to tropical diseases. Does the Minister think that the Department can do anything to increase that percentage, to ensure that there will be more of the research and development that is required to increase the number of generic drugs available to the vast populations who suffer from those diseases? This is not just a matter of the availability of drugs. Once the drugs arrive in the developing world, there must be adequate facilities for transporting, storing and distributing them, including reliable refrigeration, transport and sufficiently trained staff. All those areas are currently lacking.

The hon. Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) made a point about drug resistance, which is becoming prevalent, particularly with malaria. There is concern that malaria parasites have developed resistance to the cheapest and most common drugs used to treat the disease. Resistance to treatment can be delayed by using therapies that combine different medications. However, 18 pharmaceutical companies are producing and distributing drugs that risk exacerbating drug resistance and jeopardising the fight against malaria. That needs to be dealt with, or the problem will only get worse. I understand that that problem is more prevalent in Asia than in Africa.

There are also problems with tariffs—internal tariffs between African countries as well as tariffs that raise taxes on imports to Africa. Those, unbelievably, still apply in some instances to basic health care products such as malarial bed nets, which can significantly reduce the transmission of malaria, in particular, by as much as 63 per cent. As of 2003, 18 countries have reduced or eliminated the taxes and tariffs on bed nets. I urge the Government to encourage Governments in the developing countries to go further and introduce legislation, if not wipe out tariffs on health care products altogether—particularly the bed nets in my example. More people would then have access to the health care that they deserve and require.

The Minister also mentioned staffing, which we think is a major issue. We welcome the fact that the Government have signed up to the code of practice for the international recruitment of health care professionals, under which the public and private sectors make it a policy not to recruit actively in the developing world. However, that does not prevent doctors, nurses and other clinical staff from leaving Africa and other poor countries. About 23,000 leave Africa each year, not necessarily through active recruitment but through what is termed the "vacuum effect". They are pulled to the developed world—to the prospect of better conditions and better earnings, and we can all understand that. Malawi has just 100 doctors and 2,000 nurses for a population of 12 million people, 15 per cent. of whom suffer from HIV/AIDS.

However, we must balance such facts by understanding remittances and the important role that they play in alleviating some severe economic problems in poor countries. In the British NHS over the past three years, the number of full-time clinical academics has been reduced by 14 per cent. That will further increase the national health service's dependence on overseas recruitment in forthcoming years. I hope that the Minister and his counterpart in the Department of Health will put that at the forefront of their discussions.

It is essential that all groups in the community have access to health care, especially women and the poor. For that to happen, however, there must be better co-operation and co-ordination between public, private and NGO initiatives. As the Minister rightly pointed out, there needs to be a degree of certainty that the money is going where it is intended to go, and much greater control over duplication, as well as cross-country and cross-organisational co-ordination to ensure the best use of the money available. For example, TB is responsible for up to half of all AIDS deaths in Africa, so there needs to be greater collaboration and co-ordination between TB and AIDS programmes. As we heard earlier, a strong civil society is also essential to the maintenance of good health care.

I have a few final questions for the Minister. I do not necessarily expect him to answer them today, but I should be grateful if he gave them some thought. If he does not respond within a certain time scale, I shall fire off a letter in the usual way just to nudge him. Although aid and debt relief are necessary, economic development and international trade offer the best hope of sustainable solutions to poverty in Africa and elsewhere in the developing world. Like everyone else, we were disappointed by the outcome of the World Trade Organisation meeting in Hong Kong, particularly because a key commitment of the millennium development goals is to create an open and non-discriminatory multilateral trading system. At the moment, we are a very long way from that.

The reform of trade rules is essential if Africa is to trade its way out of poverty and to create the capital necessary to invest in its health care systems itself, through its own Governments. We urge the Government and DFID to continue to work for a resolution to the Doha round of trade talks. They must strike a balance to ensure that freeing up trade does not necessarily exclude African and other developing nations from generating revenue through modest tariff barriers. Those nations can then spend that on public services, particularly health care, so that they move away from dependency on aid, donations from the developing world and direct budgetary support.

On budgetary support, there is a balance between maintaining the continuity of funding necessary for recipient Governments to guarantee income flows, and thus the provision of services, and ensuring that British taxpayers' money goes where it is intended to go. As the Minister is aware, the Conservative party is concerned that, at the moment, quite a lot of anecdotal evidence—I shall not put the percentages on the record—suggests that a significant percentage of budgetary support money is unaccounted for and does not end up where it is intended to go.

I would like the Minister to think about putting in place more stringent transparency and accountability procedures, to ensure that direct budgetary support from the British taxpayer goes where it is intended to go. Of course we understand that there is a balance to strike between ensuring both that there is transparency and accountability and British taxpayers get value for money, and that the recipient Government are democratically accountable for the money that they get. At the moment, that balance is not necessarily correct.

On debt relief, we welcome the heavily indebted poor countries initiative, which has benefited a number of countries so far, although we believe that it could go wider and deeper. However, the G8 debt deal will provide less than $1 billion extra this year for vital services such as health care. Will the Minister tell us what percentage of the debt relief agreed at G8 will be spent on the provision of health care in developing countries? Serious questions are now being asked about whether the promises that were made will be delivered on. Germany has gone on record as saying that it is highly unlikely that it will meet the targets that it thought that it would. What impact will that have on health care in the developing world? What steps is the Minister taking to ensure that money from debt relief is used in the recipient countries specifically to alleviate poverty and on health care, in the context that we are debating?

The Minister gave a fair and articulate introduction to the debate. As he said, Africa is struggling with many diseases, not just the three big killers that I have talked about, and may prove to be the weak link in preventing bird flu, especially as the Rift valley, which runs 9,000 km from Syria in the north to Mozambique in southern Africa, attracts millions of birds each year. Indeed, Tanzania has gone on record as saying that it has only $120,000 to spend on strategies to prevent bird flu. Have the Minister and his Department made any assessment of the risk caused by Africa's inability to finance prevention measures, particularly against bird flu? If, so, what is their reaction? Will funds be allocated specifically to allow African countries to prepare for the potential global pandemic? I accept that there is a degree of uncertainty about that.

Economic growth is impossible if a country's population is dying, so strengthening the provision of health services must be a focus for all our efforts. Tomorrow, I am travelling to Yemen to discover how Oxfam has improved basic health care services in a district there by enhancing community participation, piloting community financing and strengthening district health services. Schemes such as those, which include civil society, NGOs, regional government and donor country Governments, must be replicated where appropriate if we are to see lasting improvements in the health care services of developing nations, which all of us, across the House, want to see, as those are essential building blocks for alleviating poverty and improving lives in developing countries.

3.33 pm

Greg Mulholland (Leeds, North-West) (LD): I might not be able to stay for the winding-up speeches, as I promised to attend an event in Leeds. If that turns out to be the case, I apologise and assure hon. Members that I will read the speeches in Hansard.

I want to talk about the recruitment of health professionals from developing nations, which the Minister and the hon. Member for Boston and Skegness (Mark Simmonds) mentioned. The code has been tightened up, but there is clearly a loophole that needs to be closed. Private agencies can still perfectly legally recruit health professionals from countries on the banned list if they do not work in the NHS in the first instance. They often work in private nursing homes and care homes instead, and frequently do not do the jobs for which they were trained. Their skills are entirely wasted, never mind not being utilised in their country of origin, where we all agree they should be. Private homes sometimes make money from the practice, which is scandalous. They charge a fee so that they can put the health professionals through the process and then, after the allotted period, people are naturalised, live here and are eligible to work in the NHS. It is clearly recruitment from banned countries by the back door, and we need to hear more about that from the Minister.

Why does the Department of Health still leave it to NHS employers to monitor the code rather than do that itself? I realise that that question is not directed at the Minister's Department, but I hope that it will be considered jointly by the two Departments. The Department of Health should monitor the code and not leave it to self-regulation, which could lead to a conflict of interest among NHS employers. As for figures in connection with the loophole, I am sure the Minister accepts that between 2004 and 2005, 3,301 health professionals joined the UK register who were from banned countries. Although the code is welcome and has made the position better, it is not working sufficiently. I hope that the Government will give it serious consideration.

There is a more complex problem, and I am not suggesting that we have a solution to it. It is creditable that the Government are investing in Malawi. It is hugely welcome work and we thoroughly support it, but what is the Department's assessment of the effect that it is having on attracting health professionals from neighbouring countries? I am not criticising the work, but Malawi is the focus of DFID funding, which is likely to suck in health professionals from neighbouring countries. The Department and the Government need to deal with that and the situation needs to be monitored. That is not simply a theory. It happened in Botswana, where the Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation put a lot of money into services. It attracted health workers from neighbouring countries, such as Angola, where there is a crisis in the health service. We must accept that the impact of development is often more complicated than we would expect it to be. Sometimes, development work distorts local labour markets. We must be aware of that and do whatever we can to ameliorate the position.

We welcome the overall thrust of the debate. We are all happy to be involved in it. We shall support any action that the Government take to strengthen health services and will assist them in finding solutions to the problems.

3.39 pm

Ms Sally Keeble (Northampton, North) (Lab): I am pleased to take part in the debate. Although my remarks might seem critical, I support the Government's action. I recognise the enormous financial commitment that has been made and the expertise and thought that have been put in. It is partly because the United Kingdom Government have been so active in such matters that the debate is developing. One reason we are pressing the Government is that they can make a difference and affect what happens in the countries that many of us care so passionately about.

I shall discuss three issues. The first is the need to make sure that when we consider health care systems in developing countries, we look into both acute care systems and community health care systems. Secondly, we need to track funding from the Global Fund down to community-based clinics. I have spoken to my hon. Friend the Minister about that and today I shall talk about one project in which I have a particular interest. I do not mean a financial interest; I mean that I have seen the project's work and am very much committed to it. Thirdly, I shall talk about maternal and infant mortality, because that is the subject of one of the millennium development goals on which the international community is lagging. We are also lagging on the MDGs on infectious diseases and HIV/AIDS reduction.

On primary care systems, I thought that rather than talk about statistics, I might recount what I saw when I went to Africa with my Schools for Africa project before Christmas. I went to see the distribution of boxes for children in a slum called Kiandutu, just outside Nairobi. "Kiandutu" means jiggers, which are horrible little biting things, and if hon. Members saw the slum, they would know why it was called that; it is a truly appalling place. I went with my friends from KENWA—Kenya Network of Women with AIDS—to the house of a woman called Tabitha, who had a three-week old baby.

Tabitha is HIV-positive and is on antiretrovirals. It was thought that her baby was probably okay, as far as anyone could tell, because the birth had been made as safe as possible, but one of Tabitha's other children was very ill. One of the main routes of transmission is mother to child, and there is a big need to block off that type of transmission. Once the birth has been made safe, the next thing is to make sure that the mother does not breastfeed, so a lot of effort was being put into making sure that Tabitha did not breastfeed her child. She was keen to avoid doing so, because she obviously wanted to make sure that the baby lived.

KENWA, which, as my hon. Friend the Minister knows, is connected to the Global Fund, gave the woman some powdered milk. KENWA had to give the baby ordinary powdered milk because there is no powdered infant formula available. Kenya, which is a big, sophisticated country, is not the only country affected by that lack of supply. HIV-positive women who are trying to avoid breastfeeding their babies in order to save their lives do not have access to supplies of powdered infant formula. It is available only in westernised shops, and it is too expensive for them.

Another problem was that there was no water. Supplies of water were being sold, but they were expensive and Tabitha did not have any money. In addition, the water was not safe for a small baby, so KENWA gave her bottles of sterilised water. However, there was no fuel, either, so nothing could be heated up and the mother could not sterilise the bottle. Although KENWA told Tabitha to feed the baby with a cup and spoon—one can do that with a little baby—she thought that it was proper to feed the baby with a bottle, even though it was an unsterilised bottle left all day in a filthy little hut. At least clean water was used—we hope—but there was no proper nutrition.

KENWA put massive effort into trying to make sure that that woman fed her baby safely. It supplied the powdered milk, which it had difficulty getting, and the water, and it tried to help her to manage the sterilisation issue. The woman, who is on antiretrovirals, had to struggle because she had three other children to look after, including one who was very sick. She had to cope with all the difficulties that I have described to do something that we do quite routinely.

I was struck by the fact that it is well within the capability of the donor community to make sure that such problems are dealt with. I thought back to when I had my own children in Guy's hospital just across the river. Because it is expensive to sterilise bottles, the hospital provides women who choose not to breastfeed their babies with little disposable bottles with the formula already made up. You may have seen them, Lady Winterton. They have a disposable teat, so the whole lot is thrown away after one feed. Of course, there must be an agreement with the producers that they do not sell them in supermarkets, or any efforts to encourage women to breastfeed their babies will be completely on the skids because those little things are so convenient. Instead, if one so chooses, one can buy small one-feed cartons of ready made-up formula in supermarkets and chemists. They are completely sterile: one simply opens them and put the contents into a bottle and away you go.

I described them to my friends from KENWA and asked whether they had seen them and whether it would help to solve part of the challenge of persuading a woman not to give up the unequal struggle—persuading her not to breastfeed her baby and risk finding that the baby is HIV-positive. They did not even know that such products existed—they had never seen or heard of them. They did not know that they were available.

I know that there are all sorts of debates about Nestlé milk. We talk about giving mothers antiretrovirals, making childbirth safe and trying to block transmission, which is the biggest problem, but unfortunately everything comes down to what was happening in that little hut and the woman who was facing the problem of how to feed her baby safely and avoid the baby becoming HIV-positive.

Real thought must be given to how we draw the lines that need to be drawn between acute services, primary services and community-based services. That is as much an issue for this country as it is for the developing world. It is extremely problematic for us to deal with. It is just as important for us in this country, when we talk about improving health and health care systems, to consider the areas that produce the biggest change in health care.

I turn to the problem of tracking the money. KENWA was running a project in that slum, as well as seven others in Nairobi and the surrounding area. The Global Fund considers KENWA a model organisation. If one asks the Global Fund about its work on community-based projects, it will hold KENWA up as an example. KENWA does not receive money from the Global Fund, although it did for a few years. I pay great tribute to the DFID office in Nairobi for helping KENWA through a difficult patch by providing it with funds, but it worries me that we pay a vast amount of money—I forget the exact amount, but the Government are rightly proud of it—into the Global Fund and the money is not tracked. After a great deal of unpicking, I finally found out what had happened.

The Global Fund provided the funds for KENWA for three years. Then, because the Kenyan Government had their own plan, the fund was supposed to go through the Kenyan Government, who were to decide where the money should go. In fact, the money went to the Kenyan Government and stopped. I understand that it is not known what will happen now, because of the problems in which the Kenyan Government find themselves. Meanwhile, the staff at KENWA have not been paid for several months, and the organisation is in crisis.

My hon. Friend the Minister might say, quite rightly, that KENWA is one organisation among many and that it is not right to use an Adjournment debate to lobby for one organisation, but let me explain why this particular organisation is so important. I did not realise until quite recently that KENWA provided support for 2 per cent. of all the people in Kenya who are on antiretrovirals. Because of the horrors that await those people if the funding comes to an end and they have no antiretrovirals, the organisation has been trying to find other programmes in which to put them. Some have migrated to the Government hospitals, which cannot do the outreach work that KENWA does. KENWA works in the slums, and is good at doing such work. Although the Kenyan Government figures for treating people with antiretrovirals might look good, the reality is that that great capacity is at risk of being lost as a result of the basic problem of getting the money from the donors—all credit to them—to those who spend the money and deliver the services.

Secondly, in addition to those on antiretrovirals, KENWA supports and feeds 1,400 orphans, and arrangements have not yet been made for the future feeding of those children. As my hon. Friend the Minister knows, caring for HIV/AIDS orphans is a major problem. I have been extremely concerned for some time about what will happen to such children, particularly given the risk of infection with HIV/AIDS and other health problems if they are not properly supported and maintained.

The hon. Member for Boston and Skegness (Mark Simmonds) spoke about tracking the money through the system and ensuring that all the benefits that the UK taxpayer and the individual donors who provide support expect are delivered. I do not blame the Global Fund for the problems—they are the result of a series of circumstances—but the problems certainly need to be unpicked. That story is a reminder of the vulnerability of health care systems in countries where governance is fragile.

My hon. Friend the Minister was right to say that that things have improved in many health sectors. The Government, DFID, NGOs and donors can take great credit for the amount of work that has been done and the outstanding progress that has been achieved. However, as my hon. Friend said, in some areas things have not improved, and in some they are getting worse, particularly infant and maternal mortality rates.

I am greatly concerned that although it is recognised that things are getting worse, the attention of the international community has not focused clearly enough on those indicators and on what health care is needed to tackle them. There are a number reasons for that. One that springs to mind immediately is the problems of women. Women come very low in the pecking order under many Governments, especially those of developing countries. Women and children are treated as a job lot. If the health care for women is not good, you can bet your last dollar that the health care systems for the children will not be good. I remember hearing a doctor in Soweto saying that the failure of the mother predicates the failure of the child. It is that simple.

In Kenya, the women are fed well because doing that means that they will be able to look after their children. I puzzled long and hard about the practice, which I have seen in a number of countries, of putting people on antiretrovirals for six months. It was done for only six months because after that there were no more drugs, but people said that it was terrible and asked what was to happen then; if people have a second course, the reaction is even worse. The response is, "If we can keep the mothers alive for a year or two, that will give the children protection for that much longer and a better chance later." It was as simple as that.

The professionals in developing countries and the UK who have to deal with such problems often say, "We know what has to be done and about the interventions needed to make a birth safe. We know what kind of facilities we need. That stuff can be done, but it is a question of will." The UK Government can make a real difference; they can make the arguments and encourage and cajole the rest of the international community, including the Governments of developing countries, to give such issues a higher priority.

Some things are making the situation worse. One is HIV/AIDS: we know that the disease has a female face and, increasingly, it is a young female face. We also know that the biggest form of transmission in many areas is now said to be from mother to child. There is also the issue of the number of orphans and what happens to them. I have often spoken to my hon. Friend the Minister about such issues; the figures are truly shocking. Just before Christmas, I went to Zimbabwe as well as Kenya. I had always thought that there were about 900,000 orphans, mostly HIV/AIDS orphans, in

[Ms Sally Keeble]

Zimbabwe, but I learned from a UNICEF book that the number of orphans in Zimbabwe is now 1.2 million, and the person at the UNICEF mission in Harare responsible for child health said that the figure was closer to 1.5 million, out of a population of about 12 million or 13 million. The implications of providing care for those children in years to come are startling. The hon. Member for Boston and Skegness has already pointed to the economic cost of HIV/AIDS—the costs incurred if health care systems are provided.

We must also consider the profound impact of conflict on the health of women and children because of their position as refugees and as victims of abuse by combatants, and because of the destruction that conflict causes to whatever health systems already exist. Changing sociological factors—changing patterns in child care, adult lives and family structures—have left children more vulnerable at different stages of life. Previously, birth was particularly dangerous; later, weaning becomes so.

Finally, there is the unresolved problem of the status of women. The UK Government have pressed on that issue, but the message needs constant reinforcement. I have seen women in Bangladesh who had to wait several days in labour until their husbands came to give permission for them to be taken to hospital because of complications during birth. That can simply be too late.

This is a slight diversion, but my hon. Friend the Minister talked about the improvements in Mozambique and seemed to link them with the need to make sure that there is work with community-based care workers. He is absolutely right to say that community-based care is important—not just the community care centres of the type that I saw in Kenya, but home visiting services, which are desperately important, especially for supporting HIV/AIDS victims in the community. It is important that the people who go out are properly equipped. In quite a few countries, I have seen people go into the community to provide care without the equipment they need. I met some midwives in a very rural area of Sudan, who had been given training and care packs by the DFID, but a couple of years on, all that was left was the drum for hearing babies' heartbeats—they had lost everything else and had one of those between them. The supplies need continually to be sent down the supply chain.

In Mozambique, I walked with a community care worker around some of the semi-rural slums in a town called Xai-Xai in Gaza province, just north of the capital. There were good roads, so there should have been good access for people to get in. I walked up a path to a hut from which the most awful moaning was coming. Inside, a woman was dying of AIDS. She was simply lying on the floor, because everything else had gone. All her family was dead. Her child was dead. There was just her and a care worker from Kuvumbana, the organisation that I was working with. The carer was there just to comfort the woman; she did not even have any basic painkillers.

If we are serious about providing care in the community, we need to ensure that people are properly trained and have proper supplies that are replenished. We also need to make sure that there is some joining up of provision. Not only did the carer in Xai-Xai not have painkillers, but the project had only intermittent supplies even of food. The supplies that were needed to make care in the community effective were not there. All the structures were in place, including a storage room to keep the stuff in, but things were simply not joined up.

I should just like to say something relating to what is specifically needed for health care services. We are focusing on things that are normally bottom of the pile, as it were, in terms of focus for Government attention. I fundamentally disagree with the hon. Member for Boston and Skegness on one point. He said that he thinks that economic growth and trade is a way to resolve sub-Saharan Africa's problems. Of course, economic growth and trade are needed, but sound policies for redistribution of wealth and service development have to be developed along with that if we are to tackle the kind of problems that the Minister talked about, which we all know exist in sub-Saharan Africa.

I have to say that thinking there is some simple solution sells the problem short. If the hon. Member for Boston and Skegness wants one example of why this is not just a matter of economic growth, he need only look at China, which has the fastest economic growth anywhere in the world, by a long shot, and is recognised as a future economic superpower.

Mark Simmonds: Let me clarify. That is not the point that I made. Economic growth through trade can make a serious contribution, but that alone cannot alleviate all the many problems that exist in sub-Saharan Africa.

The hon. Lady is right to mention China, where there has been extraordinary economic growth, but not all the population of China have been dragged out of poverty. Many rural parts of the far west of China have the same economic affluence—or lack of affluence—as Burma.

Ms Keeble: I shall press this matter a little further, because the details have to be spelled out. It is no accident that that is happening in China. It is happening because China does not have any policies to redistribute wealth, for example, in terms of sensible tax policy, and it does not have a regional development policy, so it has no means of getting proper transfers from the overdeveloped east of the country to the underdeveloped inland areas of the west. There are major difficulties there. We see China taking jobs from this country, while we have to support and develop its health care systems, particularly on HIV/AIDS.

Mark Simmonds: I do not agree with that last point. That is not the reason for disparity of economic growth in China. The fundamental reason is that in the east of the country there is a free market and free trade, and in the west there is still communist control. That is the fundamental reason for the disparity in economic growth.

Ms Keeble: If the hon. Gentleman asks the Chinese Government what regional and economic development policies they have and how they plan to tackle the unequal growth in different areas, they will say that they cannot do that. The same is true of the way their economy is growing and the way they develop their services. There are gaps in their policy development.

That is why it is so important that when we talk about strengthening health care services in sub-Saharan Africa we consider the problem in terms of the policies that are being developed and how those countries will be able to effect change.

We cannot apply simplistic solutions—we cannot think, "One, two, three: economic growth leads to an end to poverty," although of course the one is not possible without the other. We must also consider the areas that will not be touched in hundreds of years by trickle down.

Infant and maternal mortality have been shown to be the most difficult problems to solve. Tackling them involves looking at some of the most complex policy areas and prioritising them. Will my hon. Friend the Minister ensure that those areas receive the attention that they need? In particular, will he study the problem of tracking funding, and ensure that the UK Government's enormous financial, policy and service delivery contribution includes giving proper priority to attention to services on the ground?

4.7 pm

John Barrett (Edinburgh, West) (LD): The hon. Member for Northampton, North (Ms Keeble) made an interesting speech and gave us a good reason for strengthening the health services of developing countries. We need only look at facilities in this country to see what could be. Some people say that our facilities could be improved, but we should compare what we have across the road and in my city of Edinburgh with what some of us have seen first hand in developing countries.

Like the hon. Lady, I had first-hand experience in the Sudan, where I spoke to nurses who worked for Médecins sans Frontières. They said that they often had to put young mothers back together again after they gave birth, following Caesarean operations done with a spear. That can be compared with what I saw recently in the Edinburgh Royal infirmary, where my daughter, who now has a young baby—I am a proud grandfather—had first-class facilities. There were problems, but the care was expert. Why, through bad luck, should there be two patients to a bed in children's wards in some parts of the world—sometimes with a child under the bed on the floor—while we have expert staff and equipment in spotless hospitals? It is simply because those children live in some of the poorest countries of the world.

The health services of the poorest countries are overstretched, underfunded and understaffed. HIV/AIDs, TB and malaria were mentioned by the Minister, the hon. Member for Boston and Skegness (Mark Simmonds) and my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, North-West (Greg Mulholland). They have left huge scars on the world. However, the poorest countries, which are least equipped to deal with the problems, have suffered the most. The problems are well documented, and the challenge for us is what we—the Department for International Development, the Government, and the people of this country—can do to help.

Improving access to retroviral drugs, for example, has an enormous impact on the health of people in developing countries. Current estimates suggest that there are 16,000 preventable deaths a day from HIV/AIDS, TB and malaria. The impact of HIV/AIDS, in particular, is well documented. The harsh reality is that we are losing the fight against the disease, with 4.9 million people newly infected last year, the highest number in the history of the disease. Improving access to antiretroviral drugs is currently making a real difference. It is helping to turn the tide in the fight against the disease.

TB is also making a comeback in several nations and in certain parts of the United Kingdom. I have witnessed how the fight against the disease is increasingly undermined by poverty, the breakdown of communities and social problems, such as drug abuse. The highly effective direct observation of treatment that was devised by TB pioneer Sir John Crofton, one of Edinburgh's most famous sons, has been adopted universally, but more must be done to ensure that it is implemented effectively. I am sure that there is a greater role for the international community in that regard. A year or so ago, I saw at first hand the excellent work that DFID is doing in the fight against TB in India.

However, there is only so much that the international community can do without the co-operation of those in charge on the ground, where the problems are worse. It is hard for the international community to help developing countries improve their health services when some refuse even to acknowledge the difficulties that they face on their doorsteps. The slums of Kibera on the outskirts of Nairobi were well publicised recently in the film "The Constant Gardener", which dealt with the problem of drug testing in developing countries. About 1 million people—the population of Edinburgh and Glasgow combined—live in those slums, yet the Nairobi Government did not even accept the existence of what was happening. Such matters did not feature in plans, and the area does not have a fresh water supply or sanitation. We must press the Governments of developing countries to accept that they have a key role to play in the fight against diseases and in the development of good health services.

I visited an excellent clinic in Nairobi at which the staff and health workers were doing a great job. However, they wanted to move to better facilities across the road. A building existed, but the Nairobi local authorities had not connected water or electricity supplies. The doctors told us that they had been waiting eight years for the building to be connected to supplies. One of the reasons they were told why they could not be connected was because new hotel developments were being built in the city centre and needed the water supply for bedrooms and swimming pools. There must be an acceptance by the Government that, if they work with other Governments, certain advances can be made.

I am sure that the Minister will agree that part of our struggle is forcing those Governments to do more to help their countries. The international community and NGOs will be fighting a losing battle for ever if Governments show a disregard for the well-being of their citizens. I urge DFID to step up the pressure on those Governments, to force them to help their own people whenever possible.

Mention has been made of the importance of Governments recognising their role in recruiting staff. Such practice has often been described as poaching nurses and doctors from abroad. I had a similar experience to my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds,

[John Barrett]

North-West when I visited a care home in my constituency. The care assistants were fully qualified nurses and I was told that a fully qualified doctor had worked there for a next-to-nothing wage as a care assistant, until his qualifications were recognised in this country. Clearly, there is a long way to go. However, given that such matters have been mentioned by previous speakers, I shall not dwell on them.

I am sure that many hon. Members will be familiar with the work of Dr. Gbary of the World Health Organisation. He is the adviser on human health resources. His research estimated that 23,000 of the best trained medical staff leave Africa each year for the developed world. It is a particularly frightening statistic when we consider that there are only about 800,000 medical staff in the whole of Africa. The hon. Member for Boston and Skegness referred to Malawi and said that, out of 12 million people, there were 100 doctors and an estimated 2,000 nurses.

To put such matters into perspective, almost half of the recent 16,000 staff expansion of the NHS came from the recruitment of health professionals who were trained outside the United Kingdom and Europe. My hon. Friend the Member for St. Ives (Andrew George) raised the extreme case of Swaziland, where, in the past two years, 200 nurses have been trained, and 150 of them have since moved to the UK. I am sure that the Minister will agree that those are sobering statistics.

Hon. Members may be aware of the recent study by the university of London. It noted that although the serious consequences of a brain drain are increasingly recognised, the UK's demand for health professionals has affected the countries of sub-Saharan Africa more than any other part of the world. That has not been fully appreciated. We cannot hide the shameful fact that we have played a particularly prominent part in the process, with an estimated 31 per cent. of our practising doctors having been trained overseas. That compares unfavourably with rates in other European countries of a similar size. In France and Germany, for example, the proportion of practising doctors trained overseas is only about 5 per cent. I hope the Minister agrees that we have a responsibility to take a lead in tackling the problem.

We cannot be surprised that skilled people will want to move in search of a better-paid job. However, the tragedy is not only that we employ many skilled medical professionals from countries that desperately need them, but that when they arrive in this country they often end up working in lower-paid, lower-skilled jobs.

I do not want to be unfair to the Government, because they and the Department for International Development have done an awful lot of good work on the problem, which is very complex. I acknowledge that efforts to prevent doctors and nurses from coming to the UK will not necessarily prevent them from going elsewhere. The point is that it is our responsibility, as a major beneficiary of that medical brain drain, to take the lead in addressing the problem. The real challenge is to improve conditions back home so that medical professionals want to, and can, stay in their own country, where they are most needed and will make most difference. So far we have not done enough, and what we have done has not had maximum impact. However, I compliment DFID on its work in Malawi. The £100 million pledged for better health services, better training and higher salaries for doctors, nurses and other health workers in Malawi has been a great success.

It is important to improve awareness and understanding of health issues in the poorest parts of the world. In just over a week's time, I, along with a few other members of the International Development Committee, will visit Sierra Leone to see how a post-conflict country can develop, and develop its health service, too. That country currently has the highest risk of maternal death in the world. The vast majority of cases have easily preventable causes, including infection and obstructed labour. In Sierra Leone, as elsewhere, part of the problem is the lack of basic health education. In some areas there is a history of beliefs that it is natural that some women will die during childbirth. The idea that that is somehow the price that is paid is clearly outdated and simply not true. The price is far too high.

In many areas of Sierra Leone, lack of basic health education results in pregnant women shunning medical facilities and choosing instead to give birth at home with the help of a traditional birth attendant. Consequently, infection, disease and serious complications during birth are commonplace. There is little point in providing health services if people do not want to use them or do not understand why they should use them. Improving the basic understanding of health issues is another thing that we must address if we are to improve the effectiveness of health services in the poorest countries.

The challenge is to improve health services in such countries, and action must be twofold. We must do all that we can to tackle the serious problems that the countries face. Antiretroviral drugs, more hospitals, more staff and better education will all play their part. However, we must not pretend that we can treat those problems as we would do health issues in this country. We can spend money on drugs, we can help to halt the exodus of trained medical staff, and we can help to fund hospitals, but if the underlying reasons for the poor health of a country are not dealt with, we will for ever be firefighting.

Hon. Members will be aware that the greatest advance in health provision in this country was the advent of universal access to safe, reliable drinking water supplies. In the long term, no one single thing will do more to improve the health of people in developing countries than securing a clean drinking water supply. That would make a huge difference across sub-Saharan Africa and beyond. I often hear talk about targeting aid where it will be most effective, and securing that drinking water supply would be as effective an outcome as we could hope for.

The basics required for a healthy population are still missing in many parts of the world. Until we get to grips with such basic problems, we can only do so much with hi-tech medical equipment and the latest drugs. Crippling poverty, poor sanitation and lack of clean drinking water are not problems that can be solved in the hospitals and medical centres.

As well as support from outside, there must be political will and determination within developing countries. How often do we see desperate conditions and non-existent health services in countries with natural resources, corrupt Governments and high spending on the military and small arms? Sudan is just one example that comes to mind. We must keep up the pressure on such Governments so that the good work done out in the field by DFID, NGOs and many others is not cancelled out by the actions of the very Governments with whom they should be working.

4.21 pm

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): I am grateful to be able to make a brief contribution to the debate, in which I shall flesh out the points that I made in my interventions.

Here we are in 2006, 100 years on from the formation of the Labour party, whose presence in Government we now enjoy. I have been a member of that party for well over a third of its life. Could its founding fathers and the other people in that upper room ever have envisaged that we would reach the present position in international development from what was then the empire of Great Britain in Africa, Asia and elsewhere? Could they have envisaged that 100 years later there would be a Labour Government with a solid and substantial majority and a good track record over nine years on international development issues? That is a serious achievement. Two of our most talented colleagues have been Secretaries of State for International Development: my right hon. Friends the Members for Birmingham, Ladywood (Clare Short) and for Leeds, Central (Hilary Benn).

The target of 0.7 per cent. of GDP is substantially within reach. The debate is about strengthening health services in developing countries, and part of the money will be used in just that way. Our economy is worth about £1,200 billion at the moment; 0.7 per cent. of that is about £8.4 billion. We are not there yet, but we are heading in the right direction. I hope to live long enough to see resources developed and allocated to health services, education, and all that comes with that, at 1 per cent. and beyond; who knows? We have played a big part in moving toward that objective.

I intervened earlier because our debates on international development are rightly sometimes dominated by the potential and activities of big government—national Governments and international organisations such the United Nations and the European Union. They are sometimes devoted to the activities of large multinationals such as the pharmaceutical companies and large charities such as Médecins sans Frontières, Save the Children and Oxfam. That is fine—of course the great bulk of development work and the contribution made by countries such as ours is through such channels. That will always be the case, but it does not tell the full story.

There are many small organisations that could play a part and tap into previously unused resources. They can use energy and ideas, they are quicker on their feet and more flexible, and they can target their support effectively. That is why I mentioned the work of Inter Care, based in Syston, Leicestershire, which I think is in the constituency of the former Secretary of State for Health, the right hon. Member for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell). It is a few miles away from my constituency and some of its volunteers live in north-west Leicestershire.

Inter Care is not some informal organisation that does not work within proper professional guidelines with high standards. The people working in it are qualified pharmacists who have taken a career break or retired early and who have worked in Africa and Asia. The purpose of my contribution is to persuade the Minister, and through him the Secretaries of State for International Development and for Health, that there is considerable scope for activities such as those provided by Inter Care.

Inter Care can contribute simple medicines, equipment and educational materials to health centres in the six English-speaking countries in sub-Saharan Africa that I listed earlier. I am talking not of some scattershot approach, but a targeted one. Each donation is sent directly to specific clinics whose staff and medical needs are known personally to the Inter Care team in the UK.

Although organisations such as Inter Care are not in a position to respond to or donate medicines for emergency or disaster situations, they are able to help significantly. They support the basic health care provided by local African medical staff as they try to develop their national health provision.

Earlier, we talked about the nature of the countries that receive help. They are often the poorest countries on the planet—the poorest countries in Africa, Africa being the poorest continent on the globe. If organisations such as Inter Care were not active, the poorest people in the poorest country on the planet would have no health care or pharmaceuticals at all. Those have to be given free, because such people do not have even the necessary income to acquire medicines.

Where do the resources come from? They are unused, unwanted but in-date quality medicines that are returned every day to GPs' surgeries throughout our land of 60 million people. Inter Care is tapping into only a tiny proportion of that, but is able to help 2.5 million rural people in the six countries that I listed. I am trying to encourage the expansion of such activity, rather than to allow such medicines to be wasted and destroyed.

Ms Keeble: Does my hon. Friend agree that stocks that have to be held by GP practices and are often disposed of—not necessarily because they are out of date—are available in addition to those returned drugs? They represent a huge loss for the NHS, but can be recycled as my hon. Friend describes.

David Taylor: My hon. Friend is right; enormous amounts of medicines in this country are incinerated or disposed of in safe ways. What a waste—not only of the production costs, but mainly of the benefits that would come from their use elsewhere on the planet. Sample packs unused by GPs are destroyed every day along with pharmaceutical waste. The small pack sizes that typify those trials are ideal for the small rural health units supported by Inter Care, which also benefit from gloves, stethoscopes, face masks and other items that reps leave with GPs in the UK.

My hon. Friend mentioned other sources such as batch orders, cancelled orders and so on. A large pool of material is being wasted, incinerated and set aside, but it could be used, given the will and the means. What sorts of medicines? Like us, a poor African patient is entitled to appropriate medicines of appropriate quality. No one is suggesting that any other category be utilised.

[David Taylor]

The choice of which medicines are sent is made during careful consultation between the qualified pharmacists at Inter Care and the medical staff at each clinic. The medicines sent are appropriate to particular needs and resources and are specifically requested by the clinic concerned. They must meet high standards, must not be damaged or out of date, and must be legally recognised as safe and effective in a recipient country. There may be different standards in operation in other parts of the world.

Of course, World Health Organisation guidelines are observed at all stages. They are observed when assembling consignments bound for rural parts of Africa. There will be up-to-date information on the dosages, contra-indications and side-effects and all the things that we in the west would expect as routine.

I have made a brief contribution to highlight the work of my constituents and others in Leicestershire and show that, through partnerships with local health providers, they are about the regular supplies of essential, basic medicines to nearly 100 hospitals, clinics, health centres and dispensaries in six of the poorest countries in Africa. Almost half those units receive additional support with essential drugs in the palliative care of patients with HIV/AIDS, about whom we have talked. Inter Care is active in that area as well. Like the regular consignments, those drugs are sent by Inter Care in response to specific requests, for as long as its help is needed.

I shall conclude with one quote from Sister Rosemary, who works at Matai health centre in Tanzania:

> "Inter Care has helped me for very many years as I have moved about from place to place in Zambia and Tanzania. All the places have been very short of supplies . . . but I have always been able to write to Inter Care and ask for help . . . Even if they do not have exactly what I need, they have never let me down."

That is as good a testimony as there can be for a smallish voluntary organisation, working in a rural part of an east midlands county in the United Kingdom. That work can be replicated, and more work can be done. We are just pump-priming at the moment. To be part of that in a tiny way—to be part of a Government, as a Back Bencher, that is achieving so much in terms of the development goals that we have played a large part in shaping—fills me full of pride.

A remote member of my family, Arthur Henderson, was once leader of our great party. He would have been tremendously thrilled and excited by the progress made by our Government, elected in 1997 and hopefully re-electable in 2009–10. We will be happy to carry forward the goals and improve them. Some of the greatest achievements that political historians will be able to identify, looking back on this era in 20, 30 or 40 years time, are the changes that we have made. We all came into politics to make changes for our communities, our countries and, in some cases, our globe. This area, along with others, will stick in the memory of future generations in this land and others. We can rightly be proud, without being complacent, of the successes that we have achieved in international development.

4.33 pm

Mr. Thomas: With permission, Lady Winterton, I should like to reply to the many points made by hon. Members from all parties.

Given the propensity of the hon. Member for Boston and Skegness (Mark Simmonds) to write letters requiring a considerable amount of reflection, I thought that I would start by dealing with the points that he made. He rightly talked about the importance of the Global Fund and highlighted the fact that as a Government we have doubled our funding to £100 million for both 2006 and 2007.

Nevertheless, the global fund needs more resources than were pledged at the September replenishment conference that we held in the UK. Since then, the American Government have approved more money than had been anticipated for the Global Fund, which is enormously important. A further mid-term review of the Global Fund will assess its performance and provide the opportunity to mobilise additional funds. One donor that has not yet pledged resources is the European Community. Because its budget has only just been agreed, the details have yet to be worked out, but we hope that the Community will pledge substantial funding at the mid-term review to allow the Global Fund to do even more.

The hon. Member for Boston and Skegness suggested that "3 by 5", the WHO initiative, had been a failure. I accept that it did not achieve its headline ambition by the set date, but I do not see it in those same gloomy terms. The initiative has catalysed people's focus on a treatment that is beginning to make a significant difference in sub-Saharan Africa. In 12 months we saw a trebling of the numbers having access to antiretroviral treatment, which is important progress. The international attention that has been given to such treatment, and to what needs to be done to extend access to it, is hugely important. I accept that the ambitious target of getting 3 million on treatment by the end of last year was not achieved, but there is more to do on that front, and I shall return to the subject in a moment.

The hon. Gentleman rightly touched on the importance of continuing to focus on TB. A proportion of the Global Fund's resources are directed at TB. We are also contributing £5 million over the next three years to the Stop TB Partnership. The latest international global plan for tackling tuberculosis will be released tomorrow at the world economic forum in Dallas. That, too, will give the subject the international attention that, as the hon. Member for Edinburgh, West (John Barrett) said, is so important.

The hon. Member for Boston and Skegness also spoke about user fees. We want to see them abolished. I absolutely accept that they are a huge deterrent, particularly for poor people, by preventing access to health services. We need to help developing countries with the resources that will be lost as a result of abolishing user fees, and help them to go beyond the size of their budgets so that they can expand significantly the services that they make available to all those who will want to use the health care provisions once the fees have been abolished.

The hon. Gentleman raised a number of points about drugs, and cited some statistics about their availability. Our understanding is that the market for new drugs is horribly skewed towards the developed world and away from the developing world. Indeed, some 50 per cent. of the world's drugs market is located in the Americas and 25 per cent. in Europe—but only 1 per cent. in Africa. Those bald and stark statistics give a clear indication of the need to rebalance the international drugs business towards the needs of developing countries.

I hope that the flexibilities in TRIPS—the trade-related aspects of intellectual property rights—will help developing countries to gain access to the generic drugs that they need. We accept that we have a responsibility to help the trade and health Ministries in developing countries to take advantage of those flexibilities. Indeed, we are helping the Ministry of Trade in Ghana to develop manufacturing capacity for drugs, and to take advantage of the TRIPS flexibilities.

Ms Keeble: May I press my hon. Friend on the problems being experienced in Zimbabwe? Local factories cannot buy the necessary supplies, and the Government will not allow the import of drugs. There is a real risk that the drugs supply will fail and leave patients with no help.

Mr. Thomas: Zimbabwe, as the hon. Lady and indeed all hon. Members will know, poses particular challenges for those of us interested in the cause of development, for all sorts of very obvious Government-related reasons. Donors such as this country, NGOs and UN organisations operate in an extremely difficult environment, and we have to think very carefully about what we can do to try to secure the immediate humanitarian assistance needed for people who have been very adversely affected by the Zimbabwe Government's policy. Drugs are, of course, one of the problems that we must consider.

One of the ways in which we are trying to encourage the pharmaceutical companies to support access to drugs in developing countries is to pay close attention to their pricing regimes. We seek to encourage developing countries to have different levels of pricing from those of developed nations.

We also seek to extend the number of research partnerships with the pharmaceutical industry, in which huge talent resides, to develop the drugs that developing countries need. Again, we hope that advanced market commitments will help to encourage large pharmaceutical companies to invest in research, knowing that there is the possibility of a guaranteed market for the new drugs that they deliver.

David Taylor: Of course it is important for there to be appropriate research that will be effective in the treatment of illnesses and conditions that may be found in the countries that have been supported through international development, but does the Minister accept that in the absence of a substantial framework in those very poor countries to deliver pharmaceuticals to the poorest people of all in those countries, those people cannot pay any price at all for those drugs, and that there needs to be a mechanism to ensure that they can access medicines freely, even if their nation and their Government tend to charge for that type of product?

Mr. Thomas: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, because I was going to talk about the distribution of drugs, which was the last point in a series made by the hon. Member for Boston and Skegness. It will be a huge challenge to meet the goal that G8 leaders first said that they wanted to be met, and which the world summit endorsed, of almost universal access to antiretrovirals by 2010, not only in urban areas but particularly in rural areas where the greatest challenges lie.

One of the things that we will need to consider is how we scale up investments in health systems in the next few years, so that there are health workers in rural areas and other underserved areas with the necessary resources—drugs are one obvious resource, although not the only one—so that we can help to meet that target. That is one issue that DFID is considering.

Several hon. Members, including the hon. Members for Boston and Skegness, for Edinburgh, West and for Leeds, North-West (Greg Mulholland), talked about human resources, which were fundamental to the point about distribution that my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) made in an intervention. We do have a code of practice in this country. Indeed, we are the first, and I believe currently the only, OECD country to have such a code of practice. It is not a perfect solution to the problem of health workers leaving developing countries, but the debate in this country on the code of practice has not yet focused enough on the reasons why people want to leave developing countries in the first place.

When I visited Malawi in October with the Minister of State, Department of Health, my hon. Friend Member for Doncaster, Central (Ms Winterton), we began to understand clearly why many of the health workers who have left Malawi wanted to do so in the first place. Poor pay and conditions, a lack of accommodation close to where they want to work, the great unattractiveness of working in rural areas, and an occasional lack of access to training and career development are some of the reasons why people have wanted to leave developing countries in the first place.

There are often huge pools of former nurses in African countries, either working in other parts of the public sector or the economy or, indeed, doing other things. We need to find ways in which to support developing countries and make working in the health service attractive to those nurses and workers. Perhaps those here in the United Kingdom will want to return, but more importantly, we must help to attract people in developing countries into the health service. We have put funding in Malawi to help it to expand by raising pay levels and bringing in people from the United Kingdom to boost the training capacity to begin the process of doubling the number of doctors and trebling the number of nurses over the next five years. Initial signs suggest some success, although the programme has been running only since the beginning of this financial year.

However, back in October, officials from the health Ministry in Malawi said that they were beginning to see a slight increase in recruitment and certainly the drain of people out of Malawi had stopped. We must continue to discuss such issues as an international community. It is on the agenda in Europe, as a result of which I hope that a code of practice will be established. I also hope that other OECD members will similarly consider taking a more ethical approach to recruitment.

Mark Simmonds: Is the Minister aware that the code of practice needs to apply not only to OECD members but to NGOs? A specific situation has arisen in Mozambique whereby an NGO from another country—not Britain—has poached from the Mozambique Government a senior civil servant who was in charge of health care provisions, so that person had no one within the Mozambique Government with whom to discuss the money that he had received to spend. Clearly that is a ridiculous situation, and it would be helpful if the Minister could plug it into the debates that he is having.

Mr. Thomas: We must recognise that a series of organisations beyond bilateral Governments need to engage in the recruitment of health workers. Clearly, the example cited by the hon. Gentleman is scandalous. There is no other term to describe it. While NGOs in general, such as Inter Care, near the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire, are an example of the huge good that they can do, we need to hold them accountable for their practices on occasion.

The hon. Member for Boston and Skegness referred to trade and the importance of a good deal in the World Trade Organisation's current round of talks to help countries ultimately to boost their economic growth, so that they have the resources to fund their health service themselves. The hon. Gentleman may be aware of the Abuja declaration back in 2000, in which African countries pledged to work towards spending some 15 per cent. of their national budgets on health. Several countries are getting closer to that, while some are still a long way from the target. He will be pleased to know that they also pledged in that declaration to abolish tax on insecticide-treated nets. Again, some have done so, while others have not. We must continue to engage in the dialogue.

I recognise the essential difference of emphasis between the hon. Gentleman and me on budget support, but we cannot make progress on strengthening health services in developing countries without budget support, or at least, without support to the health sector in the budget within the Government. I accept that we need to make sure that the most stringent financial management practices are being pushed and adopted in developing countries, and that is why extensive external reviews are being undertaken by organisations such as the World Bank, the International Monetary Fund and regional development banks, as well as undertaking our own stringent practices before we commit to budget support. I say again that simply giving money through NGOs or UN organisations will not see the revolution in health care that we so desperately need.

The hon. Gentleman rightly says that we need to ensure that countries outside the UK deliver on aid commitments. He specifically mentioned Germany. One reason why we continue to push the international finance facility with enthusiasm is because it will help to bring forward those aid commitments. He asked how we safeguard the way in which debt relief moneys are spent. We do not give debt relief until an effective poverty reduction plan is in place, and we expect there to be stringent financial safeguards. It would be astonishing if an effective poverty reduction plan did not include investment in health care. That is part of the dialogue.

On bird flu, we have committed an additional £20 million to the World Health Organisation, which is leading the assessment of the preparedness of developing countries to deal with the threat of bird flu.

The hon. Member for Leeds, North-West raised specific points about the code of conduct, which I have addressed. He also talked about our investment in the health sector in Malawi, and the possibility of people from Zambia, Uganda and other nearby countries being sucked into that sector. We are working on strengthening health services in a range of sub-Saharan African countries, so we are addressing the problem that he is worried about.

My hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Ms Keeble) talked about Schools for Africa: an excellent initiative, the launch of which I am privileged to have attended just before Christmas. I pay tribute to her campaigning for orphans and vulnerable children, particularly the campaign that she has persistently waged with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and me to ensure that we track the way in which money is getting to the grass roots in developing countries, so that organisations such as KENWA, which she mentioned, have the resources that they need. They are a fundamental part of the capacity required to support orphans and vulnerable children.

The next meeting of UNICEF's annual global partners forum is approaching fast and will be in the UK. My hon. Friend will know from our discussions that on its agenda is the issue of getting money to the grass roots and what we should do about the blockages in some countries that stop money getting to organisations such those that she mentioned. She went into some detail about the problems faced by KENWA. I already have a commitment to write to her as a result of our correspondence, and I repeat that commitment. I will look into the problems faced by KENWA and come back to her.

My hon. Friend was right to remind my Department and the Government of the need to focus on the health of infants and women. We are increasing investment in safe motherhood programmes in several countries including Malawi, Pakistan, Bangladesh, Kenya and Nepal, which I visited in July 2004. Simple things such as bicycle ambulances have made a huge difference there in helping to get women who are having complications with their pregnancies into local health facilities. The programme is helping to fund investments in better equipment and training, so that when mothers and would-be mothers get to the hospitals concerned, they have access to the necessary services.

I come back to the point about the need to scale up, which we as a Department accept absolutely. That plays a part in our conversations on the comprehensive spending review, and I am sure that there will be further discussions on it in the coming months.

The hon. Member for Edinburgh, West made several points, which I have broadly covered already. The one that I have not covered is his point about the need to continue to encourage the international community outside the UK to focus on investment in basic health services. The focus of the World Health Assembly and the UN summit on these issues is hugely important and must continue.

In reminding us of that great day in history when the Labour party was formed, my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire rightly paid tribute, by implication, to the leadership of my right hon. Friends the Prime Minister, the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Secretary of State for International Development for the way in which they have championed investment in international development and health services. He also rightly paid tribute to the excellent work done by many NGOs in sub-Saharan Africa, in particular, in the absence of any other support. He talked about Inter Care, too, and I commend him and that organisation on their work.

I hope that hon. Members feel that I have done justice to the points that they raised. This is a debate that we will return to, and we should continue to do so.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at four minutes to Five o'clock.
